Perhaps that was the crux of her indomitability. Shizuru had always done things people said could not be done, headed for places people said could not be reached. She had transgressed boundary after boundary, accelerating so quickly in a direct road to her own assured and inevitable greatness that all her opponents actually risked being run over in crossing her path. What was it that sped her on? The terrible infinity of her will? The ruthless immensity of her desire? Or, fuelling all of these and being the root cause of them, the divinity from the drop of godly ichor in her veins? The woman seemed to acknowledge no barricades, seemed to know no limits. She dreamt, she desired, she dared, she did.

Which told Chie she just might dare this again. It was clear she wanted it, wanted that girl a great deal. But would she actually be able to do it? Common sense said no, it was impossible. Yet something-some indefinable spirit-part of Chie-said yes, the woman would do it. Her reason wrestled with that judgment of her spirit, though, and argued strongly against it. How could it even be done? How could Shizuru do it suffering a crippling blow to herself and her aims? It was impossible!

But didn't I just wonder earlier if she has regard for the impossible?

That brought on another shiver. Almost as though the other woman had felt it, she spoke at once.

"Chie-han," Shizuru called. "Shall you not voice any more objections? You were thinking just then that I finally said it, no?"

"Does it seem like that, Shizuru-san?"

"Yes."

"Then, yes. I confess. It makes me feel a little rude now, having goaded you into admitting it."

"I thank you for prodding me into voicing it, at any rate," Shizuru went on amiably. She was even more herself than ever, Chie realised: wholly self-assured, confidently golden in grandeur. "Now that I have, you shall be free to voice all opinions you may hold about the idea."

Chie rubbed the rough cord of the reins between thumb and forefinger with subdued anxiety.

"Do you really want me to?" she asked, eliciting a smile. She smiled too as she went on. "Anyway, it doesn't seem like it would make much of a difference even if I did. As many opinions as I can possibly produce concerning this matter, I'm sure you can double the number with the ones you can imagine, yourself. I know you're the type of person who thinks of everything, so there's hardly a contention I can make you haven't already thought of. And probably planned for. Ye gods: knowing you, you're already listing them and working it all out now! I'm not fool enough to patronise you, Shizuru-san. Especially not to your face."

They released brief chuckles of laughter at the tacked-on qualifier. Chie shifted the reins in her hand, glad at least for the smile on the younger woman's countenance. Shizuru would be facing opposition for the decision she was about to make, anyway, and in no small measure. She would be facing enough of it without Chie having to add to that. Chie's own apprehensions would have to be put away. What would it benefit her friend if she voiced them? The only benefit would be to her self-satisfaction in having expressed them-and even that was uncertain.

A pox on self-satisfaction! She could keep her concerns to herself, she could be quiet. She could be a friend.

"Right, so that's that," she said, shrugging her shoulders with all the heaviness of Atlas tossing away the world. "I just hope you'll succeed, whatever you decide, whether you change your mind or not in the future."

"I doubt I shall," Shizuru volunteered with a smile.

"I see. Anyway, Eecastor!" Chie exclaimed, putting all the shock of the past half-hour into the cry. "You're going to cause another ruckus, you know that, right? What's with all these scandals-note that I use the word without condemnation-being started by the scions of the oldest families these days? First there was Himemiya, and then Hyde-san with his abdication of the citizenship-oh, and not to forget that scandal with the Ogasawara. And now there's you! Oh, you exalted patricians! You're all running amuck, it's all that old blood going stale!"

Shizuru was laughing.

"I know about the first two of your examples, and certainly about the last one," she said jokingly. "But what of the Ogasawara? Does it have anything to do with Sachiko?"

Chie baulked at her, immensely glad for the change of topic.

"You don't know?" she cried incredulously. "Why, I'd have thought you would!"

"I am hardly as well-informed as Chie-han when it comes to social upheavals."

"Yes, that's true: you just make them. She didn't write about it to you?" Seeing the look on Shizuru's face, she answered her own question. "No, that's stupid, she's not the writing type about things like that. Anyway, I thought someone would have told you, even if it's only that banker of yours, since it's so juicy a piece of news. Gods know Himemiya wouldn't, since she's scrupulous with her courtesy even in private letters. I once had a letter from her talking about Armitage screaming at one of the senators to stuff his bill up his arse, and she wrote it as Armitage telling him to 'please put it up his primary posterior orifice'. Loved the alliteration and the implication that there might be another posterior orifice in development-you know how often Armitage threatens to tear people new assholes-though the insult became rather too witty to convey a sense of Armitage, who's not witty at all."

Shizuru nearly howled at the tale, trying to imagine her old nemesis putting her threats in such delicate language.

"Would it be all right to tell me about Sachiko, then?" she asked.

"Definitely! You'd have heard about it eventually, anyway." Chie giggled huskily. "Actually, I've been waiting for the latest instalment in that story. It reminds me so much of a good Greek play done in parts. Shades of incest and tragedy!"

"Incest?" Now Shizuru looked surprised. "Heavens!"

"Aoi's been telling me about it through her letters, you see. Oh! I bet there's something new in the letter. Want me to check?"

She waved the scroll at Shizuru, who noted the slapdash application of the seal. The younger woman nodded.

"Why, of course, Chie-han," she said, knowing the other was eager to open the letter for reasons other than finding additional news about the Ogasawara controversy. She looked on approvingly as Chie broke the seal and began to unfurl the scroll. "About what is the scandal, at any rate?"

Chie was busily darting her eyes over the script.

"It's to do with this girl her family's adopted from one of their less-illustrious and financially-struggling relatives," she mumbled, before letting slip a chuckle. "Why does it seem like so many of the old patrician families' female heirs are turning to other females, by the way? Now, now, I'm not complaining! I just wonder if that's a way of keeping the madness from continuing through the blood, by preventing direct procreation."

Shizuru chuckled too, though she frowned in confusion at the giveaway remarks.

"Do you mean that Sachiko is with this girl you mentioned? You did mention incest, after all."

"Yes. So not really blood incest, I suppose."

"She is engaged to Suguru-han."

"Not anymore." Chie peeked from her perusal of the letter and grinned wickedly at her friend's expression. "Boggles the mind, doesn't it? I never really thought her inclined any other way, either, so you can imagine my enjoyment of all this."

"Imagine? My dear Chie-han, it is painted all over your face. I need not imagine anything."

"All right, I'm guilty. But really, did you ever think of Ogasawara going for girls? Much less for such a girl!?"

"I confess I never imagined Sachiko to be a secret Sapphic either."

Chie nearly fell from her horse with laughter.

"That's a wicked way of putting it," she chortled, barely managing to hold on to the letter as well as the reins. "Really, you aren't helping much. You know I'm a slower reader than you, so you'll have to forgive me if I'm so slow in producing the news."

Shizuru shook her head, apologising and telling her to go on.

"But do seat yourself aright, please," she provided. "If you keep twisting about like that, you shall make me fear for your safety, Chie-han."

"Well, stop making jokes, then. It's your wit that's responsible for my disequilibrium, anyway."

"That would be a great compliment to me, indeed, if the level of witticism I have is enough to unseat Chie-han from her own high horse."

"See what I mean? It's ridiculous, that's what it is. Ridiculous."

They had been laughing throughout this conversation, but the laughter stopped when Chie's face was suddenly wiped clean of all mirth, taking on a blank expression for a moment before giving way finally to a look of bewilderment.

Shizuru stared at her friend, worried.

"Chie-han," she said. "What is it? What's the matter?"

Still Chie did not answer for the space of a few seconds, gazing fixedly on the scroll in her hand as would a person at a grotesque and new creature made manifest, a creature that had yet to be named and categorised. Shizuru called again, even more anxiously.

"Chie-han, are you all right?" she asked, so worried for her friend that she actually inched closer, ready to grasp the reins or catch Chie if she should fall from the saddle. Yet, she allowed, the woman did not have the look of someone struck dumb by grief or an emotion. Chie was not pale, not seized by a passion as far as Shizuru could see. No, she merely looked what she truly was-which was utterly stupefied.

"Chie-han?"

At the third call, the senior legate finally wrested her gaze from the scroll, looking up at her commander with uncomprehending eyes. What was it they found incomprehensible? And why, Shizuru wondered, did the assessment seem to be directed her way?

"Shizuru-san, I'm surprised you didn't tell me," Chie said, slowly. "I don't... I know it's not my place to ask. But I don't understand the secrecy."

Shizuru met her eyes, confused.

"Secrecy?" she said. "What do you mean? What do you not understand?"

An awkward pause.

"It says here that you're running for praetor," came the response. "Shizuru-san, why didn't you tell me you were running for the praetorship?"

Chie had to wonder why, for the second time in the day, it was Shizuru who looked as disturbed as she felt.

Chapter 35

Vocabulaire:

1. A Sign to Ward Off the Evil Eye - The belief in the evil eye (generally associated with hexes powered by envy) was more or less widely accepted in ancient times. One way to deflect its ill effects was to simply make the sign described in the chapter below, using one hand.
2. Garum - A fishy sauce or essence very popular among the ancients; it stank remarkably, but was nevertheless used and apparently enjoyed by Romans.
3. Hymettan Honey - The renowned honey from the apiarists of Mt. Hymettos; universally celebrated for its taste, especially since the apiarists making it did not smoke the beehives prior to harvesting.
4. Praetor - An office in the Cursus Honorum (Way of Honour, the path of a Roman politician), second only to the office of consul. There were around eight praetors per year in Roman times and most were granted governorship of a province following their term. There were often a good number of praetorian hopefuls in the elections, and the top eight praetorian candidates with the most votes would be the ones voted into the office.
5. Strigil - A curved, knife-like instrument-though not as sharp as a knife, of course-that was used by Romans for bathing. Oils (scented, for those who could afford it) would be placed on the skin in lieu of today's soap and the strigil would be used for scraping off the oil and dirt afterwards.

---

Inter Nos

par ethnewinter

---

"Wait now, wait! Shizuru, be calm!"

The recipient of this barked advice lifted an eyebrow, looking singularly tranquil.

"Midori-han," she said blandly, in her softest voice. "I am calm."

Crimson eyes flicked down at the table.

"And you have spilled your wine," came the dry addition.

Midori darted a glance at the red puddle-mockingly similar to the eyes regarding her with faint amusement-that was spilling on her priceless citrus wood table. She cursed and snapped a finger for the attending servant to wipe it.

"Hmph!" she sniffed. "But this is something! You're really serious that you didn't know a thing about this?"

Shizuru released a wistful sigh. This was the second time Midori had asked the question.

"I would scarce pretend ignorance where the pretence would gain me nothing," she stated colourlessly.

"No? It seems to me you do have something to gain from all this, at any rate," Midori countered. "Praetorship is the right step towards the consulship, after all."

"Put that cleanly, yes. But there are nuances to everything and this seems no exception," Shizuru retorted. "Even so, we were talking about the pretence of ignorance just now, and not the possible fruit of this development. That much, I confess I truly do not see gainful to me."

"Well, fine, so I'll stay within the parameters," said the governor of Argus, shaking her fiery head at the other's almost legalistic approach to the conversation. "So it's clear, the topic tabled for discussion is the pretence of ignorance, for now. Agreed, Advocate? Good."

The golden head tilted: Shizuru was obviously unruffled by her mockery. She continued anyway with her presentation.

"Let's see, what have you to gain from pretending innocence here? A solid alibi, perhaps? An unbroken excuse of unawareness about such a plot?" Midori brushed her fringe from her forehead. "You have to admit it, Shizuru. If this comes through, you can end up being an elected praetor where your opponents had thought to bury you, and claim innocence of the sly-note that 'sly' is often read as negative!-associations of political manoeuvring necessary to have brought you to that victorious end. You can simply claim you had no idea and it was your 'concerned cousin's doing' all the way. It'll be a fine coup for your career!"

"A pitiful one. And not that anyone would credit that concoction of propaganda," Shizuru interrupted, looking as though she found the Argus governor's words distasteful.

"Oh, really! Some would."

"Who? Rabble? Those who know me only by name or false repute?"

"Yes, yes, and more." Midori sighed breezily. "Well, let's look at the bright side, at any rate. It's a good thing many people know your cousin's obsession with you. If the reputation your cousin has been building up for her, er... methods is half as popular as that, they'd not put it past her to stir things up like this without your approval. They'd be more inclined to believe you were just-so to speak-forced to ride the waves. That would make it a little more palatable, I think. Though it does strengthen the argument I am making too, in a way. You're the type who would be intelligent enough to count on people knowing this of your cousin, after all, and could thus capitalise better on a pretending ignorance after the fact."

"In truth, this matters not to me," the younger woman said with a touch of weariness. "Were I to be honest, Midori-han, I care little for such appearances of innocence at the moment. You have been in politics longer than I have. You must be aware as well by now that in politics we all believe the worst deceits of each other. If it would do my opponents good to believe me sly -and I do note the negative connotations here-then they shall believe me sly. If it shall fit their preconceived notions of me as cunning-I note the negative connotations of the word as well!-then they shall believe me cunning. Assignations of culpability have always been part of political manoeuvring. If it is to their advantage to make the shoe fit, they shall force it on me. I doubt my cousin's reputation would disabuse them of their desire to taint mine."

A flash of darkness brewed in the reddish eyes as she finished: "And as for that remark earlier on victories where my enemies had expected surrender, I cannot imagine you would think I would take any pleasure in informing them that any success I have is not of my own making. If you believe so, then you have been attempting to force an ill-fitted shoe on me, as well."

Midori met her stare squarely.

"That's true, that's not exactly your style," admitted the older woman, trying to ignore the sparks of warning glinting at the edges of the other's eyes. How ironic that they should be speaking about a pretence of ignorance right now! "I'll give you that much."

"Thank you."

"So-for the last time, I promise you!-you knew absolutely nothing of this?"

"Yes."

"Then I'll take your word for it."

"Again, thank you."

"You're welcome," Midori said with a frown, knowing the younger woman was now being just a little bit sarcastic in her expressions of gratitude. "But setting that aside, what are you going to do now?"

The glittering crimson embers before her settled into a more mellow glow and turned away. Midori knew where they were going, or rather, to whom.

"Setting that aside," Shizuru told her, eyes now focused on the Otomean who was sitting with them, supposedly as guarantor of her safety. "I am going to wait."

Midori made a moue of surprise and gave Shizuru a droll face of astonishment.

"Well! That's all?" she asked, looking at their raven-haired companion too. A corner of her mouth turned up when the girl just looked back at her with big eyes, arms still wrapped around the other dark-haired creature in the room: her tame panther cub. "You're going to wait ? You didn't sound too pleased about this matter just now, so I expected something much more exciting than 'to wait', I have to say."

Shizuru nodded.

"I have sent letters of inquiry," Shizuru revealed. "And I fear there is little to be done but to wait for the answers to the questions I posed in them. There is, too, the matter of waiting for the fallout of my cousin's action. Conditions as well as caution contrive against my producing uninformed, direct response-if there is even any to be made right now. I can do little else with that matter at the moment, Midori-han, so I repeat: I am going to wait."

"Do you mean by the fallout, whether you have been elected or not?"

"Yes." Shizuru clucked gently, and the two silent, black-clothed creatures in the room looked her way. She smiled at them, and Midori saw an amazing thing: every vestige of irritation seemed to drain out of the young general. "The elections should have been finished by now. Now if in case I have been elected-"

A harsh laugh interrupted her. "Of course you have! Don't pretend modesty now!"

"I am not, I assure you," came the reply with another smile, one for Midori this time. "I am simply subscribing to accurate language, given the multiplicity of variable factors and figures in this formula. I say if because the occurrence of the precise event is still an if . "

"I'm a historian, Shizuru-chan, not one of those accursed Greek mathematicians you seem to have overread! Either that, or you've been talking to the Himemiya bunch again," Midori snorted, knowing the members of that clan's proclivity for speaking in theoretical riddles, which for some inexplicable reason they thought perfectly clear and equivalent to good old plain speech! That might be because they were such old-blooded patricians. Everyone knew the old-blooded patrician families tended to eccentricity.

Witness the young woman she was addressing at the moment.

"But if you want to put it that way, fine," she said in surrender. "I'm glad you're at least honest enough to admit considering what to do if the sum of the formula is that you're elected."

"Only because the probabilities tend to it," came the answer. "As I told you, I am not succumbing to modesty quite yet. I am aware of my own popularity and of the fact that my recent accomplishments are yet bolstering my fame among the electors. As such, even with the disadvantage of being unable to campaign for votes in the city, I am of the opinion that there is a very strong possibility of garnering enough votes to at least make it among the praetors-elect."

"Well, you're right about the probability, though I still think you're being modest," said the governor of Argus. With a name and fame like Shizuru's, it was statistically impossible not to be voted into the praetorian roster. "Now going from the assumption of that probability, how about we work on the hypothesis of that 'if'?"

A smile. "That was what I was about to do earlier, Midori-han."

"Ecastor !" The older woman fluttered her hands in exasperation. "All right, already! I'm sorry for interrupting you. You've made your point, though it's not the one I've been asking for!"

There was a light shimmer of laughter.

"If I am elected as one of the praetors, I believe I shall nonetheless continue working here in the north," Shizuru told her, looking confident. "It is in my interests at the moment, since my mission is not really concluded. Of course, since the mission is more or less the preservation of our territories, you could say it would be in Hime's interests as well to have me stay on for a while longer."

Through this speech, she cast two fleeting glances at her bodyguard. Whether that young woman saw them or not was uncertain.

"I can understand why you'd feel that way, especially given that recent problem we had with the Mentulaean Murders," Midori answered, opening her eyes at her young friend. "But those buggers over the border've been pretty quiet for a while now, to be honest. Do you really think they'll be venturing into our or allied territory again soon?"

"It is not impossible. Their king strikes me as fiercely ambitious. A ruthless hothead with more than his fair share of victories against his enemies. Setbacks do not last to this king. Another invasive attempt I would not put past the man."

The older woman shrugged, sucking in her lips thoughtfully before giving judgement: "If you think so, Shizuru, I'd rather stay on the safe side and agree with you. Your predictions are usually spot-on. I haven't met the man, myself, but he does seem impetuous, going from all I've heard thus far."

She frowned reflectively.

"Just as a professional opinion," she said, "do you think I should start sprucing up defences even more?"

"Yes."

"Preparing for what?"

"The worst."

"As early as this?"

"It is never too early and it is most assuredly not too early now." Shizuru gave Midori a look that said she was deadly earnest. "I may be wrong. But I am very likely not."

"I'll talk to my people."

The mood had changed; the two women were now all-business, grave and illumined by the aura of their respective offices and authorities.

"This isn't a joke, is it?" The redheaded governor's elbows found the table and rested there, the fingers of her hands forming a cradle for her chin. Her ginger brows interrogated her senatorial colleague. "You really think Obsidian's not given up his plans for expansion towards our territories, Shizuru."

The other woman nodded.

"And how soon do you think it will be, his next strike?"

"Possibly next year. More probably the year after that."

Midori stared.

"Those are serious probabilities you're giving," she said, receiving nothing but a grim nod in response. " F uck. That's soon, that estimate!"

"You see why I need more time here," Shizuru replied, thinking of the other, for-now-secret reason she needed it, politically: the scheme she and her allies had to overrun the Mentulae before the Mentulae overran them. "If I indeed collect enough votes to be among the top eight candidates, I shall try to use a bit of political planning to get the lot for a northern province. I believe it is easily manageable."

"Yes, Himemiya will be helping you, of course. She'll have won, no If's there."

"Indeed."

"Anyone else we can count on? People in good positions?"

"Several, even here." After a smile for Midori, she added: "At least, that would be the plan."

One red brow cocked at her.

"Looking to replace someone in particular, Shizuru?" Midori guessed.

"Well, I did discover something unsavoury about one of the Himean governors in the north recently."

"That better not be me," Midori said with a grin. "I know who. You mean that tubby old wart in Sosia."

The other giggled, shooting a funny face at the listening Natsuki.

"Tubby old wart?" she repeated for the girl's benefit.

"He is, and you know you agree with me-you and Natsuki-chan," Midori answered, looking to the girl as well and throwing a wink. The sight of the colour rising on the white cheeks urged her to do more for some inexplicable reason, and she picked up something from the dish on the table. It was a sticky snack, squares of sesame seed pastry glued together with honey.

"Here, My Dear, have a nip," Midori told the Otomeian. "You've been listening to us talk for a while now and haven't taken anything to eat yet. Here we've been stuffing ourselves the whole time, so uncourtously. Surely you're famished! Go on, it's good."

Shizuru urged her on as well.

"Yes, please take it, Natsuki," she said. "I know you said that you are not hungry yet, but you should be at this time. That should tide you over until we have our dinner soon. Besides, methinks you would enjoy that. It is made with Hymettan honey, is it not?"

"Yes, it is," Midori replied cheerfully. "Natsuki-chan likes honey?"

"Yes."

"Then go on, Girl. Take it, do!"

The Otomeian took the treat with a nod of thanks, although she was conscientious enough to ask first to wash her hands in the basin they were using for that purpose on the table. Midori waited for her to take a nibble before addressing Shizuru again. Who, she noted, had an evanescent wistfulness in her eyes that said she regretted not having been the one to give Natsuki that treat. The governor sniggered to herself: Oh, young love!

"Back to our topic, Sosia would do much better in your hands indeed," she affirmed, drawing back the younger Himean's attention. "Gods know I've heard so many things about that incompetent fool running it right now! It would be perfect if you're elected and inaugurated the next governor of that province, Shizuru-chan. I'd feel much better both for Sosia's sake and mine."

"Your vote of confidence warms my heart," Shizuru replied. "It would be excellent if it could turn out that way. It would be, and yet..."

"And yet?"

"And yet I cannot shake off the feeling that I am missing something in my reckoning here."

"What do you mean? Is something wrong?"

The immediate answer was a frown, and the governor felt her own forehead wrinkle at the faint disturbance in the golden brows.

"So far, you can't deny this development seems likely to turn out a blessing for your career instead of a curse for it, despite the falsity behind the matter," Midori followed. "So why the 'and yet', Shizuru? Looking a gift horse in the mouth?"

"When it comes to this particular gift-giver, Midori-han, I am likely to subject the horse even to an anal inspection."

The governor laughed uproariously, and even Natsuki chuckled. Once the mood had settled down again, Shizuru answered the question.

"I do not know. Yes, perhaps, though the clear answer seems to be no," the blonde woman confessed, looking mildly discomfited. "I know not what I mean, to be honest, other than that I have an unsettled feeling about all of this. As though something is warning me that there is something else going on beneath it."

The olive-green eyes, youthful despite the many little crow's feet at the corners, considered her. Midori sat back in her well-padded couch and exhaled.

"Perhaps you shall tell me now that I am being paranoid?" Shizuru said, smiling a little.

The older woman denied it.

"Actually, I'm inclined to agree with you," she admitted. "Like I said earlier, Shizuru-chan, you've always had the gift of prediction. Or maybe the better word is foresight. If something's bothering you about this, then there's probably a good reason for that bother."

She reached for her cup on the table and took a long drink from it, licking the drops of wine left on her upper lip afterwards.

"You know, since you didn't know about this," she went on to say, "that probably means someone else may be planning something. Besides your cousin, I mean. I'm going with my opinion that your cousin did this in an effort to try to get you to come back to Hime or be closer to it, if you do win and get assigned a nearby province. But there's something off about it, like you said. I know your cousin has her fair share of resources too, but it's not nearly enough to pull off a successful lobby for your in absentia candidature, especially given how many envious enemies you have. There's something else, most likely."

"Or someone."

Midori felt a tremor creep up her spine, cold and feathery as a spider crawling. She held up a hand with the fingers curled into the palm save the index and little finger: the ritual gesture made to ward off the evil eye. Shizuru looked at it solemnly.

"Just this once, Shizuru, I hope your foresight proves wrong," she said, shaking her head. "I don't like the sound of that."

"It does not exactly amuse me either."

"You have too many enemies. Sometimes I just worry about you. I can't help it! Don't tell me I shouldn't."

A soft look was given to her.

"I am sorry that I should worry you so, Midori-han," the younger woman told her. "But I am also grateful for that worry you take."

The governor returned the smile.

"You should be," she joked, throwing a quick glance to the girl at her friend's side. She noted the concern in their spectator's green eyes. "Now enough of that! We're worrying Natsuki-chan too, and that just won't do, eh? Cheer up, Natsuki-chan, and don't let us glum birds worry you. Smile for your domina now and lift her spirits a little. Look at her, Shizuru."

Natsuki, flustered by the abrupt shift in interest towards her once again, underwent a series of facial twitches, unaware of whether or not to humour the request and produce a smile for the two expectant-looking Himeans. Finally, she settled for sending a wordless cry for assistance to Shizuru, her black-rimmed eyes big and blinking.

Midori produced a restrained groan.

"Oh, Jupiter," she moaned, clutching at empty air. "You're adorable! How can you stand it, Shizuru? Look at those eyes-just look at that, I say!"

Shizuru was amused by both Natsuki's expression and Midori's response to it; she laughed freely.

"The answer to your question, Midori-han," she said with a wink, "is that I do not."

And reaching for her young lover's hand, she caught it up and brought it to the water basin again, washing it meticulously and with tenderness. Midori had to grin. That was bold !

"It seems to me we have troubled you long enough," Shizuru told the governor, glancing at the open window. "See how dark it is outside! When we began, it was only dusky. No doubt you have other things to do, Midori-han, and should not have to suffer our presence any longer. We shall excuse ourselves now, for our dinner."

A twinkle animated the brown-flecked green eyes.

"Given that exclusionary note, I'm almost worried what you intend to have for dinner, Shizuru-or whom!" she chuckled out. It caused another vicious blush on Natsuki's face, which she watched with great interest. She rose from the couch and the other two followed suit. "Go on, then, Children, and do whatever you do at this time! Call it dinner, if you want. There's much more fun you can have there than talking with this old biddy, anyway."

The pair allowed the elder woman to herd them to the door, which a servant held open. The governor bade the servant keep holding it open as she stood at the doorway.

"Oh, wait, don't go yet, Natsuki-chan," she called out merrily as they walked out. She showed her cheek to them and pointed at it. "Come back here and give me a kiss first."

Shizuru shot a smirk at her friend, ignoring the incredulous look from the girl at her side.

"She shall have to decline that request, I fear," she informed the governor. "The only cheek she kisses is mine."

Midori chuckled, eyebrows wiggling frantically: "Are you sure?"

The only answer she elicited was another smile.

"Isn't someone being her usual confident self," she said to the younger woman, who flashed even teeth at her. "That's good. I have to say, Shizuru-chan, I'm glad to see you're taking this so well, threat of hidden conspiracy and all."

"I am pleased to hear that you think so."

"Well, I'd be going crazy right now if it had happened to me," Midori responded. "But then, that's the difference between us. I'm-most of the time, anyway-already crazy."

Shizuru laughed.

"Whereas I am what?" she enquired.

"Crazy too!" Midori called out with a wave, turning to go back to the room. "But crazily calm, Shizuru-chan. You're the master of being just a little too calm."

A little too calm . Shizuru pondered it afterwards: had she been that? At any rate, she preferred to seem like it to the world: tranquil and unruffled, generally a portrait of exceptional-perhaps even crazy-calm. Though it was a calm that actually evaporated as soon as she was left alone with her bodyguard, the two of them in the bath she had ordered drawn by servants encountered on the way to their room.

"The cheek!" she complained loudly to her lover, who was disrobing out of the water. She herself was already immersed in it, and it splashed as she lifted a hand to gesture angrily. "Even if she is my cousin, the sheer cheek of it! She had no right to enter my name without my consent, Natsuki."

Natsuki murmured an answer.

"No, Shizuru?

"No! Tomoe, " the elder woman ground out, sounding unusually irritated, "has nothing over me. Neither legally nor morally. None at all."

The girl was facing the mosaic-covered wall of their bath, and she glanced at Shizuru over her now-bare shoulder.

"It vexes you," she said. "It does so much, no?"

" Yes ."

"Yes, I thought. With the governor, too."

The deep-set red eyes had been trained until now on the shimmering reflection of the torches on the water. Now they looked up to see a girl's pale back, the thin blades of the shoulders sharper in the yellow light. Natsuki bent to remove her trousers: the play of muscle and bone-under-skin nearly made Shizuru forget her vexation for a second.

"Do you mean that you could tell?" she asked the other woman, admiring the sight of a small but firm, nicely rounded backside. "Earlier, when I was talking to Midori-han?"

The trousers and loincloth were draped on a stand.

"Mm-hm."

"Was it so apparent then?"

"No." The other turned around and approached her. "A little vexed, you looked. But not so much, like this."

"But you knew I was vexed like-as much as this?"

"Mmm."

"How?"

The answer was a shrug. She tracked Natsuki as the younger woman went to sit on the edge of the pool behind her, sitting with bare legs loosely crossed so that Shizuru could use them as a pillow. Once she had placed the back of her head there, she felt hands run through the wet-darkened locks of her hair. She purred against the motions, taking a few moments to enjoy the attention without words.

"It simply makes me so angry that she should resort to such a thing," she complained quietly a little later, still letting the girl massage her scalp. She produced a few guttural sounds deep in her throat in pleasure from the extended, stroking touches. "It is so inelegant, for one thing. A maladroit scheme not improved by the suggestion that there is something even more galling beneath it. Like a tumour beneath a tumour."

An exasperated sigh, followed by an exclamation.

"Oh, Tomoe!" she cried. "Does she actually think she can get what she wants this way?"

Natsuki took a few seconds to reply.

"What she wants?" she enquired.

"Yes." A pause. "You know, Natsuki. You heard earlier."

A sound of affirmation.

"That fool," the older woman murmured again a second later. "Fool and faker, troublemaker! Aaah."

The hands holding her head tilted it gently back, and she found a smile being thrown to her by the girl. Fingers smoothed out the crumple of her brow and her lashes fluttered in response.

"It hurts, no?" said Natsuki.

The Himean let her countenance express puzzlement at the unexpected question and the younger woman clarified it for her: "The pride, Shizuru?"

Up went both Shizuru's eyebrows in authentic surprise.

"I-yes," Shizuru answered, expression softening. "Yes, Natsuki. How did you know that?"

"I do not know," Natsuki replied seriously. "It just seems so. I thought."

There was a thinking pause. Shizuru waited.

"Is it because she tried tuh-to make what she wants happen with you?" came the guess, with the girl frowning at the difficulty of expressing herself. "I mean she tried to maybe force you? In that scheme?"

"Do you mean that she tried to manoeuvre or manipulate me for her own purposes?"

A firm nod.

"Exactly that!" Raising her brows, Shizuru sneered at the far wall. "I am no one's puppet."

A smooth chuckle tilted her head back again. She found Natsuki smiling, eyes glimmering with what seemed to be barely concealed amusement. After a moment, she smiled too.

"Forgive me, do I sound so insufferable already?" she enquired in a whisper, sounding like a conspirator asking about a scheme. "You should not even have to listen to this sour rant."

Natsuki shook her head.

"I listen and it is not unpleasant," she said. "For me, it is good to listen. And, too, I like when you are so insufferable and proud."

A laugh. "Is that so?"

Natsuki nodded, eyes laughing back.

"So I may talk and be as insufferable and proud as I wish?"

"Yes. It is good for you to talk."

And later, the girl added: "Because you do not talk very much, Shizuru."

" You should talk!"

They laughed together, and Natsuki explained herself. Or rather, she explained her statement by explaining Shizuru.

"You do not talk very much about such things that vex you," she told the older woman. "So it is good that you talk about them sometimes. If it is to me, it is good. I do not tell others. And I promise to listen. I will try do it well."

Shizuru turned around to face her.

"I am sure I can vouch for your success in the last assertion, at the very least," she agreed. "If all the rest of it is so, I thank you again."

"So," the Otomeian said. "Talk now."

"No. Kiss first."

There was a chortle.

"Oh," Natsuki said with a frown, pretending to chide her. "You."

"Me, yes."

"Always that."

"Oh, yes."

As their lips moved against each other, opening and closing, the Himean lifted a hand to touch the other's throat. The first stroke of her finger down that smooth skin caused a sigh. Her fingers went to the pearl dangling from the necklace around the girl's neck. She slicked its surface with the drops of water on her thumb.

"So," she teased, once it was over and Natsuki regarded her with darkened eyes. "Talk now?"

"Uhhh."

"Would you fetch the oils first, though? Let me bathe you, Your Highness."

Once Natsuki had complied with her request-sparing a sniff for the 'Your Highness' remark, of course-and she herself set about her task, she found herself calming swiftly, soothed by the simple act of being able to touch her lover in so natural a way. The oil she chose to smooth over the girl's body tonight was scented lightly and was fresh and floral: a little different from the scents she herself often used, which were generally of a stronger fragrance. She felt the more lightly-scented oils suited her companion better, though, and that judgement met Natsuki's approval.

"I am sorry for sounding so cantankerous, though," she apologised again. "It is simply that, as you observed, it offends me so much. There is my pride to consider, for one thing, but even without that, there is the matter of my plans. It is as though someone else is imposing what they want on what I want for the future-and can I really take that absent complaint?"

Natsuki's head inclined to one side, a few black tendrils brushing her face. Her hair was drawn up into a simple knot, as was Shizuru's.

"What you want?" she echoed.

"Yes."

"It is what? What you want."

Shizuru nearly blurted out, I want you. Taking a moment to breathe deeply instead, she eventually answered: "Many things, Child . I am a greedy person. I want many things."

Her companion made a thoughtful sound.

"But because of this, is what I intend to say," the girl said. "What of those things are affected? Because of this?"

"Where do my desires conflict with her trickery, you mean?"

"Yes, that."

The older woman did not answer for a while, choosing to finish smoothing oil over two coral-tipped breasts first. She lingered in running her cupped hand over their curves, pausing over the gentle swell of the left one. She could feel the steady throb of Natsuki's heart as it sped in reaction. She marvelled at the thought of that fragile, mysterious organ responding so quickly to her merest touch, that organ many of the Grecian doctors claimed to be the seat of both feeling and life. She had seen it before-from autopsies, surgeries, battle, and the like-and had found nothing particularly remarkable about it. A fist-sized lump of flesh, surprisingly small for its importance. Easy to cut apart and tear open. She wondered if Natsuki's heart was only that tiny as well. She wondered if it was that easily torn.

Finishing her work, she gathered the younger woman in and wrapped her arms about the slender waist, slippery now with the oil, and kissed one pink-shelled ear.

"I suppose the conflict comes from many points, Natsuki," she whispered into that ear, the girl shivering in her arms and holding on to her shoulders. "Too many to say, or perhaps even few but too complex. Besides, there is what I told Midori-han earlier: the suspicion my instincts insist on having against this scheme. That, added to all these things, is more trouble than I consider permissible for even my cousin. All these things represent perhaps a little too much risk, even for me."

She sighed ruefully and gave the ear another kiss.

"I am sorry it is hard for me to explain at this moment, Darling," she said. "But I am so vexed!"

Natsuki turned her head and nuzzled the side of Shizuru's face in response to the utterance. The older woman felt a smile growing on her lips, knowing the girl was trying to comfort her. She knew too that it was working.

"Come, Natsuki," she said while facing the younger woman. "Stand over there and I shall fetch the strigil."

The Otomeian did as demanded but also had her own request to make.

"Ah! Shizuru," she said. "I will, ah, I may put the oil too, please? On you?"

A smile. "Of course. I was about to ask."

"Then... you will come here?"

After such a look and from such beautiful eyes, she thought, who could possibly do otherwise? Later, once Natsuki was well under way with her work, she touched the split triangle of muscle on the younger woman's abdomen. Her finger traced the groove down the middle, coming to rest on Natsuki's navel. She smiled at the way her finger seemed tempted to glide down the oil-slick surface and straight between Natsuki's legs.

"How silly we are!" she cried, splaying her hand then on the taut stomach once more. "I should have finished scraping off the oil from you first before letting you apply mine. Now we are both slippery as eels."

To illustrate her point, she attempted to pull the girl to her by taking hold of one lean limb, which slipped from her grasp almost immediately. Natsuki laughed with her as she continued trying to find purchase on the girl's arms and sides, her fingers failing from lack of traction.

"Everything simply slides."

Natsuki shrugged.

"Slippery and wet, hm? Why Natsuki, did you plan this?"

"Hmm? No!"

"No?" Shaking her head in mirth, Shizuru patted the girl's shoulder. Her hand slipped off after the first pat, of course. "You do not even know what I am suggesting. Defensive, are we not?"

The exquisitely white brow creased as Natsuki moved away and returned with the strigil.

"I know," Natsuki muttered. "What you suggest, Shizuru."

"Indeed?"

She put the flat of its tip to the girl's chin and lifted it, the girl acquiescing to this handling with a touch of laid-back defiance.

"Forgive me for teasing," Shizuru apologised, kissing her on the nose. "Forgive this horrid, inadequate person for her incessantly lecherous thoughts about you, because you are so beautiful it is hard to avoid thoughts of dragging you to the floor and having you right there. Now may I finish bathing you before the temptation becomes too much?"

A smile, slow to spread but sincere in fulfilment, was her answer.

As she scraped the strigil against the firm skin of Natsuki's arm, the girl put to her a remark disguised as a question.

"Shizuru," that young woman said. "You like very much to tease, no?"

"Dear me," Shizuru grinned. "Is it so apparent?"

Natsuki scoffed.

"Yes, I suppose I do like it-with certain people," Shizuru admitted, pouring water over the just-scraped arm. The long muscles underneath came alive, tightening for an instant at the shock of the water. "But so you know, my teasing is special when it comes to you. I only ever tease you this way."

"Lecherously?"

She laughed and flicked the girl lightly on the temple with a finger. Natsuki flinched, one green eye shutting as she slanted her head away from the tap.

"That is one way of putting it! Sometimes, you see, you simply make me feel so licentious," Shizuru joked, now applying the strigil very carefully on the unblemished curves of the other's backside. "It becomes so that I worry on occasion that it is, as I jested earlier, Natsuki's plan. You are not trying to turn me dissipated, are you?"

Natsuki loosed a husky giggle, one that remained in her eyes long after the sound.

"Dissipated?" she echoed. "You?"

"Yes. That sounds like sarcasm, Natsuki. Is it?"

"Dissipated," the girl said again. "You only wuh-wuh-want it five times, each day."

Shizuru was hugely amused that even now, the girl could stutter.

"You, dissipated?" Natsuki finished, gaining confidence again since Shizuru did not tease her for the stammer. "Hmm. No. Not possible."

The other woman laughed into her lover's black hair.

"So it was sarcasm," she said, snapping her teeth in a loud click near the girl's ear. As expected, Natsuki flinched. "Since when did you get sarcastic, meum mel ? From where did you get that?"

Another chuckle, after which the girl pushed away from her to deliver an incredulous glance more accusatory than a pointing finger.

"Oh, well, all right then," Shizuru conceded, going back to scraping her with the strigil. "At least you learned from a master."

Natsuki smirked.

"But," she said. "You admit it, Shizuru?"

"Admit what?"

"You are dissipated."

"Oh, you like it."

That earned her a smack of the palm on her shoulder.

"You," said the girl, trying to look angry, "are terrible."

"No, I," Shizuru retorted merrily while rinsing the strigil, "am hungry. Come, let us finish this bath quickly so that we can have dinner."

She held out the strigil to the other woman.

"Would you be so kind as to help me with this, Natsuki?"

Natsuki complied and worked quickly on her with the implement, after which both of them rushed through the rest of their ablutions and out of the water. Drying each other off, they dressed in their night clothes and moved to their room, talking all the way to the dinner table. It had been set by the governor's servants during their bath, as per Shizuru's instructions, so that the couple would not have to suffer other presences in what they had both begun to consider their little nook away from the world.

"I saw Yuuki-han speaking to you earlier," Shizuru was telling the younger woman as she pulled out a chair at the table, all the while ruffling the ends of her hair to remove excess moisture. "What was that? Did she want anything?"

Natsuki paused in doing the same thing to her own hair, which cascaded in black tangles over her shoulders and was wetting her nightdress. Shizuru noticed it and stopped in the act of seating herself. She went to place a cloth towel over the Otomeian's shoulders first in order to absorb the moisture from the girl's mane. She ruffled the black hair fondly before returning to her own seat.

"The primipilus wanted to borrow some of mine," Natsuki murmured quietly after thanking her in the same low voice. It seemed as though the warm, rather mellow atmosphere was more suited to subdued tones. "My troopers."

"For what?"

"Practice. Joint exercise."

"Oh, I see. When did she want this?"

"Two days from now."

"I see. You agreed, I suppose."

"Yes." The leaf-green eyes darted towards her, and she realised they were seeking approval. Silly girl, Shizuru thought. "I said it was fine."

"That is good." She rearranged the cloth towel on her own shoulders. "I hope she was nice in asking you for that?"

"Um, yes."

"Um, really? You need not hold back for me, you know. And do not worry, Nao-han will not get in trouble even if she was unkind in addressing you," she lied to the girl's face. "I am merely curious."

"Yes. She was nice."

Shizuru regarded the girl attentively, searching the cool green eyes for any indication of dissembling. She was glad to find none, although, truth be told, that was just what she had expected. Her favourite primipilus might tend to abrasiveness sometimes, but was not actually malicious-at least, that was what she thought. If anything, Shizuru even suspected that the primipilus rather liked the girl.

Though not too much, I hope, she tacked on mentally, with a nod when Natsuki restated her answer. She cast her glance at the dishes on their table.

"Enough of that. Let us eat! Let me see, what do we have here?" she began, running her eyes over the food that had been prepared for them by the governor's kitchen staff. A smile came to her as she recognised the kinds of dishes she and Natsuki liked best, a compromise between two culinary tastes that Midori's cooks had learned by now due to the regularity of pointers sent to them by Shizuru through her own servants. Shizuru was conscious that her foreign companion was used to food that might be anywhere from fairly close to shockingly distant to her own cuisine, and had thus set out to find what sort of food Natsuki liked best. Or least, as it were.

It was not as easily accomplished as one might have imagined: Natsuki being Natsuki, the girl generally accepted whatever was put on her plate with practical and courteous grace. She would not carp on it if she disliked it and often held her face so still that the older woman was often hard put to tell if she actually approved of it or not. By this time, however, Shizuru had more or less learned how to interpret the slightest motions or changes in the girl's expression. It was thus that she painstakingly catalogued what Natsuki liked and disliked, modifying her own diet-since they often shared the same food-for the sake of the younger woman's palate.

The food before them now was cognisant of those changes, being devoid of strongly-flavoured items but cooked excellently, tasty with the undisguised natural flavours of meat, spices and fruit. That Himean staple, garum, was completely absent now, Shizuru having given it up after apprehending that Natsuki's dislike for it was such that her nostrils would pinch at the least trace. Instead of that fishy essence, the roast bird before them was redolent with the aroma of cooked garlic in olive oil, stuffed with fresh herbs and sweet onion. There were two different salads of lettuces, celery, cucumbers and other fresh vegetables, each one dashed over with a different oil-and-vinegar dressing. There was even a serving of goose liver for each of them, something Shizuru knew Natsuki would enjoy since she had noticed the younger woman's fondness for that little delicacy. Rolls of the freshest bread, fig-filled pastries and at least three local cheeses completed the meal. Shizuru approved of it and, looking at Natsuki, knew the girl did too.

"How is the salad, Natsuki?" she asked as the other took a bite of lettuce and cucumber from one of the bowls. "Not bad?"

Natsuki looked sincerely pleased by her mouthful and swallowed first before answering.

"Good," she said. "You try it too?"

"Yes, I shall." She decided to finish the bread in her hands first, though, and dipped another morsel of it in the saucer of olive oil for that purpose. She put it in her mouth and chewed, savouring the delicacy of the flavour; the oil was obviously of the first press. "Oh, this tastes so good. I have been hungry!"

"But you ate before, too. Earlier."

"The treat with Midori-han? Oh, that was a snack, Darling. An actual meal is still different. The body recognises that."

"You eat much."

"Actually, Natsuki, I am merely a moderate eater." She smiled at the younger woman. "It is only that your appetite is so scanty that, by relativity, I seem to be quite the epicure."

"Oh."

"Well, it is fine if you eat a little less, I suppose. You are built smaller than me, after all." She darted a meaningful glance at her dining partner. "Just not too little, hm? Especially in this climate and this season. Winter is the time for building up resistance to the cold."

Natsuki reached for some roast fowl.

"Winter will finish soon," the girl observed. "Spring comes."

"True. The thaw should start in a few more weeks." She took Natsuki's cup and hovered her other hand over the jug on the table.

"What do you want, Natsuki? There is wine and water, and I had them bring in some fresh cow's milk tonight, too. I suppose you would like the milk, child that you are?"

The girl smiled sheepishly at her guess and the tease. When the cup was filled, Shizuru put it by Natsuki's plate.

"You really do like it, don't you?" she remarked, as Natsuki put the cup to her lips and drank deeply, eyes bright with pleasure. "I should remember to have them bring some each night for you. Or whenever you want it. Simply tell me."

"Mm. Thuh-thank you."

Natsuki was confused by the older woman's reaction, however, which was to start laughing. Shizuru extended a hand to her and held her chin.

"Silly Natsuki," the older woman said, swiping a thumb at the white moustache of milk that had been left on the Otomeian's upper lip. "Do not move. There."

She sucked on her thumb afterwards and grinned at her pink-cheeked companion.

"Sweet," she announced humorously. "Now I can say that Natsuki is truly milk-skinned."

Natsuki made a face. They continued conversing easily this way as they ate, having grown comfortable enough with each other to talk about simple matters in a manner that made both of them feel, secretly, that these simple and little things were of great weight after all. Now and then one of them would hand-feed the other with a tiny morsel, a crumb of bread, a piece of fowl, or even an olive round and shiny of skin. The one being fed would often lean forward after taking the food, catching the tips of the other's fingers with the slightest of kisses or the barest nip of the teeth. Once, after a particularly sudden tease, the younger woman even threw an olive at the blonde, who laughingly caught it and popped it into her mouth. They were simple, casual interactions between two women who had only ever been able to be this way with each other.

Tiny things, pondered Shizuru while offering the other a bite of her dessert: an exquisite pastry envelope of syrupy figs suspended between layers. The younger woman accepted and she fed the girl from her fingers. A tiny bite, another tiny thing. All of these are such tiny things, little events that shall never be recorded by the great historians nor memorised by the scholars of the next generation. They pale in size and significance to the grand pageant that is history. Possibly no one will ever know that they took place, aside from the two of us. And that only demonstrates yet again how little they touch, how little they are.

Natsuki swallowed the bite she had taken; lucent green eyes came to life.

They are all so tiny.

"Um, thank you, Shizuru. It is good."

And that is unbearable because they feel like all that matters to me.

"With you, Natsuki, the infinitesimal becomes the infinite. Did you know that?"

The girl was halfway through offering her a piece of cheese and paused at the statement, looking confused.

"I am sorry, what?" she said gently, hand-and cheese-hovering near the older woman's mouth. "Shizuru, what is it?"

Shizuru waved it off and took the cheese in front of her with her teeth. She sat back and smiled at the girl, who produced another confused look before turning back to her own plate.

"Natsuki?"

"Hm?"

"Thank you."

The space of a heartbeat. And then another smile, another tiny but infinitely powerful thing.

"Mm-hm," hummed Natsuki.

After that, they fell to their food again in companionable silence, busy with the motions of picking and chewing and swallowing. It did not escape Shizuru that Natsuki cast a few glances her way, as though intending to say something but nervous about it. She knew that if she left the girl alone for long enough, the latter would eventually say what was on her mind. Or so she hoped, at least.

Her hopes were justified when Natsuki called her.

"Shizuru?" As the elder woman looked up from a mouthful of salad, the girl went on. "What you said? To the governor?"

Shizuru chewed swiftly to clear her mouth.

"Yes, Natsuki, what of it?"

Natsuki took a while to answer.

"You... no, she said it may be there is someone?" she eventually said, looking right at the curious, golden-lashed red eyes. "Earlier, she said this?"

"Someone?"

"Someone else behind your nomination?" Natsuki elucidated. "You worry about it?"

For the briefest second, Shizuru wondered at Natsuki's countenance, which should have had concern painted over it given the tone in which her enquiry had been made. Instead of that, it had a curious disparity of expression between the eyes and the rest of the young woman's visage, which was frozenly neutral. The discrepancy arose here, because in contrast to the almost innocent set of lips, cheek, and brow, the eyes were disturbingly animate, a turbulent and tempestuous green.

Oh, she thought, studying the girl. I see.

She reached for Natsuki's hand and brought it to her lips, kissing it.

"Yes, I worry about it, Natsuki," she said. "I admitted that earlier and I admit it now. Truth be told, I do not think it shall cease to worry me for a while, until I finally know what has happened and have taken suitable measures to address it. It cannot be helped because I do not know yet . "

She gazed deep into the emerald eyes before going on.

"I do not know who this someone else is, Natsuki, nor do I have any definite suspicions at this point. Did I have any, I would take action on them myself. But that is not the case, and so I can do nothing but be patient. Worry may be present, but I fear it must be only that, for a good while, until we know how to nip it at the root. We must be patient."

Natsuki gave her that look, the one that transfixed her afresh each time. It was a strange way of looking that she had yet to see from any other set of eyes: a way of looking that seemed to teeter on the edge of forever.

"We can... yes. We will be patient," said the author of that look, softening instead of breaking the spell. "But we will be alert, too."

Black brows drew close and she added: " / will be alert, too."

Shizuru understood the message in the husky words. For an instant, she was caught between the urge to kiss her devoted protector and the urge to remain as she was, basking in the ferociously determined gaze of those large eyes. She would have liked to do the former, but then Natsuki would shut her eyes, and Shizuru did not want that because she wanted to keep looking at them for a little while longer-an eternity, even. That left her with the latter choice. But to have someone look at you that way and not touch them was simply insupportable. So she wavered, saying nothing, until she finally remembered the thin hand that was still in her own. She brought it to her mouth again and kissed it once more, this time slipping two of the finely-shaped, many-scarred fingers past her lips.

"Thank you, Natsuki," she said after pulling them from her lips with a wet sound. "Thank you again. That takes at least half of my worries away, you know, to know you are looking out for me."

The other woman nodded, blood swarming onto her cheeks. After a short silence, she reclaimed her fingers reluctantly from the Himean's hand. Her eyes were downcast.

She was looking at her fingers, which Shizuru had sucked.

"I have never feared much on that score," the elder woman spoke up. "And I know I could not ask for anyone better than you beside me, to see me through my days safely."

Natsuki nodded.

"Given that position," Shizuru continued, before stopping abruptly and seeming to consider her words. "That importance you have to me, I would also caution wariness from-"

She stopped before finishing and her companion wondered at it because it was so unlike her. The crimson eyes widened the slightest fraction for a second, as though she were just now coming to see something important. The next instant, she had Natsuki's hand back in hers and was staring intensely at the younger woman.

"Natsuki, " Shizuru said, her voice soft as always but obviously hardened underneath, the backbone of steel it held on the most urgent occasions showing under the lilting cover. "Be wary too. You must be wary too."

Natsuki stared.

"You must be careful. Not only for me, but for yourself as well," Shizuru continued. "It is true that I am one of your concerns when it comes to safety-but your first concern must still be for yourself. Look out for yourself first, Natsuki. Promise me."

The girl was too astounded to reply.

"I am not saying I do not want your protection-I am not so ungrateful," Shizuru pressed on, face rendered fiercer by the lamplight. "But I am not so ungrateful either to consider you even remotely expendable . Remember that I would always prefer to weather an injury myself rather than have you weather it, especially if the damage to you would be greater than the potential damage to me. Do not jump in front of me to take arrows if it is possible for me to simply hold my shield against them. Do you understand me? Never place yourself in jeopardy, not even for my sake. All right?"

Her hand was tight on the other's now, almost crushing the slender fingers together with her own though she did not realise it. Still Natsuki made no move to take her hand away, and simply sat there looking-what was the word? Dumbfounded, perhaps?

A short while later, the girl finally spoke.

"Shizuru," she said quietly, sounding both explanatory and argumentative. "I am your bodyguard."

As though that were the key to the lock of her fingers, Shizuru released her hand. And though the younger woman did not understand it, the Himean actually seemed disturbed by that answer. Her red eyes were hooded, but the faint line that had gouged itself between both eyebrows betrayed the turmoil in her.

And then she answered: "Perhaps."

Natsuki angled her head, a scowl on her face now as well.

"Perhaps?" she repeated questioningly. "I am your bodyguard 'perhaps', Shizuru?"

Shizuru said nothing, her eyelids now pressed tight together. Natsuki persisted, voice becoming even throatier with her disturbance.

"Shizuru, that is not so," she insisted. "What is it that you mean? Do you say I am no longer-"

"I said perhaps," Shizuru interrupted, silencing her with a burning stare.

The young woman's jaw snapped shut, full of resentment at what she perceived to have been a disowning of her official position.

"My bodyguard," Shizuru continued nevertheless, seeing the passion in the exquisitely pale, twitching face. "Yes, perhaps you were. Once."

Natsuki said nothing, a heartbreaking spasm flickering over her countenance at fear of being cast off. Still the older woman went on, her next words dispelling the girl's fear.

"Not now, Natsuki," Shizuru told her. "Not any longer. Now you are just so much more."

Chapter 36

Greeting and thanks to all the readers. I daresay this chapter had my fingers aching: it was typed in one sitting. It makes one appreciate the work typists and secretaries do, and even then only marginally. I imagine my typist found me terribly irritating back then, as I used to ask someone to type for me-mostly when my carpal tunnel seizes me. Imagine having someone say, while pacing restlessly before you, "Quote it is a most difficult thing comma end quote she said full stop. She looked at the other woman and winced because her friend had again drifted off to sleep full stop. Edit - omit 'because' and replace it with a colon, would you?"

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Contubernalis (L.) - A military cadet. Most (wealthy or prominent) Romans sent their children to fill this position come time for their requisite military service. The contubernalis was expected to serve his superior, whether legate or general, in the capacity of an attendant, gaining experience from observation and exposure.
2. Dann and Dagda - Ancient gods; part of Celtic lore.
3. Dis , "To Dis with it!" - Dis being Pluto, this would be something similar to the modern expression, "To hell with it!"
4. "Gerrae!" (L.) - "Rubbish!" or "Nonsense!"
5. Insulae (pl. L.), i nsula (s. L.) - T he ancient equivalent of our modern apartment buildings.
6. Meum mel (L.) - Literally "my honey"; a Latin endearment.
7. Octet - Yet another division for the Roman military. The men of a century were divided into groups of eight or octets, with each octet having its own leader.

8. Pilum (s.), pila (pl.) - The name of the Roman military spear.

9. Pilus prior, primipilus - Names for the highest-ranking centurions in the legion. There were actually many grades of centurions, from first-spear centurions to second-spear centurions, and even now there is much ambiguity about the number of ranks. The primipilus can also be called the primus pilus.

10. Praefectus (specifically praefectus fabrum) - The official supplier of the army; in this story, the role is occupied by Tokiha Takumi.

---

Inter Nos

par ethnewinter

---

Winter sunlight crept into an otherwise dark room, differentiated into slanting rays by fretted shutters. They crept across the room and over a rumpled bed-sheet, painting the body on the bed with bars of light. Glittering under one of those stripes was an eye that would have been unmistakable to anyone from Hime's Ninth Legion: an eye of the tangiest, most acerbic green. It was the eye of their most decorated (and probably most redheaded) primipilus centurion .

This very eye was now moving, rolling from centre to corner, for the primipilus was watching the other person in the room. This other person moved to the window, and the rays of light striping the primipilus's body were interrupted.

"I'll open the window, Nao?" floated the voice of the person blocking the light. It was followed by the sound of sheets being pulled. "Or light a lamp?"

"No, not a lamp. Unless you've some better quality wicks since last I visited. The one you lit last time smoked like a fucking furnace." A self-directed giggle. "Quality wicks, here? Who am I kidding?"

"The window, then."

"Open it, but pull the curtains. It's cold."

The shutters were removed; light flooded the formerly dim room.

"I can get another blanket," came the suggestion. "Something thicker."

"No. To Dis with it! I'll be going out later anyway, and it'll be worse then. This'll do."

"Wine?"

"Always."

The other woman laughed, and her grey eyes turned sideways were full of brightness from the window.

"You Himeans," she said, the laughter lingering in her high and clear voice. "You and your wine."

"You talk as if you don't drink either, Pollonia. Hurry it up." Nao propped herself up on an elbow. "Hey. You do drink, right?"

Pollonia went to the table, drawing from under it an earthen jug and using that to pour the requested wine.

"Sometimes," she said.

"Sometimes!"

"I like water better."

"That's the barbarian in you." Nao laughed in taking the cup from the other woman's hand, downing a large gulp of the beverage immediately. " Shit wine."

The other regarded her unapologetically.

"This is a shit establishment," the woman said. "Our customers don't come here for wine."

"Don't come here to be poisoned by shit wine, I bet."

She made a face at her cup but drank again anyway. Pollonia smiled.

"They don't come here for language lessons either," she told the red-haired woman. "But some customers expect too much."

Yellowish-green eyes met grey ones. They smiled at each other in understanding: primipilus and prostitute.

The room they occupied was part of the sleeping quarters owned by the establishment that owned Pollonia: a respectable, middle-class whorehouse of Argus. It was not the best whorehouse in the city, nor was it the most reasonably priced; but it did turn a fair trade, and had enough uniquely pretty girls to keep on turning.

The reason Nao herself patronised this instead of other, cheaper whorehouses nearer the inn she had been billeted was for one of those uniquely pretty girls: Pollonia, to be precise. Each time Nao visited this brothel, she requested Pollonia. Not once did she waver in the constancy of this choice, and the manager had long learned to stop asking which girl the primipilus wanted when she stopped by.

The reason for choosing Pollonia, however, was not on the merits of prettiness-although Nao had to admit Pollonia had a good deal of value in that aspect. She was dark, so very dark, with bronzed skin that caught your eye immediately in a brothel line-up where the standard was for fairness. Her hair was a rich deep brown, and her eyes an unexpectedly light grey for so dark a woman. She was not beautiful in the classical sense. She was clean and looked it, and her features were intriguingly sharp. Sharpest of all was her great hooked nose, which was Semitic in shape and protruded from her face like a large beak. For all its largeness, it was not unattractive. In fact, it pleased Nao in the way it invoked a bird of prey. Nao thought that Pollonia looked like a hawk-though perhaps not an eagle.

This was all very well, of course. But Nao did not really patronise her for these physical traits, likeable as they were. Nor did the Himean centurion choose Pollonia out of any reputation Pollonia might have for legendary skills in bed-although she was, Nao thought, not bad at all. There was another, far more important reason for visiting Pollonia and it was Pollonia's history and heritage. The Argus prostitute was a Mentulæan born and bred.

Properly speaking, she was a half-breed: part-Mentulæan and part-Jew. Pollonia's mother had been Mentulæan, while her father was an itinerant who happened to pass into Obsidian's empire during his mercantile travels. Shortly after the romance that sired Pollonia, he had left on another of his commercial trips and was never heard from again. Her mother being a slave in a minor noble's household, Pollonia served there as well until she reached the age of fourteen, when yet another misfortune changed her life. The household for which they worked was dissolved, their noble master falling into ruin, and Pollonia found herself with the rest of the former slaves on the auction block.

This was where she was separated from her mother, who went to one bidder while she went to another-one who happened to be a travelling merchant, not unlike the father who had vanished from her life early on. If Pollonia had expected to serve this new owner as a life-servant, however, she turned out mistaken: for the man took her to Argus, whereupon he sold her yet again to the recruiter of a local whorehouse. This was the establishment in which she and Nao currently were.

Pollonia had divulged bits and parts of this to Nao once the latter began frequenting the brothel as a regular client, but Nao actually knew it all before that. Long on the lookout for someone with a history like the prostitute's, she had been delighted to find her first candidate as tailor-made to her needs as possible. Pollonia was shrewd yet tractable, not wanting in courage, and possessed of a detestation for Mentulæans that made her agree to Nao's demands-which she very well knew might aid in the killing of Mentulæans.

Pollonia had lived in Obsidian's lands half her life thus far, which put her in an excellent position to satisfy the centurion's requests on various things. She was able to provide various pieces of information the centurion required, from local customs to cartography in the lands across the border. At present, she was helping Nao perfect her grasp of the Mentulæan version of the Himean tongue. This was the language spoken between the many Mentulæan peoples. It was a bastardised version of the original, spoken in a broad and slangy accent full of what native Himeans would perceive as syncope. It was thus in this version of Himean that the primipilus and Pollonia conversed now, as they often did with each other.

"One of my usual customers passed by earlier," Pollonia was telling her most loyal customer. "He's one of the local centurions. I think he was at the general muster too, actually."

Nao's accent was just right: "That's why it's called a general muster."

"He met your commander." An uncertain pause. "He wasn't too happy."

"Oh? Why is that?"

"He didn't like her."

Up shot one of the ridiculously red eyebrows.

"Ho! Now that's unusual!"

Pollonia threw her hair over one shoulder.

"He said she was snooty," she told the centurion. "Was it snooty? Or snotty?"

"They mean the same damn thing," Nao interrupted with a snooty snort of her own. "Back to the topic! You said he's a centurion?"

"Yes."

"They're letting just anyone become a centurion these days, seems like," the decorated centurion said. "I can't believe it. The general's never snooty. Unless it's to people she dislikes, anyway, and even that rarely. Did she dislike him on first contact or something? That's even rarer."

"I wouldn't know," Pollonia said. "He called her 'one of those stuck up nobles who think their shit don't stink', I think was what he said." She frowned and tapped the fingers of her right hand on her temple. "I'm pretty sure I got that part down right. He said she was one of those who looked down and liked to do it-look down on people, I mean."

" Gerrae! "

"He said it." Pollonia suddenly giggled, drawing closer to Nao like a gossip schoolgirl. "It was funny, you know. I know the real reason he didn't like her. He said it himself."

"You're supposed to tell me that first!"

Pollonia was coquette enough to pretend hurt: Nao was sceptic enough to ignore it.

"Tell me," she demanded, effectively clearing the stung expression on the other woman's face. Pollonia recognised an order when she heard it, and Nao was not someone whose orders you could take lightly.

Unlike some of my other customers, she thought before checking herself. Nao was definitely unlike all of her other customers.

"I think it was when he went with the other centurions-our lads, that is," she clarified, meaning the local officers. "They went to see her after the parade thing. You don't know?"

"I know she talked to the local officers, but I wasn't with her when this thing you're talking about happened, obviously. I wouldn't be asking otherwise."

"Fine. So, I was saying, this centurion who didn't like your general-"

"What's his name?"

Pollonia stopped, mouth still slightly parted. Nao raised her brows, mutely repeating the question. When that did not work, she decided to speak.

"Well, who's he?" she asked.

The other woman licked her lips.

"I don't suppose you want it for a reason, do you?" she said slowly and with great circumspection. "I mean, well, you won't go after him, will you?"

The redhead laughed: "Is he more than a customer after all?"

"No. He's not even one of the customers I like." The other shook her head. "I'd just not like to have his death hanging over my head for something so little. Though you could find out his name easy enough from others even without me, I guess."

"True, I could, so you can save your noble act. And I agree it's 'little', so don't be an idiot. I'm not about to go killing people just because they don't like the general," Nao said dryly, finishing with a mutter: "Was in that business, I would've assassinated half the Senate by now."

"So why do you want to know his name?"

"Plenty of reasons, but here's the basic one: random information can someday come in handy."

Pollonia smiled at that.

"You and your handy information," she said, before divulging the intelligence. "His name is Itou. Kentaro Itou."

"Another Taro. That explains it."

"What?"

"Nothing," Nao sniggered. "Go on with your story."

Pollonia sighed.

"I was saying some of them met with your general," she began. "And Itou-san was with them. He said she was talking to the others when he suddenly got an itch in his throat. The really bad kind, he said, so he had to hawk and spit it out, because it was so bad. And then-

"No, don't tell me, let me guess!" Nao interjected, shaking with laughter. "He looked up to find the general staring him down so coolly he got the uncontrollable urge to piss in his pants?"

"I think so, though he didn't say it that way," Pollonia laughed merrily with her. "Does she do that often?"

"No! Or, maybe," she said, pausing to think about it. "Huh. I think it depends."

She harrumphed and went on: "But it's not often some fool has the bumped-up balls to spit in front of her, you know. It's rude in front of a general, especially during inspection. And it doesn't help his stupidity that the general herself has spotless manners."

"He didn't think so."

"What would he know about manners? He practically spat in her face."

The grey-eyed woman smiled.

"Not couth, is it?" she asked.

"Damned right it isn't. Even I can behave pretty when I know it's needed, and I'm as bloody couth as the most vulgar ranker to ever cuss his con-steepay-ted way to a latrine pit," she cooed.

Pollonia whooped with laughter and fell in a swoop onto the sheets.

"Oh, you're uncouth, all right," she giggled, rolling over. "Uncouth centurion who spends her time in a whorehouse instead of the barracks."

"And having a very productive time of it, so bugger off." Nao took a few seconds to sneer at nothing in particular, reaching out to drag her fingers through the other woman's hair. It was surprisingly well-kept.

Later, she murmured: "Happens often, that. Stupid."

"Who's stupid? What're you muttering about?"

The centurion shifted on the bed, changing her seat so that she could look at the other woman's face as she talked.

"What that idiot centurion did," she explained, staring straight into the light grey eyes, which seemed more intense because they were so deep-set. "More people than you'd expect make that kind of mistake, sort of, the first time they meet the general. She's so daunting it's hard not to get your guard up, you know."

"Daunting?"

"Crisp, like," Nao uttered. "Incredibly crisp with, I don't know, poise, and just oozing all kinds of power and confidence that it threatens you sometimes-especially when you think you're full of piss and vinegar yourself, just like your customer probably did. Standing in front of the general is like standing in front of a lion and suddenly realising all you are is a scrappy alley cat with an attitude too big for your claws, Poll. She shows up everyone just by being herself." Her shoulders lifted ever so slightly. "You build yourself up, trying to fight that. People like this Itou go overboard."

The brunette next to her frowned.

"I'm not sure I understand," she said.

"Just think of confidence and how building it up defensively can turn it into arrogance," Nao returned. "That's just a step away from disrespect."

"Oh. That's a little easier to understand." She looked at Nao a little more closely. "You know her well, your general."

But Shizuru's veteran centurion laughed.

"Know her?" she said with incredulity. "Now there's an arrogant thought, all right! No one really knows that woman, Poll. Or if someone does, it's surely not me."

Her eyes narrowed into slanted, piercing slits of green.

"But I'll tell you something," she continued. "All you need to know about Shizuru Fujino is in her eyes."

As Pollonia uttered an exclamation about those selfsame eyes, Nao found herself being visited by a corresponding image of crimson cut with scarlet: circular shards cut from a bloodied mirror. It was all reflected there, she thought with a grimace, realising the memory was from the first time she had seen Shizuru up close. Everything had been in the woman's eyes then, and still was now. Hungry eyes, keen and ravenous as a fire. They put to mind a tiny world up in flames, entire globes eaten up by a carnal flare that could never be doused. Many thought of them as representing blood, and that was why they thought them terrible. But Nao had always thought that was a mistaken attribution. The terror was in the blaze, not the blood.

Everything's blood, she thought, but not everything's fire.

This was because Nao had the fear of fire ingrained into her. She had it from living in the big cauldron that hosted the stews of Hime: the section of the city known as the Subura. She had her own place in the province, and it was a freer, more open space than the one in the city by far. But ever since her entry into the spying-and later, military-elite, she had come to spend less and less time in her provincial home and more in the urban one. The latter was a set of rooms in one of the better Suburan insulae. It was here that she lived when not away on campaign.

As far as rooms in the Subura went, hers were fairly good ones. They were clean and well-furbished, structurally-sound. The only problem, perhaps, was the one that every tenant of the Subura suffered and eventually learned to overlook: the suffocating lack of space in general. Subura-dwellers lacked aural space, having to put up with endless cacophonies of gossip being shouted from one building to another, shrieking babies, and wailing drunkards. They lacked social space, having to endure the curiosity of others thrusting their private miseries out before the whole world as well as having others' privations thrust on them.

Most of all, however, they lacked physical space. As with all other slums in large cities, the Subura was packed so full that, as the joke went, you could barely stretch your hand out of your window without touching your neighbour's arse. As with all other slums in large cities too, this necessitated a communal awareness and terror of the worst possible blight that could come upon so densely-packed a physical community: something that would hurt the Subura, buildings and residents alike, worse than an actual war, storm, or earthquake.

This great, supremely destructive terror was fire .

To residents of the Subura-or residents of Hime, for that matter-the mere hint of an unruly spark was enough to set about general panic. Fire was destruction of the house and home; fire was destruction of livelihood and life; fire was, simply put, destruction in its purest form . Nao, a long-time city dweller, understood this. Thus she understood what was so disturbing to those who found her general's eyes eerie: they hinted at a fire that was utterly rapacious in its ambition.

"Fire," she murmured now, to her companion. "It's the way they look afire."

"Itou said that they're bloody, actually," said Pollonia, twisting a lock of her long brown hair. "Said that was a bad omen, it was."

"Doubt that. She's famous for her luck." Nao suddenly smiled. "Well, maybe it's bad only for the people who cross her."

"He really didn't like her."

"I'm sure she's not in love with him either. Imagine spitting your fucking phlegm in front of Shizuru Fujino and then having the balls to say she's snooty and has bad manners. Hollow balls. Bollocks!"

"That's what he thinks of her, though."

"Pah! What d'you think of her?"

The dark lashes fluttered in a dreamy sigh.

"Oh, I think she's just wonderful!" Pollonia said.

Nao laughed good-naturedly.

"I expected that," she sniggered, placing her back against the pillows. Her arms crossed behind her head. "Dames love a woman in uniform. Met her yet?"

"No! How can I?" The grey eyes were wide with scandal. "She comes to whorehouses?"

"No. Juno's cunt, that'd be something if she did." Nao laughed at the ludicrous thought. "But she walks around a lot and talks to a lot of people, so there's always a chance. Not uppity, the general. Shit, she's so up she can afford to get as low-brow as she wants. It's pretty easy to talk to her."

"I'd like to. Can I?"

"We'll see," Nao replied, snuggling into the pillows. "Don't get your hopes up though, Sweetheart. She's a girl of her own already."

Pollonia's gaze turned dreamy again.

"The Otomeian Natsuki-san," she identified, to which Nao nodded. Again she released a wistful sigh. "Oh, she's wonderful too!"

Nao smirked.

"Guess I expected that too. And her, you've met her yet, Poll?" She caught herself abruptly and cackled out a laugh at her own question. "Who am I kidding? It's even less likely you've met her!"

Pollonia looked at her with great interest.

"Why, is she more unreachable than even your general?" she asked.

"Sure," Nao said. "Because she's blessed unsociable."

"Really?" Pollonia wrinkled her nose. "Now that you say, she does seem awful cold. Aloof, like."

"She is."

The other woman winced. "So she's hard to talk to, after all?"

"Pretty much. She's not rude-hard, or really rude at all. Just... she's a surly wretch, I'll say that." The white, brown-scarred hands came together and the sound of knuckles popping crackled in the room.

"That doesn't matter, though. She's her own points working in her favour. By god, I'd love to get my hands on her."

Pollonia looked positively giddy at that little confession-until Nao went on to explain it.

"Make a perfect assassin and intelligencer. She'd be a trainer's wet dream."

"Oh, not that!" the other woman exclaimed, startling the centurion a little. "I didn't think for that!"

Nao made a funny face.

"Well, for what then?" she said. "Jupiter! You thought I meant to fuck her?"

"Why not? You mean you wouldn't want to?" Pollonia retorted with a wide grin.

"What for? I already fuck you."

The other woman hit her lightly but continued to smile anyway.

"She's beautiful," she said with feeling.

Nao snorted in response.

"Of course she is," she said, with a parody of sweetness on her face. "And of course the general thinks so, because every time she looks at the girl, all she'd need is a wash-basin and a plate to eat the kid up on the spot. Aaah, forgo the plate. She always looks as though she'd eat her up without setting her down."

"But not," Pollonia chuckled out, "the wash-basin?"

"Trust me, the general'd wash her hands first."

"She's a clean person then, your general." Pollonia looked thoughtful. "I guess nobles are like that."

The reply was contemptuous: "No, some of there are right dirty, I'd say."

"But not Shizuru Fujino?"

"No, not her." The light green eyes gleamed. "She doesn't like to get her hands dirty, in some ways."

"Does she like to get your hands dirty?"

Nao laughed. She liked Pollonia's intelligent sense of humour.

"You know, or you don't-in which case you'll know soon," she answered. "Depends on what I decide to do too, 'course. Then we'll find out if you like to get your hands dirty."

Her apprentice conspirator nodded at that, understanding what the centurion meant. She wondered what Nao would eventually decide here. She was anxious about it! The exchange for all the information and services she had given and would continue to give Nao was significant: the centurion had promised to buy her from this brothel and take Pollonia into her household, as a loyal and well-treated slave to eventually be freed after the usual years of servitude had been finished. Whether that meant she would be shipped overseas to Hime by the centurion as soon as their lessons had been concluded or perhaps kept here in Argus until the end of the centurion's military duties in the region, she did not yet know.

A good, practical part of her preferred to be shipped overseas, as she desired very much to see the greatest city on earth and begin life anew as someone not a prostitute. Yet a smaller, still insistent part of her was starting to make its desire known: it wanted to stay with the woman who would be her new mistress and serve said woman here, in the about-to-erupt-north.

"Hey. What's the matter?"

She snapped out of her contemplation to find lime-green eyes turned her way.

"Sorry," she apologised. "Did you say something?"

The centurion's pretty face- Surprisingly pretty for a soldier, thought Pollonia-frowned a little.

"Asked if you could get me more wine. You all right, then?"

Pollonia sprang from the bed and took the cup.

"Yes, I'm sorry. I just didn't hear you," she said, sparing a smile for the redhead. "I'll get it now. Should I refill the cup or get the whole jug?"

The Himean laughed: "You're catching on."

Pollonia laughed back. She liked hearing the centurion laugh. There was something infectious about it.

"For someone who thinks it's shit wine, you down it like a fish," she told her.

"It doesn't change the fact that I think it's shit wine. And whoever said fish down wine? Never seen a drinking fish yet. Never seen a fish swimming drunk yet, either."

"I don't know, it's something people say. Besides, how can you tell if a fish is swimming drunk?"

The centurion offered: "Maybe it swims backwards."

"That's stupid."

They laughed together.

"Anyway, I don't think fish can drink wine," Nao insisted light-heartedly. "They can eat shit, though."

That made Pollonia pause.

"What?" she said to the odd statement.

"In Hime, there's this thing we call the licker-fish. Delicacy for the rich. It gets fat on shit from the sewers. And I mean shit, Poll: what comes out of an arse and gets chucked down the sewage system every day . "

"And the rich eat it?"

"They love it."

"But why, if it eats shit?! What's it like?"

"About this big..."

Pollonia listened to the centurion, and while listening, found her anxieties slowly slipping away. To think of a place where rich people fell over themselves to dine on a fish that ate shit-why, what place could possibly be more interesting? If Hime was a place where shit-eating fish could turn into delicacies, then it was surely also where a former prostitute could turn into a respectable household servant. Or maybe a respectable assistant intelligencer, even. What possibilities! She really should not be worrying.

I'd be stupid to let my fright get to me, she thought with newfound resolve, handing over the centurion's wine. She laughed and smiled when the other woman made a joke, not doing it entirely out of mere play-acting-even though both of them knew she could play-act very well. Twelve years as a whore taught you tricks, and Pollonia knew all of them by heart. How else could she have lasted this long?

She knew men and she knew women. She knew how to act according to their express desires, how to tap into and model herself after their private fetishes. She knew too how they perceived her as exactly that, no more and no less than an approximate concretisation or outlet of their fantasies. Not quite human.

That was why she liked Nao, really, even beyond the bargain between them. The centurion might be using Pollonia too, but at least she used her beyond the sexual respect. All her other custom treated her well-Pollonia was good at charming people that way-but always held a subtle derision for her at the back of it, the silent appreciation many prostitutes were given. It said, "Poor you who aren't good for anything else."

For some reason she could not fathom, however, Pollonia never sensed this underestimation from the Ninth's primipilus. She was not silly enough to think it due to some infatuation or love from the other woman, knowing both things well enough to recognise this situation had neither. She could not attribute it to the culture of Himeans from the mainland, since she had serviced enough of them to know it was not that. Nor could she attribute it to the manner of soldiers, since she had known enough of them the same way. Could it be a point of education? Or even nature?

Ah, who knew? Perhaps one day she would understand, when she was no longer in this blighted brothel. Perhaps she would get to know the primipilus more and understand why, beneath all the bluff and bluster, the centurion was actually quite nice to her.

---

At the very same time this was happening, a letter a little over two months old was reaching its destination in the land of the Mentulaeans. It had been sent with specific instructions for speed, but human instructions were not proof against the constraints of nature. Most of the passes were blocked and the letter had had a long route to go before reaching the Mentulaean king's winter palace. At least the missive bore the seal of the ruling house, and that was enough for the party carrying it to be sped through most of the man-made constraints along the way: the checkpoints and guard stations throughout the empire. Once past the final point, it found its way to none other than the king's chief advisor, Lysander. He delivered it to the king.

Who is crusty today, Lysander thought during his task. Indeed, the king had been crusty the whole winter. The best way to tell the king's temperament was by the number of executions he ordered in a season, and this season had been a veritable winter harvest of heads. Unfortunate, especially to the former owners of those heads. Unfortunate too to those put in charge of the bodies, since winter meant everything was either too waterlogged or iced up to facilitate proper disposal: burning was impossible with damp wood; burial, difficult with icy ground. The only ones who seemed to find anything fortunate in the number of headless, gutted bodies seemed to be the great fish in the empire's rivers. Those aquatic animals had learned to rise gobbling to the surface whenever the king's executioners stood poised at the banks, the only ones to grow fat this wicked winter. Then again, perhaps they were not the only ones to grow fat off the accounts of the beheaded. After all, more dead courtiers meant more openings to be filled, and there was no shortage of social climbers ready to jump into the latest vacancy.

Though they'll be jumping out of it soon enough-headless into the nearest river, Lysander thought, well-aware of the king's continuing bad temper. He would know it best, being near the king at all times and privy to the continuing throb of the royal pride-a throb caused by a galling thorn in the empire's paw .

Or put in the words of the king himself, by the thieves in the empire's backyard.

Now, seeing that the letter he had just handed to His Majesty was from the heart of those foreign thieves' lands, Lysander prepared himself for whatever spurt of rage might issue from his lord's mouth. One good thing about being the virtual sounding board of the king, he thought, was that he could immediately tell what was in royal missives simply by listening to his lord's outbursts. He took position now next to the great gold and jewel-encrusted throne, watching the purple-clad figure break the seal.

The first outburst came even before the king began reading.

"He certainly took long enough to write me!" said the king, frowning as he looked over the thick roll of paper. Lysander knew, however, that it was not merely because of the delay in correspondence that the king looked so disturbed: the King of the Mentulae was a slow, difficult reader. Long letters were the bane of his existence.

"Accursed boy. He's become lax."

"Your Majesty."

"He better not have been taking it easy over there. What's he been up to that he's forgotten to write to me?"

"Majesty."

"Nagi's my smartest boy, Lysander. But he'd better not be getting too smart for his own good."

Again the mindless repetition: "Your Highest Majesty."

And so on. When finally the king resolved to read the letter, it was all Lysander could do not to breathe a sigh of relief. One could only get by with "Majesty " so many times, after all.

As the king mumbled his way through the perfectly lined, even writing of his son's scribe, Lysander waited patiently, hoping that the prince had kept the pleasantries to a minimum this time. Prince Nagi was, as his father had observed, possibly the smartest of the royal princes as well as the most polished. Where most of the royal family waded through court, he glided. He had perfect courtly manners, did the prince. This meant he greeted everyone with the usual and expected pleasantries, went the carefully circuitous way with his speech, and was mindful of the usual courtesies in even the most trifling occasion or letter. Unfortunately, the king hated having to slog through what he considered meaningless courtesies. Which was a problem, since the king also found all courtesies meaningless. A coarse old cynic, was the king.

Not that Lysander would ever say that aloud. He rather liked his head and thought it looked best on this current perch.

Listening to his king mumble and mutter over the letter, he knew his hopes had been dashed. The king was taking a long time dissecting the first part of the letter and seemed to grow crustier after each deciphered line. That could only mean he was slogging yet again through the prince's pleasantries. Oh, his feet! Lysander had to stand to attention while waiting for the king to finish reading, for he had been given permission neither to sit nor to go. A lifetime seemed to pass before the grumbles turned into articulate words again. And Lysander's poor feet already felt like stone.

"Tchah! Keep on marshalling-it's for the best, he says, as though I couldn't think of it myself!"

He made a murmur of agreement, careful to keep a look of studied faithfulness on his countenance. If his feet could be stone, so could his face.

"I know well enough they're a damned problem, by Dagda! He might be there currying favour with their politicians but I'm here trying not to butt heads with their generals."

Yet another murmur of agreement from the chief advisor.

"Of course they should be told to keep to their territories and leave the North to us-I'm not the one expected to tell them that, am I? He's the one all the way there, fool of a boy."

Lysander could not stand it anymore: he shifted his weight and walked one step backwards, just to ease some feeling back into his heels. The king did not seem to notice.

"Ah!"

Lysander jumped.

"Uh." He looked at the ostentatiously dressed figure on the throne. "Your Majesty?"

The king did not look up from the letter. A few more seconds later, however, Lysander received his answer.

"He's leaving."

Who's leaving? The prince? Leaving where? For what? Seeing that the king's response begged more questions than it answered, Lysander felt a little tingle of irritation. Nonetheless, he hid it and waited for any clarifications, which he hoped were soon to come.

They came shortly, though in rather pared-down form.

"He's coming back."

That piqued his interest.

"Prince Nagi, Your Majesty?" he ventured.

"Hrm!"

That was the most he could get to clarify that particular statement. The king continued to read for what seemed to be an age, the only balm to Lysander's aching feet being that his lord looked progressively better-humoured as time went on. What could that mean?

Lysander mulled it over, thinking deeply on the matter. He had expected the prince to return sometime soon from his ambassadorial mission to the detested Himeans' city, of course, but he had not expected it to be this soon. Sometime after spring, had been his estimate. But this letter was dated two months ago, which meant the prince would most likely be returning around the commencement of spring itself. Was the reception to their suit among the foreign city's powers so bad, then? Or, even-somehow Lysander could not imagine this-had it been so good?

It was so hard to guess. And now the king was smiling.

When he had finally gone through the entirety of the letter, the man on the throne addressed Lysander again, even if only as a conduit for speaking to himself.

"Well, well, there's something," said Obsidian, reclining deeper against the royal cushions. "There's something indeed. That's a fine thing, I must say."

Lysander bowed, consumed by curiosity.

"Your Highness?" he said.

"It's not a bad winter, after all." The sound of paper being rolled up. "Continue preparations for the army, Lysander. And... and summon Calchis from his post to return here with his own army in time to greet spring. Yes, that would be perfect."

"Your Majesty, if I may: the raids against the lands under Prince Calchis's position-

"Tell him to leave a contingent on guard duty there. It's not as though he's only a handful of men in his command."

"Of course, Sire."

"Have Faris send the summons to him. She'll know what to tell her brother."

"Straightaway, Sire."

"Make sure to send a missive to Hanu too, who's in Gorgo. Summon him as well."

"Yes, Sire."

The king said no more after that, and Lysander was left wondering if he should leave already to carry out the orders. Just as he was invoking permission to go, though, the king's voice rose again-this time more pensive and a little softer than usual.

"Nagi's a smart boy, eh, Lysander?"

Lysander hesitated only the briefest instant, weighing his choices for a correct answer.

"As you say, My Most Beloved King," he replied.

Thank Dann! The king seemed satisfied with that. And then he said something Lysander, deep in his courtier's heart, had been expecting.

"When he returns, have him watched very carefully."

Lysander bowed. Oh, the menace of kings! Satisfied with your machinations on their behalf one second, suspecting you of machination against them the next!

"But this is something." The king waved the scroll at his advisor, who watched it like a well-trained dog. "This letter is something, Lysander."

He smiled hugely as he said that, his great horse teeth flashing in the light, and Lysander saw that he was no longer as crusty as before. What in the world was that 'something' he kept talking about?

Despite the curiosity, all he said was: "I am glad you are pleased, Sire."

The hairs on his arms rose: the King of the Mentulaeans laughed.

---

Back in the Himean province of Argus, a sizeable carriage was rolling its way down the road, its occupants jolted and jiggled unmercifully. Uneven roads were the curse of wheeled transport. There was nothing to absorb the shock of each troublesome little jag the wheels encountered, which meant a most disturbing-and, for the sensitive, nauseating-conveyance for those within it. Most people preferred to walk. But there were also occasions when the wheeled carriage was necessary, as for instance when speed was a consideration or the size of the party being transported in a hurry was considerable, as was the case with this particular carriage's inhabitants. Certainly the consideration could not currently be comfort.

"It's only when you take a nice carriage-ride down a road that you really see if it's in tip-top condition or not," exclaimed one of the persons in the coach. "And by all the gods, this is not! Oh, Midori-san needs to fix her roads!"

The woman sitting across her smiled tolerantly.

"My apologies for the discomfort, Chie-han," she said, turning twinkling red eyes to the window and the man poking his head out of it to vomit. "It seems Aisuka-han is faring no better, either."

Chie looked at the hapless Aisuka, just another of the motley scribes Shizuru employed for her purposes. She herself might be the official, personal secretary taking down notes for Senate's edification in this campaign, but the scribal duties she handled were few and particular-the composition of the official dispatches, for instance. For nearly everything else, Shizuru used the large gang she often had tagging along with her: a crew of as many as a dozen personal scribes per campaign, ceaselessly taking notes whenever she wanted and wherever she went.

At present, two of them were in the carriage: Aisuka and Imari. These two were among the best of her scribes and were paid very well for their work, but they were also worked in proportion to their pay. During instances such as this, for example, they were expected to keep up with Shizuru's flow of speech while jolted to sickening vertigo by the carriage. Each had to struggle not to vomit in tandem with the other so that at least one would be on hand to continue note-taking. Already Chie could see the still-working scribe, Imari, slowly turning pale as Aisuka continued to decorate Argus' icy streets with the contents of his gut. And still a relentless Shizuru ploughed on.

"As regards, however, the matter of directing units, one cannot deny the utility of universal familiarity with the essentials of the plan. This translates, naturally, to the importance of general addresses carried out by the commander to the entire army. It is each octet leader's task to remind his men of the fundamental scheme; the centurion's task to remind each octet leader; the pilus prior and primipilus centurions to remind the other centurions; the legates to remind each primipilus; and, of necessity, the commander's task to inform and update the whole."

Chie took deep breaths to stave off her own nausea. She was amazed that her friend could continue untroubled, speaking with that fascinating ability to distil words immediately from the mind into coherent and stylised speech. Out of the corner of an eye, the senior legate could see Imari scrabbling to keep up. Out of the corner of her other eye was Aisuka, wiping his mouth and still greenish of face. Shizuru was sitting across Chie herself, and next to Shizuru was the only silent member of the party: Shizuru's Otomeian.

Who looks her usual cool self, Chie thought, considering the girl's expression. Cool as ever-which meant she was not experiencing the same discomfort every other person in the carriage except Shizuru was having. Chie guessed she was likely to have good sea-legs. Which should please Shizuru, come to think of it, come time to go through with what the patrician seemed to be planning for the two of them.

Said patrician was still talking: "Moving on, the recent alterations."

Shizuru stopped a moment to cast a brief smile at her bodyguard.

"One alteration concerns our traditional military-issue spear, the pilum," she continued, unconsciously softening her voice when Natsuki smiled shyly back. "I had my weapon-designers working on alterations I requested in the first part of this campaign, and they have now produced a final, test-validated product in accord with my instructions. Modification of the army's other pila shall be undertaken as soon as possible, ideally within another week."

Chie tapped the tiny travelling table to get her attention.

"Sometimes your changes make me believe you're mad," the senior legate told Shizuru. "I heard, but was of half a mind to disbelieve it. Altering the pilum ? Good gods!"

Shizuru was unrepentant: "Oh, I daresay you shall fancy the changes to the design an improvement, Chie-han, if I do say so myself."

"So long as the changes aren't just for decoration."

"To what, strike the enemy dead with a superior sense of fashion?" Shizuru asked, making Chie forget the conveyance's clunking enough to laugh. "No, I assure you I have very practical reasons. Although I do think the spear looks better too. I shall show it to you tomorrow."

"Good. I'm dying to see it."

"For now, however..."

The general's words trailed off as she regarded the two scribes on both sides of Chie, both of them visibly changing colour again. She ordered the carriage to be stopped, to general relief. Turning an amused eye to Aisuka and Imari, she relieved them for the day and invited them to step out of the carriage, which offer they took up immediately.

"I shall have someone bring your implements to your offices later. Take care then, and until tomorrow," she said to the pair walking down the road, her head out of the car. "Mind the ice, the road is slip-ah. Tsk. Well, there you go."

Chie's head appeared beside hers.

"I feel sorry for them, you know," she told Shizuru, as the two of them watched the pair on the street pick themselves up, tottering on unsteady legs. "You're a tyrant."

"I am not," Shizuru retorted, eyes twinkling. "I merely expect efficiency from my employees."

"Unfortunately, you also expect iron stomachs to go with it. Even I'm feeling a little ill with all that jolting and jarring, so don't you dare tell the coachman to start on yet."

"How queer that you should suffer so! Why, I never feel anything."

"That's because you never feel anything, has always gone the common talk about you. Well, unless it's those passionately, disturbingly, devastatingly amorous feelings for-ow!" Chie glared at her commander. "My foot!"

Shizuru smiled: "Is still attached to your ankle. For now."

"Tyrant."

"Tattler."

"Huh. Oh, look at Aisuka go."

"That is certainly an efficient way to travel. Look at the distance he covered."

"I guess-oh! Seems the stopping's a problem. Your scribe might have the makings of an Egyptian dancer yet, Shizuru-san."

"Hmm. The arrangement hints more at the Syrian to me."

"That's evil."

"Why? I happen to like Syrian dancers."

They were laughing so hard that they failed to mark the approach of their fellow senators, Suou and Kenji, until the latter hailed them in his gravelly voice.

"Didn't expect to catch up with you, General," he called, turning both of the heads poking out of the carriage. "Your group left the grounds before us."

It was Chie who answered him: "Detours, Kenji-san. Where are you two headed?"

"I'd like to go to my billet and hide under a nice woolly blanket."

"And I am trying to persuade him to seek comfort in a nice warm drink instead," said the young woman at his side. She had not been at the inspection of the local garrison earlier, and so she explained how she came to be walking with her fellow legate, who had been there.

"I ran into Kenji-san on my way back from my meeting with our praefectus. All is well with both accounts and supplies. Now the only supply with which I find difficulty is that of drinking companions. Perhaps you'd like to humour me in that regard, Shizuru-san, while I humour you by delivering a figure-by-figure report from my task? That is, if you're not too busy now."

Shizuru, who had pushed open the carriage drapes completely, leaned towards the opening and was already halfway into dismount. She spoke to her other friend first, however, who brushed away her apology as well as the invitation to join them. The senior legate was no fool, and only a fool would intrude on what was obviously intended to be a private invitation from the young Himemiya.

"I do think I'll take this rattle-trap on for a bit, though," she told Shizuru while gesturing at the carriage, which the other woman's bodyguard exited too. "If you don't mind. I think the road gets better soon, and it's really too cold for me too. I'll take Kenji-san along so needn't walk. That's if he doesn't mind having to endure a little rattling until we reach the better roads."

"Excellent," Shizuru replied, looking up at her friend. "It would set my mind at ease if I knew the two of you were safely warm and indoors as soon as possible. Kenji-han?"

Kenji mounted the car with a word of thanks and settled himself into the cushioned seats. After exchanging farewells, they ordered the driver to get on and the car began moving again, with Chie calling out a few final words to the women left behind.

"I'll send it back for you," she said, having been told by Suou the directions to their destination. "And try not to dance to a Syrian tune!"

Suou looked away from the carriage going down the street.

"Dance to what?" she asked Shizuru.

"Oh, nothing," the other woman laughed in return, following her as they started to walk. "That is merely Chie-han's way of saying we should try not to slip. Though I doubt it, for I am wearing my boots."

She trailed off and suddenly turned her head to look at the girl walking behind her.

"Natsuki, what about you?" she asked, stopping and thus halting her fellow Himean's steps as well. "Forgive me, I forgot to ask. Are you all right? If you are having trouble with ice, you can hold on to-"

She was cut off by a sharply upraised brow.

"Ice, Shizuru?" the girl said. "I was born of this."

Both Himeans in front of her took in the words, then broke out in smiles. Suou's smile was one of amusement with interest, while Shizuru's was one of amusement with surrendering affection. Natsuki tipped her head to indicate that they should keep walking and they set off again, the youngest female keeping slightly behind them.

"Fool that I am indeed," Shizuru murmured with self-mockery. "Of all the people for whom to be worried, I choose the one who would be most accustomed to the hazards of winter. I suppose it serves me right to be dismantled in one blow. What a retort!"

"She won that one," Suou agreed. "What could you say against that?"

"Nothing at all, which is why it would have been silly to try."

"It's so nice to see you lose a battle of words." The fairer, blue-eyed blonde grinned at Shizuru's wry glance. "See, it's so rare."

"Ah, I think not ill of it, especially if it is to Natsuki."

"Or more accurately, only then."

"Perhaps," Shizuru said with a shrug, refusing to argue it with a charming smile. "How about you, Suou-chan? You seem to be on steady footing as well."

Suou lifted her feet: she was wearing her army boots too.

"The advantage to wearing our boots," Shizuru observed while they walked. "It is difficult to lose footing on a fine set of hobnails."

"True-I'm glad I thought to wear mine as well," said Suou, before shooting a cursory glance at the other patrician's heavily-cloaked and armour-clad form. "Why are you in full parade gear, by the way? I have to admit I didn't think it was necessary for an inspection and it would be easier to get around without all of that on."

"Yes, it would be, and no, it is not necessary," Shizuru replied. "But it helps for inspirational purposes, especially during the muster. Besides which, the soldiers being inspected are compelled to go about with twenty pounds of mail-shirts and cuirasses on their backs while putting on a show. It would be quite poor of me to simply plead comfort to avoid doing the same."

"I see. I never thought of it that way." Suou's hand cuddled a fold of her own thick, heavy cloak. "Your new armour looks lovely on you, by the way."

Shizuru's pleasure gleamed in her eyes.

"Thank you," she said, obviously thinking the same. "The maker is, oh, a genius."

"A regular Vulcan of the forge. I might look him up too."

"I can recommend you."

"Thank you. Seeing you in it had me dreaming about my own, you know." She smiled pensively as she outlined the design she wanted in her mind. "Something similar in style, though with our crest, of course. And silver instead of gold."

Shizuru nodded, breathing out a puff of air.

"Silver and midnight blue," she recited, referring to the fact that it was in Suou's family tradition to wear silver armour instead of standard brass and a blue-black cloak instead of the standard red. They retained the scarlet plumes of Hime on their helmets in battle, however-although she knew they also sometimes wore midnight blue ones for pure parade or display purposes.

"I wonder if your family began wearing blue and silver before the tendency for fair looks in the line was established or vice versa," she told her friend, who pondered the question.

"I'm not sure, to be honest," Suou answered. "Why?"

"Because it is such a nicely appropriate vanity," Shizuru sniggered. "The deep blues of your cloaks and gear look wonderful paired with blondes of your type, you know."

"How kind of you to say so." She looked up. "Here we are. This is a nice little tavern. Good wine, brought all the way across the sea and from the south."

"It fascinates me how well you navigate this city now," Shizuru said as the two of them entered the deserted shop and gave a terrible shock to the dozing-off owner. He blinked once, twice, and only then finally found the image behind him convincing enough to precipitate a skip towards the impressive-looking intruders of his cosy, amber-lit domain.

"Because I've been spending time with Sugiura-san," Suou returned, loosening the folds of her cloak but not removing the garment. She nodded and smiled to the barkeep as he bowed and scraped before them, using his hands to point out a table.

"Awfully educational, really, watching her handle the never-ending feuds between the minorities in the city," the Himemiya went on. "And, of course, she knows all the pubs with decent wine. We stopped at half a dozen in a day and-and I'm sorry, but what's she doing, Shizuru-san?"

Having been on the verge of walking towards the table indicated by the owner of the pub, she had stopped short at the sight of Shizuru's bodyguard overtaking her to the destination and doing various peculiar things, all of which had the air of a most critical inspection. The two Himeans and the barkeep watched with puzzled reverence as the dark-haired girl went about her business, ending by nodding at what was to be her companions' table in apparent satisfaction. The two Himeans settled there afterwards, and Natsuki herself went to stand at the entrance to the tavern.

"My, my," Suou began, peering at her friend's bodyguard leaning against a side of the doorway. "Natsuki-san seems more thorough than usual."

"Natsuki." Shizuru was looking at the girl. "You may sit with us, you know. You need not position yourself there."

Natsuki shook her head at Shizuru, flicking a quick, curious glance at the other woman with them. It was only when Shizuru persisted in cajoling her to return that she answered with her regular succinct finality.

"Here is fine," she told them. "I like. Wind."

Suou kept her face composed, only a near-invisible lift of her pale brows letting on her surprise. The truth was that she had been hoping to talk to Shizuru without the girl listening to them. Part of her intended talk touched on matters related to the Otomeian, after all. Thus she had hoped but not actually expected to be granted a little time with Shizuru separate from the cavalry captain. She had been trying her wits for a way to bring this about during the brief walk here, but had not come up with a suitably polite solution. Now here it was being presented to her like a gift. Had the enigmatic Natsuki guessed it, or was this mere coincidence? For, by standing at the doorway, the young woman would not be able to make out their words inside the pub: whatever sounds she heard would be garbled by the strong wind blowing outdoors and gusting in instead of out.

How perceptive of her, Suou thought. It was charmingly civil too, of course. She could not help but be impressed by the realisation that, even in this act of consideration, the dark-haired girl had kept in mind her primary duties: the distance from the doorway to the Himean pair's table was something one of her agility could easily cover in a few seconds. Oh, "The General's Girl" was a formidable one! Suou rather liked that.

"Some of your finest wine, if you please, and three cups," she told the hovering pub owner, who rushed off to fulfil the order. Suou redirected her sky-light gaze to Shizuru. "She's half-outside. The wine would help keep her warm, right?"

"Yes," said the other woman, still looking at the girl. "Yes, that is very good of you, Suou-chan. My thanks on her behalf."

"My pleasure. It's the least I can do for her thoughtfulness."

"Ah, yes." Shizuru finally tore away her attention from the doorway. "I gather you wished to speak to me alone, then?"

"Yes, if possible."

"Quite possible, as you see. You might have simply asked me, Suou-chan. Natsuki is most considerate in such things. She would not mind."

No, but you would, Suou thought. Instead she said, "Then forgive me for not thinking to do that. Natsuki-san is considerate, as you say. She's proven it now."

"Indeed." For a moment it seemed that Shizuru would turn again, but did not. "Would I be correct in thinking we shall be talking about recent developments back home? Your sister sent you a letter too in the packet we received nine days ago, I recall."

"She did. I meant to talk to you earlier about that, but haven't been able to find the right time until now, unfortunately. We've all been so busy getting the army primed in time for the spring thaw, plus helping with Midori-san's reinforcement of the province's military. Well, it's been a chore trying to get time alone."

"I understand."

"For my part, I understand that Midori-san believed the probability of foreign incursions into our territories even before this, but never with such conviction," Suou rejoined sombrely. "The way she's treating it now, most people are saying that she thinks it practically an inevitability. Of course, she's not saying anything specific about the direction from which the threat comes, but it's quite clear it's the Mentulaeans on her mind."

Shizuru answered the unspoken query: "I may have sown a seed of warning, but she knows nothing beyond it."

"When do you plan on telling her?"

"When Chikane obtains the affirmative from Senate."

"I see. That's nice and clear." Suou's eyes narrowed in thought. "I say, do you think this will cause a return in her problem with the Mentulaeen Murders?"

"I know not, unfortunately, since the peculiar nature of the city's mixed demographic makes its population's temperament unfamiliar to me," Shizuru replied. "So I hope not. I am certain Midori-han would know what to do, in any case. Despite certain opinions to the contrary, she and incompetence are not at all close relations."

The arrival of the pub owner stopped their conversation, and they paused long enough to thank him for the beverages as well as the plate of roast meats he placed before them. Shizuru poured some wine into a cup, diluted it with water, then handed it to him along with some pieces of meat-very carefully picked out from the plate-wrapped in a cloth napkin. He was directed to take it to the dark-haired girl by the door and tell her specifically that 'the general wished her to have them'. He bowed and carried out his errand.

"I suppose our lovely ice princess would not accept it otherwise?" Suou guessed.

The red eyes looked at her.

"Curious you should use that word," said the other woman, who was in the process of divesting herself of her cuirass.

"Which one? Do you need help with that?"

"Yes, please. And 'princess'. Not 'queen'."

"Is it curious to use one instead of the other?"

Suou rose to her feet and helped the other woman remove her shoulder-guards and body armour. These were followed by the pteryges, the skirt of burnt brown leather strips over the breeches. They settled the pieces on the other end of Shizuru's bench and returned to their seats.

"I suppose it may be because she is younger than me-or us. I'm sorry, I didn't mean to be indirectly patronising about the age difference."

Shizuru shook her head, a few tawny and fetchingly curled locks waving at the action. Devoid of her armour, she was left wearing the padded black tunic whose sleeves reached her wrists, along with a pair of black breeches up to her knees. It was unconventional, thought Suou, since most generals wore the standard-issue red tunic and breeches under their armour. The woman had unwound her cloak earlier too before removing the cuirass, and now had the great bolt of red cloth over and around her shoulders.

"Not at all," she was saying. "I understand completely, Suou-chan. She looks so-how to put it? Eternally girlish?"

"In face and form, yes." Suou glanced at the ceiling with one of her slow smiles. "I daresay you're right about it being eternal. She will always look that way, I believe, with those bones."

She looked at Shizuru and added: "She will probably hate it one day, you know."

As she had expected, Shizuru's reaction was to produce an expression that was the visual equivalent of a scoff.

"To look so?" the darker blonde asked, her tone making it clear that she thought it ludicrous that anyone with such looks could hate them. "That would be strange indeed. What makes you think so?"

"Most girls and women who look like girls do," was the answer. "I've noticed. See, a girl child often dreams of the day she will mature or 'grow up' in the sense of growing forward, to speak of at least two specific places. The developed body, with its attendant curves. There is the patent maturity, the supposedly womanly face. An image that puts to mind the words 'woman' or 'queen', rather than the former words 'girl' and 'princess'. I suppose we all wish for it and look forward to that, inwardly, when we are children-partly because the adults themselves reinforce that stereotype of mature femininity. Thus it doesn't sit too well with some when they realise they'll never get past teetering on the border. I know quite a few other girlish-looking women who bemoan their misfortune of eternally adolescent appearance to me."

She filled her cup with wine from the jug and guided it to her lips.

"I couldn't speak for them specifically," she finished. "But I suppose it's because even just the façade of youth is a double-edged sword."

Shizuru took a moment to think on it.

"Perhaps so," she eventually ruled. "Still, I suppose it may be difficult for me to speak on it, as I appreciate the looks of youth myself. Besides, 'princess' is technically one of Natsuki's titles, so you are not far off in that much, at least."

"It would have to be," came the rejoinder, to which she replied with an inquisitive look. "From what I have seen and heard, Shizuru-san, it hardly describes her to be called a mere cavalry officer. Granted, their social structures may differ from ours, but no mere cavalry officer could, say, converse with all their high aristocrats and even their king in the most familiar of tones-or quote Juvenal at the drop of a hat. Both of which you assert she can in fact do."

"I suppose that is true," Shizuru averred. "Breeding and birthright tell powerfully in some people. I have been informed that most of their higher military officers are generally high in the social structure too, though. I suppose the easiest way to think of it would be in terms of similarity to your position instead of the centurion's, Suou-chan. A kind of legate. They are nearly all nobles, I gather."

"Ah, now I see. If it's that way, it makes you think of her guardianship of you as a form of apprenticeship, no? Similar to our contubernalis. " She smiled at her friend. "The king assigned her to you personally, right?"

"Yes."

"Awful smart of him. Not only did he get to put one of his nobles right up there in the midst of our command tent, but he'd also worked out a way to have her possibly getting an in-depth education in our ways and tactics from it."

"So I have often reflected, myself. Of course, I do not mind at all."

"No, of course not. She's excellent at her work, from what I see, and I for one find little to distrust in her or the arrangement. A warrior princess in training, eh? Well, her carriage speaks for itself. All the damnable arrogance of nobility."

The other, just-as-noble patrician had to smile.

"I wonder what your sister would say to that arraignment of nobility," she said, taking a piece of roast pork between thumb and forefinger. Suou did the same, squeezing the morsel first to test how yielding was the meat.

"Nil, since she's one of the most arrogant nobles and also one of the best at hiding it well," she said once satisfied that it was soft enough for her preferences: she popped it into her mouth, chewed, then swallowed. "As she does most things. In that sense, one could not wish for a better conspirator. I should know, being her sister."

"And I, to a lesser extent, being her friend."

"Not lesser, Shizuru-san. For heaven's sake, there's no need to be so modest-no one can arraign you for damnable arrogance if you admit to great familiarity with her." As the other woman smiled, she leaned forward and lifted one platinum-coloured brow. "We both received letters from her a few days ago, and both sent letters back. We talked then, but only fleetingly, of the content of her letters before writing our own replies."

Shizuru nodded at this recollection.

"Has anything changed since then, Suou-chan?" she enquired.

"I'm not sure. I do have something to confess, though, as well as something to ask."

"In that order?"

"The latter shall precede the former."

"Then ask away, please."

Suou thanked her for the allowance.

"This may be curt, but I hope you'll agree this weather is too cold for beating around the bush," she said, noticing how Shizuru's neck seemed to twitch again at that, as though striving mightily not to twist and turn again to the doorway. Truly the young woman there seemed to exert some form of magnetism! "I wanted to make sure of something. All your interests are against you taking time off from this campaign to go back home, right? That is to say, you'd rather not go just yet, even if only for a short while-as you'd be required to, say, if you were elected one of the praetors and thus had to go home to get your official assignment."

"Yes."

"That hypothetical situation would require, at best, a mere month or so away from here. Would that still be unacceptable? In terms of strict preferences, of course."

Shizuru's face was neutral but her voice was firm: "Yes."

"I see. If that's so, I'm very glad." At her friend's puzzled face, Suou smiled languorously. "I mentioned a confession."

"That you did."

"As well as my sister's missives and our replies to her."

"I'm assuming they are related?"

"You are and you would be correct to do so." A flare from one of the torches rendered the pale blue eyes opaque for a moment, covered by a film of pure light. "I stated in my letter something consistent with an earlier dispatch I sent Chikane, which she should have received by now given that it was sent over a month ago. As you can guess, part of that earlier letter concerned you, as did the later letter."

"And that concern was?"

"My intimation that, given certain circumstances, you might prefer to stay in the North without interruption for a while."

The fair brows moved up: Shizuru was regarding her with mild surprise. Suou merely looked back coolly. As if settling the matter, they both reached for their cups and lifted them to their lips. They lowered their cups to the table at the same time.

"Did you really say that in your letters?" Shizuru asked her.

"Yes."

"Why?"

Suou's eyes slid away and to a point behind her.

"Because I thought you enjoyed the local scenery," she said.

Shizuru smirked.

"You are beginning to evince a verbal equivocation that is highly reminiscent of your sibling," she pronounced, drawing a crooked smile from her friend. "And yes, I know, of me as well."

"I am relieved you admitted it."

"Only before you could point it out," Shizuru replied. "How strange that you should think it! It is true, of course. But was it apparent as early as a month ago?"

"I think so. Why should it be strange?"

"Because I came to a resolution only recently."

"Oh. Well, curious, that. Don't you mean 'realisation', then?"

"Was it that apparent?"

"Yes."

Shizuru sighed at her giggling friend, who seemed to be enjoying this mightily. Her eyebrow's ascent only served to further fuel the aforementioned friend's amusement.

"Care to know some of the reasons?" Suou asked with mischief.

Shizuru crossed her arms and lifted her shoulders.

"By all means," she said. "Do illuminate me."

"First and most obviously, you're never apart from each other."

"She is my bodyguard, you know."

"Yes, but then comes the second reason: you've exhausted the stocks of nearly half the shops in Argus that are selling anything remotely attractive to a young lady of her age. I daresay they all love you for the commerce you've been giving them ever since we arrived, as do the gossips for your gift of new material."

"And what is to say I have not been on this spending spree for myself?"

Suou rolled her eyes with a chuckle.

"I know you too well for that, so please spare me," she retorted, her lips forming yet another sly grin. "For instance, I happen to have heard that the latest such spree was with one of the province's most esteemed and expensive tailors. It was a large order for Himean nightdresses in all the latest and popular fashions."

"Himean." The other woman tapped a finger on her cheek coyly.

"That seems to support my contention, yes? I am Himean, after all."

"Pfft. Word has it too that the measurements given to the tailors seemed less characteristic of Shizuru Fujino's taller and more endowed form than of her shorter, slimmer bodyguard." She sniggered cheerfully. "Oh, do give it up. Shall you wait for me to catch her wearing them instead of admitting it to me now? And with you calling her ' meum mel ' in the background?"

The other woman was not immune to her friend's comical threat: a laugh escaped.

"Oh god," she said at the mental image. "All right, I concede. Planning to pursue a career as an advocate, Suou-chan?"

Suou flicked her fringe away from her eyes. She had not had it trimmed, Shizuru noticed, and it had grown such that the other patrician could now easily tuck away all of it behind her ears, along with the rest of her long and flaxen hair.

"Maybe," she said now. "The witness examination suits my tastes. Anyway, would you care to tell me how that order for nightdresses came about? I'm awfully curious."

"Ah, you see, she suggested that she would like one," Shizuru answered with uncharacteristic hesitation. "And since I knew better than she from which tailors to place such an order, I thought I would save her the trouble by doing it."

"And having a hundred made."

"Merely thirty!" Shizuru corrected swiftly, drawing a series of muffled sounds from the other woman.

"Merely thirty! Good god, you said it: she wanted only one!"

Suou clutched her stomach in a desperate effort to stay the guffaws.

"Oh, you're wonderful. And don't," she said, seeing Shizuru's mouth open, "protest by claiming you were pressed to know what colour or style to get her. Simply, you wished to have as many kinds as possible, am I right? Oh, to where has your much-vaunted subtlety gone, Shizuru-san?"

Shizuru's mouth quirked.

"I suppose that when subtlety feels impossible," she answered with self-directed humour, "one might as well choose the glory of excess."

"In this case, it seems all to the good. As I said, it gives the locals business and you something to do with your scads of money." She looked at her cup, realised it was empty, and began to refill it. "And I daresay our princess likes it."

The note of anxiety in Shizuru's answer did not escape her: "I hope so."

"Of course she does," she told her friend feelingly. "Now, then, tell me something."

She refilled Shizuru's empty beaker as well before going on.

"How does it feel?" she asked. "I asked my sister this before, but you know Chikane-she thinks some things are too abstract for words. It's her personal drama."

"Thank you." Shizuru picked up her cup, as did Suou. She lifted it to her lips but hovered there long enough to ask a further clarifying question. "And how does what feel?"

Suou smiled at Shizuru as the latter drank, then lifted her own cup as well.

"Being in love," she said.

Shizuru choked.

"Oh dear." Suou leaned towards her friend, conscious of the pub owner scurrying towards them at the sound of Shizuru's violent coughs. Natsuki too had been alarmed by the hacks, and she approached as well. "Are you all right, Shizuru-san? Oh, I am sorry!"

One of Shizuru's hands was up, waving away the concern. The pub owner stopped halfway through the room on his trek towards them and returned behind the bar, seeming to look for something. That left Natsuki.

"Shizuru?"

The Otomeian hovered above her charge, who was pressing a cloth handkerchief to her mouth. The latter looked up at her.

"It's all right, Natsuki," she told the girl. "I am fine, really. I merely choked."

The green eyes bored into red ones. As well they should, the watching Suou thought. Shizuru Fujino was not someone who "merely choked".

""You may return to your post, Natsuki. Go on, I am fine."

"Umm."

"Go on."

The pub owner returned at that moment, bringing a new jug of cold water and another cup. They thanked him as Natsuki left to do as Shizuru had told her. One poured cup of water later, and the pub owner returned to his post too.

"Interesting," Suou ventured as Shizuru took the water. "You weren't so keen on having her go all the way there earlier."

Shizuru shot her a quick frown. Suou lifted her brows at the mute attack.

"I'm sorry, Shizuru-san," she reiterated. "I really didn't mean to-I don't know-surprise you that way, I suppose. Was it a surprise?"

Shizuru drank half the contents of the cup. She felt the stab of pain in her head that told her she had done it too quickly, for the water was very cold, but she ignored it and answered Suou instead.

"It was, rather," she admitted. "I should say so."

"May I ask why?"

Shizuru smiled drily.

"I suppose," she said.

"So why?"

Silence.

"Oh dear," Suou said. "I was right. You're just like Chikane."

The other woman shifted, looking slightly uncomfortable. Suou had a thought and said it.

"It's the word 'love', isn't it? Chikane always used to flinch in the early days when I spoke it."

Shizuru looked a little more uncomfortable.

"Does that mean you haven't told her yet?"

Now Shizuru looked extremely uncomfortable.

"Shizuru-san," Suou started, in the face of this stretch of silence from her companion. "I've always regarded you as something of a sister and often an older one, like my own. So I wouldn't presume to give you advice unless you permit me to say something to you. It's something I said to Chikane once that I would like to say now, something I told her at the time she went through a similar situation. Truth be told, I'm not sure this is what I should say politically. It might be rash of me."

A wide, charming grin spread on her face.

"But," she continued, "as I'm not like my older sister and I don't have the constraints she has as the head of our clan, I entertain the thought that I can be rash where she can't, most of the time. All the same, I shall keep my words to myself if you would rather not grant permission."

Shizuru shook her head slowly, trying to regain composure.

"You may say whatever you wish, Suou-chan," she invited.

The pale blue eyes lit up as Suou delivered her advice.

"Tell her, you fool."

That did it: Shizuru flinched.

"Oh dear."

Chapter 37

Vocabulaire:

1. Actaeon - A man who accidentally chanced upon Artemis bathing in a pool. The goddess struck him with drops of water from her hand, regardless of his innocence, and turned him into a stag for the offence. Actaeon had been hunting, his dogs were present, and the hounds pursued their own master and killed him.

2. Athena - See entry for "Pallas Athena".

3. Calydon (in text: association with "swine") - Site of the famous Calydonian Boar Hunt: King Oeneus offended the goddess Artemis and caused her to send a great boar to ravage his country in punishment. The Calydonian Boar Hunt is supposed to have taken place afterwards, with many legendary heroes participating in the attempts to kill the monster sent by Artemis.

4. Client-patron relations - In much the same way that Rome/Hime has client-states, politicians have client-persons. These are people who enrol themselves under the protection and welfare provided by a prominent and powerful politician, who then has them under his or her authority, more or less. In exchange for this power over them, the clients may seek the patron's help for such things as monetary aid, or for the protection of their interests in legislation.

5. Cupid - Also Eros (Gk.); God of Love; often presented as a beautiful youth bearing good gifts to men.

6. Diana - Also Artemis (Gk.), Selene (Gk.), Luna (L.); Goddess of The Hunt, Goddess of the Moon, Lady of Wild Things, protectress of youth. Often depicted with bow and arrows, her silver shafts are supposed to bring instant death.

7. First (specifically, The First Century) - A military term; the foremost and supposedly best century in a legion, here being Nao Yuuki's and thus the best century of the Ninth Legion in particular.

8. Gorgon - Creatures whose looks could turn men to stone.

9. Nereid - The nymphs of the sea, daughters of Nereus. There were supposedly fifty, and Achilles' mother, Thetis, is among them.

10. Pallas Athena - Also Minerva (L.); Goddess of Wisdom and War; favourite daughter of Zeus; called Brighteyes by the other gods and said to have grey eyes. The reference Shizuru mentions, in relation to Nao's Ulysses/Odysseus costume, is that Ulysses was one of Athena's favourites, and he was helped throughout the Odyssey by her as he made his way home.

11. Porticus - A building constructed around a central, open courtyard.

12. Psyche - An exceedingly beautiful woman supposed to have caught the eye of Cupid (s.v.). Venus was jealous of Psyche's beauty and hold over her son, and was thus her enemy. See the Latin writer Apuleius' account, for details.

13. Ulysses - Also Odysseus (Gk.); protagonist of the Odyssey and the genius of the wooden horse that led to Troy's downfall. He was supposed to have red hair.

14. Venus Victrix - Venus the Victorious; an aspect of Venus who can grant victories even in war.

---

Inter Nos

par ethnewinter

---

Eight days later, the approaching death of winter was celebrated by Argus. For most people, it was a subdued celebration. Perhaps the lingering cold and still-to-thaw snow was responsible for that, or perhaps it was simply that they were saving up their celebratory energies for the actual fullness of spring, but the feasting was kept to a minimum, the noise more conversation than clatter. The rowdiest parties, among the common folk, were those in the tavernsnothing out of the ordinary, given that tavern crowds were always rowdier.

The local elite too had a celebration all their own. It held great social as well as political meaning, for their gathering was traditionally a statement of unity from the persons considered to be the leaders of Argus. This included the owners of big economic concerns; the heads of the merchants' guilds; the representatives of racial or social factions; and even, when applicable, the commanders of wintering armies.

This year's celebration was deemed especially important. After the year's conflicts, announced the governor, this commemoration of provincial unity was more necessary than ever. It was a way of telling the citizens that they need not be concerned about the recent problems and unrest, that the province's leaders were still more or less willing to be civil to one another. This was no false propaganda: the practical purpose of the said event was truly for the leaders to discuss matters of cooperation and settle arguments in a more relaxed atmosphere than the typical board room. And this year, the governor had decided, there were "a bloody good lot" of matters of cooperation and argumentation that simply cried to be discussed.

"I think it a brilliant idea," Shizuru said, in response to another partygoer asking her what she thought of the event. Her interrogator was an influential grain merchant and a former Mentulaean citizen. "More than ever, the citizens of Argus need reassurance that the city is united in its interests and that mere distinctions of race are not sufficient to cause a break in the ranks."

The merchant was a pudgy man with hair the colour of sand. He now hummed pensively. Shizuru studied him covertly in the meantime, for she thought him in rather curious dress. He had come draped in the finest and most vivid yellow fabrics, which he informed everyone supposedly distinguished him as the Druidic equivalent of Apollo, Lugh. The governor had chosen to make this year's gala a costume event.

"Mere distinctions of race, Fujino-san?" he repeated after Shizuru, who was spectacularly decked out in golden and cream cloth as Venus Victrix-not so much out of conceit, everyone present knew, but in order to honour her divine ancestress.

"It's well to say that," the merchant eventually said. "Yet it's only recently that someone was killing-no, murdering citizens of Argus in their sleep, for those 'mere distinctions'. And it's only recently too that the governor tightened her regulations on Mentulaeans coming into Argus. Distinctions, but not 'mere', I think."

Another person in the group responded to this before Shizuru could.

"It's not fair to bring up that spate of serial killings to Fujino-san," he said, speaking with a lighter hint of the same accent the other man had displayed. He was also an emigrant from Obsidian's empire, just like the former speaker. "In truth, this gathering is precisely to show that those of us who know better don't agree with such barbaric actions."

"That is so, Korel-han," Shizuru replied with a tip of the head to this other speaker. She tried not to look at the strange headpiece he wore, which had had people staring at him all night. Even Shizuru's companion, dressed as the Goddess of the Hunt, had been unable to resist murmuring a jest that it was very difficult to resist letting fly an arrow at the man. This was because Korel wore an enormous-and authentic, he assured all who enquired-set of branching stag's antlers on his head. Shizuru was fascinated by the thought of how heavy they probably were and had to agree with her girl: the ridiculous costume did tempt an arrow or two.

"This gathering is symbolic of everyone's desire to see no more of those horrors," she proceeded. "That such a reprehensible series of acts by some grossly mistaken people took place prior to this does not invalidate the sentiment of this meeting. Rather, it actually strengthens the resolve of those here who are determined not to see it happen again."

Sounds and replies came from the other people in the cluster of couches and sumptuous seats. Amidst them rose the voice of yet another influential Argus denizen, this time a very wealthy Greek transporter. Given her commercial concerns, everyone agreed that her chosen persona was appropriate in reference, though perhaps not in appearance: a Nereid.

"I agree with this," the Greek said with a toss of the head, causing ringlets like spun iron to pitch on her brow. She was already an old woman, no more than a withered old wisp in size and shape. Yet the sternness of her aura was such that everyone was intimidated into listening to her without daring interruption.

"This gathering is just what the province needs," said this oddly wizened and withered sea nymph. "I myself deal in trade over the waters and some of my usual commerce has been slowed by the governor's regulations. Yet I'm not Mentulaeen. I'm Greek. To claim that the increasingly stringent rules on incomers and-though to a slightly lesser extent-outgoers is applied only to Mentulaeen citizens or those of Mentulaeen origin is untrue. Everyone is affected by the regulations! This is, after all, a trade city. We all have to suffer with restrictions of this type. But if that's the price for our safety, then so be it! It has always been the province of government to regulate our activities and curb our flows, lest we become too perilously free."

Again several people voiced their agreement along with Shizuru, who was immensely thankful that the old woman had said this for her. After all, given that she was technically part of "the government", there was a greater chance of the same words coming from her being greeted with resentment by the economic elite that had to put up with the restraints. Coming from one of them, however, and a very influential one at that, it begged fewer accusations of state-run authoritarianism.

"I would concur with my good lady here," Shizuru followed with notable diffidence. "And this is, I assure you, a personal concurrence. I believe that Sugiura-han has considered everyone's best interests equally in whatever rules she has recently applied to the province and that her consideration is informed by a wealth of experience and familiarity-and, I should think, affection - gained from having governed and lived amongst the people of Argus for years. Of course, it may be bold of me, a mere outsider, to say this."

"Not at all!" came the exclamation from yet another guest, loudest in a chorus. "I don't know about my other colleagues here, but hearing that from you settles any doubts I had. You are after all an economic power in your own right, most of us know."

He ran his eyes around the group.

"It's good to be reminded, I think, of how fortunate we are in having Sugiura-san," stated the man. "Other provinces have problems. They've complaints of being raped by greedy governors, who happen to be incompetents aside from being selfish gluttons. We've all had our run-ins with the State, but have we ever found fault in her for that in particular?"

There was a ripple of thoughtful murmurs, followed by someone lifting his cup.

"There's a truth," he declared. "By Jupiter, let's drink to our governor, ladies and gentlemen! Lift your cups. Let's show them that, even if the province's leaders can differ in opinion, they do not differ in interest."

The rest lifted their cups in accord, cheering for both their province and their governor. It was in this moment of harmony that Shizuru's senior legate came up and asked to borrow her commanding officer for a moment, which request the others granted with regret. Many of them had been charmed thoroughly throughout the evening by the urbane patrician, and those of them less susceptible to charm had been won over from the start by knowledge of her other considerable assets. They were all plutocrats, after all, and nothing attracted a plutocrat nearly as much as money. And everyone was aware that money was one thing the young Fujino indubitably possessed.

"It looked to me like you were finished conquering them and needed extraction," Chie told Shizuru, who laughed. "As you requested earlier, I've come to save you from their clutches. So leave us go to a discreet spot where we can all get some well-deserved breathing space after hobnobbing with the local elite."

"Thank you, Chie-han," Shizuru replied as they walked in search of a private corner. She checked that her bodyguard was close behind them. "I hope it to be the last time you have to save me that way tonight."

Chie waved away a slave offering a tray of chilled, honey-glazed fruit.

"You're welcome and it's fine," she said. "I know very well they'd try to keep you with them as long as possible, so I'm glad to do you the favour of providing an escape, no matter how many times you need it and how many little cliques you have to visit and bend to your will. Besides, I had to get you out of there quickly just now for another reason."

Here she leaned in close to whisper something into her friend's ear, making it harsh in order to be heard above the din of guests and music.

"It looked to me like glorious Diana was ready to perch a few shafts on their chests."

She cast a sideways look at the goddess being discussed and saw the immaculate face in the half-light, the slender brows closing again in irritation when someone accidentally brushed an arm. She has reason to be irked, Shizuru thought, a little irritated herself. She knew the accident might not be so accidental. It would have taken a blind man and a fool not to want to brush against the young woman, who had come in white dress and silver-draped garb. This was by Shizuru's own request. The Himean had wished to indulge her private fancies of the girl as Artemis, of course, but had also done it out of yet another, rather recent guilty pleasure: that of dressing up her lover.

She had recently discovered special happiness in swathing the Otomeian in the softest linens; she loved to adorn the younger woman with precious ornaments that complemented not only Natsuki's atmosphere but also matched her own. For instance, she had slipped a thick band of glittering silver on the girl's arm tonight and decorated the other arm's wrist with a bracelet of the same material ornamented with cabochons of jade. They had been yet more gifts in an endless procession and Natsuki had been bashfully loath to accept. That is, until the Himean revealed that she had a twin of the bracelet, this one made of gold and studded with lapis lazuli instead, which she then fastened around her own wrist. Even the dress she wore seemed complementary to the one she chose for the girl-not a twin but a foil.

Chie did not miss the effect. She had even indulged in a public giggle over it with some of the other Himeans present, and also in a private sigh to herself. Say what some might about such drolly romantic behaviour, she was nonetheless romantic enough herself to enjoy it. Besides, there was the fact too that the pair indulging in such behaviour were remarkably suited for it and each other. It was the contrast of a woman like the rising sun next to a woman of twilight. It was her friend's charm that was all brightness, of course: Shizuru was dazzle and daze, blinding in her attractions yet reassuringly warm. Whereas the Otomeian was just pure frost: it was an appeal so cold it burned, like a sultry, sexy something that had little reassurance and plenty of intimidation.

Venus and Diana, Chie decided, still trying to come up with the right words to describe the pair. The former makes you think of giving everything up to touch her; the latter makes you think you just can't.

They found the dim nook they had been seeking behind one of the many drapes placed over the immense atrium's archways and recesses. This one nook was just such a recess, a modest alcove set with two plush couches that filled its space with a small rectangular table. It was apparent that someone else had had the use of this alcove earlier, since there were a few empty plates and some used goblets. Chie thrust her head out of the curtain as the other two women settled themselves, while she beckoned a passing slave nearby. After a few seconds of consultation, the slave entered and cleared the table, promising to discreetly return with wine for the ladies in hiding.

"Wait."

All eyes turned to the Otomeian captain, who had risen from her place.

"I will go too."

Shizuru lifted an eyebrow.

"You do not need to, Natsuki," she said, realising that Natsuki meant to ensure the integrity of the drink to be delivered to them. The girl insisted, however, and it was with some reluctance that Shizuru finally bent to her will. The two went off, and the pair of Himeans were left in the alcove.

"That's taken care of that," Chie said, making herself comfortable in her own long couch, which she occupied by herself. "I must compliment your costumes, since I've yet to do that. They're gorgeously appropriate. You both look lovely."

"Yours is very fine too, Chie-han, though you seem to be missing a blindfold."

Chie laughed.

"Ahh, I don't really believe that love is blind, you know," she said.

"Nonetheless, you make a handsome Cupid."

"Alas, I'm separated from my Psyche."

"But shall certainly reunite with her," Shizuru pointed out.

"True, that's how the tale goes. And if I remember, you're the one who was intent on keeping us apart, oh dearest mother. I hate you," she said in a perfect deadpan manner.

Shizuru laughed gently.

"To some extent, I fear it is true," she told her friend.

Chie grinned, looking rather rakish for a love-bringing deity. Shizuru reflected on how masculine her friend's beauty could be; the male garb tonight emphasised it.

"That's a joke, Shizuru-san, so please don't take it so grimly. Come now, we ladies of love must get along! Anyway, am I right in guessing your costumes were your idea?"

Shizuru confirmed it.

"Well done, then. The allusive significance is nice, too." She chuckled suddenly, her brown eyes alight. "Is it so that anyone tempted to undress her with their eyes thinks better of it, under threat of being turned into a hapless deer?"

The other woman smirked.

"I am thrilled to see that at least one person took my meaning," she said with throaty warning.

Chie loosed another chuckle.

"Dear me," she said. "Take heed or be chased by the hounds, eh? Though, if I remember, Actaeon meant no harm and simply happened to be in the wrong place at the wrong time."

"Quite," Shizuru nodded. "Still, poor fool. Such can only happen to one unloved by luck."

"You can say that only because you're beloved of Fortuna. Have you seen her walking around, by the way? The buxom, strapping woman with the scales?"

"Heavens." Faint amazement registered in the bloody eyes. "That really was a woman?"

"It got me too! She, though she looks like a she who is really a he, is really a she who just looks like a he dressed up as a she-and I can't believe I just said that without tripping!" Chie laughed boisterously with her friend, eyes darting around in an effort to spy the subject of their talk. "She's been made unofficial judge of all the wagers and petty contests the drunkards are getting into, which isn't fair since I've noticed her scales tend to tip in favour of the person who adds a sneaky coin or two to his scale's weight! Although that's probably only proper, come to think of it. Fortune really does love the rich, don't you think so?"

Shizuru laughed at the jab to her own fortunes.

"As usual, I do not really have a reply to that question, Chie-han," she said.

"You can afford not to answer, Shizuru-san," Chie replied with a small grin. "Anyway, have you seen the other officers in their costumes?"

"Oh, yes. Suou-han looks superb."

"She always does."

"And Nao-han suits her guise, methinks."

"Ulysses, yes, the red-headed trickster. She wanted to go around the party dragging a horse."

Shizuru barely stopped her shout of laughter.

"But," Chie went on, "since she couldn't find a wooden one on short notice, that fell through."

"I would have thought dragging that grey-eyed Pallas with her was sufficient reference."

"Ah, yes!" The senior legate expounded quite excitedly on the subject, actually sitting up from her relaxed slouch. "She's interesting, isn't she, that one our dear old primipilus has managed to find? Oh, she's not a beauty in the average sense-she wouldn't hold a candle to your girl, say, for sheer purity of the structure-but she's definitely something."

"I agree, she has her own appeal, unconventional as it is."

"Pure Minerva in the looks, at least in her garb tonight. And those eyes she has! So luminous and flashing and appropriately grey! Such cheekbones! Yuuki's one lucky woman."

Shizuru tapped a finger on her lower lip thoughtfully, a dire grin forming on her mouth.

"Dear me," she murmured. "Perhaps I ought to tell Psyche, after all."

Chie turned an alarmed look to her.

"It's nothing like that," she told her commander. "I'm merely appreciating the aptness of her beauty to her guise, Shizuru-san. No one here catches my eye that way and no one could, since she's not here."

"Of course," said the other woman, innocence in her eyes. "That was exactly what I meant to tell Psyche. Why, did you think it was something else?"

She found out that dear, kindly Cupid was capable of glowering after all.

"You've a streak of meanness in you that surfaces from time to time," Chie grumbled. "It was only remote praise, you know. I'd say the same of you, to other people, and I have. Or of Natsuki-san, since she does fit her guise quite spectacularly-which means I'm praising you, as it was your choice to put her in that costume. Anyway, it's all meant in true, unimpeachably innocent admiration."

"Then I thank you again, and assure you my own reply just now was made in unimpeachable innocence too," Shizuru smiled, drawing a disbelieving scoff. "At any rate, Natsuki was rather pleased with my choice too, you know."

"Oh, really? Did it tickle her fancy to come as the Goddess of the Hunt?"

"Perhaps. I do not know. What I meant was that she was pleased that the costume meant she could carry weapons on her person, being the Goddess of the Hunt."

Chie blinked, then smiled as she guessed at it: "She wanted to come in her uniform, didn't she?"

"Yes, and with her daos."

"Which she's traded for a bow, arrow, and daggers laced to each beautifully-shaped, ivory-skinned thigh." At Shizuru's expressionless glance, she hastened to explain. " Not that I have been staring at said thighs! Merely observing something I noted shortly earlier, in passing, by a perfunctory look."

Before Shizuru could say anything beyond a chuckle, the curtain parted yet again and the slave from earlier entered with the requested wine and goblets, followed into the alcove by the Goddess of the Hunt herself. The slave left, drawing the curtain behind her-which action was followed by a puff of annoyance from Shizuru's chief legate.

Shizuru looked at Chie curiously, following the legate's gaze to the scene beyond the drape. The cloth was thin enough to see through, thanks to the blaze of the torches and lamps on the other side.

"Oh," Shizuru said, upon finding the person on whom Chie's eyes were. "Is that not..."

"Yes, the pompous arse."

Shizuru covered her mouth to stifle a giggle. The person in discussion was another of Hime's more popular authors-and someone Chie happened to abhor, doling out such personal descriptions of the woman as an "oily, bombastic word-spewer without a single grain of true wit".

"You dislike her, as I recall," the patrician mused, to provoke her friend a little.

"Have you read her latest work, Shizuru-san?"

"No, I am afraid not."

"Be more afraid of reading it than otherwise. For someone who claims to be one of the best rhetoric-teachers around-and who charges her pupils duly for that claim-she sure finds new ways to overuse 'therefore' to hyperextend her sentences, therefore causing the reader extreme anxiety over finally seeing the end of each point-therefore begging the question of whether she actually ends her points- therefore causing you to sink into such ennui from her tediousness that you therefore begin to ask yourself if she even has a bloody point."

Shizuru had dissolved into laughter by this time. It had already lapsed into soft giggling when she felt a light touch on her arm, accompanied by Chie's remark.

"Oh," said the legate. "I think Natsuki-san wants something."

Shizuru looked at Natsuki's grave face.

"What is it, Na-" She stopped. "Ahh. Is he here already?"

A nod.

"I see. In that case, we should go." Shizuru turned to Chie. "I am ever so sorry, but would you be so kind as to excuse us, Chie-han? There is someone with whom I must speak."

She spared a regretful glance for the mostly-untouched wine on the table.

"I promise I shall have another drink with you soon," she told her chief legate.

"Go on," Chie replied. "Is it that chap Nao told me about? The one who runs that agency?"

"Yes, that would be correct," her friend answered.

"Hope it goes well, and know it will, even if I hoped otherwise."

They left the legate. Natsuki led the way as they emerged from the alcove and went through the atrium and attached courtyard. This was the property not of the State but of one of Argus's wealthiest moguls. He was actually a Himean-of the loyalist tradition, the governor had remarked to Shizuru-and his manor had always been the chosen site for this particular celebration in the past. So long as he considered this signal honour meriting the opening of his fabulously stocked wine-cellars-something he always did to mark the occasion-it was highly unlikely that the governor would ever decline his offer to host the party in the future.

In any case, his manor was remarkably suited for hosting parties; rumour even had it that he had its architect build it with the express purpose of making a home that could host three parties at the same time. Whether or not this report was true was immaterial, for no-one seeing the sheer breadth of his estate, the height of the mural-covered walls, and the girth of the colonnades of his porticus, could possibly doubt the place's capacity for accommodation. Indeed, it accommodated the present event very comfortably.

A sizeable domicile indeed, Shizuru thought abstractedly, as she followed her bodyguard's lead through their linked hands. She estimated at least a hundred guests tonight, with a slave dancing attendance on each one. Combined with the troupe of Greek actors brought in, the dancers and magicians, the mummers and musicians-well, it was a sizeable crowd, to say the least. And it further stressed the dimensions of the manor, since all these partygoers did not find themselves in a squeeze. In fact, they milled quite freely in and out of curtained archways and found more than enough lush couches on which to settle down with their food and drink. Factions tended to cluster together, of course, but the Argus officials and Shizuru's officers worked to ensure the constant circulation, so that all could truly mingle.

She snapped out of her ponderings when she realised that she was being led out of the courtyard and headed for one of the attached corridors.

"Natsuki," she called, stepping a little faster to bring her closer to her bodyguard. "Are we supposed to meet him somewhere in particular?"

The girl paused momentarily and looked back at her.

"Yes," she said. "There."

Shizuru nodded. Natsuki turned again to resume their walk, only to find herself face to face with one of the mummers, who was apparently impersonating a gigantic and drunken toad.

"Oh..."

The Himean watched the mummer, a little entertained, as he acted out ridiculous movements and contortions of his body in front of them, croaking terribly all the while. Then she felt the hand holding hers tighten, prompting her to look at Natsuki. The girl was staring down the performer, her nostrils flaring in incredulity, and then suddenly casting a look towards Shizuru that made the Himean chuckle.

What manner of creature is this, that gloriously royal face seemed to say. What is this thing whose presence offends me?

She squeezed the younger woman's hand to catch her attention.

"Mercy, Goddess," she whispered to her companion's ear. "Send no swine to ravage this Calydon."

Natsuki was quite unable to prevent a smile.

"Be nice," Shizuru went on. "I will try to get us out of this as soon as possible. All right?"

She received a squeeze of the hand in return.

"It is fine," Natsuki told her, getting up on her toes to speak into Shizuru's ear. "We go when you want."

"Soon. I promise."

With a wave of the hand, Shizuru banished the mummer and they went through the arch with Natsuki taking the lead once more. They strode the breadth of the hallway, its red-veined marble leading them to the edifice's heart. They turned a corner and entered a dimly-lighted sitting room. Here the sound of the party was but a murmur, and the room itself seemed empty save for a silhouette sitting in the dimness. There was only one small lamp for the entire room.

"Natsuki, you found me," the person in the sitting room said in a bland, unremarkable voice. "Good evening, Fujino-san. I'm pleased to finally meet you."

Shizuru took her place on the seat opposite his. Natsuki elected to lean against a nearby column, her spare figure almost completely swallowed up by the shadows. Shizuru only felt her move there, her own eyes being fixed on the stranger in front of her. He sat well back, presumably to keep to the shadows, but was nonetheless faintly discernible as a man in a Greek tunic, of modest figure and dark hair. A few more seconds, and her eyes had adjusted enough to the lighting to note other things: he had a quizzing glass on his lap, dark eyes, and was clean-shaven of face.

"Well-met," she said at last, whereupon he smiled. "Thank you for meeting me, Yamada-han."

The man who called himself Yamada tipped his head. It was appropriate, Shizuru would reflect later, that they met in such a shady location, for Yamada was an intensely shady character. It was even uncertain if his name was truly Yamada or not, as research had shown that though there were documents certifying it they might well have been counterfeited. Claiming to be of mixed Himean and Greek descent, he was listed in the census files as having one of the more privileged degrees of citizenship classed under the Extended Rights.

He had supposedly been living in the northern territories of Hime for nearly two decades. He had operated his trade within and without said territories for about the same length of time. His trade relied heavily on transport and navigation, being an agency catering to so many varied tastes that it ran the gamut of Argus for its clientele and served clients in a position only roughly and euphemistically called "specialised acquisitions". Shorn of the euphemisms, it was perhaps best described by the word "smuggling ". But then again, smuggling was not exactly all there was to it. After all, given the right fee and conditions, his agents had been known not to refuse other similarly special errands as they passed their routes- "errands" being yet another euphemism, of course.

It would occur to anyone of good sense that a person whose daily activities required an overload of euphemism was most probably not a clean character. And indeed, Shizuru was fully aware of Yamada's illegal activities when she decided to meet him. That was because he provided her with good reason to do so, especially insofar as her military interests were concerned. His agency had years of experience in working as far abroad as the lands of the Mentulae.

Yamada's agents had an overwhelming wealth of experience at navigating the byways and dirt tracks webbed haphazardly through Obsidian's empire, some of them even just as familiar with the popular pathways in those regions as they were with the little-known ones. To a soon-to-be invader like Shizuru, such navigational knowledge was invaluable. This was not only for the prospect of cartographic details and assigning guides, but also for the possibility of non-military assistance and reconnaissance networks. Thus, upon hearing from her primipilus-who had been doing investigations along these same lines-of the existence of such an agency as the one run by this 'Yamada', Shizuru had been quick to see the opportunity.

The only problem had been the question of gaining a meeting with him, for Shizuru had insisted that she would meet only the man himself. The difficulty was that Yamada was notorious for avoiding exposure, often relying on his higher-ranked agents to make contact. It was rumoured that he only appeared himself when the client-to-be was of indubitable significance. There Nao had assured Shizuru she would qualify, and so the situation seemed to have been resolved, with the only remaining task the question of how to extend this invitation to Yamada. Just as they were debating this, however, help had come from a most unexpected corner.

"Natsuki asked me to do this meeting, Fujino-san," Yamada said to Shizuru, who nodded. "I couldn't very well refuse one of my most esteemed clients."

"I see," Shizuru said, making a mental note to ask her girl again about what business she had been giving Yamada. The first time she had asked, she had been given a vague and unrevealing answer that slipped from her mind quickly, given her eagerness to reward the girl for the favour. And now, here was Yamada saying that she was one of his most significant clients. What in the world could Natsuki have been doing with such a character? How had she met him? How long had they known each other? She had a nagging feeling, from the way he spoke of Natsuki, that their acquaintance was not a recent matter.

Yamada was talking again in his unmemorable, terribly prosaic voice.

"Your accent is more noticeable than I imagined, Fujino-san," he ventured, without any real attempt at making his tone charming. He was mindful of the sombre glint in those red eyes. It was his first time to see them so closely, and he discovered that the layers of red in them were flaked, overlapping crusts from shredded rubies. Uncanny! "Please don't interpret that as criticism. I think I could listen to you all day, if you don't mind my saying."

"Thank you. Rest assured that such compliments do not inconvenience me."

"By the way, have you tried the fish stew they're serving tonight? It's good."

Shizuru looked at the bowl on the table, near his open hand. She could discern mussel shells and prawns aside from the chunks of fish, all of it drenched in what seemed to be an orange soup. It smelled strongly of shallots and garlic, and was fairly appetising.

"No, I have not yet done so," she said. "But I believe I may later, upon your recommendation."

He seemed amused.

"It's not a bad idea," he said. "My recommendations are valuable, you know."

"I doubt it not. I would like to ascertain how consistently they earn their value, however."

"They always do." It was no false claim: Shizuru had performed a check on him, and the results were in agreement. "I think you'd know that, Fujino-san, since you wouldn't even waste your time with me if my record had been bad."

She slanted her head to acknowledge that.

"You have checked, haven't you?" he said, eyes flicking to the person watching them. "And I suppose the princess has vouched for me?"

Shizuru did not answer that, choosing instead to look at Natsuki as well. The girl spared a short lift of the eyebrow in response.

She nodded.

"Then, can we start?" he asked. "I'm sure you've many things to do, being commander of a fortification force."

"I detect irony in the inflection," Shizuru noted.

He shrugged a shoulder.

"I'm sorry," he said. "Unless the irony is actually appropriate, General?"

"I am afraid I do not really consider myself a credible critic of rhetoric here," she returned. "I did see at least one grammaticus in the party, however, and an esteemed one at that. I daresay she is better qualified to tell you whether your use of irony is appropriate or not."

A small grin came to his mouth, and he dipped his head in acceptance of the subtle rebuke. When he looked up, he was quite serious again.

"As I was saying, I understand you've come to see me in your capacity as commander of the fortification of the Northern Territories," he resumed. "Since fortification means there's something to fortify against, am I right in thinking the first name in the list would be King Obsidian's?"

"Perhaps."

"Their proximity is something to be concerned about, I'd think."

"Not to mention their unrest," she replied. "Of course, any possible act or discussion of fortifying against incursions from them is merely in recognition of potential disagreements, and not operative on a certainty of conflict. Good security lies in recognition of eventualities."

"And our good security is your business, General." He smirked, privately enjoying her caution. She was careful, this one, and a smooth talker. The accent helped too, he felt. Well, all of it helped! Just look at her!

He said: "I take it our business has to do with that, then?"

"Yes."

"How may I be of service to you?"

Against his expectations, however, she repeated the query to him.

"Would you be so kind as to tell me?" she said. "After all, this is my first time as a potential customer in your shop, so to speak. I do hope you shall humour me a little by showing me around and suggesting something among your wares that would fit my taste."

Yamada's dark eyes were narrowing as he sat back: he was beginning to get the measure of her.

"Or, perhaps," she followed, "that was a little too much metaphor?"

He could not resist releasing a chuckle. Oh, was she ever careful! Even more so than he had thought before. That was good: he only did work for people who were careful.

He bent a little way forward, enough to show her his face. He kept his eyes locked with hers the entire time.

"If you want a pitch," he acquiesced. "My agency specialises in clandestine acquisitions and intelligence, as you already know, and runs as far afield these areas as the Mentulaean lands. Given your present interests, it strikes me that we could work out an advantageous deal on the premise of your need for reconnaissance work in our grumpy neighbour's empire, so we know when he's getting one of his fits. You need people that can scurry past his borders and all around them- just to keep an eye on things, of course, and keep you informed-and we have those people. We can pass through his borders and pass right out of them without detection, faster than pure, clean water through a net. And we can get you whatever you need while doing it. Our main service may be listed as acquisitions, but we can provide many other services just as expertly, from surveillance to scouting, according to your requirements."

She seemed neither impressed nor disappointed by the speech. He supposed that was to be expected: word had it that she had some of the best intelligence operatives from Hime's Sulpician Province actually embedded in her legions.

"Our requirements are flexible," she told him. "Are your services the same?"

"Yes, all the way to the extreme points of the spectrum."

"I see. Let it be understood that all intents thus far are strictly non-aggressive."

And it's down to cold, hard business. "It's understood."

"Manpower?"

"Over a hundred, with almost twice that number for secondary assets. Total varies according to tasks being performed, given constant passage through many borders. Sometimes there are fewer on hand, since some are abroad, but all stay in contact."

"How often in contact?"

"Constant updates, reasonable allowances given for distances and weather conditions. If the update cycle is disrupted, we send other agents for reconnaissance."

"And I presume these follow-up agents handle the situation if anything goes awry?"

"Yes, though that's hardly ever the case," he replied blandly. "And when it does happen, it's due to uncontrollable aspects of a situation, like a flood stranding an agent somewhere, without escape. Even so, we have a perfect record for resolving such cases."

"Has resolution ever dealt with issues of management? Such as, for example, defections?"

The beady eyes seemed to harden. Would he tell the truth, or would he not? The standard practice for business was to deny this, but the prospective client before him did not fit any conception of standard. Watch what you say, the twinkling red eyes seemed to murmur merrily to him. Watch it, and watch me watching you.

"Yes," he said after an infinitesimal pause. "Four times. They had unusual circumstances."

"I see. And were they resolved?"

For this he had no need of a pause: "Yes. All four situations were salvaged, and both the problems and the commissions executed. The actual integrity of the primary mission was not compromised."

"Ah."

"I hope you don't let this tarnish your opinion of us as business partners," he said with a thin and rather sombre smile. "Being a woman of authority yourself, Fujino-san, I imagine you know that each organisation has its occasional personnel problems."

She responded with an unexpectedly wide smile, folding gracefully slender and spidery hands over crossed legs. He watched the white fingers come together perfectly, as though each one was meeting its own reflection in a mirror. He realised suddenly that they were not actually as thin as they appeared. Simply, they gave the illusion of being thin only because they were so long. Much like the rest of her, they were in fact very large and powerful.

"It does not put me off, Yamada-han. Rather, it actually strengthens my faith in your enterprise," she laughed, confusing him a little though he did not let it show. "As you say, every organisation has its personnel problems. Had you told me you have never had one, that could only have meant three things. First, that someone has not been checking hard enough. Second, that someone is lying."

A grin spread his mouth. He did not fail to notice that instead of naming him specifically as the one at fault in those two situations, she had opted to say "someone".

"And the third possibility, General?"

She nodded gently.

"Third, you truly have yet to get your share of personnel problems and should be anticipating them in the future-in which case they would most likely fall upon your commission from me." She smiled, closing her eyes for a few seconds. "And since the first such experiences are always the most disturbing, given their break from what was previously a coherent and universal trust in the system, I would much rather not have my interests threatened for the sake of your organisation's learning experiences with personnel problems. That charitable I fear I am not."

He was grinning fully now, his bland face endowed with unanticipated character by the expression. She opened her rust-red eyes and smiled at him.

"Now then, since we are talking about learning experiences," she said crisply. "Training?"

"Varied preliminary schools. Half come from the Sulpician Province," he said, naming Hime's famed breeding-ground of expert intelligencers and torture specialists.

"So at least half are Himeans?"

"Yes." He was confident in answering that, especially as it was advantageous to her. "And the other half is mixed. Syrians, mostly, who've grown up in our territories. Jews too. Practically Himean."

"How practically?"

"Under the Extended Rights citizenship."

"One wonders how those were procured."

"Most of them have mixed heritage," he replied. "I take on only those who feel a, shall we say, kinship with Hime. It's to keep them from going over to foreign concerns because of money." A flicker of deviousness passed over his eyes. "National elitism can be strong glue, I'm sure you know."

She unbent enough to smile.

"It can be that," she murmured. "And what about them? How is their training?"

"Conducted under much the same principles as those from the Sulpician schools." At her curious glance, he went on to explain: "I hire trainers who schooled there themselves."

"And how much of the Sulpician intelligencer's curriculum do your agents take up?"

"The full range."

"Passing all of them?"

"They get booted out of training camp and sent home if they don't. We don't use machines with missing pegs."

"Very well, then."

She exhaled a sigh that gave nothing away except that she was meditating, and leaned back in the comfortable seat of her chair. The cushions accepted her weight carefully, resisting after she had sunken about an inch deep into the padding.

"Well, Yamada-han, it is a most impressive stock you have in store," she said, a little amusement in her voice. "Impressive, though still limited in supply. How many can you dedicate without conflict of other interests to me, if ever?"

"Half, if required."

"Is that figure negotiable?"

"Maybe. It depends on the price, General."

"What is the price?"

He laughed now, obviously cheered by the thought of money. At heart, Shizuru thought, he still was really just another plutocrat.

"It'll be expensive, Fujino-san, I can tell you that."

The word 'expensive' failed to register any sounds of alarm for someone of her means; she brushed it aside.

"Indeed. You may talk it over with my bankers, come to that," she replied with her usual nonchalance over money. "I have no wish to haggle with you at this moment. I am sure my bankers do that well enough for me, anyhow. What I wished to know was whether or not you would be willing to dedicate all your resources to our enterprise's interests."

This time, Yamada let his surprise show.

"That's going to be even more expensive."

Again the rich woman's shrug over "expensive".

"As you say," she said. "What is the answer?"

He blinked, and then his eyes gleamed open: he saw the great, shining vista of chance yawning before him. If this woman was this rich, if she was indeed as immensely powerful as he could feel, then this was the time to bargain for that which he had always wanted. Yes, a perfect opportunity!

"If you add something to bargain, you can consider it sealed," he ventured.

She lifted an eyebrow in query. He came out with it.

"Full citizenship." At her blank face, he said it again. "If you get me- and any possible issue I might have in the future- full citizenship, I'll dedicate all our resources to you, Fujino-san. I won't take any other jobs after that unless the resources can be spared. But your tasks will constantly take precedence."

He repeated the qualifier for conclusion: " Only if you get me the full Himean citizenship."

It took a while before she replied, but when she did, he saw in her eyes that he had pleased her.

"Full citizenship?" she said.

He said nothing, knowing she was merely measuring the idea.

"That would mean you would become my client, " she said, suddenly. "I would be your patron."

He smiled grimly and nodded.

Again the pleased, somewhat feline smile from her. Well, and with good reason, he thought to himself. To have him as a client would be very useful to any patron.

Of course, he surmised, he could probably say the same of having a patron like her.

"Then we shall definitely talk again," she said, after a few seconds of smiling at nothing in particular. "To finalise arrangements."

He nodded.

"It's going to be a pleasure doing business with you, Fujino-san," he said.

"I should hope so." She looked at him in a way that indicated the interview was not over yet, and he took the hint. They stared at each other. "Permit me to ask you another question, first."

"That's what people do when they talk to me, General."

"What is in it for you?"

Even in the gloom, she thought she saw the glimmer that passed his eyes, as he smiled at her.

"Why, I thought I'd already answered that question earlier," he replied. "But since I'm assuming you're not the sort of person who'd ask the same thing expecting to hear the same answer, I'd say it's just the standard trifecta. Money, power, sex." He laughed colourlessly. "Though the last one's not as important as the first two. I could live without it."

"Money and, roughly speaking, the citizenship." Her eyes glimmered much like his; only, hers did not lose the flame after the initial spark. "Allow me to put it a little more clearly, then. Are you not concerned about what our probable continued presence-implied, quite clearly, by my preliminary terms in our bargain-can mean for your business? Surely you have considered the possibilities it may have on the environment for your trade, in the long term."

"What do you mean?" he asked, lifting his eyebrows in false curiosity. "What can it mean for my business in the long term?"

Shizuru's smile was charm personified, though her eyes seemed to narrow at his answer. She rose from her seat.

"I see," she said. "Forgive me, but I have changed my mind."

He stood as well, stopping her with a gesture of his hands.

"No, please," he said with a touch of urgency, only receiving yet another charming smile in reply. "Please, Fujino-san. Please take your seat. I'm sorry-that was in bad taste."

She deigned to return, lowering herself with deliberate sloth into her seat. He had returned to his as well and watched her quietly, obviously calculating. It was only when she lifted an eyebrow at him that he finally spoke again.

"That was a stupid joke," he told her with a far more animated expression than he had shown her thus far, his mouth actually loosening enough into a small but sincere grin. He shook his head while talking. "I'm very sorry for that, Fujino-san. It was juvenile and I'm sorry for offending you. Please stay."

She said nothing, accepting his apology with an incline of the head.

"I should've spoken to a woman such as you directly and just answered the question," he continued. "So if you'll be good enough not to change your mind yet, I'm willing to answer you honestly."

"Then go on, Yamada-han," she replied evenly. "You may say your piece."

You may say your piece - you may, he mused afterwards, repeating her words in his mind. Well, he had asked for permission and been given it. But oh, she was a true aristocrat, this one! Yamada had known it all along, had known of her repute even before she had come to the North, but it was still something to meet the person behind the popularity. What he saw justified the esteem, and maybe more. Taller than he had thought, more intensely authoritative than he had imagined. Unbelievably good-looking, if a trifle eerie because of the eyes. He could almost feel a ton of weight behind her too, its ponderous way smoothed by masses of glamour and charm. And beneath all that cultured charisma was what intrigued him most about the very patrician, famously courteous and elegant woman: Shizuru Fujino had a supreme and surprisingly unerring instinct for the jugular.

I believe I'm going to enjoy working for her, he thought contentedly while going about his explanation. A movement off to his side made his eyes flicker to the darkness for the briefest of moments, and he caught sight of two predatory green eyes eyeing him closely, cold assessment in their depths. He returned his gaze to the woman before him, feeling like a man caught between two predatory animals. For Shizuru Fujino was that too, was she not? He saw it now, if he had not seen it as clearly before: the Himean only seemed perfectly refined. She had an intense power of stillness that worked to her advantage, but the more perceptive would sniff something working under it, an evanescent but dangerous scent. It was the impression of a wild and untamed spirit in an exquisitely civilised body.

Is that why you like her, Princess Natsuki?

His eyes focused now on those before him, noting with fascination the way the crusts of those rubies actually bled into each other.

"Of course I'm aware that your presence in this region will be long-term," he was saying to her. "And-I'm speaking on my own conjectures and projections here-the long-term result will undoubtedly be favourable to our side, in which case I'll have acquired for myself a prime bargaining position in securing more benefits and commerce in the new, let's say, balance of power in these regions. Assuming, of course, that you would be willing to bargain with me for that, afterwards."

"Perhaps," she said with a smile. "Do go on. Since we are talking about conjectures, what if something should happen in the future of our association that would lead you to conjecture differently from what you had first thought?"

He smiled crookedly: "So long as I continue receiving my benefits from the bargain, my services wouldn't change, I promise you. Even if I thought the North's power structure wouldn't ultimately end with the Himean side on top, I know it wouldn't inconvenience my continued commerce too much later since my assistance to you would be carried out in a clandestine capacity. They couldn't punish me then, because they wouldn't be able to target me. They wouldn't even know me."

He plucked at the soft cloth of his tunic to rearrange it.

"Of course, it would leave me with a lot of added costs, if we did lose the power struggle-in a manner of speaking," he told her.

"Relocating base of operations, setting up again in different locations, forming a new client base. Even with the profit I'll undoubtedly make from our arrangement, throughout its duration, I consider it frankly tiresome and unnecessary. The most benefit would come from me holding strictly and loyally to our partnership and using it to the fullest advantage," he concluded. "That, my esteemed general and soon-to-be patron, is why you can trust me. Besides, Natsuki's fondness for you would hold me in itself. I'm not fool enough to think even I can escape the princess if she wanted to revenge a betrayal on me. She's one of the few people I genuinely fear in these lands."

Shizuru's eyes went to the side: Natsuki was eyeing the man very darkly.

"I see."

She uncrossed her legs, and he knew the interview was over.

"You argue your point effectively," she remarked. "As I said earlier, we shall speak again soon. How shall I get in touch with you?"

He rose to his feet too, bowing to her.

"I'll send one of my agents around soon," he said. "But if we need to meet before that, I think Natsuki can tell you how. She would know."

"All right. Thank you again, Yamada-han. It was a pleasure meeting you."

"And you, General. This has been an advantageous evening for us both," he said with a smile. "Now I'm even more glad I did Natsuki the favour of coming here."

Shizuru halted in the act of turning around, seeming to think on something. Suddenly, she asked the young woman near the archway to go a little ahead of her. The girl hesitated, but finally agreed when assured she could wait just outside the room.

"Is something wrong, Fujino-san?"

Once sure that Natsuki was out of hearing range, Shizuru faced Yamada and walked the few steps necessary to bring her a mere two feet away from him. She noticed his eyes widen a little upon her approach, his chin forced to tilt up for him to meet her eyes.

"Why did you do it?"

His mouth parted, but no sound came immediately. Instead, he took a second to take a slow, solicitous breath of air.

"Do what, Fujino-san?" he asked, perfectly calm.

She spoke just as calmly, and in an even more languid tone.

"Do Natsuki that favour. I have heard that you do not grant interviews with just anyone, that even the wealthiest, most influential plutocrats do not always get to sit with you. Yet it seems almost as though she has summoned you with a single request. It strikes me a touch interesting."

Yamada's dry face suddenly loosened, and she saw that the emotion on it was amusement.

"She didn't pay me anything for this meeting, if that's what you're thinking, Fujino-san," he said very simply. "And she won't be paying me anything for it. As I said, it was a business favour."

"Business," Shizuru repeated enquiringly.

"Good business," he replied, with a smirk. "To show you what I mean, I'll do you a business favour too, since you're now a significant customer as well as my future patron. Here's a hint to something most people wouldn't know, because its so rarely spoken about with anything approaching a confirmation."

She looked at him intensely as he delivered his message.

"Perhaps I'm doing all of this just because I think it's smart business to get along with solitary, uncontested heiresses," he told her. "Even if some of them haven't cleared the cobwebs from their crypts ever since interment."

Having delivered this line, he stepped back and gave her another bow, leaving through a different archway from the one she and her bodyguard had used to enter. Shizuru watched him vanish behind the curtain, which swung gently in the stir of his departure.

She tapped her finger to her own thigh thoughtfully. Solitary heiresses, cobwebs and crypts. Even interment had been mentioned. The man must have enjoyed that little riddle. Unfortunately, she was unsure of feeling the same way. It was but a clue, after all, and not a confirmation: all she would be able to glean from it would be vague and in the manner of a signpost pointing her to the destination proper. It was clear that he had been talking in part about her. But he said it was something most people would not know, which effectively ruled herself out as the direct subject. Could he be talking, then, about Natsuki?

This bears investigation, does it not? An inheritance of some kind, then, has survived from her family? Part of the Ortygian Treasures, I would guess. But his words might as well be indicating something more in the mode of the immaterial, some other form of wealth or power or influence destined for someone in her position and with her ancestry. It bears investigation.

She shook her head as she walked, thinking quietly on what Yamada had told her. She shelved it away, however, upon seeing what was waiting for her on the other side of the curtain.

"Natsuki, my apologies," she said, approaching the Otomeian. "I merely had a final word with him."

The dark-haired girl looking at her keenly said nothing. A torch on the wall nearby threw a shine on the girl's lean shoulders, the points above the muscle leading into the bars of her clavicles and ending in a deep hollow above the flat of her breast. Shizuru touched that hollow with a finger, feeling the small shiver that passed through Natsuki at her action, and seeing the swaying movement that seemed as though the girl would fall against her.

She would have caught her if that happened, but it was a hand that came out instead.

"I hope you were not too lonely waiting for me." She took the offered hand. "We can go now, if you wish."

Natsuki threw a speaking glance at her. " You want to go?"

"I suppose so. Let us see."

They went down the hallway they had passed earlier, stopping just at the archway leading to the courtyard. Like almost all the other curtains, the filmy cloth hung over it permitted Shizuru to spy the scene outside while the darkness in the corridor prevented the scene from spying on her. Through the diaphanous red cloth, she could see the governor of Argus no longer playing the part of her guise, acting more like a gracious-though still rather merry-host than a mad member of the Bacchanal, as went her attire. She could see her officers, from the senior legate to the greenest military tribune, mingling with the crowd and chattering with the locals. She saw that all was well.

She smiled down at her lover and said, "I think they can do very well without us. I have done my part, as have you. Let us leave them?"

Natsuki nodded.

They slunk away through the dimly-lit halls, passing a few other loitering guests and more than a few local soldiers on guard duty. At the entrance-or the exit, as the situation would be-the pair found one of the villa's three head slaves. It was the one who had received them earlier, ready to see them out gracefully as well. His would be the task of informing the guests, should it prove necessary, of who had departed from the party and why. He took the noble Himean's excuse of being exhausted as well as her apologies, and promised to convey them to the host and the governor.

He and another servant had helped the two women with their cloaks by the time they heard the sounds of Shizuru's hired carriage coming up, along with the sound of what seemed to be many other horses.

"That may be your gig, general," he said, stepping back from her and her partner with obvious deference. "And the horses for the guards accompanying you. Will there be anything else?"

Shizuru felt the edges of her cloak flap in the wind as she turned to him.

"No, thank you," she said, and noticed the surprise he tried to hide at being thanked. "But you may leave us now, please."

He bowed even deeper this time, to her as well as to the icy-looking noble near her shoulder. His duty performed, he retired quietly as she had requested, musing on the strange courtesies of some aristocrats. Thanking a slave, of all things!

Shizuru and Natsuki were left alone in the outer courtyard of the great villa, their heavy dark cloaks tight around them.

"The guards tonight are to be from the local garrison," Shizuru told her companion quietly. "The measure was determined necessary by Sakaki-han and Midori-han, given recent points of unrest. Besides, it is well into the night-and what a dark night it is turning out to be! Perfect for bandits or ambushers."

Natsuki hummed in approbation, tilting her head up to look at the sky.

"Moonless," she murmured, the fine angle of her jaw inviting.

"Moonless," Shizuru agreed, her own eyes on the girl. "Perhaps because the moon has come down to the earth to stand next to me?"

The younger woman smirked at the blatant flattery.

"Could be," she said.

Their carriage finally drew up, as well as nine military steeds and their riders on them. Shizuru saw that yet another soldier was actually sitting next to the driver of the carriage, her red army cape wound well about her shoulders.

"Well now," she said, recognising the soldiers accompanying her. They were all veterans from her Ninth Legion's First Century. "Am I right in thinking Yuuki-han ordered the ten of you specifically to accompany me?"

They saluted in confirmation.

"Got to get you home right and proper, General," one said.

"I am sorry this takes you from the comfort of a warm bed," Shizuru sighed. "And I thank you kindly for taking the trouble to assure I get safely to mine."

The soldier sitting next to the driver answered her.

"It's our duty and we're proud to do it, General," she told her commander. "We're working with the Argus military tonight, but our officers get first priority. And you're the first of the first."

Another soldier, a rider, continued it: "Which means you get the first of The First."

Shizuru chuckled.

"Well-put, Hideki-han," she said with one of her more dashing grins, the one she reserved for her most precious rankers. "I thank you for doing your duty so zealously, then."

"Personally, the whole century would've been glad to accompany you tonight," came the answer. "But the centurion did say you'd rather there were less of us, I think."

"She knows me so well." Shizuru smiled winningly. "At any rate, I am sure the ten of you are worth another army's century, so I still dare to say I am overwatched for so short a trip through the countryside."

And, of course, you must consider that I have a goddess looking out for me too at my side. Do you know of any bandit silly enough to chance it?"

The others chortled quietly, seeing the colour on the face of their commander's lover. They went silent rapidly, however, when the so-called goddess tiptoed up to whisper something in her charge's ear. Whatever she said lifted the general's golden eyebrows.

"Oh, you too?" she said to the girl with a wondering expression. "How many?"

The Otomeian murmured to her again, and whatever it was seemed to heighten her wonder.

" Thirty ?"

The general pulled back to look her lover in the face.

"You mean you ordered thirty of your riders to escort us this evening?" she went on. "Good heavens, Natsuki, that is a lot!"

"No," was the low response. "It is just barely enough."

The legionaries exchanged glances, straining forward as unobtrusively as they could to catch more of this interesting dialogue.

"So they have been waiting for us all this time?" the general was asking the Otomeian, who nodded in answer. "Where?"

The Otomeian merely pointed her chin in the direction from which their carriage and riders had come. Before Shizuru could ask any more, one of the legionaries spoke.

"Beggin' your pardon, General," he said in a distinctively country brogue. "But if I can say, I think we know what the lady means. We were with them back in the stables."

Shizuru looked at the one who had spoken and thanked him for the information, saying his name to show she remembered it. Everyone knew she always did, but it warmed each one's heart every time.

"Easy to remember, those black uniforms," he continued. "There were thirty, a'right, and we could see they were waiting fer something. They were getting on-saddle when we lef'."

"I see." Shizuru nodded at him. She turned to look warmly at Natsuki. "Now I really do feel overwatched. But thank you so much for your concern, Natsuki. Believe me when I say I appreciate it, and I am sure these good legionaries probably feel a little better knowing they have cavalry reinforcements."

She turned her head to one of the men on horseback.

"Does this satisfy your concerns, Hideki-han? I know you had hoped for your entire century here, as you said earlier, but perhaps this shall do?" she asked. "The Lupine warriors are not feeble soldiers, you know."

"Sure aren't, General," he said, sparing generous praise. "They're right terrors, that's for sure. I'm proud to have them with us tonight."

Natsuki acknowledged his compliment for her troopers with a smile. Shizuru addressed the girl again, mist floating from her mouth with each word.

"I suppose they are waiting for us at the exit to these grounds?" she asked, gaze drifting over the young woman at her side, whose eyes were hooded against a gust of wind. She was pale as always, Shizuru thought, and with all that pallor wrapt about her, the black of her fine brows and lashes was a shock.

"Yes," the girl whispered. "They will join there."

"I see. Well then."

Shizuru put her hand on the handle of the gig as if to go in, but paused suddenly before doing so.

"Natsuki," she said, looking at the girl next to her.

The girl looked at her too.

"You are so beautiful," she said unashamedly. And then, without missing a beat: "Come on. Let us go."

The pair of them entered the gig and let the heavy curtain fall back into place, sheltering them from ten highly-amused pairs of eyes. Natsuki's bow and arrow were placed on the unoccupied seat across theirs, within easy reach. After a signalling knock on the carriage's wall, the driver started off, the clatter of their guards' steeds audible around them.

"I hope you will excuse me for not waiting to get in the carriage first before saying that."

Shizuru smiled as she spoke, knowing the younger woman was looking at her without having to actually see it.

"I simply felt as though I had to say it then," she said.

Complacent in their privacy, the smaller female inched herself gradually closer to Shizuru's side, whereupon the Himean snaked an arm around her neck and held her close. They stayed silent this way for a while until they heard the sounds of more hooves: their Otomeian escort had joined them.

"Shizuru?"

"Yes?"

"Tired?" was Natsuki's enquiry.

"Not very, strangely enough. Are you?"

A sound of denial.

"Ah." Her fingers pinched the girl's ear. "Your ear is cold." She covered it with her palm, hoping her hand was warm. "Are you all right?"

"Mm."

"Really?"

A firm point of contact found her shoulder: Natsuki's cheek.

"Warm now," came the answer.

Shizuru was loath to alter their position after that, but nonetheless decided to ask the girl to move a little first, without explaining why. Her intentions were made clear anyway when she unfurled the cloak wrapped about her and draped one side of it over the other woman, taking the other side for herself. They snuggled under the burgundy cloth, close together.

"Better?"

Natsuki nodded.

"Why did you ask if I was tired?"

"You mounted so fast," Natsuki responded, flicking green eyes in the gloom to indicate the interior of their carriage. Suddenly she straightened. "Is there hurry? Something is wrong?"

Shizuru drew her back in. Again she felt the weight of the young woman's cheek resting on her shoulder.

"I'm fine, worry not. We are going directly to the gubernatorial mansion and then our quarters now," she said. She could smell the top of her companion's head: it smelled of the fragrances from their bath and-as always, which fascinated Shizuru to no end-of new pine. How did the Otomeian keep her hair smelling that way? It was almost as though she went prowling about the woods at dawn, each day. "We are done for the day, thank goodness. Do you want to go somewhere else, though?"

A sound of denial.

"All right, then."

A short silence passed.

"It was not unpleasant today," Shizuru eventually said, rubbing her cheek against the top of Natsuki's head. "My work, I mean. But everyone was full of talk and politics and talk yet again. And all I really wanted was to be with you. You are perhaps the one person here whose company makes me feel as though I am not at work again."

She felt the warmth blossom on her shoulder and knew the other woman was blushing. A hand took hers and began to play with it, pulling and pinching at the fingers gently. She let her hand stay limp for the most part, but every now and then pinched back. Later, she pulled up the smaller hand and held it to her lips before returning it to her lap.

A few seconds later, she felt something tugging at the ribbons holding up her hair. She looked down. In the greyness, two big and liquid-green eyes regarded her mutely.

"What are you doing?" she asked.

Natsuki smiled.

"This tie," she said. "Your hair, maybe?"

She consented. The fingers continued their work until the cords gave way, and then her hair was released. It settled in rich golden waves over her shoulders and her back. She felt a hand gather and move it to the side, towards the shoulder where the younger woman's head rested. Then came the long, deep breath Natsuki took when the blonde locks were near her nose. It was a breath that spoke of a long day, a low and whispering desire to inhale something familiar and comforting. It sounded like a sigh of relief after so much raucous alienness, and it was then that the Himean felt a twinge of guilt.

" Meum mel, I am sorry I am always rushing around," she said, remembering the way Natsuki had been watching her today: watching everything and anything with electric fastidiousness that bordered paranoia. Some part of Shizuru had sensed it, in days earlier, but had almost forgotten. Ever since her avowal of suspicion about something dark shadowing her, a confession she made to the governor eight days past, Natsuki had been like this: eagle-eyed and as tautly alert as their adopted panther when it was scenting prey nearby.

The first few days, Shizuru had thanked her but cautioned that she need not be so alarmed of surprise attacks, as they were highly unlikely to come in such a form; the older woman expected any trouble to come through less direct means, such as through politics. As the days wore on with no sign of relaxation from Natsuki, however, Shizuru had eventually grown to reconcile herself with it, choosing instead to regard her lover's efforts with amusement. Now she realised that she might have grown too contented in that amusement. How could she have failed to remember that, uniquely capable as her girl was, she was still capable too of exhaustion?

"Forgive me," she said again before Natsuki, now sitting straight, could protest. "I promise that tomorrow shall be better. I did promise it would be only the two of us, after all. Tomorrow we shall have the day all to ourselves."

She thought of the things she had planned for the promised tomorrow, which had taken her all of this past week to arrange. How much she had put into them! It was perhaps only natural that she should feel a pang of disappointment in her next words.

"But if you think you are too tired for our little outing tomorrow, it is fine if we postpone it," she said, keeping her voice level. "It is no matter if we put it off for a little while, and simply rest in our room."

The firmness of Natsuki's answer both worried and relieved her: "No."

"Are you sure?" she asked.

"Yes. Tomorrow." Then, as if figuring out what would be most reassuring to Shizuru: "Please. I wish to go."

Shizuru suppressed her sigh, releasing the breath of relief through her nose instead.

"I see." She pulled Natsuki close yet again. "Thank you. I promise to make it worth your while."

Once they had settled into their former positions, it became her turn to lift the other's hair with loose fingers. Because there was absolutely no curl to the girl's hair, however, the strands poured down again almost as quickly as she had gathered them.

"So black," she said. "You know, I have always loved black hair."

Natsuki looked at her from the corner of an eye. Shizuru caught the flash of humour in the emerald depths before they slid away.

"One of the dancers earlier," said a voice Shizuru thought had all the depth of aged wine. "One of them, she had it too."

She had to smile.

"Really?" Again she took up the dark mane and let it spill from her clutch. "She had black hair?"

"Mm."

She paused when a thought came to her: Natsuki had seemed to be watching the performers very closely all night. What disturbed her about this was that many of those performers-the dancers, to be precise-had been quite good-looking, their beauty accentuated by exotically-made-up faces, and hair and skin sprinkled with golden dust. They had been cosmetically good-looking, in fact, in what Shizuru fancied to be close to the Otomeian fashion.

And Natsuki had been watching them all evening.

"Natsuki?" she began in a neutral tone, desperately trying not to scowl. "You were watching the performers?"

"Mm-hm."

Of course she would-that is what you do with performers, Fool!

"Did you see anything interesting?"

"Mm... ohh. Oh, yes."

"Well. Well, now." She tried to keep what she was feeling out of her voice. What was she feeling? Her stomach was restless and felt empty, as though it were sinking. "Which or who was it?"

She heard a brief purr of obviously lingering delight.

"The boy," Natsuki said.

Shizuru nearly leapt out of the carriage, ready to kill the boy.

Natsuki continued quite happily: "With the wolf? Ah, the wolf I liked very much."

The swelling murder in Shizuru's breast was suddenly arrested.

"Remember?" Natsuki was saying with a smile, looking up at her now. She seemed to have interpreted Shizuru's abrupt stiffening in quite a different way from the truth. "You saw too. The wolf was trained very well. It was interesting, no? The wolf was beautiful, Shizuru."

Shizuru stared at the girl, who seemed blissfully unaware she had almost perpetrated a violent homicide for the wolf's owner.

"Not the dancers then?" she said slowly. "The wolf with the tricks, was it?"

Natsuki nodded with unusual cheerfulness.

"That one. With the ring." She made a face. "The dancers I did not like so much. They came too close to us, too many times. Should stay in their dance area."

So that was why she kept watching them so closely. Still, about that boy with the wolf.

Shizuru narrowed her eyes, although her lips did produce a smile.

"Well, then, the wolf," she pressed. "You liked the wolf?"

She received a slightly puzzled look from Natsuki, who sounded affirmation. The puzzlement was due to the fact that she had been saying this for some time now, after all, and it was unlike Shizuru to press for confirmation of something already so firmly established and confessed.

"And the boy himself?" Shizuru said next.

This time, all the Himean received was a careless shrug. Not entirely sure she liked that answer, she followed as nonchalantly as she could with another query.

"Yes, I remember the wolf," she told Natsuki. "But dear me, I seem to have forgotten the boy! What did he look like again, My Dear?"

Natsuki turned her eyes upwards in an effort to remember.

"I think... long hair," the girl said eventually, twisting her lips into a slight frown. "And he was short."

"Indeed, indeed. What else?"

Natsuki frowned a few more seconds before finally turning a helpless grin to her.

"I am sorry, Shizuru," she uttered. "I do not remember well. I was looking at the wolf. I am very sorry. Why, it is important?"

The rusty eyes seemed to blink merrily at her as Shizuru shook her head, chuckling strangely to Natsuki's ears.

"No, I was merely curious," the Himean said. "Fool that I am. Do not worry about it."

Shizuru pulled at a lock of the younger woman's hair once more. A pair of emerald eyes turned to her and she wiggled her eyebrows, back to her old self.

Natsuki smiled.

"Black hair?" she said.

Shizuru smiled back: "Black hair."

They chuckled.

"So then," she started, recalling their interrupted conversation from earlier. "One of the dancers had black hair, did she?"

"Yes."

"But not like this, I suppose."

Natsuki stirred gently.

"Ah yes," murmured the young woman, not without playfulness. "A little like, I think."

Shizuru gave into a laugh and finally dipped her head, burying her nose into that wonderful dark hair smelling of frost and the dewy fragrance of The Hunt and of new-shed pine.

"Never like this," she insisted, speaking against the warm scalp. "There shall never be hair to compare to this."

She moved; her mouth drifted to one tellingly hot ear and spoke into it.

"Whenever I hear 'black' now, I think of this," she told her lover. "I said that I have always loved black hair..."

She gave the reddened ear a soft, suctioning kiss.

"But I have never loved black hair as much as I love this."

She was silenced after that by a pair of soft, very plump lips. She purred when they sucked on her underlip before letting go. She would have leaned in for one final press of their lips had Natsuki not beaten her to it, laying a softer, lighter kiss on her mouth before going back to nuzzling into the crook of her neck.

How nice to have this, Shizuru mused as she stroked her companion's back. How nice, too, to have a little silence again. She had told Natsuki she was not tired and it was true, but only insofar as her physical being went. Her spirit, however, was a little wearier. What she said earlier to her girl was true: she had been tired of all the talk, all the silly shop-chatter she had to perform simply because some fools had set the precedent only weeks ago for the province's first truly political genocides. The anxiety generated by the Mentulaean killings had been longer-lasting than the killings themselves. This did not mean that the direct effects of the murders were temporary-those who were killed always stayed killed-but, rather, that the Mentulaeen killers did not stay Mentulaeen killers for long, having been dealt with by the governor.

The trouble was that the murders might have stopped, but the suspicion and doubt they sowed continued to take root. A fatal thing for such a many-peopled, multi-cultural province as Argus. Said province also happened to have an army in residence at the moment whose only disclosed goal had been announced as "safeguarding the northern provinces of Hime and her allies, against such threats as may prove imminent". In a situation of heightened paranoia and suspicion, unfortunately, nearly everything could be a threat-and nearly every threat could prove imminent.

Which is why, of course, I have to smooth feathers yet again, she thought with a wry smile, knowing that her presence had been required tonight. Not only was she the commander of the wintering army, she was also-and this was just as important, if not more so-Senator Shizuru Fujino. The same principle applied to many of her officers, in particular those with established names in Hime's political hierarchy, such as the also well-born and extremely wealthy Suou Himemiya.

And there is yet another reason I am feeling nervous these days, Shizuru admitted to herself, imagining two chilly blue eyes staring at her: Suou, or her last conversation with that woman. There had been a dialogue fraught with nerves! On her part entirely, of course. Her attention slid completely to their past conversation now, recalling what had happened from the time she first admitted her apprehensions about Suou's advice a week ago.

"It is hardly so simple and straightforward a matter," she had confessed to the Himemiya, her brows coming together in a frown. "Even if I do feel that way about her, I cannot simply come out and encumber her with such a declaration. I am unsure of her feelings about it, and I cannot possibly just-just launch such a surprise at her. I consider this, ah, love, a significant and weighty word-not something to be taken lightly-and I am certain-I am most certain-Natsuki considers it so too. She is a person of great gravity in her own way, Suou-chan."

The reply had been something unexpected.

"I'm sorry," Suou had said, "but could you repeat that?"

Apparently, Shizuru's voice had progressively lowered throughout her speech so gravely that by the time she ended, Suou had needed to lean a good way forward to hear anything at all.

"Pardon?" the younger patrician had repeated. "I didn't hear you very well."

Shizuru had leaned forward too and answered in a stage whisper.

"I said, what am I to do if she dislikes it?"

"That must be the silliest thing you've said yet," Suou whispered back. "Why would she?"

"It may be an imposition."

"Allow me to recant-now that is the silliest thing you've said yet."

The reply had been an exasperated intonation of her name, followed by a giggle from Suou.

"Pardon me," Suou had explained afterwards. "See, I was half expecting you to say another, even sillier thing to break your record. Instead, you said my name. Pity, that would have been perfect."

"I did break my record," Shizuru had hissed dryly. "That last thing I mentioned is the silliest thing yet."

"How mean. Anyway, do you really think that? That she might feel it an imposition for you to speak your affections?"

"Yes!"

"Hmm." Suou had paused and frowned lightly at her. "Incidentally, you do know we look like two amateur saboteurs planning something suspicious, right?"

That was when Shizuru realised that they had both half-risen from their seats to lean towards each other over the table.

"I-yes, I know," had been her uncomfortable answer after a moment's pause. "But how else can we be sure no one overhears us?"

"Well, I could sit over there."

"On the same bench? Two people drinking at a table rarely sit on the same side. It would be strange!"

"More so than this?!"

Shizuru blinked.

"Shall we sit?" she then invited.

"Yes, let's."

And so they sat.

"Well," Shizuru had remarked, rubbing her thighs. "That was uncomfortable."

The other woman had been looking around when she said that, and suddenly emitted a stifled exclamation.

"Oh, there's a stool by the corner table! We might take that and place it by this side-" She indicated the end of the table perpendicular to Shizuru's. "-so I can sit closer to you."

"Yes, that sound good. I shall get-"

Suou cut her off, rising swiftly and motioning her to sit back down.

"No, sit, I will," she said.

Shizuru had taken her seat at Suou's wave, but nonetheless made to rise again.

"But you are doing it for my sake," she said, rear hovering over her bench. "So I should-"

"No, sit, sit. I'm going already."

And so Shizuru dropped into her seat once more. By the time other woman returned with the stool, she had a dry remark ready.

"I never realised," she noted. "How much of a toll secrecy takes on the thighs."

The two of them laughed; Suou dropped chuckling onto the stool she had just brought up.

"It's you," the fairer woman remarked with one of her gentler smiles. "You're being very silly today. I wish Chikane could see you. Actually, I wish all of Hime could see you."

"You seem to have little regard for my poor dignity, then."

"Oh, no. It's simply that you seem so human right now. It's actually quite disarming."

"Why, do I not seem human to you generally, Suou-chan?"

"Speaking for myself, I can't really say. I was trying to speak from the perspective of the common."

Shizuru found herself compelled to giggle at that.

"What a term," was her retort in a voice thick with humour. "The common."

"Yes, them. At any rate, shall we return to our topic?"

That returned Shizuru's apprehension in a flash.

"Oh, well, I suppose so," she murmured, lowering her voice yet again as she inched herself closer to the end of the bench and nearer Suou's side of the table. "What was it that we were saying?"

Suou placed an elbow on the table, propping up her chin with one hand.

"We were saying you should tell her," Suou replied with unmerciful frankness. "I say it again now. Would it be the end of the world if you did so, Shizuru-san?"

The response was accompanied by a rueful sigh: "I doubt it, but under the minute possibility of such an outcome, would it be wise to hazard precipitating that event?"

The Himemiya grinned.

"People say the world will end eventually," she rejoined, her normally clear voice acquiring a slight husk from having been dropped to its lowest, still-audible register. "Nearly all the religions have it so, I should think, and accept it at some point. Delaying what's inevitable shall not help you escape. It's just cowardly postponement."

"Suou-chan," Shizuru replied with a strained voice, obviously envisioning such end-of-the-world scenarios for the venture they were discussing. "This is not helping me!"

"Oh. Right. Right, I'm sorry." The other woman cleared her throat. "Would it really be so bad, Shizuru-san? To just tell her?"

"Would it really be so bad not to?"

For that query, Shizuru received a stare that seemed to ask if she had lost her mind.

"What-you really don't want to tell her?" Suou demanded. "I believe I don't even need to answer your question, because I'm assuming you said it out of desperation; we both know that it makes a difference . So at least tell me if you don't want to let her know how you feel. Because if not, then all of this is pointless."

"I do want her to know, I would like to," Shizuru responded. "But it is simply that, well..."

She trailed off there, grimacing in silence when she found herself at a loss to express her meaning. The other woman seemed to sense her frustration and kept quiet.

" Ecaster!" she eventually burst out in irritation-not for her confidant, but herself. "Oh, Suou-chan. It is such a-a thorny issue."

"Yes, I can see it is," Suou answered sympathetically. "But, I suppose we are nevertheless discussing it because the only way to pluck a true rose is to brave the hedging thorns."

The irritation disappeared from Shizuru's face at that, replaced by a thoughtful smile. Suou returned it with an even more languorous one of her own, her pale and well-formed lips curling knowingly. She had surely known that letting loose a clever and suitably romantic bit of witticism would appeal to her friend's literary sensibilities long enough to make Shizuru forget her momentary inarticulacy. One could trust a true rhetorician-or romantic!-to be disarmed that way.

"True enough," was Shizuru's answer. "And such thorns they are."

"Are they?"

"Mmm."

"May I say what most of it is, if you won't?"

"If-yes. Yes, if you wish."

"You're afraid that she might not feel the same way."

Oh, the desolation in your eyes, Suou's own amazed and apologetic gaze had seemed to say after that. For Shizuru responded with a reflexive rasp, like a person grasping for a breath in thin mountain air. She looked so helpless at this new challenge that she seemed suddenly like a child, and that was enough to make her friend almost regretful for saying what she had. Shizuru schooled her countenance too late as well-far too late to make the teetering apology in the other woman's eyes go away.

"It is rather upsetting," she finally managed to say later with classic understatement, praying her own expression did not belie the subtlety of her phrasing. "What then, Suou-chan? I cannot-that is, she has never said anything of the sort to me either. Had she expressed such a declaration as we are proposing now, before, this would be much easier. But it is not so. Why, indeed, now that I think on it, I cannot even be certain that she feels whatever it is she feels for me with the purity I would ask of her. I cannot deny it makes me a little less optimistic than I would like to be."

"Now that is indeed the less optimistic way of looking at it," Suou returned, just as quietly. "In fact, it's sheer pessimism. See, your girl is not really the saying type. It seems to me she would find it easier to show it-until you actually find the gumption to prompt her by saying it first, that is."

A little of the dejection seemed to lift from Shizuru's face.

"Is it possible?" was her hopeful-and trying desperately not to be hopeful-whisper. "Do you think so, Suou-chan?"

"Yes. A reluctant one in the Word." Suou paused and opened her eyes at her friend. "Tell me, then, and truly: would you say it to her now if she said it to you? Do not object to the situation-it's hypothetical. Would you confess to all you feel for her?"

Shizuru exhaled a drawn-out sigh.

"If she said it, I suppose I would," she admitted. "I would. Yes."

"There you are. So, ultimately, the two of you are only waiting for each other. Unfortunately, Shizuru-san, I'd say we are in agreement that your famed Sphinx would likely hold out longer even than you, patient as you may be. Thus it falls upon you to take initiative."

Again another feelingly drawn-out sigh.

"I suppose so," was Shizuru's answer. "And yet-yet I cannot help but keep worrying, Suou-chan. I mean, even if she does say it, what if she does not feel it?"

That elicited a puzzled, obviously disagreeing look.

"Would she say such a thing if she didn't mean it?"

"Natsuki? No, I think not."

"There."

"But that is the root of all worries. What if she does not feel it?"

The misery rushed back into Shizuru's eyes, the powerlessness she felt before this dilemma clearer than ever. Had she not been herself, really and truly herself, she would have been tearing at her hair.

"I would like to be confident, Suou-chan. I truly would," she said in an impassioned whisper. "But I cannot. For all I know, it would translate to unfounded arrogance. I cannot arrogate her-her feelings for me to myself. She is such a riddle! Sometimes, when I begin to imagine I understand her already, I discover myself duped. There is no certainty at all, not even in myself-for indeed, how am I to be sure that I am true in thinking this is what I feel, this is what I would like to tell her? Even I must ask that of myself. I am aware you think me a weakling in this affair, but-but you cannot imagine how frightening it is! I have faced down whole armies with unfamiliar monsters on unfamiliar territory. But never have I faced anything this frightening."

She fell quiet after this fervent speech, dropping her gaze to the table. When she did raise her eyes again, she looked up to find the other woman regarding her with a soft expression that was unbearably close to pity.

"Oh, Shizuru-san," was the other patrician's answer. "I see, I really do see it must be frightening. I'm beginning to understand now that the first time always is, especially for people of your and my sister's ilk. But if you really need convincing, all you need do is look at her, I think."

"But I told you, Suou-chan-"

"Just do it now, if you have the courage. Just-look-at her."

The other blonde's pale blue eyes, so like the core of a glacier, seemed to melt then into a resolve that brought to mind the onrush of ice in an avalanche. Shizuru felt suddenly the willpower that often lay frozen, dormant in other woman. It took her by surprise, she had to admit later; she had forgotten, due to that façade of supreme indolence, just how strong her old friend could be. It was then that she remembered that Suou was someone who had had a lifetime's practice of standing beside and up to an awesome sister.

"Do that much, at least, if you can't work up enough common sense to see what I mean," the Himemiya persisted. "Look at her now and think on what you see, for god's sake."

And Shizuru felt herself compelled; she let herself be carried away by the magnetism of another, for once, and finally turned to the doorway .

Look at her, she unconsciously repeated in her thoughts, gaze riveted on the young woman waiting just outside and scratching her heels on the frozen sand near the door. She continued watching as that young woman moved, walking a few steps from one side of the doorway to the other but never disappearing from view. That called to mind a hundred memories, for some reason, that Shizuru had found herself replaying in her mind like a flickering tableau.

She looks so young, she thought at that precise moment of the girl's motion, and she moves like a colt. She looks somewhat like a colt, in fact, with her long-legged, slightly adolescent appeal. I see that. I have seen her ride like she is part of one, too, and that is why it is even more remarkable that she does not walk with her legs curved, in the bowlegged manner of those living in the saddle. That is because she is only half colt and the other half is all cat. Oh, just look at her!

She turned fully then, still in her seat and barely aware of her friend looking at her as she herself looked at Natsuki. She might have tried to tear her gaze away and acknowledge her friend again, resume their conversation, but she knew it would have only ever been a try, and a futile one at that. Her eyes, her head, her heart-everything in her insisted that she should, for just a little while longer, keep looking.

So I look at you, she uttered to her girl in the secret hush of her mind. She told me to look at you but she did not know how dangerous that was-because I feel I could keep looking forever.

Natsuki was so raw and beautifully animal, she thought. As though she could kick up her heels at any second and just run away forever and never be caught. But everything, even the wildest animal, had a match, and Shizuru liked to believe-she would like to become-the girl's match. She wanted nothing more than to keep looking at the girl as the latter poised and ran. It was certain that she also wanted possession of her, but she did not want to cage her, she did not want to kill that free and untamed stride the girl had. She wanted to look at her in her freedom, knowing that the girl would only ever be running, ultimately, towards her.

And yet she found it to be painful to keep going, just to keep thinking all of that. Was it normal that doing merely that, just looking, should hurt ? But the situation and that young woman by the door were not even remotely close to normal, on second thought.

Vertigo was the word, perhaps . So many things, former fixities, she realised, seemed to be rearranging themselves.

She looked at her. And it seemed that she was looking not only at her then but at everything of the girl she had ever seen. It was in looking that she understood a great many things, really, or at least began to understand them. She saw, for instance, that the girl acted with great poise while undertaking a duty given to her because she was comfortable with what she was and what was expected of her during those times. But Shizuru had seen her move awkwardly too when placed in a situation where she could not hide in functions, as though something invisible under her skin embarrassed her. Shizuru would never agree that she had any possible reason to be embarrassed but could not fully protest against it either when the effect of the embarrassment was so charming. She had to admit to the enjoyment she felt whenever Natsuki looked like that, red-faced and mortified by something inside her; but she had to admit too to the grief of seeing the girl so pained by shame.

It was then that she had saw it in full: the variety of feelings the young woman evoked in her, the sheer range and novelty of them. It was confusing at times, for there were occasions when she was conscious of a great and overwhelming tenderness, a profound desire to care for her and protect her and render her safe from all ache. Yet and often at the same time, she would feel a craving for her so extreme that she would actually bite her, experience a need to take her between the teeth, crush her in the arms, and reduce her into a limp, broken-down piece of frailty. Sometimes the twin-yet-opposite needs showed, especially when they were alone, and she would find herself trying almost frenziedly to impale the other woman into screaming from exquisite and painful ecstasy. Then, afterwards, she would hold her with a kindness she had never before known herself to possess, as though trying to atone for the earlier hurt. She, who had never even imagined holding anyone, much less so hurting them! Everything was in confusion.

And then came Suou's whisper, too soft to break the spell, yet clear enough to infiltrate it.

"Yes," said the other woman. "You see?"

And Shizuru saw. Oh, she saw and knew it; she knew she had been falling into that abyss all along. But knowing something did not mean you could stop it, especially when it was something that you had never faced before. She had never faced this before, so she had been unable to identify it honestly at the start. But when had it started? It could have been from the very first time they met! Even now, she could not think back on the first time she laid eyes on the girl without a quiver in her stomach, that empty-full sensation she had come to associate with Natsuki. Was it really so? Were her recollections accurate in telling her that, from the moment she saw that heartbreakingly sculpted face, and those lustrous, truly green eyes looking out at the world, she had been completely and hopelessly finished?

That was when she found her eyes beginning to sting-thinking, Why, what is the matter with me? -and knowing exactly what was the matter, which did nothing to lessen the astonishment from it. That too was when the young woman at the door turned to look at her-as indeed she had been doing regularly for some time, though Shizuru did not know it and Suou did. Their eyes met, and both, having been surprised, flushed brightly and looked away. Perhaps it was even Shizuru who had the greater shock at that instant. On the back of what she had been experiencing just then, that was only normal.

"Do you see?"

She found the sky-blue eyes again in front of her, a smile in their depths.

"Yes," she said.

"Will you tell her?"

Shizuru, emotions still boiling, thought: How could I not tell her? But her mouth whispered, instead: "How could I tell her?"

The other woman replied to that with sudden practicality.

"Well, that is a good question. Personally, I feel I would simply just up and say it," Suou answered her friend, who had only begun to recover from her turmoil. "That's rather straightforward, though perhaps not your style."

A few seconds elapsed before Shizuru got herself together to answer.

"No," she determined quietly. "No, I suppose not. Only, it would seem... insufficient. Somehow."

Suou nodded, a pleased smile on her face; she was obviously glad to have overcome the reluctance barrier and get to tackling the real task she had been pushing from the start.

"Then there's the option of preparing properly for it," she told Shizuru, who listened to her attentively. "You might ask Chie-san, since she would obviously have more experience at this sort of thing. From what I know, though, some people-my sister numbers among them-make rather grand productions of it, because they say it helps to better express their feelings if they put work into it. Although, yes, such people usually follow their confessions with a marriage proposal," she finished with a chuckle, only to be surprised when Shizuru gasped and stared at her, looking horrified.

"A marriage proposal?" Shizuru said with indignation. "Suou, she's a mere child!"

Suou started backwards from the forcefulness of this reply. Regaining herself quickly, she then delivered a quick retort.

"No, she's not, and you know it!" she told Shizuru. "She's past eighteen, if I recall what you once told me, and that means she's already within the acceptable age for marriage. You simply forget that because you tend to treat her like a young pup still, to coddle and cosset."

Shizuru was stunned, properly chastised.

"I do?" she uttered wonderingly. "Do I?"

"Sometimes, I suppose." Noticing a twinge of regret flash over her friend's face, Suou hastened to qualify: "Not in a bad way. Not really patronisingly, don't worry."

"But..."

"I'm sure she enjoys it, Shizuru-san. And you do it very sweetly, in a most flattering way. Trust me, most girls like to be fussed over and pampered. More so for her, most likely, because she's probably not had the most pampered childhood, if she ever had one. These military nations!"

"Oh, yes. I see. I hope you are right."

They settled into silence after that, which was broken when Suou's head jerked upwards and she stared at Shizuru. Her oft-languid eyes were wide open and shocked.

"I say, Shizuru-san."

"Er, yes?" Shizuru said, puzzled by the other's face.

"What you said just now."

Another puzzled look from Shizuru.

"Yes, what of it?" she prompted.

"It's just-that's-" An abrupt pause, as though she was thinking on whether to say it or not. "When I mentioned marriage, Shizuru-san, it was just an offhand remark."

This time, even Shizuru's eyes widened until they were the same size as Suou's. The two of them stared mutely at each other, like Gorgons turned to stone by their reflections.

They even opened their mouths at the same time.

"Did you jus-"

"Of course!"

Having successfully finished her remark first, Shizuru then ploughed on to a still round-eyed Suou.

"Of course, I knew that," she had said, with one of the shortest laughs she had ever delivered. "Now, let us continue speaking of the preparations, Suou-chan. I am still most anxious about them. What else can you suggest to me about it, from what you know?"

And so on. What a holy imbecile I can be, Shizuru told herself after that recollection, still so wholly mortified by the scene that she actually had to cover her face with one hand a week after the event. A good thing she was hidden in the dark of the carriage, with the only person who could possibly see her returning blush being unaware of it. Of all the stupid things to say! Why had she even reacted to Suou's little jest about marriage, anyway? Of course she knew that had merely been a joking aside and not something directly related to her situation. And of course her accursed, traitorous, thrice-damned cheeks would not stop blushing, even at this moment.

I should think of my preparations now, really, she decided, not even bothering with the fact that she had been going over them again and again for the past week. Her plans included sleeping in late the next morning, since she wanted both of them to be fully rested for the day. After which, she had arranged for a specially prepared lunch to be cooked by the governor's kitchen staff, to be delivered to their rooms after their bath. She would then present Natsuki with the new saddle she had commissioned for her: a beautiful, diamond-patterned affair decorated with patches of black and maroon leather stitched alternately together. That would give her the pretext of inviting the young woman to try it out, whereupon they would go for a ride. While it was still cool, it was no longer as cold as before, which meant they could enjoy their outing better than they would have some weeks earlier. This also meant they could spend a little more time outside, which she knew Natsuki would like. The girl loved few things better than a good gallop on her steed.

Their path, as she had planned it, would take them up a small promontory outside the city from where they could see the sea and ports to full advantage. They would stop there for a moment of rest and replenishment-they would bring a few rations, of course-and then they would return to the mansion to change and get ready, just in time for a special performance of Euripides' Elektra by the same Greek actors they had seen today. After that, they would go back to their quarters for a private but lavish dinner, whereupon she would present the other gift she had prepared, along with the words she needed to say. All very thoroughly planned, all rather straightforward. All easy and simple.

So why did it feel as though she was about to put a sword to her gut?

A slender finger rose to her face and pulled on a lock of her hair. She woke from her musings and to a welcome sight: a tempting, ivory-skinned face peering curiously at her.

"Forgive me," she said, distracted from her anxiety by Natsuki's expression: verily, these days, nothing else could divert her as easily. "What is it, Natsuki?"

The soft fan of those black lashes, Shizuru thought, was poetry in itself.

"Hnn."

The girl's fingers released her hair; they smoothed the gentle swell of her lower lip instead. She went still for a second, and then smiled at the touch.

Natsuki smiled back.

"You smile," the girl observed.

"As do you." She carried on smiling, anyway, when the exploring fingers dropped to her lap. "What is it, Natsuki?"

Natsuki looked away.

"Your face was worried," she told the older woman.

"Oh. I had no idea." Shizuru frowned at herself. "Was it? Please excuse me for my bad manners."

A finger poked her cheek lightly, barely making the skin yield under its touch.

"Again, the worried face," Natsuki murmured. "You will smile again?"

Shizuru produced a small laugh-and did so while smiling.

"How would you know I was not smiling just then?" she asked jokingly. "You were looking over there, not here, Natsuki."

Natsuki said nothing, merely flicking an amused glance her way. Her hands had picked up one of the ribbons that had been in Shizuru's hair, and she was now playing with it, wrapping the bloodred cord around her fingers. The older woman watched, then began to play with the cord too, tugging at the free end while Natsuki tugged lightly back. They continued to do this absently for a while until Shizuru's ears picked up something that caught her attention: the sound of horses detaching from their group, then returning after a while, only to detach once more and start the cycle anew. Start and stop, come and go. At least half of the Otomeian riders, she realised, were moving in very strange and shifting formation.

"Natsuki," she called, eyes narrowing in thought. "Why is it that your warriors seem to be coming and going from our convoy? I can hear them moving away and then seeming to return, only to leave again."

"Oh, that," the younger woman answered. "To check the way we go, to look out for ambush."

Shizuru pondered it: "You mean several are scouting ahead regularly?"

Natsuki nodded.

"I said to check," she said self-assuredly, looking not at Shizuru but at the cord with which they were still playing. "They will warn if something is ahead of or behind us."

"I see." Shizuru smiled generously at her. "That's very cautious of you, meum mel."

Shizuru lifted her hand, intending to touch the young woman's face with it, but was surprised by its sudden weight. She snapped her attention to it and saw something red coiled around one of her fingers.

"What is-oh."

A gurgle of laughter spilled from the younger woman. Shizuru saw it then: the weight of her hand was due to the cord they had been playing with, which was now wrapped around Natsuki's fingers as well. She blinked at the display of their tied digits, breath catching at the suggestion in the sight.

A memory from her childhood: an aunt telling her that a red ribbon joined the fingers of people meant for each other. A superstition she had long dismissed as a ridiculous piece of romanticism by those who knew no better.

"Shizuru?"

She looked at the girl, who was still grinning at her. Natsuki looked happy and amused. Innocent. As always, she looked innocent.

There was another pull on Shizuru's hand, which fell onto the one tied to it. Natsuki laughed again, seemingly entertained by this small bit of mischief.

Oh, Natsuki, Shizuru thought in awe, eyes drawn irresistibly back to their hands and the cord that joined them. Dear, dear Natsuki.

She returned the younger woman's smile with one of her own.

You do not even know the significance of what you have done, do you?

Chapter 38

Illustration: From IrisEnigma . Please replace the X's with W's, the YYY with "com", and remove the spaces after the full stops in the URL.

XXX. deviantart. YYY/iris-enigma89/art/Inter-Nos-Red-Ribbon-124979932

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Class distinctions in (Himean) society - The model is the Latin one, with five economic classes, all told, of landed or income-earning citizens. The richest belong to the First Class, those of less means to the Second, those of still less means to the Third, and so on, until the poorest belonging to the Fifth. The actual bulk of citizens belonged to the lower classes, as well as to that division in which were lumped all of those citizens too poor to actually qualify in any of the five economic classes mentioned above: the Head Count or capite censi (the poorest of the poor, considered classless).

2. Clivus (Orbius, Sacer) - Meaning "a street on an incline"; hence Clivus Orbius would be Orbius Street, and Clivus Sacer, Sacer Street. Incidentally, both streets as well as some other places mentioned below (e.g. Curia Hostilia, Macellum Cuppedenis, Palatine, Porticus Margaritaria, Subura, and Sacra Via) actually existed in Ancient Rome, specifically in or around the area known as the Forum Romanum. It is possible to trace the progress of the two characters walking there in this chapter if one has a map of that area.

3. Crossroads colleges - Associations of men in districts with major crossroads. Each major crossroad had a shrine to the Lares (Roman gods said to be attracted to crossroads) and this shrine was tended by the crossroads college of that district. Each crossroad college often had a pub near the shrine as a meeting place, said pub being rent-free and under the care of a custodian-of whom one might think as being the leader of the gang.

4. Dis - The Latin equivalent of Hades, Pluto, god of the underworld; also the name for the underworld itself.

5. Elektra - Sister of Orestes, daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra of legend. The tale has been written by both Greek authors mentioned below.

6. Fellatores (pl.) , fellator (s.) - A Latin obscenity meaning "one who sucks a penis".

7. Plebeian vs. patrician - A patrician is anyone descended from the original Roman nobility; everyone else who is not, regardless of wealth or power, is a plebeian. To understand the pronouncements made upon the ill regard for patricians, one must imagine a terribly birth-conscious society (not so very hard to do!) where the people both adore their aristocrats and detest them: the former because they are terribly birth-conscious; and the second for the same reason, since it is difficult not to resent those who have such an advantage over you without having had to do anything to gain it.

8. Praetor urbanus - See note for urban praetor.

9. Quirites - Literally "citizens".

10. Tribunate - Used here in the sense of "pertaining to one of the tribune offices or affairs". See following item for more.

11. Tribune of the Plebs - one of the most important offices in Ancient Rome, reserved exclusively for plebeians and purportedly existing in protection of plebeian rights; the prime lawmaking body of that time; the office bearing the power of the veto. If one was about to enter the Senate, the best way to make a name for oneself was to be a tribune of the plebs, since they garnered so much attention and had the opportunity to make a radical splash. Of course, since the office was reserved for plebeians, patricians often had to seek another way to make their names early on.

12. Urban praetor - If both consuls are absent, he would be the chief magistrate of the city. The urban praetor was also responsible for many things, primarily that of overseeing the city's civil litigation. The urban praetor was traditionally the praetor elected with the highest number of votes, and was not allowed to absent himself from the city for more than ten days at a time.

13. Zalmoxis - Main god of Dacians (and, here, Otomeians). Part of the associated teachings involve belief in an afterlife-a more nuanced and desirable afterlife than that of Ancient Romans-and this meant they believed in immortality, which often led to them performing daring acts of courage and heroism in battle.

---

Inter Nos

par ethnewinter

---

There were, Shizuru thought, far worse ways to greet a day like this. Today was the day. It was perhaps her day or, better even, Natsuki's day. Most accurately of all, however, might be to call it their day. Shizuru knew that it was most likely a day she would remember all her life because of what she planned to do, something she had planned for the first time. First times were always important and, as it often turned out later, legendary.

Whether they end happily or in disaster.

She winced at that, even while knowing it was still a possibility. But it was a bad thing to think of failure this early in the day, she cautioned herself, because she knew the power thinking could have on reality. She knew that thoughts-or expectations, rather-did not determine an outcome, but she also knew that they could help to shape it. So now she shook off that anxiety like a dog shakes off water from its back, willing herself to plan for the good because what she wanted to shape was a success. She smiled too, because it was always a good thing to smile from the beginning and it was her way.

And, because she was a person who constantly saw the humour in things, she made a little fun of herself while she was at it: These are the strange things people think to build up confidence before a confession.

She sat up more squarely then, and the sheet over her fell to her waist, baring her firm and white breasts. So be it, she thought, if she was only trying to build up her confidence for the day ahead; based on prior experience, building up one's confidence at the outset usually worked out quite well. Today would be practically perfect, and the morning was already practically perfect. Although she did have to admit that there was one little thing about this practically perfect situation that she already wanted to alter.

She was trying to do that now.

"Really," she was telling the girl fidgeting under the blanket. "Do try to calm down. I know you are quite used to being up and dressed before me in the mornings, but I think the presence of the governor's servants is insufficient provocation for you to leap into your uniform."

She sighed, suppressing the instinct to roll her eyes when the one she was addressing merely huffed.

"I hardly think that two unarmed and middle-aged women can possibly threaten either of us, Natsuki, even if they were fully awake and the two of us half-asleep."

There was still no answer from the young woman next to her.

"And besides," she added kindly. "I do not doubt that you would still be able to dispose of them quite promptly in the unlikely event they do pose a danger to us, even if you are naked under this sheet."

The younger woman screwed her lips together, looking very sulky at that unnecessary reminder of her lack of clothing. It was the presence of the mansion's servants in the adjoining room, of course, that had her so uncomfortable. Shizuru had ordered them in to draw their daily bath, and they were there doing so at the moment, as indeed they did each day. The only irregularity here was the one that bothered her girl so much: neither she nor Natsuki was wearing the barest scrap of clothing.

Which is what comes of having late-night romps in bed, Shizuru thought, happy with the memory of their doings last evening. I do not see why I should have woken her, anyway, when I sent for them to draw the bath. Not when she looked so small and sweet asleep, or so fragilely perfect.

"Hmph," the fragilely perfect being grumbled, fidgeting again. "I should-"

"Stay as you are," the older woman finished for her. "It matters not a whit to them if you are dressed or not, you know."

She got another grumble, although Natsuki did choose to stay still and silent after that, at least.

Shizuru sighed after more than a couple of minutes had passed without a word, peering to the side to see her companion frowning with beetle-black brows. She knew that look: Natsuki had it whenever she fell in the grips of some deep meditation-which was really all too often. It was probably another reason the young woman had gained a reputation for being sulky. Whenever Natsuki fell deep into thought, her face tended to take on a terribly glum expression. Unfortunately for the prevailing opinion of observers, the actual tone of her thoughts was not always commensurate with the mood of her countenance. Sometimes, Shizuru would enquire what had so darkened her girl's brow, only to be told that the point up for consideration was something as light as whether or not the panther she kept for a pet should be given a treat before dinner.

"Why so quiet, Natsuki?"

The green eyes went to her.

"Thinking," Natsuki said.

"You think too much."

At least, she thought later, listening to the soft and merry sounds in the aftermath of her question, at least that made her laugh.

"You say that?" Natsuki said to her with a scoff, afterwards. "You?"

"It's quite true, though."

"Still."

"Yes, I see what you mean." She shrugged. "I suppose it is hard not to appreciate the irony."

"Hm, yes."

And, having said this, Natsuki again returned to her meditations.

Finally realising that the girl would not speak unless she controlled the conversation, the older woman cast about for something to use as a topic. She was looking down the foot of the bed at that moment, and so she saw the girl's exposed toes idly squirming. Pushing her own foot out of the blanket, she put it side-by-side with the other one.

"Your foot is smaller," she murmured, apropos of nothing. "Mine is bigger."

They considered their feet, side-by-side. From the half-open door leading to the bath, the sounds of water being poured came to them.

"Your foot," said the dark-haired girl a little later, "is very long."

Shizuru acknowledged it with a wry smile; the uncommon length of her feet had been one of her old despairs. When she had been younger, it had been a constant lament of hers how exaggerated in size her feet were-but that was before she discovered that she would shoot past six feet in height by mid-adolescence.

Exaggerated height too, I suppose, her mother had used to smirk at her, also a very tall woman but beaten by several inches by her daughter. In retrospect, Shizuru thought, she should have expected it: both familial sides had some of the tallest men and women in Hime. Which meant, of course, that both familial sides would also have some of the largest-footed men and women in Hime. Relative to their height, such large feet merely looked appropriate, and even normal.

"Yes, I know," she told Natsuki now, no longer put out by the remark as she might have been years ago. "As it should be. I am very long."

"But it is the same colour," the younger woman replied. "Our feet."

"Us."

"Yes."

"My skin may be a little less pale than yours."

"Hmm?"

Shizuru pointed downwards. "Look at our feet. I am a little less so."

It took a few seconds before Natsuki acknowledged the slight difference. While Shizuru's feet were still a little pinkish in some areas, especially around her well-shaped toes, the Otomeian's had nary an atom of colour. They were white as marble, white as chalk, and seeing them like this tempted Shizuru to reach down and hold them in her hands so that she could try to warm some pinkness into their pallor. Why had she never noticed it before? They were so white!

"Oh." Natsuki said it wonderingly, as though she had never seen her own feet before. "My feet."

"Yes."

A short pause ensued as they regarded the feet in question.

"They look dead." Natsuki said it. She was staring at her own feet now with mild distaste. "Shizuru, they look dead."

Shizuru was looking at her and put a finger under her chin, turning her head away from her insidious examination of her own feet.

"Do not say that, meum mel," the Himean rebuked, although privately agreeing. At the other end of the bed, her foot moved over Natsuki's, testing to ensure that it was not cold. It was not cold, only cool, and she rubbed it with her own to see if it could be warmer.

"They are pale, yes, but very pretty nonetheless, as feet carved in ivory. I love your marmoreal quality, so do not let it trouble you. And they are only white since it is cold."

There was still a small pout threatening the edges of those pink lips.

"I am not cold," came the contention.

"I meant from the general temperature of your homeland," Shizuru persisted softly. "This is as I told you earlier. The difference in climate. It shows especially in the feet and legs, as you can see."

"Um."

Shizuru went on: "And in the rear. Let us not forget the rear."

Natsuki's head whipped towards her, showing a look that implied she thought she had not heard aright.

"The posterior," Shizuru clarified.

"Posterior?"

"In common parlance, the arse, bum or butt . "

She smirked when Natsuki coloured a little.

"Buttock?" she tried again, trying very hard not to laugh.

"I-I know," Natsuki frowned, stopping her before she could say more.

"I know this word. These words. But I do not know what you say."

"Permit me to explain then. It shows in the posterior whether a person has lived in a cool, hot, or temperate climate," Shizuru said with the air of a pedagogue, before finishing: "In the shape, I mean."

That snared the girl's full attention. Shizuru nodded deliberately, endowing the action with all the theatrical wisdom she could summon-which was considerable, come to think of it. Natsuki still stared doubtfully at her for a few seconds before suddenly rumbling a dark chuckle, scowling with her brow at the same time.

The Himean lifted an eyebrow.

"You do not believe me?" she demanded of her companion, who had fallen silent again and now regarded her with the same disbelief as before. "I am serious, Child."

Predictably, the answer was a scoff.

"No, Natsuki, really." She released a sigh and followed it with a shrug. "I suppose it is fine if you wish to disbelieve such a strange notion. After all, even I found it ridiculous the first time I heard of it. Although it does pain me a little to think you would disbelieve me so swiftly."

Predictably too, the answer was a look of guilty uncertainty.

"Nonetheless, I might as well tell you the difference," she ventured. "Even if you do not believe me. The rears of people from cooler climates are small but very compact, round and well-curved. The rears of those from warmer ones are larger but a little less round, slightly squarish due to the shape of the hip. Go on: take a look if you wish."

She lifted the hem of their blanket by two fingers' width, wiggling her eyebrows suggestively.

"What do you think, Natsuki? Perhaps you shall see and finally believe me?"

Natsuki seemed to wrestle with herself for a few seconds, not knowing whether to credit her lover's assertion by attempting to view the present evidence or contend that Shizuru's claim really did push the boundaries of credulity to breaking point. Frowning quietly at a wriggling lump under the sheet-which Shizuru guessed rightly to be the girl's fiddling hands-the Otomeian finally threw a pathetic look of conviction towards the Himean, who had to hold back a giggle.

"Um," Natsuki finally mumbled softly. "Not tuh-tuh-"

The Himean leaned closer after the unintelligible reply.

"I'm sorry," she said. "What was that?"

Natsuki looked uncomfortably at her.

"Hrm," she mumbled again, speaking only a little clearer. "You are..."

lying."

Shizuru smiled innocently, leaning back against the pillows.

"Is that how it is, Natsuki?" she spoke out. "My dearest, sweetest Natsuki, who thinks I am only trying to play another of my jokes on her?"

Now Natsuki looked truly guilty. Until Shizuru continued.

"I am, actually."

She withdrew her foot at the double, anticipating Natsuki's attempt to kick her before it could come. When the foot tried to follow hers, she retaliated by twisting deftly under the sheet and pinning the younger woman.

"Only with the remark about the rear, meum mel," she giggled, holding her down with only light difficulty. Slight as Natsuki might be, Shizuru was nevertheless aware that the young woman was extremely lithe and most probably versed in grappling. Her true advantage was actually not in her own stronger physique, but in her knowledge of the Otomeian's nature: Natsuki would not seriously struggle because Natsuki was truly loath to hurt her. Thus Shizuru knew, even as her bodyguard struggled, that she had already won.

Not, of course, that she would win if she were not holding back, the prouder part of her provided, before making an allowance: But I do think she might still be able to do me a lot of damage then.

"I meant the one about the feet," she disclosed, idly studying the tightly-knit muscle banding on the girl's lean shoulders. She loved that she could see them moving and forming little grooves and attractive hollows; it pleased her greatly to be with someone of an equally athletic composition. She did not know exactly why-a part of her argued for vanity-but she truly could not imagine enjoying a morning wrestle in bed with someone whose body was not this wonderfully spare of fat. The girl was a sculptural marvel!

"The observation about the difference in colouring of the feet is generally true," she told her lover. "And it is quite obviously explained by the necessary difference in leg- and foot-wear. People from my climes do not often need to wear socks, boots, and trousers as you do, which means we get more skin-darkening sun. Since your feet are so rarely exposed to the sun, by comparison, your feet have a higher likelihood of being paler."

All the while, Natsuki had been trying to dislodge her.

"Shi-Shizuru!" the young woman choked, hissing quietly in scandal while she darted her eyes to the bathing room's entryway. Her face had gone from outrage from the jest Shizuru had worked moments earlier to desperation. "They-thuh-them!"

"Them?" came the answer, given with apparent unconcern. "Whom?"

"Shizuru!"

"Yes?"

She laughed when her bodyguard actually whined her name out a third time. She shook her head in amusement.

"You beautiful little innocent," she crooned, burying her face in the fresh-smelling dark hair and delighting in the silky skin rubbing hers. "They shall not care if they see us like this. Do you know that there are many slaves who are actually permitted to enter their masters' quarters even when said masters are abed and working out a passion? Sometimes, they are even made to stay! That way, they can provide services whenever required, such as a cup of water after the thirsty work is done. Trust me, My Dear, when I say that seeing us doing even more than this should be as nothing to them."

Natsuki still had her objections to that.

"Buh-buh-but, Shizuru, they are not yours," she choked out haltingly again, eyes still snapping back and forth from the bath's doorway to the red eyes studying her. "They are slaves of-"

Suddenly she stilled, eyes going round as she stared at the passageway again.

"What is it, Natsuki?"

"Finish-they finished!" the girl gasped, throwing a pleading look to her tormentor. "I hear! Oh, Shizuru, please?"

Her eyes communicated the plea more effectively than her mouth, however: pleading, begging, praying for the older woman to save her from what her strange and fastidious sense of modesty considered a fatal point of embarrassment, no matter the prevailing attitude of most others in like situations. Finally relenting at the dread in those green discs, Shizuru exhaled a last sigh and put her palms on either side of the girl's body to prop her up as she rolled back to her original position. She kept her eyes on Natsuki's as she did so, nonetheless, and thus saw the girl's short-lived expression of relief morph abruptly into something else: dread again, or panic, or perhaps even something like terror.

Apparently, the blanket over them had been slipping off to one side of the bed all this time. And Shizuru's motion was all it took for it to fall completely off.

"Nnh!"

Just as suddenly, she was on top of Natsuki again. After a squeak of horror, the younger woman herself had reached out and dragged Shizuru back over her as a last resort for a cover, the blanket having slipped too quickly out of reach. And, naturally, this was exactly when the slaves who had just filled their bath appeared at the doorway, where they went stock-still at the sight of the two naked women together on the bed.

Again, naturally, it was Shizuru who broke the silence.

"Well, now."

She did not bother looking at Natsuki, already feeling the heat that had erupted under her chin and the sudden rigidity of the arms around her waist. So she looked instead at the slaves standing by the doorway, both of whom had dropped their eyes respectfully to the floor. They seemed, she thought a little distractedly, very uncertain. It also seemed that they had a little more colour on their cheeks than she remembered.

"The bath is filled, Fujino-san," said the elder of the two slaves, still not daring to look up. All of them were very aware of the Himean general's great adoration for her mistress, of course. How could they not, with the scent of sex spread all over the pair's sheets whenever they came in to change the bedding with fresh linens? But this blatant a display was not normal at all. So they kept their eyes down conspicuously, just to be safe and avoid any potential whippings for being too daring with their eyes.

"Will that be all, Fujino-san?" the slave continued.

"Yes," Shizuru replied, sounding faultlessly calm. Her eyes darted to a water clock on the nightstand, noting the hour. "Please inform the kitchen that I require our noontime meal to be ready by two hours' time. Send it up here as usual."

Bowing to show she had received the order, the slave enquired if there was anything more, to which Shizuru replied negatively. The two servants scurried out of the room swiftly after that, their departure sounded by the heavy clap of the door.

It was a low whine that broke the silence they left behind.

Shizuru looked at the young woman shaking underneath her, obviously so torn between anger and shame that she looked as though she would cry. She just had to smile at that purple face, even knowing it was ill-advised to do so. But Natsuki squeezed her eyes shut at that moment, and fortunately failed to see her.

"My poor Natsuki," she murmured, getting the girl's attention. "Poor Darling."

Bright green eyes opened.

"You too!" Natsuki cried, still distraught. "Poor Shizuru too."

Shizuru just had to laugh at the childish statement, which did not improve the Otomeian's humour. The green-eyed young woman looked stunned that she could laugh even now.

Shizuru explained.

"I never thought I would hear that said of me, you see. But it is sweet that you are thinking of my dignity too, even as you consider yours greatly injured." She was still laughing, her golden hair slipping further over her shoulders and tickling the other's neck. "My poor, poor Natsuki. You are much afflicted, are you not?"

There was a rumble from the warm body beneath her.

"Natsuki, I am so sorry," she said kindly while patting the girl's head. Even as she comforted her, however, she could not help but grin in amusement at the situation. "It's all right, really. Try not to think on it."

Quite by accident, however, another laugh escaped her lips. Natsuki stiffened and pushed her away so they could look at each other, the younger woman glaring dreadfully.

"Not funny, Shizuru," she snapped.

"No, of course not," Shizuru said with a dim sparkle in her eyes. "Not funny at all."

They stared at each other silently for a few tense seconds-until Shizuru ruined it and chuckled.

"I'm sorry, I'm so sorry!" the Himean laughed, no longer attempting to rein in her mirth as she prevented a struggling Natsuki from leaping out of bed. She tightened her embrace so that the other woman could not slip out. Here her expectations of being the stronger of them were confirmed: try as Natsuki might, she could not escape the powerful lock, for Shizuru's slender arms had muscles that flexed into pure iron. But this was also velvety iron, silky even as it was strong, and the younger woman could not help but soon stop struggling against its embrace.

"It was quite amusing in its own way, you know, and I had to acknowledge that. Forgive me if that irks you, please. But I really am not laughing to irritate you."

Natsuki shot her a dirty look and mumbled something in Otomeian.

They were sitting up now, and the young woman was facing away from Shizuru, who grinned.

"Ah-ah, you cannot use that any more," the older woman said cheerfully, understanding the Otomeian word for "fool". "You taught me that, remember? I know what it means now."

Natsuki shot out another dark look, then muttered again in her native tongue.

"Well." Shizuru smiled winningly, still holding the girl immobile. "What does that one mean?"

Natsuki made a point of ignoring her.

"Very well. I suppose I deserved that," Shizuru acquiesced, easing her hold on the Otomeian. The latter had gone limp once more, most likely from revisiting the memory of her embarrassment. Raising either leg so that it was crooked at the knee and pressing a side of Natsuki, Shizuru lifted her embrace from the girl's arms and instead encircled the Otomeian's collar in a lighter hold. The lustrous dark head fell back against her shoulder and she cooed into a still-red ear.

"Do not worry, they are used to seeing such things and worse," she soothed the wilting girl. She could still feel the heat radiating from the Otomeian, and marvelled that a single person could produce so much of it so quickly. "At least they did not see much of you, if anything. All they should have seen is my back, since I was covering you."

Natsuki made a weak attempt at a growl, which ended up sounding more like a whimper. Shizuru cooed again, moving the girl away from her shoulder to fist the long black hair and lift it.

"Think no more of it," she advised, marvelling at the blush that had stained even the slim column of her lover's neck. The colour was so much and so high that it seemed tempted to spread even further down Natsuki's pale back, pooling around each meagrely padded knob of her spine. Shizuru blew on the back of the thin neck and felt as well as saw her shiver. "Let it be, for it does not matter, and it is done."

Natsuki murmured something.

"What was that?"

"Stoic," the girl repeated in a condemning tone, which made her grin.

"Perhaps so," she admitted. "But in such a situation, there is naught else to be."

She bowed her head to kiss the smooth nape, the tail of long black hair having been moved aside and over one white shoulder. Her action produced another shiver, and yet one more faint whine.

"Hush, I said not to think any more of it," she murmured, stroking the tidy mane again. This time, she pulled back the black hair so that the bare patch of white behind one ear was exposed. She kissed that patch of skin and found it evoked an even stronger shiver. "Trust me when I say it is all right. And if it is not, I shall try to make it all right."

She spoke this behind a sensitive ear, and each word produced a tremor. Natsuki's body pushed closer to her until her breasts were crushed against Natsuki's back again and her hips gripped by Natsuki's hands.

"But Shizuru," Natsuki murmured with faint soreness, piquing her attention.

"Yes?"

"That-that, too."

"What, too?" she asked softly.

"They saw you too."

"Yes, but I already said it does not bother me, so it is well."

"But."

"But?"

"They-" Natsuki sounded displeased again. "They saw you."

"Well, then?"

Natsuki did not answer and she saw what the young woman might have been trying to say.

"Oh." She paused. "Oh."

Her arms closed in on the form against her chest, and she held the girl tightly.

"Does that bother you?" she asked.

Again there was no answer. Not that it mattered, however, for the prior words had already answered in advance. As did Natsuki's face now, half-turned away as it was.

"Silly girl," she said, moved by this petty jealousy. "You are the only one who ever sees me."

The big eyes looked up with uncertainty.

"Truly," she promised in earnest. "If you wish it, you shall be the only one who will ever see me."

Natsuki's glance at her was both shy and strange. Then she did something that melted Shizuru as no one or nothing had ever done, for she turned around and wrapped her legs around Shizuru's waist, cupping the older woman's face in both hands with a look as though she wanted to hold it to herself alone and would deny it to the rest of the world in this possession. And she kissed her. She kissed Shizuru on the ridge of her high, straight nose and slid her lips up to one of the golden brows. She kissed without sucking but with a tender, deep feeling that made Shizuru want to sigh and smile at the same time. The older woman eventually did both and shut her eyes when Natsuki finally rested the migrations of her mouth, her silky-dry lips pressing on the thin and hairless scar a Mentulaean blade had left on Shizuru's eyebrow in the Battle of Argentum. She kissed it once, twice, then another time and very gently.

Shizuru kept her eyes closed; Natsuki moved again and kissed each one too.

"All right?" Shizuru asked quietly. "All right now?"

She felt the lips turn to her temple, lingering hot and longingly there. And even though when she opened her eyes she could see that there was still some mortification in that pale face, she saw it being suffused by something else that told her it was fine now and it would be better soon. What complexity her Natsuki's emotions had! But it made her happy to know Natsuki was already beginning to recover, and at the moment, it was enough.

All right now.

She knew it was best for them to go into the bath already while the water was still hot; but then Natsuki pressed her back onto the sheets and moved on top of her. They did not kiss immediately, but simply put their cheeks together at first. The girl was warm, her breath sweet, and it made Shizuru turn her cheek so that their lips finally found each other.

Such emotion, Shizuru wondered, thoroughly seduced by the softly muscular lips on hers. Such emotion in her mouth now, as though she can speak only this way and no other. Even the recent shame seemed to be communicated through their meshing tongues, along with a medley of other, inextricably interwoven things that she could barely uncoil by the strand and identify by the colour. This young woman's embarrassment seemed to be so woven into all of her, she thought, like a bright and brittle weaving that ran through the rest of Natsuki's emotions and linked them in a fine mesh. Shizuru felt it always, low often and high on occasion, but always poignant, often childlike, and sometimes pitiful. It was part of the reason she felt always like protecting the young woman-even if it was from that odd and guilty shame written deep in Natsuki's self.

Shizuru liked being wrapped inside that convoluted feeling. She liked to be touched by it and she liked to touch it. This was the purest of pleasures she had ever discovered: to slide her hands up the girl's arms, feel under her palm the tense yet lissom flesh, and all the while wonder at how quickly the two of them could go from laughter to mortification to this, yet immensely glad that they could. She was, to be precise, immensely glad that Natsuki could. For Shizuru had begun to realise about herself many things too, and one of these was her possession of a sharp hunger, a near-gluttonous passion that could twist her guts and wring them dry with desire when it struck. That Natsuki was not terrified by it was both blessing and irony: the former because it had the potential to stoke Natsuki's fragile shame; the latter, because the Himean could well guess that others with paradoxically less shame in their being would be terrified by it in a way Natsuki was not.

As far as others in my class back in Hime are concerned, at any rate, for many near and of my station do not know real passion.

This was no light evaluation she made, but a home truth. The reality of upper-class Himeans was that well-informed about matters sexual though they were, they were also often what the rest of the populace would call shocking prudes in the bedroom. Those scandalous orgies and indecencies bruited about as vagaries of the rich were in fact truly scandalous and indecent, as far as majority of the rich and noble were concerned. It was those in the strata below theirs that often indulged in such shocking sport, the middle classes composed of the less-than-noble, the rich-but-not-noble, and others of the same ilk. Shizuru herself had lived in the upper crust all her life, and knew better than most that it contained less decadence than did the actual filling in the pie.

There were reasons, of course. Part of it was because membership in the crust invoked expectations and not surprises, like the filling. It was expected for an upper-class Himean to behave "with modesty" in the bed-most especially the wedding bed!-and not writhe about in a haze of passion while screaming to the high heavens. No, such things were considered indecent and low behaviour. Which Shizuru, even inexperienced as she was when she had been younger, had found frankly bizarre. How exactly did logic relate class to bedroom manners? But they are related, people told her: such animal things were reserved for the lower classes and liaisons with courtesans or prostitutes or other worthless paramours. What an answer!

It was perhaps another reason why, before now, she had not even seriously considered taking anyone to bed. No having-up-a-wall for most of those "proper" Himeans that might have stood a chance of being among her choices for lovers; no wild and bruising romps in hidden corners. Never mind, then. How dusty and boring the little bed-play might be!

Something it never is with Natsuki, she thought, and something they may never know. But then again, even Shizuru's fellows in her own culture's upper-class could display such ardour sometimes-or so she supposed, from her friends' confidences in her. Still, they often displayed it only with their affairs and rarely with the persons to whom they were bound by marriage later on. Their wedding beds were left in the dust, while those of their illicit affairs were kept moistly sex-sweet. One compounding reason for that might be that most of them still wedded people for reasons other than passion. They wedded for reasons Shizuru considered less moving than what moved her when she was with Natsuki, who could electrify her whole being with the touch of a finger. Anything less than that lightning-bolt shiver would be dusty and boring, without question.

She wondered if any of them enjoyed their affairs as much as this, wondered it when Natsuki traced her jaw with the thin, wet blade of a tongue. She herself would wither with anything less than this; she prayed Natsuki would wither with anything less than this.

She chuckled suddenly, mysteriously, with an indecipherable humour. Natsuki's tongue faltered, already halfway towards the deep hollow at the base of her throat. The girl moved to lapping at the blue vein near it instead, teasing the throbbing pulse under Shizuru's white skin as it thudded.

Shizuru sighed: "Tell me you want me, Natsuki."

Natsuki's head came up and her green eyes were very dark, the skin around them shaded with the smoky remnants of the stibium she used to line them each day. Shizuru repeated the demand to the girl, knowing she was making it out of a desire to have the other return the sheer Want she herself always felt. Her Himean fellows might content themselves with their short-lived affairs, which made them flare once and burn out a moment later, but she wanted none of that. She wanted her Want for this girl to throttle her with its flame far longer than a mere moment. She felt it could only happen if the source and fuel of her fire flamed just as brightly for her, just as hotly as her own fire. She was Shizuru Fujino, after all, and Shizuru Fujino always aimed at perfection. And this Want, this desire-further now, this love ; and the word caused a good shiver-she had decided, would be the most perfect one ever.

But Natsuki was shy, she knew, and it would take some stoking. She slid up her hands, wrapping them around the little waist, and touched the groove above that shapely rear with the tip of a finger. She stroked the groove and Natsuki squirmed above her.

"Do you, Natsuki?"

Natsuki looked amazed that she could even ask, and that alone pleased her.

"I, um." The husky voice was quiet, disturbed. "I-yes."

Natsuki blushed while saying it, but her green eyes remained heavy. Shizuru spread her fingers to hold Natsuki's rear.

"Do tell," she teased, massaging it as her voice grew deeper. "Really?"

Natsuki finally apprehended what the older woman wanted her to say, and swallowed a few times before managing to say it.

"I-I want you. Shizuru."

"Again."

Natsuki's voice was disturbed, but Shizuru liked that.

"I want you, Shizuru," she said again. She paused and took a few quick, shallow breaths. "I want you."

Shizuru smiled fiercely.

"Show me," she said.

They grabbed each other's hair at the same time, crashing their mouths together frantically as Shizuru thought, Yes, this is it, this is

Want. Then there was only the softness of their breasts crushed, and the coolness of the sheets beneath them, and the tightly-held struggle between them as they tried to lie over each other. When that was over, Shizuru knew that all her life she would remember the way the girl yielded underneath her and the curve of the girl's throat when she threw back her head; the shaded whiteness of her shut eyes as they came together, finding perfect fulfilment in what she had believed to be an all-consuming, perfectly insatiable desire.

---

Later, after the two of them had sated both hunger for each other and for a midday repast-with a freshening, if slightly lukewarm bath in between-they finally set off to tackle the next part of their schedule. Shizuru had presented her lover with the gift saddle she had ordered, which the girl received with deep gratitude. The gift pleased the girl so much that it had taken a few moments before she could say anything, conveying her gratitude instead with starry eyes and a bright smile. So happy had she been with the gift, in fact, that she had practically leapt at Shizuru's invitation to go for a ride with her. It was thus that they went to the Argus governor's stables, with Natsuki saddling her black stallion and Shizuru saddling the white one given by Natsuki, Albinus.

"We shall be riding on each other's presents," she smiled while seating herself atop her bluish-white steed. "I on my horse and you on your saddle."

Natsuki smiled at her.

"Shizuru, Shizuru," she called suddenly before Shizuru could urge Albinus to go, drawing her black horse near Shizuru's white one. She reached inside the pouch she had attached to the saddle and Shizuru watched her, making her mount stay quiet.

"Yes, Natsuki?" she asked curiously.

"Wait."

Finally, Natsuki found what she was looking for and showed it to her companion.

"Oh yes, excuse me."

Shizuru put out her face and let the young woman apply the smooth Otomeian balm on her lips, the one that she used every day to prevent them from cracking with the cold. She smiled to stretch her lips and get them used to the slightly thickened feeling.

"Thank you," she said. "Did you put some on already?"

"Mm."

"Lovely. Shall we go?"

"Mm."

Their heels tapped at their respective horses' sides, and they were soon out of the stables and under a cloudless grey sky. Their steeds ranged alongside each other as they rode, and the two of them talked.

"More people out today than usual," Shizuru noted casually after nodding at a salute from a passing quartet of legionaries. "I shall lead the way, all right? I know where to go. Unless you would have somewhere you wish to pass by?"

Natsuki shook her head.

"All right, then."

They kept a relatively quick pace as they went, though they did not permit their horses to gallop just yet. Both of them were excellent riders and perfectly at home in the saddle, so the time passed without difficulty for either woman, their bodies perpetually relaxed and swaying along to their horses' easy canters. Once they had gone a good way off and were in a quieter section of street, Shizuru enquired how the gift saddle felt.

"Very good," Natsuki said to her, green eyes joyful. "It is very good."

"I am so glad. I worried too about whether or not it would suit Niger," Shizuru replied, naming Natsuki's arrogant-looking black charger. The beast clearly knew its name, for it turned its head as if to look at her after the statement, then turned back away with an air of dismissal: the only creature that ever seemed to hold its attention was its master, after all, and she was already seated on its back.

"It suits him," the young woman answered. "Thank you again, Shizuru."

"You are very welcome." She smoothed her hand over her own horse's hanging white mane. "Thank you again too for Albinus. He has a lovely gait and is most well-behaved. I noticed he did not even pay any heed to the squawkers at the stalls we passed just now."

"He is a good horse," Natsuki nodded. "It is good you like him."

"I like him immensely, probably more than any horse I have ever been given."

The smooth cheeks pulled into a smile at that, which Natsuki sought to hide by turning away. Shizuru could see part of her face though, and it told the tale before the girl could vanquish it completely.

"I like his former mistress better, though," Shizuru went on.

The Otomeian turned to face her, the smile still somewhat on her mouth.

"Shizuru," she said, as though berating her.

"Natsuki."

And, though they knew not why, that was enough to make both of them laugh. Foolishness of lovers, Shizuru thought, taking only faintly self-conscious delight in that explanation. Midway through their laughter, a few excited squeals reached their ears. Shizuru turned to look at the cause of the disturbance: a group of youths, adolescent girls and boys, were staring at them in awe and admiration. She spared a smile for the gawkers and was gratified when that started off another round of excited sounds as well as some blushes. That was nice; she liked being admired, if she had to be honest. But then she noticed Natsuki.

"Natsuki, what is it?" she asked cautiously, immediately identifying the touch of bad humour on her girl's brow. She guessed what it was, of course, and answered her own query with a tone suspiciously like that of a woman trying to speak up for her own defence in a trial. "I merely smiled in greeting, meum mel. It was a mere greeting."

The other said nothing to that, however, and inched her horse a little ahead. The older woman spurred her own along to keep up.

Natsuki inched forward once more.

Is she jealous, she wondered, trying to peek at Natsuki as they continued their game of pulling away and catching up. Could she possibly be jealous? Yet again it was all so foolish, but the knowledge of its foolishness did not stop her heart from soaring. She had been feeling like a fool all this time anyway, so it was nice to know she was not alone.

She gasped when she heard a thunder of hooves erupt ahead of her: Natsuki had spurred Niger into a full-on gallop. She saw the young woman's face before that, however, and saw it smirk before the flying black hair shattered her view. At that, she finally gave rein to her feelings and laughed, joyously spurring Albinus after the black stallion too. They were in an empty street near the edge of the city now, and as they raced after each other, Shizuru felt suddenly that she understood what people said when they exclaimed they were glad to be alive.

"Turn left at that fork!" she called out to the girl as they reached a juncture.

Natsuki steered there and she did the same. Eventually Shizuru caught up with the other woman and took a swift peek to see that the latter was also smiling. They raced on a little more, neither now breaking away from the other, until Natsuki decided that they had had enough and reined Niger into a trot. Shizuru followed suit, her white teeth beaming at the girl.

"No one wins this race, then?" she said, lifting one hand to shake the tawny mane of her hair.

Natsuki flipped her own dark locks over one shoulder.

"No," she said in the arrogant, cocksure way she sometimes had. "I let you share victory, Shizuru, with me."

"Oh, really?" The Himean laughed breezily. "If you say so."

"Mm-hm."

She pointed to the way ahead of them then, and Shizuru understood why she had stopped their game.

"I see," she remarked. "There seems to be business going on there."

They proceeded more slowly, rubbing their horses' necks as payment for the beasts' earlier efforts. Shizuru kept an eye on both the road ahead and Natsuki as they went, and was about to say something when they passed some off-duty soldiers, who gave her yet more salutes.

She smiled, bidding them a fine afternoon.

"Well," she said, once they had passed the legionaries. "It seems a lot of others are off to enjoy today too."

Her smile broadened when she saw some townspeople cheering and clapping their hands at a puppet act being put on by itinerant performers some metres away.

"I am glad the soldiers and the people are happy. It is so nice to see them with smiles on their faces."

Natsuki replied in a way she did not expect: "You can make it like that, no?"

Shizuru turned her head, meeting Natsuki's gaze.

"What do you-I can make what like that, Natsuki?"

"Happy. The people."

"I can make people happy?"

"Yes."

"How?"

Natsuki seemed to ponder the matter of clarification seriously.

"My people would say your magic, maybe," the young woman told Shizuru, the slow cadence of her words making it apparent that she was choosing them carefully and with much thought. "Through that you can do it. They would say you were blessed with such magic."

"Magic?" Shizuru asked in confusion. "Magic, Natsuki?"

"That you can-can make others so," Natsuki answered. "Simply by looking at them. As if your look has magic, or you have something luh-luh-like a personal magic."

Shizuru frowned in thought.

"I am not certain exactly what you think my smile can do, Darling, but I would say what you are describing is charm," she suggested.

The other nodded.

"Yes," she said. "Charm."

Shooting an indecipherable look at Shizuru, she added: "People magic."

The Himean bowed her head as she grinned.

"You sound almost wary of it," she said. "Well, perhaps I do have this 'people magic'. I have to, to have gotten where I am at my age. Nonetheless, I would caution you that you have a heady share of the same dark powers yourself."

Natsuki stared at her as though she had lost her mind.

"No," the girl said matter-of-factly. "I do not."

Shizuru smiled-before she apprehended that Natsuki was deathly serious.

Good heavens, she uttered to herself, looking back into that sombrely honest face. Did the girl really think herself devoid of charm? She, who had so thoroughly ensorcelled half of Shizuru's army in the early days of this campaign that soldier after soldier had publicly declared despairing after her? Not to mention the effect she had on Shizuru herself! Was that possibly why she never seemed to notice any of the myriad dreamy eyes that were fixed on her? Certainly her charm was different from Shizuru's own, but even so! It was there and it was undeniably powerful.

"I tell you, you do have it," Shizuru insisted. "It is merely that you do not pay attention to its effects. No doubt you dismiss such swooning and sighing as beneath your notice, and do so instinctively."

Natsuki shook her head yet again, making a sceptical face. She even looked amused by the notion.

"I am telling you the truth," the older woman went on. She surveyed the area before them and had an idea. "Indeed, I shall prove it to you. One of the reasons you do not see the more obvious effects of your charm is that you tend to look so serious most of the time. It intimidates them into hiding the symptoms until you look away. But I believe that were you to smile, you would be better able to see it. People hide it less before someone who has an open smile."

Natsuki looked even more sceptical.

"Come, then, care for the wager?" Shizuru goaded. "Smile at the next person to pass by you, and see what happens. Try it, else I think you are afraid I would prove you wrong after all."

The younger woman sneered, adopting her haughtiest pose.

"I said to smile, Natsuki, not look disdainful," Shizuru said, recognising someone about to cave into a challenge when she saw one. "Well, meum mel ? Afraid you are wrong?"

"Huh!" Natsuki scoffed, lifting her chin and looking suddenly determined. "I am not afraid."

"Then shall we try it?"

Natsuki nodded, albeit a little reluctantly and with great hauteur.

"Only to show," she explained to a highly tickled Shizuru. "You are wrong."

Shizuru looped her reins around one hand.

"Wonderful," she said. "First, smile-no, not that way, Natsuki. It's quite, um, manufactured. Smile with your mouth open."

Natsuki sent her a look of disbelief.

"That will look silly," she said dryly. "If so, I will look like I catch flies with my mouth."

Shizuru nearly dropped the reins with laughter. Trying very hard to preserve her composure, she answered the too-serious young woman: "No, Natsuki, I meant to open your mouth only to show your teeth. To grin, Dear. I never mentioned anything about gawping."

Natsuki sniffed.

"Come, shall you not try it?"

It took a good deal of urging before the girl deigned to humour her.

"A touch stiff, still," Shizuru remarked, before shrugging. She manoeuvred Albinus around a misplaced wooden crate. They were already on the open roads of Argus province. This particular road was just close enough to the city to still be peppered with carts, merchants and tradesmen bringing stock in for the vendors and shop-owners. She and Natsuki had to navigate paths around them.

"On second thought, you need not smile yet. Smile later, Natsuki, once the person passes by."

Natsuki was already scowling by this time, which did not bode well for the enterprise. Then Shizuru had a thought.

"Pretend that you are smiling at me when you do it," she instructed the girl, whose eyebrows shot up in reply. "Just do it, please, and trust me. Here, there is a man approaching. Pretend you are smiling at me. Pretend I am telling you more of the silliness you are always saying I spout from my mouth so easily. Now, then. Ready?"

The Otomeian was ready almost to the point of stiffness, and it made Shizuru worried. Still, she executed the smile better than Shizuru had expected, although she did bestow it to the man for no more than a few seconds. She kept her lips more closed than open, and Shizuru thought that was a pity, because if the girl had smiled with her teeth it would have been an instant kill. But then Natsuki was looking up again, pale cheeks splashed with colour.

The Otomeian eyed her older lover defiantly as their target simply kept on walking.

"You see, Shizuru?" she said a little harshly. "It was silly, too. I have no magic."

She spurred her horse to walk a little faster after that, Shizuru trailing after her. The older woman was looking backwards, after all, and observing the man to whom Natsuki had given that brief smile. Hence she saw what the girl missed, which was that the poor fellow jerked his head to look for her over his shoulder at least four times before finally meeting the expected mishap by tripping over one of the boxes Albinus had stepped around earlier.

"Right," Shizuru smirked to herself, watching bystanders pick up the still-dazed fellow. "No magic at all . "

Natsuki looked at her, but she just shook her head.

"Such a thing," the Otomeian then said, unexpectedly. "This thing, this charm . "

"What of it?"

"Do you not think it can be explained?"

"What do you mean, Darling?" Shizuru asked. "How do you mean, explained?"

Natsuki grimaced while seeking the words she wanted.

"Maybe studied-or learned-something," she murmured. "I mean that it is not so very like a-an unreasonable thing, as those who call it 'magic' say."

"I suppose so, yes, if you mean that the art of charm can be rationally honed and improved," Shizuru replied. "Although I still do think there is something magical about it, in the sense that a part of charm shall always defy logical categorisation."

Natsuki nodded thoughtfully.

"Yes," she said. "But many without charm, many who do not understand it logically in the part of it that is-is logical, they think it is all random, Shizuru. A random magic."

"Random in the sense of being entirely unexplainable?"

Natsuki answered positively.

"I think these people like to call it magic for a reason," she expounded. "The word, the choice of what to name the thing, it can be-um, how do you say-an explanation too, perhaps, of how much people understand a thing or want to understand it. I think it is so."

Shizuru smiled, perceiving the depth of her lover's perceptions in this argument. How delightful it was to have a lover who had a mind! She genuinely found it as enjoyable as Natsuki's more physical virtues.

"So what do you think it indicates, their choice of nomenclature in this case?" she asked.

"I think it indicates that they wish to keep its appeal even as they confess their-their-ah, mystification with it and how it is produced. Because what is magic is interesting and a mystery, no? A good mystery."

"Do you think so?" the older woman asked, thinking that Natsuki must be deemed a very magical object herself. How else could she make you tumble head over heels for her and keep you tumbling each second following the first, after all?

"Yes," the girl replied. "People like to say it is of magic when they do not know the answer to a question that is interesting."

Shizuru quizzed her for an example.

"An example is Niger," she said, indicating the horse upon which she was currently astride. They were out of the crowd again and Natsuki was talking more expansively now. "They say of Niger that he will let ride only me because he was made only for me. In the immortal world."

"What do you mean?" Shizuru smiled. "Like a sort of Pegasus, then?"

"Something like. And that he is magic because he keeps me safe, always, in battle. That he cannot die, because my other horsemen have had good horses too-bigger, sometimes, than Niger-and these good horses died." She licked her lips. "They say he is a divine horse, sent to me from the world that is after, by my kinsmen that are there."

"Oh." Shizuru watched her carefully after this revelation, relieved at least that the girl did not look at all saddened by what her own words: she was still smiling faintly. "That is a nice thought, though."

Against her expectations, Natsuki breathed out an attractive chuckle.

"It is nice but silly too," she told the Himean. "Niger is not divine, Shizuru. He bleeds if he is cut. He has such scars."

She pointed at several places on the horse's body and Shizuru noted them faithfully.

"Also," Natsuki continued, "he lets ride only me because no other stuck to his back for so long, when we-we-hmm. How do you say, Shizuru, to make tame a horse for riding? The expression, I forget."

"That would be 'breaking in'. You broke him in . "

Natsuki nodded and looked tickled.

"I remember it now," she said. "This expression. It is funny."

"Do you think so? Is it because of the word 'breaking'?"

The Otomeian shook her head.

"It is because of 'in'," she said with a smile. "I think, In where ? But you say no place and leave the 'in' alone... so I wait for nothing."

Shizuru laughed before she could stop herself.

"So I see," she said, still chuckling.

Natsuki chose to return to her earlier point: "I was the one who did not fall from Niger when we, um, broke Niger in. Everyone fell but me. Mino-you remember him?"

Shizuru said that she did. How could she not remember him? He was the one who had unlocked the secret of Natsuki's past for her.

"Mino, he fell too," Natsuki actually giggled. "He was very angry with Niger. Niger was so wild."

She patted the stallion's neck and it tossed its head, nickering with happiness at being paid special attention.

"He is very strong and fast," she clucked proudly.

The fair-haired woman smiled.

"So must you be if you were the only one able to cling to his back," she noted. "I suppose he bucked like a barmy bull?"

Natsuki was delighted by the alliteration. She had confessed to enjoying the sound of them, once before, and Shizuru tried to indulge her in that as with everything.

"Bucked a bar-mee bull," she mouthed to herself near-soundlessly. "Yes."

"And you never fell?"

Natsuki shook her head smugly.

"Well done, then. I wish I could have seen that. At least, however, I have seen you ride foes into the ground with him."

Natsuki face continued to look smug; Shizuru wanted to kiss it.

"And I have also seen you drag our captive prince in the dust while astride him."

They both chuckled, remembering the pitiful sight of Artaxi that day.

"Poor, silly man," Shizuru sighed all of a sudden, remembering the hapless prince's ceaseless moans and groans during their march to Argus. "If only he had not been so silly, so quick to dismiss his opponents. Although that might have been trouble for us, I admit. Only, it is a pity that such a large army had to pay the price for a single fool's incompetence."

Natsuki nodded, saying in condemnation, "Stupid."

The elder woman wiggled her eyebrows at the girl, who continued disgustedly: "Do not like stupid people."

The Himean grinned. "No?"

"No."

"Sometimes you might find you can like them a little better if you try to, well, tolerate the facet of stupidity amidst their other traits."

"No."

Shizuru smiled: "No?"

"No," the girl grinned back.

"How do you like me?"

Although that elicited the regular blush, it also had the perquisite of a laugh.

"You, Shizuru?" Natsuki said, eyes sparkling with amusement. "You are not stupid!"

Shizuru inclined her head: "I am relieved you think so, Natsuki."

"Yes," Natsuki said, before seeing the look on Shizuru's face.
"Shizuru?"

"Oh, nothing." The Himean smiled, shaking her own head to clear it of the fog. "I suppose I was merely thinking about the first time we met. And what I thought of you."

Natsuki smiled too.

"Ohh," she breathed secretively, seeming reluctant to ask further.
"Hmm. That."

Shizuru looked enquiringly at her.

"What did you think of me then?" she asked.

It took a while, as Natsuki seemed intent to brood on the memory first before answering. The reply, when it came, was an Otomeian word Shizuru translated easily.

"Impossible?" she said with puzzlement. "What do you mean, 'impossible'?"

Natsuki smirked.

"Impossible," she said again to her lover. "More so later. Argentum."

She suddenly chuckled, smiling cheekily at Shizuru as she added: "I thought, 'She is not right in the head.'"

The older woman let loose a string of laughter.

"What?" she said. "You thought I was mad?"

"Many times."

"No!"

"Yes!"

Shizuru grinned.

"Why, what could I have done to make you think such a thing of me?" she asked the young woman.

"Many things. More and more, I thought it."

"It's a wonder you managed to stay civil to such a worsening loon, then!"

"I was nice to you. You see how I tolerate?"

They laughed.

"Silly!" Shizuru said, extending a foot to nudge her leg where it lay against the horse's side. "But truly? What made you think I was mad?"

Natsuki took her time to reply, eyes always looking ahead as she hummed meditatively. Shizuru watched her as she thought about it, admiring the gentle sway of her body as it kept pace with the horse's steps. She looked almost like a centaur, the Himean thought, for she and her horse seemed to be just one animal.

Finally, she gave Shizuru an answer.

"The way you talked," the girl told her general. "And the things you said. Such strange things."

"Was it my teasing you even then?"

A pink smirk. "Could be."

"I'm sure it is so," Shizuru smirked back, fluttering her lashes a little. "Though I suppose that is not all there is to it?"

"No. Many things."

"Indeed. And you mentioned Argentum."

The mention of that name seemed to reanimate Natsuki, who threw her lover a queer look, black hair whipping to one side as she turned her head. Against the light grey skies, Shizuru saw it as a raven's wing in flight, fluttering up and vanishing phantom-wise.

"There, you were mad," the young woman said, speaking with a low, rumbling sort of excitement. "I thought then that you were really not right in the head. I was very much worried."

Shizuru stared back into the intense emerald gaze.

"You were worried?" she echoed musingly. "For your fellows' sakes, having to follow a mad general?"

Natsuki seemed to catch herself, and pinked again before looking away and straight ahead.

"That, yes," she said. "Yes, it was like that."

Shizuru made a non-committal sound, detecting something else the girl was leaving unsaid.

"That is perfectly understandable," she said, before adding gently: "Dare I hope you were you also worried for my sake, Natsuki? Because, perhaps, you were worried that I would be hurt?"

She said it as lightly as she could, feeling very silly for wanting Natsuki to say yes. Of precisely what, anyway, was it in affirmation?

"Yes," Natsuki told her. "Could be."

Shizuru tried very hard not to smile, almost blushing with gladness.

"Thank you," she said, leaning over towards the girl. She was met by Natsuki halfway, and she said something else before they kissed. "Though I hope that does not mean you have no faith in me."

Natsuki chuckled when they separated.

"You were so far front, you see," she said to the older woman. "It was worrying."

"I can understand why a fellow Himean - or a Greek - or even a Persian, for that matter - would find it unusual," she told the girl. "But I had thought you, of all people, would find it normal. After all, your barons and commanders are known for leading deadly charges into the enemy line as well. You yourself do it."

Natsuki nodded, a wisp of hair blown across her forehead by the wind. She allowed it to settle instead of brushing it away herself.

"Yes, but not always the head commanders of the entire army," she answered. "And, too, I read about you Himeans, Shizuru. You do not do such a thing."

"Ah, yes. Now I see."

"Do you do it always?"

The crimson eyes slid to her as Shizuru replied.

"No, not always," the older woman confessed. "I admit it was a terrible risk, but one I felt I had to take."

Natsuki looked very curious. She asked why.

"Because we were so heavily outnumbered," was the answer.

"Because I knew that, brave though my men were, some part of them would sink at the sight of those numbers facing them. Because they needed to see that I was confident enough of winning to fight with them, at the very front, so that they could be confident enough to win, themselves. It is one thing to have a commander tell you to go over here and fight over there; it is another to have that commander do those things with you herself. You are a commander too. You know what I mean here, yes?"

The girl nodded, looking very impressed.

"And also for the practical matter," Shizuru continued. "Since we were terrifically outnumbered, it meant every available soldier needed to pull more than double-weight, and that included me."

Natsuki said nothing to this. They remained silent for a while afterwards, neither looking at anything but the road ahead, which forked into two different paths. Shizuru chose the path to the right, and the girl followed her.

"I am still worrying," Natsuki said suddenly and gravely, some moments later. "You take such risks, Shizuru. But I see now. You walk the way to immortality."

Shizuru was intrigued by the statement.

"In a manner of speaking, yes," she said. "Is that a soldier of Zalmoxis speaking?"

"It could be it is a soldier of General Fujino."

Said general laughed.

"Oh, come," she said, with a few more chuckles. "You never call me 'General'."

The black brows arched at her, all innocence.

"I tried," Natsuki reminded. "At first, so I called you. But you said I should call you not that but 'Shizuru' instead."

"Yes, yes." Shizuru sighed. "So I recall. Yet I am surprised to realise how lovely the title sounds when you say it to me."

Natsuki threw a perplexed chuckle.

"It is all right. I still do want you to call me by my name, Natsuki."

A short interval of silence later, she tacked on the addendum: "But I do not mind if you call me 'General' sometimes too, just so it is clear. For a little variety of flavour."

A confused murmur: "Flavour?"

Shizuru did not respond, smiling straight ahead. Natsuki kept a quizzing look on her, but to no avail: the Himean simply carried on smiling. Finally seeing that she would get no further explanation, the younger woman made a droll face.

"Sometimes," she muttered, "you are so strange, Shizuru."

She did say, nevertheless, a few seconds after that: "But if you want, I shall also call you 'General'."

Even with only the fact that she said that, Shizuru already felt unbearably happy.

---

"It's terrible, being born a patrician."

The words, straight out of a woman merging two of the oldest patrician ancestries in her truly blue veins, came with heartfelt woefulness. Those listening to her nodded wistfully too, convinced that she meant them with nothing less than complete honesty. How could they be convinced of it, given her situation? By her demeanour, perhaps, or her past actions as well as present. But even more than these at the time was perhaps the tone of her words. It was a tone that sang honesty. Not in a reeking, obviously affected way, but like something that was true and heretofore hidden: a secret boil, quietly inflaming until it broke and leaked a fine trickle of the most honest, most festering pus .

"It's a sad thing when people think you're not fit to associate with them, just because of it," the young woman continued, sulky voice showing the wound that still rankled. "One can't choose where one's born, they forget. So many of our good folk have shunned me a good while, just because they think me different. Well, maybe I am-I don't know. But aren't we all Himeans, great people of a great nation? Surely there's no call for them to treat me so shabbily, just because I was born into a different class from theirs? I don't treat them shabbily, my friends: never have, never will. I don't let the fact of where they're born affect the way I treat anyone, unless it's the fact that they've been born into Hime."

Her auditors murmured their apologies on behalf of those poor folk who had let their prejudices run away with them, who had surely not known any better: just like them, who had not known any better. But that had been before they met her.

"And the strange thing is, even those in my supposed class think me different!" she went on in lament. "Though in their case, they're right! Just yesterday, I had to put up with their bitching once more, simply because I asked for more funds for the crossroad colleges' upkeep. Jupiter as my witness, don't the colleges need it? And can't the bastards give it, when they have so much money to put in their bloody banks to fatten their already fat arses?"

There was a roar of laughter at that, which she joined.

"I suppose it's why I've always felt a little off with them, you know, the others. Like something wasn't quite there. Like they didn't understand me and I didn't understand them. It's now that I'm glad to see why."

She hushed, and again her voice was bitter.

"I really didn't understand them."

Now the verbal sympathies became louder, more emphatic in their agreement. This poor young patrician! To be born into such an uptight, hoity-toity class, when her heart was so much like theirs: so plain and honest, so true and common. Oh, but Fate could weave such cruel beginnings for the best people! And she was such a damned fine, smart girl too!

"I didn't understand them-and I mean the ones among them who're uppity, mind you! Not all of them are, and I'll mark them out for you soon enough. For starters, there's our urban praetor, and my cousins, of course. But the other ones, by god, I don't understand them!"

Her voice had risen now, and it acquired a husky tremble of agitation at the end. It was touching and it was emotional. It was perfect.

She sat up straight with a low growl and a wicked smile. They tensed. They knew something wonderful was coming.

"I'll make them understand us, quirites !" she howled, to the accompaniment of their pounding chairs. "Ye gods, I swear it! I'll force it down their soft mouths if I have to, and I'll make them understand that we're fed up with them and their stinking snobbery-them and their accursed arrogance-them and all their gods-fucked grubbing! We'll have justice if we have to fight tooth and nail for it, and once we do get it, there'll be no giving it back, so do I swear!"

That did it: every foot was stamping, every mouth howling support and admiration for this brave, selfless young woman, who was one of the rare few who truly understood and supported them: the numerically greatest denizens of the greatest city in the world, whose voices were hardly ever heard for all their greatness. Always ignored, always pushed aside by the policy-makers and politicians. Until they found someone to plead their behalf, of course, which they had now. And she was no lightweight, mind! She was one of them, one of the uppers, but was also truly one of them at the same time, a member of the good folk, the disenfranchised and trodden.

One deeply-stirred pub-goer, his eyes reddening with unshed tears, lifted his glass and made the toast for all: to their new tribune of the plebs, the excellent Urumi Himemiya-Kanzaki Nemura!

The young woman in possession of one of the most awesome names in Hime nodded at that, accepting the cheers with an easy if slightly embarrassed grin. Her smile seemed the most likeable thing all of a sudden to those people clustered around her. It had always been so for this young woman: if she smiled that terrifically likeable smile, everyone smiled back. She had many other smiles, of course, and a good number of those were even less than likeable; but she also knew many ways to play the game and knew when to play what way. So she gave them her best and most affable smile now, because this particular game called for it.

"You cheer me up better than those farce-fuckers in Senate!" she laughed, using that contagion she handled so well to infect them with mirth. "I thought I'd have to drink myself to death tonight to get over their mule-headedness, but it turns out all I have to do is watch you do it instead!"

Again came boisterous, coarse laughter.

"Least we can do, Urumi-san," another of the men at the bar told her, his face rough with the scars of a dozen fights. A brash old brawler, no doubt. "You're not like them other haughty buggers-beggin' yer pardon."

"No need to, Todou-san, since you're right: most of them are haughty buggers. I've heard they even stick up their noses in buggery, though I'd like to know up what hole," she sniggered, setting them off a fresh round of hilarity from the bawdy jest. She took a final sip from her cup before mopping her mouth with that outrageously large and bulky handkerchief she always seemed to carry around, getting up from her stool. "Think they're about done discussing their buggery by now, and I need my cousin-who's one of the decent ones among the lot, thank the gods."

They groaned, pleading with her to stay; to keep talking; to entertain them even more as she always did so incomparably. She shook her head with a chuckle, however, and pointed to the barkeep.

"Can't, but I'll thank you for cheering me up, you drunken lot," she said with crude affection, grinning at the swarthy man behind the counter. She threw him a small cloth pouch, which made everyone grin too when it clinked tellingly into his hands. "Here, Old Chap, and give them another round on me, will you? And if there's more left, give them some of that disgusting slop you make your patrons eat in place of honest fare!"

"It's disgustingly honest slop, Tribune," he said merrily above the cheering. "Admits it is, don't it?"

She laughed: "You speak true, Old Swindler."

Taking her leave with a hearty wave, Urumi made her way out of the wine-shop. She walked with a light step and a perky grin, extending a hand to pull playfully on the vines that drooped from the wooden lattice atop the entrance. Then she was out on the street and smack into the hubbub of the Subura.

The Subura was Hime's densest, most dismal address. Dank and reeking of foetor, walls mould-caked and peeling, the place was inscribed with poverty from top to bottom. Here was where the poorest inhabitants of the city converged, where the septic squawk of the sewers made itself heard in a rushing, bubbling torrent of urban squalor.

Like other slums in other cities, the district was perpetually bursting at the seams. It teemed with people from nearly every walk of life, the only exceptions being people from our present young woman's walk, naturally. Urumi was one of the most well-bred, well-connected members of Hime's First Class, and this showed in many ways. It was in her look, which was so evocative of those patricians of all patricians, the Himemiya. It was in her proud but graceful stride, too, as well as in her fine and fashionable clothes. Urumi was rich and well-bred and looked it. By rights, she should not be here in this pit, and its dwellers should be snapping at her already for an intruder or mugging her blind. Not so, strangely. Instead, here were the denizens of the Subura hollering out greetings, waving, welcoming, just absolutely loving her. To any member of the First and Second Classes, people well used to being hated by all those beneath them, it was something that begged the shocked question: "Why?" And so deep was the amazement over this that it often merited a second iteration, yelled out of sheer incredulity: " WHY?"

Because Urumi Nemura, formerly under the family Himemiya-Kanzaki, was a true and bona fide genius.

Geniuses, some liked to say, were geniuses primarily of mischief. Urumi was a perfect a case in point for those who held to this aphorism: her own talents often manifested in what others would consider works of naughtiness. Her works were brilliantly mad-or madly brilliant-schemes built on a foundation of disregarded common precepts and values. One of the hallmarks of genius had always been unorthodoxy, and given that all unorthodoxy was considered mischief by the mainstream, it was only natural that the originators of it would be considered troublemakers.

Urumi was a great troublemaker. Her latest scheme in particular was something she was sure would further her reputation as one. Becoming a plebeian citizen from a patrician one had been the first step in this new opus, after which being elected a tribune of the plebs came next. But concomitant with this second step was another, which she had been in the process of undertaking just now and would continue undertaking throughout the entirety of her plan-indeed, perhaps throughout the entirety of her life, given how useful she was seeing it to be. This other second step was the romancing of the masses, their seduction by a woman who planned to use them to further her own aims and those of her friends.

It was technically the most difficult part, she thought. As she herself had remarked, it was terrible being born a patrician-and a rich patrician at that. Patricians were viewed with distrust by plebeians, even those plebeians with names so august and coffers so rich they were of the First Class themselves. Patricians were still different. Patricians came from the blood of kings and queens and the ancient bluebloods, and that was enough to make wary a people who had forever sworn off kings and queens. As indeed Hime had, during the founding of the Republic.

It was no matter that Urumi had already switched over to the plebeian gentry; she was still viewed with that universal reverse-snobbery that characterised the lower classes when presented one higher up the social ladder: a tightly knit, guarded distrust against society's head, which always dictated motions to its mud-spattered feet. Urumi was aware of that powerful wariness, which was nevertheless also an attraction. She also knew of that suspicion of all things unlike and superior and different. More than most in her class, she knew it: for Urumi was, to almost everyone else, unlike and superior and different. Urumi set people on guard without trying, just by being what she was. Nonetheless, her plan required that she become a demagogue to end all other demagogues, and that meant she would have to overcome this Olympian obstacle.

She did it with aplomb worthy of both the Kanzaki and Himemiya.

It was a success built with tools that previous demagogues had never used as well as she: a conquest funded not primarily by hard cash and charity but by infinite resources of guile and magnetism instead. Oh, it had been a tortuous road! She had had to begin at the knotted roots, picking as her first battles those with the persons most opposed and wary to her kind.

She infiltrated first and most deeply the company of those shadier characters of each slum district: the thugs-for-hire, the brawlers, the directionless or work-weary men and women who whiled away time in dark taverns, talking about whatever it was commoners discussed. She began with their leaders, of course. She started by romancing two heads of a crude sodality and an infamous protection gang, raised the number by four, went on to eight, and so on, always adding to her network of 'new friends'. How did she do it? The answer was ludicrous in simplicity: talk and drink.

It would begin, usually but not always, through a talk with them for a potential commission or other business arrangement engaging their services. Then it would escalate to a visit to check up on the already-finalised job or to talk more about the potential of one. In this wise, Urumi's familial connections actually aided her-for, at the time she began this project, her cousin was the urban praetor. Since the urban praetor was general magistrate of the city, anyone tempted at first to remedy Urumi's intrusive presence through rough means would think twice. Furthermore, given that one of the most important conquests she needed to achieve was that of the crossroad college sodalities, it predisposed the members of those particular associations to treat her nicely, since her cousin was the official of the city put in charge of all such colleges. A word from Urumi and it was quite possible that the colleges would be disbanded, their rent-free licences revoked, or even-and here was a collective shudder-their taverns and meeting places removed entirely. Such was the power of the urban praetor and, she being the urban praetor's cousin, the power of Urumi.

Her talk always began harmlessly enough. She spoke not of the high topics she was used to dissecting, but restricted herself to those matters the commoners would know. She would ask them for opinions, and when that had progressed, ask them for advice. She had a great sympathetic style to her listening, and she always seemed fascinated by their notions, constantly expressing her delight with their wisdom. To further warm them up, she would drink with them and pretend just enough tipsiness to be convincing. Later, once she had begun to gain their trust, she would go on to near-drunkenness, which set them enough at ease to do the same. Ah, Hime, where camaraderie was best founded on the spills of a wine flagon! But it was camaraderie based on an illusion that no one had yet uncovered. The illusion was that Urumi, even in her prodigious draining of cup after cup, never actually drank the wine in them.

Handy little trick, too, and so simple, she thought to herself as she walked, always amused by the fact that no one had noticed that petty deceit yet. But, yes, all great plans are made of a handful of little tricks... just like every great tapestry is begun from a few simple threads.

The reek of the Subura had waned; a little further on, it was followed by an infinitely preferable odour. The blonde tribune of the plebs was out of the cesspit, and had reached the Macellum Cuppedenis . Here were the spice and flower markets of the city, where the concerted smells of peppercorn and incense and the spicy-sweet tang of the best cinnamon mingled with a thousand other fragrances. It was enough to send all of Hime, flower- and perfume-loving city that it was, into a veritable swoon. Urumi found herself nodding absently in approval, her nose finding reprieve after the shit-stink whence she had just come.

She rounded a corner and gazed about. Her eyes alit on a trash pile ready for burning. She strode up and casually dropped her handkerchief on top of the pile, taking care not to let the dark cloth unfold and disclose what was hidden inside: a very heavy sponge soaked with spat-out wine.

On she went in her trek, going down the incline of the Clivus Orbis and turning up the Sacra Via, never faltering in her relaxed amble nor in her equally tranquil smile. Even here people greeted her, both high-born and low, for she was now one of the most popular persons in the city. It amused her to be so, as she knew she could use it. Thus smiling and waving did she finally reach her destination of the Curia Hostilia . Seat of Hime's Powers. The Senate House itself.

Seems that they have finished, Urumi noted, her asymmetrically coloured eyes flashing as she surveyed the crowd at the front of the building. Thank the gods-that means I don't have to wait any longer. Now it's just a matter of finding her in this crush.

She walked up and through the crowd, as perfectly confident of her acceptance among these people as she had been among those of the Subura. They welcomed her and talked to her, of course, but she kept her words short, for she was saving her true thoughts for someone else in the mob. Someone who would most likely be at the centre of it, yet removed from the rest of it. A distanced nucleus was her destination.

Still, she thought, this crowd may present a problem. If the one she sought was indeed at the centre, it would mean more trouble in seeking her due to the bodies sea-walling around the woman. Nonetheless, Urumi was well-known enough to part that sea without having to resort to pushing and elbowing each person. Just a little closer-and my god, what awful perfume is that one wearing? What a reek!

Finally, she came within shouting distance of her purpose. Chikane of the Himemiya. Beautiful Chikane, who looked like a visitation of some lunar goddess, her face endowed with such relentless symmetry that it could not be human. Aloof, frosty-looking Chikane who was, in truth, one of the sweetest and kindest people in the world.

Which did not make her any less powerful, of course. Or any less dangerous.

Urumi went up on her toes, wondering if she should wave at her cousin to be noticed. But that might go unobserved even then, with so many moving around and flailing their arms at some political quarrel or another. She cursed her height, wondering why she had not been blessed with that same stature Chikane and Chikane's younger sister had. She barely made the average for Himean women whereas her cousins, the Himemiya Sisters, made it well above that mark. She would have to get Chikane's attention another way.

"Chikaneeee Himemiyaaa!"

She sang it out with a smirk. As predicted, her cousin's exquisitely sensitive ears picked up the call amidst the babble. Around swept that magnificent head, assuming an equally magnificent smile. As Urumi knew it would, that smile stupefied over much of the crowd into stillness. It permitted Chikane's stroll towards her to be that much easier. A giggle left her: what a wickedly useful thing it must be, to be able to do that!

The young tribune of the plebs had considerable charms herself, she knew, but she still had to admit they were not in the same league as her cousin's. Which is no sad thing to admit, she thought with good humour. How many people could stupefy people so effortlessly? Certainly her other cousin, the Princeps, had his own dazzling smile; and Chikane's friend, Shizuru Fujino, had a truly fabulous one that even her opponents talked about with admiration. So did a few others who made up the ranks of the city's most beautiful people. Each one slew with a smile and knew it, worked with it. Yet it was only Chikane who could slay so thoroughly and break your heart so swiftly without full knowledge of it taking place.

That was because of Chikane's strange lack, that thing that was both her triumph and her tragedy: her distinct isolation.

Chikane, even with all her kindness, was one of the last rare, really remote beings. She isolated herself without pretension and suited that isolation-far unlike all those other beautiful faces in Hime who traded with their looks. Those beauties understood others and the effect they had on others, and that was something Chikane did not, or not fully. Her natural introversion prevented her from understanding precisely how she was experienced by other people. She might be aware, for instance, that others thought her beautiful; but she did not know how devastatingly that beauty affected them. She did not know how those silences she caused were due to a dozen hearts rising to tight throats. Urumi thought that was a strange deficiency of knowledge for someone who generally knew everything all the time.

Urumi had long pondered it. Maybe because her knowledge is often so cerebral? It was a little too cold, just a little too clear. Chikane was perhaps too withdrawn a woman to have that particular depth of awareness rendered only by true and connected empathy. So she could not help but go on as she was doing: she smiled and slew and through it all had no idea how deep the slaying was. Which was only appropriate, in Urumi's opinion, because Chikane was an incarnate force of nature. Forces of nature hurt you in innocence, not knowing that their thorns sank into flesh instead of merely pricking out a bit of blood.

I think, in fact, Urumi reflected with amusement, that may even be Chikane's greatest and only cruelty.

"I'm so glad to see you," she told the taller woman now, meeting her. "I was going to call on you and Himeko-chan tonight, so this saves me the trouble."

"I match your gladness, if not surpass it," the other woman said at first, adding quietly as they embraced after: "Any news, Little Troublemaker?"

The shorter woman scoffed.

" Great, please, always great," Urumi declared humorously as they separated. "I strive for more instead of less."

Chikane smiled sweetly... and slew another dozen in the crowd about them.

"My apologies." She bowed her head lightly. "I shall be sure to remember it, Great One."

"It feels as though you're mocking me, for all the courtesy with which you deliver it." The pretty, impish face suddenly came alive; it lasted no more than a second before returning to its usual and faintly drowsy aspect. "I expect to be living up to the title soon, by the way."

"My, that sounds exciting."

The statuesque woman inclined her head to the road after that remark.

"Come, Cousin," she continued. "Shall we walk?"

"We shall walk," said Urumi, tipping her head at the persons lingering near them. "Your retinue?"

"They may follow."

Turning to give her attendants a few words of instruction, Chikane permitted her cousin to link an arm around hers and lead the way to her home. There she could talk to each client personally in her study while having the rest happily entertained and waiting in her parlour. For now, however, she felt in need of a short respite from their gabble. And hazardous as many thought Urumi could be, Chikane was fond enough of her cousin to consider time with her a respite.

Once they were a safe distance from the following crowd, she addressed the younger woman again.

"How then, Urumi, shall this affirmation of the title be achieved by you?"

Urumi looked elated.

"Why, through various happenings of bedlam, the likes of which would put to shame an Egyptian circus!" she grinned, angling her face upwards to bring her mouth nearer the far taller woman's ears. "It's related to our northern question, of course, have no fear."

Chikane slipped one small chuckle.

"Have no fear?" she echoed. "A strange assurance from one who often uses fear for her purposes, and with maximum efficiency. I hope that this bedlam of which you speak is actually secretly ordered towards the answer of aforementioned question."

"It is."

"How so?"

Urumi's eyes gleamed as she replied, not without enjoyment: "The answer to the question is wrapt within a riddle."

Chikane breathed out a little sigh.

"Oh," she said tonelessly. "Melodrama."

Urumi stared at her incredulously. "This, from the child of one of the greatest political thespians Senate ever saw?"

"Can you not yet tell me?"

"No. I want it to be a surprise. Would you like the riddle?"

"If you wish to give it."

Urumi delivered with her usual flair, tones suddenly lugubrious and dolefully hollow: "The answer is a mummy and its effects, hidden in plain sight before the royal palace. The surprise is the mummy rising and terrifying pharaoh before his throne. The secret is the mummy thinking it was and is pharaoh, unaware that it is now only ever a puppet and a corpse."

"Hmph," Chikane smiled after thinking on it for a few seconds.

"Either I am mistaken in my interpretation of that riddle or you deliberately omitted the part from it that would let on exactly what novel mayhem you have planned-for the answer, as it is now, would be nothing too new as far as the bedlam-bringers in our Republic's history go."

A fine tinkle of mirth came from her side. The younger woman had omitted the last part of the riddle, for it did not suit her purposes to have Chikane know all of it at this point and Chikane was smart enough to figure out what the last part meant.

The trick is the priest who unleashes the mummy, who sets it on the other priests with a club and a gag.

"Well, then it wouldn't have been a surprise anymore," Urumi told the elder woman, who shook her head gently. "I know you well enough not to risk telling you more than three-quarters of a riddle if I want you to really experience the sense of mystery that comes with one."

"It is flattering that you think so highly of my deductive capabilities that you modify the rules of riddle-making, though still unfair," Chikane said. "And, yes, before you remind me: I know what you think of the word 'fair' . What fresh hell have you now wrought?"

"It's still in the process, but yes, it's awfully fresh." Urumi giggled, flapping one end of her ginger and brown cloak. "I should hope for it to be fresher, juicier of pulp and more virginal of pit than any other that Lord Pluto ever created and bled rot- stinking -dry."

An amused sound left the other's lips. "Competing with Dis, Urumi-hubris already?"

"Mere literary licence, actually."

"What morbid literature you create."

"All literature is morbid-the cheeriest ones are even more so, because they fail to realise the morbidity in themselves." The younger woman's eyes twinkled. "Now let's stop the shop talk for a moment. Simply rest assured my surprise shall fit perfectly into your own plans, Cousin. Having said that, will you do me a favour and tell me that I'm invited over tonight?"

"You are invited over tonight, as indeed you are welcome to be every night." Chikane smiled knowingly, nostrils flaring as she sniffed the air. It was heavy with damp: spring had yet to fully enter. "Bored with Reito-kun?"

The prodigy at her side groaned.

"He gets so tedious," she whined. "I don't know how his women find him so enduringly fascinating!"

"He has particular merits for them, one supposes. What of his younger sister? Surely she can provide more variable entertainment?"

"Always off at Tokiha-san's. I'm starting to think there's something going on there."

"Ah, a caution. You may start some dangerous gossip with that whimsical tongue of yours." She smiled at some people who greeted them as they passed by. "And your adopted mother, also known as your ever-acquiescent friend?"

"My pet? She's out of town visiting some relatives in the country." Urumi made a wistful face. "I don't want to stay at her place if she's not there. There's little fun in it without her to play jester."

She felt one sapphire eye on her and sighed.

"No, I don't plan on making you play jester in her stead, Chikane," she added. "Especially not your wife."

She reminded Chikane about her earlier enquiry for news and bade the older woman attempt to guess at an answer to her own question.

"Instead of attending the Senate's session, as you should have?" Chikane replied jokingly. "I wonder. I suppose you have been mingling vertically?"

Urumi said she had and that Chikane would be pleased by its results come time to unveil them.

"I look forward to it." Chikane quirked a slim brow at this. "I wonder, by the way, that your speech makes them not uncomfortable. The lower classes have an aversion to such as they would call high talk."

"True, but my speech is not the height it regularly is, when I'm with them," Urumi retorted, before suddenly saying in a perfectly broad commoner's accent: "I can slum right well with 'em bastards, and talk from my arse withou' a sniff of a stink."

Chikane was delighted.

"You do that so well," she complimented, looking very much as though she wanted to laugh. "'Tis eerie."

Urumi giggled: "Or frightening?"

"Perhaps for some."

"Frightened?"

"Never," she replied, to Urumi's laughter. "In any case, I hope this heralds success for overcoming our latest obstacle. I-"

She stopped here, without continuing, and Urumi looked at her curiously.

"My apologies," she said with a quiet laugh. "I merely realised how odd it is to actually consider this matter an obstacle. At any other time, it would have been a blessing."

The shorter woman nodded, smiling too.

"Even more for Shizuru-san, I'm supposing," she ventured. "Are we sure, by the way, in our predictions of her reception, Chikane? This is a lot of work and preparation for something of which we have no real confirmation yet, or not from the woman herself. I don't grudge the trouble, but the problem is that I've come to enjoy and invest so much into it."

She stopped as they passed some acquaintances. Once they had moved on, she continued: "I just really want it to be for something! If she calls it off, well-I'd be a little put out, to tell you the truth."

"We must allow latitude," Chikane assured Urumi, touching the young woman's arm shortly. "But I am certain as far as I can be that you shall get to employ your latest instruments. Even if some chance occurrence rendered my certainty false, I would provide you with an opportunity to employ them all the same."

"You do humour me, don't you?" Urumi said, looking up at her cousin and friend. "I knew that, really. But even so, I doubt we could find another matter like that. Not another as deliciously notorious or attention-grabbing or challenging."

"If it proves impossible to find such an issue, I shall make one."

The tribune of the plebs laughed, her differently-coloured eyes bright and happy once again.

"You're so sweet, Chikane," she replied. "Thank you."

Chikane nodded, eyes not on her but on the road ahead.

"Well," she murmured, before raising her voice to a more audible level. "Well met, Tate-san."

Urumi turned to look at the man Chikane had just addressed and who was approaching them. He was of middling height and build and had on a blue cloak over a tunic the same shade as his sandy light hair. The blue of the cloak brought out the gold in his hair and brown skin. A nice-looking man; but Chikane and Urumi came from a clan of better-than-nice-looking women as well as men-so now, contrasting it with a mental image of their relative the Princeps, they wondered a little. Interesting, both thought, that Senator Mai Tokiha had preferred this man to their more urbane, more intelligent, and far more attractive relation.

The man now offered them a curt but not unpleasant smile.

"Himemiya-san," he said. "Urumi-san."

Both women smiled, although Urumi's disappeared as swiftly as his had. Chikane's remained in place.

"I tried to catch you after the Senate meeting, but you'd gone quickly," he told them, eyeing the crowd of patrons hovering a respectable distance away. His thick brown eyebrows drew close. "Mai had a message."

Chikane moved her head very slightly.

"I noticed she did not attend," she said. "I hope she is well."

"Ah, she's fine," the other senator told her with some discomfiture, having read the question in the lake-blue gaze. "A little busy though. Just finishing up some things. You know, for the, uh, wedding."

"I see."

"Yes."

"You must be busy too. I dare to hope you are well, even so."

He half-smiled and half-wincing, as was his wont: "I'm fine, I think."

"That is good."

There was a silence after that which might have been perceived as awkward, though only by the sandy-haired man. The two women, for their parts, remained perfectly at ease during the interval.

Finally, Chikane took it on herself to prompt him.

"Tate-san?" she said, again very gently and with utmost courtesy. "Would it be preferable to seek a more appropriate venue for the message's delivery?"

He started a little at that, brown cheeks seeming to go ruddy.

"Ah, no," he said, looking irritated with himself- and all things in general, Urumi thought mischievously, as she watched him mutter the communication to her cousin. "She said she's agreed and all you have to do is send the item when it's ready."

"I see. Please convey my gratitude to her, and accept that which I convey to you now as well," Chikane answered, bowing her head. "My thanks for having taken the time to give us this message, Tate-san. I am much obliged, and can only hope it did not trouble you."

He smiled a little, shrugging like an embarrassed boy. Up came his hand again to scratch, but instead of going to the back of his head, it went now to his chin. It was dark with light brown fuzz, and both women guessed it had been there from this morning.

"Don't mention it," he replied. "Anyway, she'd have made me go by force if I said no. Have some errands myself, too."

"All the same, I am grateful." Chikane inclined her head, causing a few locks of glossy black hair to tumble forward. "Shall that be all, Tate-san? You mentioned some other errands, so I would hate to keep you here if you have more to do."

"Yes, that's about it. I better get going now, Himemiya-san."

"Then please go with our good wishes."

He nodded once again before going off, leaving the two women-and the tag-along band behind them-to resume their walk. They were almost at the Palatine, the richest and most sumptuous address in Hime, and were going down the Clivus Sacer. As they rounded the corner and passed the great edifice of shops known as the Porticus Margaritaria, Urumi chose to remark on their most recent encounter.

"There's a fellow I think is morbid," she said, to the amusement of her cousin.

"How so?" Chikane asked, looking up at the high colonnades of the great Porticus. It had been a while since she had taken her wife to shop here. Perhaps she should ask her if she wanted to, tomorrow. "Mayhap it is the manner?"

"It's part of it, yes," Urumi replied, gold-lashed eyes narrowing. "Something more than that. Something within him."

She paused before finally elucidating: " Rudderless, I believe."

"Indeed?"

"Tate-san has muddled ambitions, Chikane, if he has any at all. It makes him morose, I think. Do you disagree? I think him very unaware of what he wants."

"Does that not apply to most of us?"

"Perhaps. But not to you. Nor to me."

"No? I have heard you described as most unpredictable in your goals as well, Urumi. Is not an erratic rudder alike to having no rudder at all?"

"I am not so unpredictable as some think, Cousin. The consistency is that I aim always for interest . " The blonde woman lifted her shoulders in a gesture of indifference. "Anyone who truly knows me can vouch for that. I believe myself justified in claiming to be aware of what I do desire."

"Very well. Then the earlier statement is true of you." Chikane produced one of her slier smiles and lowered her silky voice. "Is it true of Mai-san?"

Urumi giggled, making a face.

"Remember not to smile like that when you're in Senate-you look positively wicked," she said, drawing close to the tall woman in order to speak more confidentially. "I can't believe she's marrying him, you know."

"On Reito's side in this case, are we?"

Urumi waved a hand, swiftly dismissing her other cousin's thwarted suit of Mai Tokiha.

"No, not really," she said. "It just seems a striking mismatch with the present players, that's all."

Chikane hummed, face calm and sedate again.

"I see," she said.

"I'm not entirely sure it wouldn't be a mismatch with Reito either, but I do think it would be less so. I suppose the outcome should provide some social interest in the future, at least."

"Possibly."

A few seconds passed as they strolled on.

"I do hate the way you let us blabber while constantly withholding your own opinion," Urumi suddenly burst out, drawing a laugh. She shook her head in exasperation. "Really, Chikane. I'm quite sure no one can hear us now, so it's really all right. Do you think I'd have spoken, myself, were it not so?"

Chikane's eyes shone in that way they did, that way that made you think she was cherishing elegant secrets behind them. In all likelihood, Urumi thought, she actually was.

"Of course not," she said, supplementing the answer with a smile.

And no more.

"You're hopeless," the youthful tribune of the plebs ruled, nonetheless affected enough by her cousin's aura to return the smile. "All right. I'll let you keep your scruples and counsel in peace."

"Thank you." Chikane brushed away some of the hair waving about the smooth planes of her face, her cool blue eyes darkening with hidden irritation, which she voiced in the next second. "That proves increasingly difficult to do these days, I feel."

The other woman smiled with understanding: "Rarely have a moment to yourself now, I suppose?"

"Quite." The tall woman chuckled, as though amused by something. "But one supposes it is the price for this."

"And it's a great price to pay, especially for you, " the younger woman agreed. "But then again, Chikane, you are the one who decided you wanted to become senior consul."

Hime's leading consul of the year laughed, looking every inch the senior magistrate perfectly at ease with her position. The clients following them smiled curiously, wondering what her cousin had told her that was so amusing.

"Peril awaits all those who seek great rewards," she murmured, before throwing a sharp look at her cousin. Her eyes were dark and deep, and it was that more than the cool hush of her voice that arrested the younger woman. "Perhaps even more for you than for me, Urumi. Be mindful of what awaits us. Of what awaits you. The tribunate of the plebs has always found renown in the most hazardous of businesses, and I would be deeply grieved should anything happen to you. I would not have you harmed, yet I cannot throw protections all around you so often as I do with others, for your office necessitates that you be always surrounded and in contact with the rest as well as the rabble."

Urumi nodded, giving her an unusually subdued smile.

"I'm aware of it," said the younger woman. "Don't worry, I have my own counters."

Chikane nodded, looking away again.

"At least we shall be prepared," she said, her cool countenance easing slowly again into a relaxed expression. "And if our calculations are not mistaken, we have not long to wait. Shizuru should be receiving the news soon, and everything gathering momentum."

Her cousin grinned, seeming as though she would rub her hands together with glee.

"So it begins," Urumi said, her light blonde hair waving as she skipped forward. "Well then, things for our golden girl up north should be coming to a head!"

---

Things were indeed coming to a head. However, the golden girl was peacefully unaware of it at that precise moment, for other things were occupying her just then. At roughly the same time Urumi and her cousin were having their conversation in Hime, Shizuru was riding back to town with her companion, their destination being the local staging of Euripides' Elektra. They were coming back from their ride to the cliffs, from where Natsuki had openly admired the great silver-flecked sea the Himeans called theirs. She had smirked when she said the name they gave it, seeming to find it amusing that Shizuru's people presumed possession of that great expanse of green and blue water. When Shizuru explained that it was because most of the lands about it had been conquered or annexed by Hime, the Otomeian had replied that she knew that much. However, she went on, she also knew that Himeans were allegedly mediocre in their naval skills, as opposed to the excellence they displayed on land. She said she knew that pirates trawled the waters of Hime's sea, and posed a constant problem for them; so constant a problem, in fact, that she considered the sea's true ownership questionable.

Much though she wanted to dispute the girl's opinion, the Himean saw the justice of the argument; indeed, how many times had she herself thought that the pirates were a problem that needed to be addressed by her fellow senators? It was true that Hime was not a naval nation. Its victories were won inland, rarely ever over the water, and Shizuru felt it keenly to have Natsuki point it out to her. She made a vow to herself: she would eliminate the pirates too, in the future. But first, from where had Natsuki learned all this, she asked, given that the Otomeian had lived away from water her whole life? Unsurprisingly, she got the standard answer: I have read.

At present, however, that conversation had ended. Now they were talking about their destination, and Natsuki was giving her opinion on the text of the play-which, of course, she had also read. While Shizuru could not complain about this facet of the girl's personality, she could not help but think how glad she was that she could offer Natsuki more things to do than holing up alone in a library as the girl seemed to have done for much of her life.

"I like it," Natsuki was saying. "This story, I like better."

"Than the Aeschylus version?" Shizuru replied. "Why?"

"Aeschylus, sometimes, I think is too... pffff... fantastic," the younger woman returned, before mumbling the rest of her statement.

"Fantastic, I think."

"I see. Prefer the sober ones?" Shizuru said with a chuckle. "I suppose I like both equally, on their own merits. But I am glad that it happened to be this one we shall be seeing, if it is indeed the one that pleases you better."

"Yes." She grimaced thoughtfully. "But it is such a story, no? A sad one, especially for one who is not truly the protagonist of the tale."

"Which character do you sympathise with, then?"

"Elektra. Especially in Aeschylus, always I think, 'Poor Elektra.'"

"Why so?"

The green eyes were looking away: Natsuki was watching some children running down the street, rolling a ball with a stick.

"All she does," the Otomeian answered a touch absently. "She waits."

Shizuru felt her heart patter, though she knew not why. What a queer time for it to do so!

"I see," she said. "And how does Aeschylus' rendition of her lot compare to Euripides'?"

"Umm."

"Natsuki?" She looked to see what had arrested Natsuki's attention. It was a trio of Otomeian warriors, all wearing the dark uniform of the Lupine division. "Oh. Your troopers."

A second later, Natsuki turned to her.

"We are near," she said. "If you want, they will bring Niger and Albinus to the stables for us. The stables are far, and the theatre is near. If you want, I can tell them to do this thing."

Shizuru nodded, seeing that the trio had already noticed them and were facing their way.

"Yes, it would be better to walk," she decided. "As you wish."

They brought their horses near the warriors, who saluted them. Though they gave the Himean general a very low bow, it was on their captain that their eyes fixed, the three of them actually forming a row and standing to attention.

Natsuki looked down on them from her superior height atop Niger. She began to talk in Otomeian.

Interesting, Shizuru thought afterwards while dismounting Albinus and transferring his reins to one of the Lupine troopers. While the three other Otomeians regarded their superior officer with both admiration and a seeming easiness, Natsuki herself seemed aloof in addressing them. Or was that merely an exclusive evaluation, on her part? After all, Natsuki was far more open with her than with most others, and she supposed her own experiences with the girl's warmer side were colouring her perceptions now. The Natsuki she saw now was Natsuki as she had been in the first days of their acquaintance, it seemed: face immensely grave, words terse and tone unchanging.

Once the commission was over and the two of them walked on, leaving the Otomeians to take care of their horses, she chose to comment on it.

"There are occasions," Shizuru began. "When you do seem made of ice."

Natsuki glanced at her and said nothing.

"I meant it in a good way," Shizuru continued. "Please do not be offended."

The girl shook her head, chewing a corner of her lip.

"I-I am not offended. Sometimes it is useful," she answered the Himean. "It is useful in the army."

"Yes, of course. You project an awesome aura when you look that grave," Shizuru returned, whereupon her dark-haired companion peeked a smirk at her. "What?"

Natsuki shook her head and shrugged it away.

A gust suddenly blew past them, setting both women's cloaks soaring. The dark-haired girl let hers flap freely while Shizuru used an arm to hold one end of hers closer. A shriek from down the street: a bystander was chasing after her escaped scarf.

"Yet, you are so with nearly everyone, Natsuki," the general was saying to her girl as they continued walking. "I believe you seem cold to most people. Why, you were at first cold to me! Shall you gainsay me there?"

The girl took her time answering, but eventually acknowledged the truth of Shizuru's words-albeit very reluctantly. Shizuru smiled in triumph.

"It does beg the question, however," she followed playfully. "Why are you not so with me?"

Natsuki sent her one of those looks: the one that seemed to say, 'I cannot believe you are asking such a question.' Shizuru responded with a look of her own, which the girl well understood by now as meaning, 'You had best believe it as soon as possible, because I have every intention of repeating the question until such time as you find yourself convinced.' On occasions as these, they would often take to shooting each other these glances as often as they deemed necessary, like two archers trying to take down each other. The outcomes of these duels were more or less consistent, however, and that consistency was perpetuated now.

Shizuru won.

"Because you are you," Natsuki finally replied a little haltingly, before giving the older woman a sudden smile. "And you are very funny."

A laugh: "Am I?"

Abruptly, Natsuki's smile became sly.

"Also," the girl said. "You are my commander."

Shizuru blew humorously through her nose.

"As though I have ever pulled rank with you," she teased.

Natsuki blew through her nose too: "This noon, you asked me to call you 'General'."

"And I danced straight into that one," Shizuru chuckled, winking at her. "Shall you take revenge and ask me to call you 'Princess'?"

"You do already."

"Yet you never complain."

"I do not because, um, because-"

"So you do not like it when I call you 'Princess'?"

"No, I do not not like, but-"

"So it is bad for me to do that?"

"No, but-"

"What if I addressed you from now only ever as 'Princess'?"

"Then I will not call you 'General'!"

Both of them erupted into laughter at this, dropping their serious miens after Natsuki's droll retort. They walked on, occasionally clutching a mouth or belly in an effort to stop laughing, and many a bystander smiled as he watched them go their merry way.

Meanwhile, from the second storey of the building they were passing, a curtain moved back into place.

"Would you look at that," came the voice of the Ninth's chief primipilus, even then turning away from the view and back to the room. "The general and her girl. Happy as usual."

The dark woman on the bed smiled.

"Are they?" she asked, getting up. "Did they pass by just now?"

"It's not like I imagine the pair of them for fun." Nao motioned for her to lie back down. "Save your strength. They've gone already, Poll."

Pollonia perched on the edge of the bed again, looking disappointed.

"I wanted to see them," she complained.

"Bad luck, then. They're long-legged fillies. Fast walkers."

Pollonia shuffled on the bed, bringing the sheets over and around her brown shoulders. The sheets were a creamy colour, and in the dimness of the room, they stood against her skin in bright contrast, making all of her seem even darker.

Except for her eyes, Nao thought, meeting the light grey look head-on. She has the damndest eyes. Now, with them catching the shaded light passing through the curtain, the thin ring of grey around the dilated pupils was almost white.

"Anyway, get your head on straight and listen to me now," the centurion said in her sarcastic-but still beautiful, Pollonia thought-voice. "As I was saying, I've already arranged for the transfer in ownership. You should be getting word from your owner soon, though she won't tell you you're being sold to me. She won't know."

Her future slave lifted both eyebrows, unable to help grinning. Her teeth were big and white.

"How did you do that?" she asked.

If the centurion noticed that Pollonia did not bother asking why, there was no verbal acknowledgment of it.

"Legal tangling and puppet buyers," she told the other woman. "No one should be able to trace immediately that you're sold to me, not just yet. Just in case it ever becomes necessary, though, I've set aside documentation as proof that you're my property now, or from the conclusion of the business."

"Does anyone know it yet, aside from us?"

"No, but that can change."

"I see."

Pollonia let her back fall on the mattress, feeling the nice, springy bounce that produced. Her legs were still hanging off the bed and she let them go wide open, leaving her exposed to the centurion. She did not care and it was comfortable; besides, the thought of those lime green eyes on her was not unpleasant. Certainly she liked to look at the place between the centurion's legs too, particularly for its unusual, bright red thatch of hair. She had never seen hair like that on anyone else or any other sex. It was hair so vivid it looked afire, and she often took to pulling at the little strands of it when her head was resting on Nao's thigh or belly. If she could do that, so could the other woman look as she pleased. Besides, the woman would soon be her owner, would she not? Let her look as much as she liked: she had the right to it.

But these were remote justifications made in a small-voiced part of her mind. The prime reason she did not close her legs, really, was that she just did not care, did not have a single care in the world for those few short seconds. A person used to living her life always with myriad concerns and considerations hounding her heels, she permitted herself now a rare moment of respite. She permitted herself to feel this once, exclusively and overwhelmingly, the great and soaring joy of escape .

She breathed out slowly, closing her eyes and letting the relief wash over her.

"Thank the gods," she whispered with reverence. "I'm so happy."

She heard her soon-to-be-owner giggle.

"Right," was the answer. "You should be."

The gravity lurking beneath the casual words was too much, her reprieve at this recent development too much: Pollonia let loose a great laugh. She did it loudly and with pleasure, and the other woman knew what was happening and did not interrupt her. Nao understood why Pollonia was laughing.

She was a little surprised, however, when Pollonia revealed that she understood what was happening, too.

"I was worried for the longest time, you know," said the bronze-skinned woman. "If you were going to decide to kill me after all."

The strawberry-red eyebrows shot up as Nao stared. All she got was an eyeful of Pollonia's sex, however, as the other woman was still not getting up.

"You thought I was going to kill you?" she asked. She followed it with a question that was more curious than incredulous. "Why'd you think that?"

"I knew you might," came the other's reply. "You could. Even more now, if I do belong to you. You'd do it if you had to-what's the way you'd put it, Nao? Oh, should I still call you Nao or 'Domina', now that I'm going to be yours?"

"Call me as you've always called me. You were saying?"

"I was saying you'd do it if you had to cut costs, I think . I was worried because it was either that or you'd make good on your promise to buy me." She chuckled lightly. "Obviously, I was hoping for the second one instead of the first. And now look where I am!"

The red brows sank slowly back to their usual places at this shrewd evaluation, the light green eyes below them unblinking. And then the centurion grinned a naked grin, as full of sharpness and animal danger as a snarl from a beast of prey. But Pollonia did not see it because she had not yet moved from her position, and Nao did not mind even if the woman did see it.

"Well, Poll, I've made good on my promise," the centurion answered, still smiling nastily. "But what if I hadn't done it? You'd be dead."

That brought Pollonia up, her body bending to lift her from the waist. She propped herself on her hands by stretching long brown arms behind her and looked Nao in the eye.

"I know," she said. "But I'm not."

"Could've been."

"I know."

Nao shook her head.

"Gods, you took a fucking big risk, Woman," she said. "I'm just a little surprised you didn't have a backup plan if it looked like it wouldn't pay off. If you knew that was liable to happen, why'd you even risk it?"

Pollonia sighed, making it sound as though she thought there was no need for his conversation.

"I know it was a fucking big risk, Nao-I could be fucking dead right now." She smiled to herself. "But I'm not dead. And I'm getting out of here. I'm going to be a Himean's slave and I'm going to do what this Himean tells me to do, which won't be a problem because I'm sure it'll be more interesting than what I've always been doing, just fucking and fucking and goddamned fucking all the fuckers in this town who think I've no brain between my ears because all they care about is the hole between my legs. Dis take them, for some it's even both holes between my legs."

The other woman seemed willing to let her continue, so she went on.

"I decided it was better to take that risk with the Himean because, worst case was, with that Himean I'd be dead-and that wasn't any worse than being stuck forever in this shithole life," she shot out with a defiant air, snarling with growing passion. She was warming to her subject; it was clear now just how important this had been to her and how much she had staked on it. Nao found herself wondering how many nights of sleep the woman had lost over worrying about this. Had she wanted so badly to get out of here, then? What would have she done if she had never found this opportunity and had to stay on in the brothel? The common story for prostitutes in an establishment was that they were kept by the establishment until their juices ran dry, milked and rented out like cows for hire. Most of them were treated all right by the establishment's owners, generally: not great, but all right. Or Nao thought so. Had it been different for Pollonia?

But she seems to be fine, she thought, raking the other woman's form now with her gaze, the yellow flecks in her irises glinting razor-light. She seems fine. Her skin's unbroken, and I don't see any bruises on her, and I should know because I've been seeing her nearly every day. She's mostly fine.

Pollonia had been treated relatively well, she reassured herself. But Pollonia was still talking with her strange passion and Nao could suddenly hear an echo of her murdered mother's cries, and that was enough to make her wince. She closed her teeth on the inside of a cheek and felt the blood wash tinny on her tongue, the pain giving her a focus that let her listen only to Pollonia-only to Pollonia now, and no longer to the echoes of a long-dead past.

Listen to Pollonia.

"So I took the gamble because the possible loss was better than what I would've had if I didn't," Pollonia was saying. "Because that's what would've happened, most likely, if I didn't take the risk with that Himean that could kill me. Maybe I even preferred her killing me over just staying in this stink-awful trap. I could've died. I might've died. Nao, when you're in the sort of place I am, there aren't any risks you consider too high. At least, if I did lose the gamble and get killed, it'd be by a hand of my own choosing, was what I thought."

She stopped to stare Nao deeply in the eye, looking wild with joy at her triumphant wager. The centurion stared back, fascinated by the woman's daring.

"So it was a fucking big risk, fine," Pollonia finished. "Maybe for you it was the biggest sort of risk. Not for me. Either way, though, this is what counts: it fucking. Paid. Off."

She made a point of keeping her stare on Nao's as she said the final words, and was a little surprised when the lime green eyes snapped shut after her peroration. A reversal of roles took place as something that had happened earlier was repeated: only, this time, it was the redhead's mouth that opened and belched, to Pollonia's astonishment, a huge and ringing laugh.

Pollonia watched as Nao continued to cackle, feeling slightly unsure of herself again. Why was she laughing? Perhaps, she thought, perhaps I shouldn't have said that? Perhaps Nao did not like it, would decide to kill her after that cocky disclosure she had been careless enough to do? But Nao was not like that; there was no logical reason for her to kill Pollonia over such a thing. And yet, here she was laughing, and Pollonia did not know what it could mean. Oh, better she should have kept her mouth shut and safe!

For all that uncertainty, however, Pollonia was a naturally brave person-as indeed Nao had begun to fully appreciate. After the first peal of mirth, each successive chortle merely served to steel her nerves. Thus, when Nao opened her eyes and found enough composure to speak to her again, all she saw was Poll being Poll: clear-eyed and quiet and attentive as usual.

Nao smiled at that.

"I've bought a cheeky slave, looks like," she said, and waved a hand to fan herself. Her face was still red from her bout of laughter. "Bloody cheeky, and a heavy gambler, at that. Do you gamble much, Poll?"

Pollonia had a ready answer: "When the stakes don't involve my life on the line, not really."

This time, both of them smiled at each other.

"Only in it for the big pots, eh?" Nao replied, crossing her legs and jiggling the foot that this act left dangling in mid-air. "Still, I want you to answer something for me, and you'd better answer me honestly, because I'll know if you're lying."

"Fine."

"That you even took the gamble means you thought there was a chance of actually winning. What made you think I'd possibly keep my side of the bargain instead of disposing of you afterwards?"

"I don't know."

Nao gave her a terribly amused grimace.

"Well, shit," she said. "What do you mean you don't know?"

"Just that," Pollonia replied with a helpless shrug. "It means the same as it always does. I don't know. I just thought: Hey, maybe. Or maybe it's better to say I felt that." She winced, knowing that did not sound at all convincing. "Or something like that, Nao. I don't know. Maybe I was just desperate enough to think it? You get plenty desperate when something like that comes along, you know."

Unexpectedly, the centurion gave her an affable smile.

"No, I get it," she told Pollonia. "It's either of two things: luck or instinct. Either thing is useful Poll, and if you've got at least one of them, like I think you do, then I think I know what to do with you."

That caught the other woman's attention, and a quiver seemed to run up her body as she stiffened, staring intently at her new master.

"What?" she asked with deep excitement. "What are you going to do with me? Will I stay on with you, after all?"

A few seconds after dropping the final question, she seemed to remember that there was another alternative-which she had heretofore thought just as preferable. Her own forgetfulness of it was indication enough to both of them of what she wanted, however, and it intrigued Nao as much as it surprised her.

"Or am I going to be sent to Hime?" she followed, naming the other now-slightly-less-attractive option. Inside, she was asking herself why that was so. Was she reluctant to leave this place, after all? If so, it's surely reasonable. Yet that reason rang hollow, for another voice kept up a building susurrus in her head: Nao, it's Nao, now it's Nao.

The woman in front of her waved a finger before putting it to her lips, which curved up mysteriously.

"We'll see," she began, before being interrupted by a knock on the door. Both of them looked at it and it was Pollonia who got up first. Nao intercepted quickly when a familiar voice sounded her name, however. She told Pollonia she would take care of it. Instead, she said, Pollonia should get dressed; Nao herself was already in her tunic.

The centurion opened the door an inch and peeked out. After a few mumbled words with the person there, she told Pollonia to finish dressing while waiting for her to come back. Pollonia agreed and watched as the redhead left the room.

And exploded back into it only moments later.

"What's wrong?" the brunette asked, watching Nao thunder all over the room and pick up her scattered effects. She could see those thin red brows slanted close together, however, and the tightness of Nao's mouth arrested her. Something was happening, she understood, but exactly what it was she did not know. It must be bad-horrible, even - because Nao was not talking, not even spewing invectives like a sodden drunkard picking bones with a vengeance. Nao was silent. It was that, more than anything, that frightened her.

She stood at the side of the bed, holding her arms to herself in an effort to minimise the space she occupied, and watched the redhead helplessly. What was wrong with her future master?

After a few terse seconds, she found her voice above the din of Nao's stomping.

"Are you fine?" she asked very quietly. "Nao?"

The soft words seemed to make Nao remember she was there. The sharp eyes turned her way, and had Pollonia been made of slightly lesser mettle, she would have flinched.

Instead, she blinked.

"Find my boots," the centurion ordered, still scowling dreadfully but keeping her voice low. She sat on the stool she had been occupying earlier, beside the window. "Help me put them on."

Pollonia complied, quickly locating and bringing the footwear over.

Once she had knelt and begun to slip one over Nao's foot, the centurion threw her head back and suddenly let loose that thing Pollonia had been expecting.

" Fellatores! " she howled, making the other woman's fingers pause.

She breathed heavily after this, as though something about that had not released but only exhausted her. Pollonia dared to look up, concerned almost to distraction, and looked straight into Nao's troubled face.

"What's wrong?" she asked.

Her hands continued lacing up the high boots as Nao glowered.

"Trouble," said the centurion, chewing furiously on a lip. "A shitload of trouble. Shit!"

Pollonia nodded, wondering if she could ask about the trouble or simply let the centurion keep discharging her oaths. She did not have long to wonder, however, as Nao herself began to tell her.

"It'll be all over town soon, Poll," she said in a growling voice. "Hey. You remember that thing I told you? About the general being among the candidates for our elections back home?"

Pollonia nodded eagerly, knowing any hesitation might well displace that terrible anger towards her.

"For praetor, I think?" she ventured.

Nao nodded in a swift jerk.

"Guess what happened," she snapped. "Hurry up."

Pollonia slipped the other boot on the remaining foot.

"She won?" she tried, hoping it would be the right answer. Nao probably preferred to hear right answers when she was like this. Then again, how would she know? She had never seen Nao like this.

"Damned right she won," Nao muttered, easing Pollonia's worry about her response. "Oh, those cunni, I'll bet they did this. I'll bet this is what they wanted all along."

"Er..." Pollonia tried to keep her fingers working steadily as she put the question. "Why is her winning a bad thing?"

This time, all she got was silence. Even the troubled breaths ceased, and she thought, suddenly, that silence could be a violent thing sometimes. She held her own breath, steeled herself as far as she knew how, and summoned every daring fibre in her body to risk looking at Nao again.

The glare she found on Nao's face forced anything she might have said all the way down her gullet.

"Oh, it's a bad thing, all right," Nao told her angrily, something in her voice registering like rusted nails dragging on a marble floor. "It's a bad thing because our goddamned perfect general had to do everything too well again. It's a bad thing because she just had to come in at the top of the poll. That's plenty bad, Pollonia. It's bad because it means she's been elected praetor urbanus. And that means she's got to go home."

Chapter 39

Illustrations:

Please remove the spaces. Once again, we have Mlle. Iris Enigma to thank for this piece (and we do indeed thank her). Replace the Y's with W's, the ZZZ with COM, and remove the spaces after the full stops.

YYY. deviantart. ZZZ/iris-enigma89/art/Inter-Nos-Shizuki-s-Haven-128740217

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Antakaios (Gk.) - Sturgeon, specifically a stellate sturgeon.
2. Manica (L.) - Arm-greave or protector.

---

Inter Nos

par ethnewinter

---

"You don't mean that, Chie? It can't-I mean-you didn't even know about it, for Juno's sake! Do you really mean that?"

A telling silence met these words. The first speaker, frustrated by this mute response, vented her anger in a loud snarl.

"Beggin' your pardon here, General," she said with a tip of the head to her commander. "Don't mean to make such a scene, really! But I'm just waiting for one of these bloody politicians-no offence intended to you-to explain this to me, because I'm just a dumb commoner who can't seem to see her way through this with common sense!"

The occupants of the room looked at the centurion, whose flame-like hair waved wildly as her roaming glower tried to prod some of them to answer her, at least. It was the one woman she was not taking to task who actually did reply, though, and with a gentle voice that yet brooked no argument.

"Nao-han," the woman said. "Let us be calm."

It was a command and Nao took it. The centurion shut her eyes in response, obviously trying to wrest whatever cool she could from a reservoir that had been draining all evening. Right now, she felt as though she was running on empty as far as that virtue was concerned. And it did not seem about to rain patience any time soon, as far as she could see!

She was in Shizuru's quarters within the gubernatorial residence, in a private meeting with a few select persons of the general's own request. They had all participated in a larger conference just hours earlier, which had been held at a different venue. That earlier meeting had been part of the reason for the deterioration of her patience, for it had taken a good deal out of her to stand silent while their commander announced to them that wretched news: that she, Shizuru Fujino, had been elected urban praetor and was consequently due back in Hime. That she had to go home .

The centurion took the inside of her cheek between her teeth, trying very hard not to bite all the way through the soft flesh. Going home already? Without having finished their objective? Wretched news indeed! For their situation had shades of complication to it that muddled the issue of who would be returning to Hime and who would stay.

She released the tissue of her mouth and took to grinding her teeth. The act produced a low and terrible sound, one that her soldiers had learned to fear by now. The common saying (when the centurion was not present to hear it) was that she ground her teeth first, then ground your bones afterwards. And given that she was the sort of person to whom one attributed such dark threats in a literal and not literary fashion, no one ever wanted to hear her grinding her teeth.

It's not that I don't want to see Hime, the tooth-grinder was thinking, frowning direly at the handsomely-decorated floor of her general's quarters. Who would not miss their home after months in a land this chilled and this wind-blasted? Who would not long for the decent roads of Hime, which were generally kept smooth and easy to traverse, as opposed to the ice-crept walks here? It had been months since she had seen a true Himean tavern too, its latticed walls wreathed with clambering vines instead of the wretched frost that infested these northern lands; months since she had walked the warmly shadowed alleys of Hime instead of the bitterly dark ways of this place. No question about it: a part of her yearned now and had yearned, ever since arriving here, for Hime. For home.

But-and here was the rub-was she even going to go home?

The doubt arose from a bureaucratic point, one that had been discussed in the earlier staff meeting: the person to receive the summons had been their commander alone. Only she was obliged to return by virtue of her election as the chief praetor of the city for the new year. Her soldiers' fates, by comparison, were still floating. The commission that sent her on this campaign, it would be argued, was not actually done yet. Which meant she would have to be replaced in her command.

When commanders were recalled from and replaced on their missions, the rest of the pack had to face the possibility of staying. A good number of the superior officers stayed on too if they and the replacement turned out to be willing to make the arrangements. But, as for Nao... she was only a soldier. Granted, she was an invaluable commanding officer of the soldiers, but still essentially and indubitably a soldier: not someone of reasonable clout or distinguished lineage; not someone with the right to decide for herself when her service would be over. Much as it annoyed her, it had always been the fate of commoners to have such matters decided for them by others higher up the social ladder.

Applied to the situation, this meant that the soldiers would have no choice but to stay and continue their service under the replacement if their superiors decided it. The commander herself wanted it to be so, as she harboured fears of sudden incursions by the Mentulaeans while she was away serving her term in Hime. Hence, there was every likelihood that Nao would be made to stay. In effect, she and her soldiers would soon find themselves under the command of another general.

It was this Nao found insupportable. She roared to herself that she would not have it, ready to belch this mental protest aloud if necessary to get her message to the woman in front of her. Again the grinding teeth, the revolt against the notion. The very thought of soldiering for another general was odious to her, and her general should know it: the patrician had been one of the legates for the last campaign Nao had taken under a different commander, after all. She had even been the one to prevent Nao from nearly killing the man due to his incompetence. Nao had seen enough of dimwitted and mediocre commanders to be fed up; the current campaign's leader was the gross exception who did not tempt her into the capital crime of mutiny. The woman knew that-she just had to!

It was not just her reluctance to soldier for another. There was, for instance, such a thing as investment . Nao believed in what they-under the guidance of their true and only commander-were doing here. She shared the sense of urgency in their true mission: she could see how important it was to Hime's continued superiority that they rein in the Mentulaeen expansion before the wretches reached Fuuka's outlying boundaries in the north. They had been just about to do that. But now? Now changes would have to take place. Bad changes. Changes about which, she nonetheless realised, none of them could do a thing.

And that was what she tried to remember. Damn sure you're upset, she reminded herself, but the others are too. Her eyes went instinctively to their general. She was the most upset one there, really, for all that most people would never have seen it. Nao did, but even so, she could not help wishing that Shizuru would show it on her face-as did most other people. But that would make her less of whatever she was that kept Nao following only her lead and no one else's, would it not?

"Right," she uttered after taking a moment to breathe. "Pardon me again, General. I'm sorry about that."

Shizuru surfaced from her isolation to give her centurion and occasional spymaster a smile.

"I just want to know what's going to happen, is all," Nao heaved. "What's going to happen to all of us, I mean."

"I'm afraid it's clear enough, much though I hate to admit it." The answer came from another of the guests of this exclusive conference, the senior legate. "Shizuru-san has to go home, and the same probably goes for some of the legates. As for the soldiers..."

Nao glared at her friend.

"Go on," she said. "What about the soldiers, Chie?"

Chie looked unhappy.

"Nao," she sighed, shaking her head. "I guess it can't be helped."

Out came the fangs again: Nao's eyes flashed with anger.

"Don't look at me like that-I'm not offering sacrifices of thanks for it, either!" Chie warned.

The centurion raised an eyebrow.

"Well, shit," she said, so frustrated that she was actually driven into the opposite direction and into smiling-though it was a rather nasty smile that she managed. "Shi-eeet . "

"My thoughts exactly," the senior legate said wryly, before suddenly producing an uncharacteristically malicious smile. "The only consolation I'll have is that when we get back to Hime, we can convey our thoughts in a more concrete way to everyone at the back of this mess."

Nao growled in agreement, avoiding Shizuru's eyes-as indeed everyone else was suddenly doing. After all, it had been her cousin who was most prominently responsible for the aforementioned mess.

And Chie seemed all of a sudden to remember it.

"Armitage and her posse, I'll wager," she qualified swiftly, darting a glance to their commander. Shizuru did not acknowledge her.

"There're more people behind this than meets the eye. Or gets to the ear."

Naο agreed: " Cunni must've been right thick in it, to get this. They'll have spent a pretty penny on bribes to guarantee this result!"

"Actually, I have a feeling they didn't spend as much as you'd imagine," came another voice, oddly serene and thoughtful considering the agitation of the other speakers in the room. "Given the news of the letters I have been receiving, I believe Shizuru-san has gained even more popularity back home of late. Certainly the tales of her exploits have been trumpeted this entire year, not only in the Curia but also in the Forum and to every sidewalk-vendor screaming news to his fellows down the street."

The others looked at the youngest of Shizuru's legates as she smiled coldly at her goblet.

"I also imagine it adds to it that there are no other interesting military ventures on Hime's plate," she continued casually. "Definitely none as successful as ours, anyway, and with as popular a commander as we have. The military woman of the moment in Hime, I think, is none other than Shizuru-san."

Her eyes met red ones as Shizuru herself looked her way. Suou met the gaze equably.

"If any were so ignorant as to be unaware of her before, they surely aren't now," she continued. "The Battle at Argentum was only months ago and has been followed by other exploits of interest: the solo parley with the King of the Mentulaeans-the annihilation of the long-standing forest bandits-the small but extraordinary battle to recapture a menagerie of giant and slaving cats. Tales from a distant world, frigid and freezing, and fantastically fabulous."

She smiled her laid-back, slightly calculating smile again as she went on: "Fables, you know, capture a child's interest. All the more when they're set down by an author as gifted as you, Chie-san. You have a natural touch for epic composition, you know: surely it's not escaped you that your accounts of our work have been selling out at bookstores back home? Often repackaged under titles such as 'The Fujino Campaign: Adventures in the Northlands'. I even have correspondents who've waxed lyrical with praise over them."

The senior legate blinked.

It's no wonder Shizuru-san came out at the top of the poll. See, most persons, voting Himeans of the upper classes included, are still children." She smiled and showed her decidedly upper class teeth to them. "All things considered, their timing was perfect."

The primipilus frowned at this, too irritated to admire their foes' supposed temporal precision.

"I don't think we should be singing Hooray's for them right now, Legate," she snapped harshly-something most would not even imagine doing if faced with one such as the woman she was addressing. The young patrician was unfazed by her severity, however, and merely nodded before sending a lazy wink to Shizuru, for whom the gesture seemed to barely register. Indeed, the commander herself had thus far let her friends do all the talking. And this apparent muteness had not passed notice among the others, even if it had passed comment. Shizuru had spoken very little after her announcement to the other officers and her request for this small group to stay, adding only a noncommittal word here and a silent nod there. To most onlookers, she would have appeared the calmest of everyone: face nearly void of expression, body still and unshaken. However, as Nao had observed earlier, this was often her demeanour when most upset. All the people with her at the present time had known her long enough to either suspect or know it.

Perhaps, each one also suspected, that was precisely why she had asked them in particular to stay.

They let her have her silence and went on with their discussion. Meanwhile, the only other entirely quiet person in the room never moved her gaze from the centre of turmoil. Her deep green eyes communicated a plea so strong it was almost pathetic to watch: for Shizuru to be all right, to please be all right. However, Shizuru did not see her. As was true of most other things in that room, that night.

The Himean general was too busy thinking to notice much of anything. For one of the rare times in her life, she felt that she had lost. It was true that it might have been a mere battle, figuratively speaking, and not the entire war; all the same, it remained a loss. And Shizuru Fujino never lost: not with her battles and most especially not with her wars. That was because she knew every battle mattered, because the secret behind her genius was her knowledge that each small blow landed on an enemy was what felled him, and not actually the last, seemingly grandest one. Every battle you won brought you a step closer to winning the war. That was why the lowest she ever permitted herself was a draw.

So much for never losing. Now she was running through the awful wastes where she believed her over-confidence had finally led. Unforeseen treachery! What was happening? How had it happened? How could she have let it happen? That was the crux of the matter, surely: she should have seen it before it happened. She should have been able to perceive it coming, and thus prevented it before it could arrive. But she had not. How in all the hells could she have not?

Her discomfort with herself manifested only in a shift of her crossed legs, which no one perceived under the table.

Tomoe, she thought lividly, wishing she could crunch the woman into powder as easily as she crunched the name between her teeth. Tomoe-her cousin-her own traitorous trap. Tomoe had done this to her.

Whatever small regard Shizuru might have previously held for that woman was now incinerated, burnt in the flames of betrayal. Her friends were right: Tomoe would have had to be in league with one of her foes to do this, a foe who surely knew that her supposed isolation in the North was actually better rather than worse for her career, given the opportunities it provided for her reputation's enhancement. A smart foe, evidently, and a rich one too, Suou's remarks on the easy funding of this petty plot notwithstanding. Even if she was as popular in Hime as Suou claimed-and she knew without arrogance that Suou spoke true-such a scheme would still have required a good deal of bribery, not least because its makers would have wanted to be certain of the results.

She had no choice but to return to the city, whether she would challenge the election or accept it meekly. She had to return unless she wanted to be held in contempt of the laws she had respected and held for so long, and which she knew she would continue to respect and hold, if her dignitas had anything to do with it. Oh, yes, dignitas had everything to do with it!

If she returned, she would be able to contest the results in the proper courts and methods. No one could say she had been childish in stubbornly refusing to honour the Senate's summons just to make an infantile-if-valid point. Especially when she could more easily and effectively make said point in the flesh, before the Senate and People themselves! Tomoe knew her well, to have worked it out so perfectly. She would have to show Tomoe the price of having played this game too well.

The feeling of having failed herself and failing to see this little game's end rankled her pride even more than the betrayal. She had not cared for Tomoe enough to prompt expectations of great loyalty, after all. But that aside, she now had to think beyond the little game, and of what was really holding her back. Even with the prestige the position of praetor urbanus brought, she had no desire to return to Hime just yet. Why would she? Her plans had already solidified this far, her commitment to this venture concretised so much that she had only been weeks from the first foray. Every fibre of her was set to go to war, every horned patch of skin on her palms hardened and itching to take a weapon and swing it at the empire in the west. All those preparations, now to go to waste. Preparations that were not only of the body or the mind, but also of the heart. She had set her heart on staying here for a few years more. She supposed that may even have been what hurt most of all.

There was Natsuki.

Dear Natsuki, she invoked, finally turning her eyes to the Otomeian girl's face. The earnest look of concern on the young woman's countenance had mellowed, but there was still enough there to hurt her chest. How kind the girl was! How could one possibly go without that sort of concern after having lived with it every hour for months? It was selfish, she knew, but the possible selfishness of it did not make it any more possible a deprivation. She had no intention of condoning that deprivation. But how to explain to the girl that much?

There was another matter being forced on her all too suddenly!

It was decided-had been decided, prior to this-that she would do all she could to keep Natsuki by her side. All the same, Shizuru could not help but be anxious over the thought of separating the girl from her own home due to selfish desire. How could she possibly explain that to Natsuki without making it seem so egocentric?

How can I, Child, she asked the girl with her eyes, taking a chance now that Natsuki had dropped her gaze to the floor. How do I go about this with you? This is why you frighten me, and why I call you 'Child' even when I know you are also already a woman.

She could not help but feel it sometimes: that Natsuki was the only person in the world who could frighten her, who could crack her shell with that wide and brutally honest look, which was so like the impenitently sincere attention of children. Children were vicious in that way: they had no sense of subtlety in their glances; they bored straight and reckless into you. Was that why she had never liked children, even when she had been a child herself? But then, she had never been much of a child, was the truth of it.

If any of that was true, then it made even more ironic what she felt now. After all, Natsuki had the truest embodiment of that innocent look she so feared, had the most stabbing sincerity in her eyes that Shizuru had long disliked. Yet Shizuru could not dislike the girl. She could not possibly dislike her.

But by god, did she ever dislike being forced into this situation!

Nevertheless, I am already in it, she thought resignedly, knowing she would have to face those emerald irises soon and speak her request-her selfish desire-to them.

If I tell you this, Natsuki, if I tell you this now in such a way, perhaps, or another, I cannot help but be afraid of it. I am afraid of what look you might give me.

She made a small movement with her head, needed to lick her lips to mask the sigh that nearly slipped out. She needed to find out the answer to her private query soon, for it was clear she was operating on borrowed time. The advance letter from her friend-currently the senior consul; Traditionalists, take that!-had warned that an official summons from Senate would soon follow. It would be either accompanied or followed closely by a formal deputation bearing her replacement, whoever that poor fool would be. It would have to be a fool, as everyone knew without illusion that few could claim to be a "replacement" for Shizuru Fujino.

She sneered inwardly, knowing herself well enough to have confidence in that common belief too. If only she knew the incompetents back home would choose someone decent for once! She would hate to have added work on her plate when she did return to these regions. But she had the feeling she was hoping for too much. The Senate had little idea of just how fragile the situation here could be and already was. They would most likely settle upon some other conceited mediocrity with the ancestry but not the skills for this mission. Calling it a mere fortification mission indeed!

A pestilence on them all, conceited mediocrities that they are!

Upon her replacement's arrival, she presumed she would be tasked to leave for Hime immediately. There was no use trying to pretend she could do otherwise, her racing-but-still-clear mind told her.

Well then: she needed to get as much as she could in order. What to do with the army, which was really her army, made up of her veterans for the most part? What to do with her legates, at least half of whom would most likely be going back with her? What to do with the greater plan, the one to whip the Mentulaeans into submission? And what to do with Natsuki, who would be uprooted from her home with violent speed if all went as she was now planning, if she would indeed have to make all these changes so abruptly?

Ye gods, she thought, sorely tempted to massage her throbbing temples. I need another drink.

She picked up the jug from the table and poured wine into her brass cup. She did it silently and with her typical fluidity; even so, it was apparent that everyone was conscious of her at that moment, and waiting tensely for her to do more than what she did, which was to lift the cup and drain it in mere seconds.

She set the cup back down, and looked at the people watching her.

"Very well," she said, and something in her voice elicited a common shiver. She had not whispered the words nor spat them, yet there was something in there that slid hard and scaly into each ear, slithering around their brains. How could a woman sound so perfectly civil and calm, they wondered, yet manage to inject so much venom into the substratum of the notes?

"It is clear there is much to discuss. It is clear too that there is nothing our talking here can do about the recent development that is the cause of all this discussion. I am not saying we have exhausted the topic, but I do believe we have exhausted ourselves tonight."

She smiled at them.

"It is late," she said. "I thank you for staying with me to this hour. Little though you may know it, your presence has done wonders for my peace of mind, and I look forward to continuing our talks more rationally-and, I hope, fruitfully-tomorrow morning. I feel what we all need now is simply a good night's respite."

Her senior legate smiled as well. As for the three others in the room, their expressions changed little: Nao continued to look irate; Natsuki, quietly concerned; and Suou, languid as ever.

Everyone rose to stand.

"Then we'll see you first thing in the morning," Chie told Shizuru, as she ushered them to the door. "I'll be up early, so just ask for me among the staff. I'll let them know wherever I am."

"Thank you, I shall," Shizuru said. "And thank you again for tonight."

"Not at all-this is a shock for all of us, anyway."

"Indeed. Thank you too, Nao-han."

The centurion nodded: "I'll be up early tomorrow too, General."

"Please do not worry overmuch." She spared a faint smile for her loyal centurion. "If push comes to shove, I shall ensure you are not shoved into a duty not of your desire."

Yellow-sharp green eyes stared into glittering red ones and, a moment later, glittered too in satisfaction.

"That's a relief," Nao said simply in an exhale. "It's not that I'm being difficult, General. It's just... you understand."

"I do," Shizuru replied, smiling faintly as they filed out through the doorway. She realised she was missing one in the exit, however, and turned to find the remaining person lifting an eyebrow at her. "Suou-han?"

An unhurried smile from the fair young woman.

"I'm sorry, but mind if I impose just a tad longer?" Suou enquired, looking not the least bit apologetic. Shizuru understood what that meant, and shut the door quietly.

"Please," she replied, holding a hand towards one of the vacant chairs. "It would be a pleasure."

Suou met her look as they both sat again. Shizuru was conscious of Natsuki doing the same, on her stool from the far wall and near the bed.

The other patrician spoke first: "I've my own letter."

"I see."

"Hardly a surprise."

"Yes," Shizuru answered. "Hardly one."

Having said this, she took a vaguely tired breath, tapping a finger idly on one knee under the table. The atypically fidgety action was noted only by Natsuki, who remained in her corner and said nothing—save through her eyes.

"I suppose your letter consists of persuading me to do what your sister has suggested?" Shizuru volunteered, stilling her itchy fingers at the glimpse of her girl's disquiet.

Suou answered with a headshake.

"Do you mean to say I even have to persuade you?" Suou asked rhetorically as Shizuru copied her earlier motion: both of them knew there was no other logical choice, of course, other than to do as the elder Himemiya had recommended. She had to go home.

"My letter is most likely a mere overview of yours, with a few additional words here and there," Suou went on, flicking her longish blonde fringe away from her eyes. "I see no reason to strengthen my sister's propositions to you, as I'm sure she put them cleanly enough. She has a talent for that."

"Among other things."

"I do have a proposition of my own, which is the main reason I'm still here."

Shizuru eyed her with vague curiosity; she was still occupied with thoughts of everything she needed to put in order.

"A proposition?" she probed in a soft voice. "Is it one entirely your own, Suou-chan?"

"Primarily rather than entirely. I admit Chikane did put forward the option in her letter. Nonetheless, she also advised as much against it as for it, so the decision is truly mine, or so I like to think."

"I see."

Suou smiled before coming out with it.

"I shall be staying," she said.

The distracted red eyes focused, then blinked. For that alone, Suou was satisfied.

"Do you mean as a regular citizen?" Shizuru asked her now. "Or..."

"As a legate to the one who shall be replacing you, yes," Suou replied. "So I am actually here to ask for a transfer of duties from you."

This time, Shizuru did not blink but merely stared.

"You want to act in a legal capacity for my replacement?" she clarified.

"Yes."

"Could it be you know who my replacement is, Suou-chan?"

"No more than you do," Suou lied easily, her chilly eyes reflecting only the fabled cool of her clan. The only person to whom some alarm might have registered was her sister, and Shizuru-while already that in one way-was nevertheless still not her sister. Suou built on the deception effortlessly: "For all we know, it could be holy Jupiter himself."

Shizuru smiled very weakly. Suou knew she might not be smiling when she found out who her replacement would most likely be. Suou had smiled herself upon learning it from her sister's letter. But it had been the sort of smile that reeked of vinegar.

You rat, Chikane, she thought, with an inward sigh at her sister's nonetheless understandable caution. It was this that had put her in the delicate position of knowing something Shizuru did not, of the awareness of a probability Shizuru considered not. Of course it was still only a probability, as Chikane had informed her, but given the cautious way Chikane was handling the information, it probably meant that this particular probability had very good chances of coming true.

And what did that mean for Shizuru? Bad news, she guessed. Chikane had only had an inkling when she drew the inference from what facts were available to her, but Suou had the truth valid and verified, being privy to a closer familiarity with the facts than her sister: Shizuru would definitely not like the person who might just be her replacement.

But she doesn't need to know that yet, she thought to herself. Their friend was dealing with more than enough tonight and needed to get herself in order first before Suou put that additional information on her doorstep. Chikane was right, after all: it was still only a possibility

. There was no need to put even more grief on their friend's already strained shoulders until the possibility materialised. Or, at least, before Shizuru had recovered enough from the latest trouble given her. And, capable as Shizuru might be, even she needed to recover.

Added to this was that Suou had a feeling the red-eyed woman had very delicate matters to settle first; she also felt that Shizuru needed all her faculties dedicated to that particular set of tasks.

So forgive me for this, Shizuru-san, she told the other woman, but only in her mind. I shall withhold the information for now. Only for now. After you've made the most important arrangements, then perhaps we shall see.

"A pity you do not know," Shizuru was saying to her with tired expression. "I worry, you see."

"Naturally," Suou answered. "I'm sorry I can't offer anything more to the information pool."

"No, it cannot be helped if you do not know."

"No, it can't," Suou thought, masking the guilt with a light smile. "But I'm asking, all the same, and I'm confident of being accepted under their aegis, all the same."

And Shizuru knew that it was no conceit. Suou's familial clout was strong enough to warrant her acceptance into any position she sought by recommendation.

No one would have the gall to turn down one of her brood, Shizuru thought. They would have to be stupid to do so, at any rate, given that all of the brood thus far has been so marvellously capable. But for Suou-chan to ask this-to ask to do duties under another commander and a yet unknown one, at that-and for such a hazardous mission as this one? Why, I never thought she would do it!

She tried to keep the negativity from clouding her face. If there was one of her legates aside from Chie whom she had been certain of leaving with her out of pure loyalty, it had been Suou.

"An explanation is required, I see," Suou said a trifle deviously.

Shizuru shook her head.

"No," she answered. "I would hate for you to feel that all your decisions need to be explained to me, Suou-chan."

"That's sweet of you, but I would beg to differ. For one thing, you are my senior officer."

"Soon, no longer."

"Officially, yes. Actually, no."

The crimson eyes glinted. Yes, Suou thought with humour. Yes, you silly nut. Now you see.

"Why, Suou-chan," Shizuru said, smiling a little. "Have you been taking lessons from Nao-han?"

"Every now and then," Suou said with a furtive smile of her own.

"Now that that's established and you can stop doubting my intentions out of your usual over-courteous fear of being presumptuous..." She paused to grin as Shizuru gave a low chuckle: she had hit the mark. "I suppose I can continue. I said that was one thing."

"Indeed you did. There is another?"

"For another, might I remind you that we have known each other since childhood. That long a friendship merits some explanations of action, at the very least."

She was just a little surprised when Shizuru's eyes turned dark again.

"Pardon me for saying I am uncertain of that these days," the other patrician replied. "There are those who seem not to hold to the same theory."

What? From where was that?

Then Suou caught the answer in a flash: Tomoe, of course. Shizuru was talking about Tomoe. That meddling little bitch! That cousin of Shizuru's had done more damage than she knew, Suou saw. She had wrecked Shizuru's faith in her, precious little as it may have been. This had planted a small seed of rot in Shizuru's confidence in those close enough to her to be considered family. Suou suddenly thought in a flash of insight that she saw that seed working away at those red eyes: a dark infection, bloody and full of bile. A putrefaction of sorts. Chikane, Shizuru's dearest friend, would say it should not be allowed to happen.

She herself would say it could not be allowed to happen.

"I pardon you for that," she told Shizuru now. "It's understandable after your cousin's petty treachery. But I have to admit I won't pardon you if you apply the same uncertainties to me. I have never wronged you in such a way and never shall. And I have long held your interests so dear to mine and my sister's that I hardly even see the separation of our fortunes. You are my other sister, Shizuru-san, I always thought that was clear. You injure me if you apply your doubts to even me now."

Shizuru's face slipped into apology at the rebuke.

"Of course, Suou-chan," she said quickly, smoothly. "Excuse me if it sounded like that. I never even thought of it."

No, you didn't, Suou answered in her mind. But a little more time, a few more years bearing that doubt of others without it being checked, and you might.

She truly could not allow that to happen. A Shizuru that distrustful was not only a tragedy for her and her sister, but also-and she was cool-headed enough to admit this-a danger to everyone else. Their dearest friend was too strong, too limitless at heart: endow her with limitless distrust and you would be making a monster.

"That makes me happy," she said now. "May I go on with my explanation, Shizuru-san, now that that much has been cleared?"

Shizuru was acquiescent, her hands doing a graceful welcoming movement. Suou watched them curl through the air and, because the palms were out, display the many calluses on the white skin. She thought it was a beautiful irony that someone could look so elegant and yet have hands so scarred by work and war. Her own hands, sword-worn as they also were, did not yet have as much character. Suddenly she wondered how many persons Shizuru had killed with those long fingers of hers. Hundreds? Thousands, even?

"I am your eager auditor," Shizuru was saying. "Please continue, Suou-chan."

The clear blue eyes, so light they were nearly white, twinkled merrily in response.

"If I remain, I shall be in a most useful position for you and my sister," Suou said. "After all, I dare to think my loyalty to our cause unquestioned, insofar as my loyalty to you and my sister is that. I believe some of the other legates may be remaining as well, but I'm going to state something here at the risk of being arrogant: no other legate that can or shall be willing to remain can possibly be as worth your money as I am. Feel free to rebut me if you believe you have ample reason, but I doubt you do, hmm?"

Shizuru's eyes were twinkling too.

"Perhaps Harada-san-or even Nao, for all that she's merely a centurion-could give me competition in that regard," Suou continued with a smirk. "But! First of all, they do not have my name and my family's clout. I daresay few could claim equivalence there, especially with you yourself out of the picture. And that already gives me a distinct advantage, not so?"

"True."

"Furthermore, you know as well as I do that the two I mentioned would not of their own volition ask to stay on under another commander. Chie-san might stay if you actually ask her, but you would never do that. As for Nao, she as much as declared earlier that she wouldn't even be willing to put up with any other general-unless it were my sister, maybe, and even then only because you would vouch for Chikane and Chikane already has a reputation for being an excellent as well as humane commander too. Otherwise, Nao would be liable to commit several petty mutinies, and where would our favourite centurion be then, eh?"

Shizuru finally gave in to the smile peeking out from her eyes.

"Indeed," she smirked. "That would be troubling."

"As you say." The other patrician bowed her head lightly. "So, it is best for all of us that I be the one to stay stationed here, under the order to protect our common interests." Flashing a brief, coded look at a now-smiling Shizuru, she added: "Related to which, actually, is the other suggestion I have to propose."

Shizuru smirked: "Full of suggestions tonight!"

"Hah! Tired of them yet?"

"On the contrary-I am eager for any more. The origin of this next suggestion is?"

"Myself now, and no other."

"I see. Do go on!"

"My second suggestion concerns the most valuable local interests you have," the other blonde continued, as blandly and smoothly as if she were not speaking in cipher. "While I am perfectly willing and ready to look over them for you during your temporary absence, I nonetheless suggest that you look into some options for a provisional transfer of property."

Shizuru met her look squarely.

"Some of your recent acquisitions," Suou elaborated. "May be possible to remove, even if only temporarily."

Still no word from the other woman. Suou pressed on with a cool smile.

"Which is to say that I am personally in favour of making arrangements to remove them as soon as possible, and under your express custody. Their temporary holding place need not necessarily be Hime, of course. I believe you have some excellent safes and lock-boxes in some of your villas near the city, and they may also be considered for the protection of your recent acquisitions. The choice of venue, however, is ultimately up to you. If I may, though, I would advise against banking said acquisitions even if only temporarily. That dear little banker, Sosius, while a perfectly capable financial advisor, would be hard-pressed to know how to deal with such special items."

She added perversely: "They rather have a life of their own, which makes them difficult to manage."

She found it intensely hilarious that Shizuru looked as though she knew not whether to smile or to frown.

"Suou-chan," the woman settled for saying.

"That's it, all right? I promise to cease harassing you with all my suggestions," Suou grinned, putting her hands up in false fear. She giggled when the war on that beautiful face was concluded, ending with Shizuru in a rueful smile. "They are good suggestions, though, aren't they?"

Shizuru exhaled a long breath, looking winded by everything her friend had just said.

"Yes," she said, turning her eyes heavenward for a moment. "Yes, they are."

She chuckled shortly and added: "You are right, of course, in saying that poor Sosius-han would not know what to do with such items."

Suou nodded.

"All right, then, Suou-chan."

Suou inclined her head curiously: "All right?"

"Yes."

"Does that mean my suggestions are accepted?"

"And to be put in action."

"Immediately?" Suou pressed.

Shizuru inhaled first, as though bracing herself. Suou watched her.

"Yes," the general decided, voice firm. "Immediately."

"Then my work here is done." The other woman rose from her seat and gave Shizuru a suddenly accusatory glare. "Have you eaten?"

Shizuru seemed mildly stunned.

"Oh," she said, her eyes round. They slid away from Suou and towards Natsuki, who returned the stare with only the same curious expression as before. "Oh, no."

Suou looked at each woman in turn before nodding to her friend. "I'll tell someone to bring up something. I'm going now, anyway, so I don't mind."

"There-there is actually a dinner waiting for us. It was supposed to be for us," Shizuru said, looking at her friend feebly. The latter woman could see it was taking all of her restraint not to run over to the Otomeian with them and begin apologising for having forgotten. "It was prepared in advance, that is."

Suou was already at the door.

"Understood," she said, throwing her flaxen hair over a shoulder. "I'll tell them to warm it and bring it up. And I suppose I should call for someone to prepare your bath too. No need to rise-I'm quite capable of showing myself out, thank you."

The general looked at her old friend helplessly.

"Thank you so much, Suou-chan," Shizuru said, from her seat. "I am indebted to you. Truly."

Suou left them with a wink, the closing door a prelude to the silence that followed her exit.

The two remaining women looked at each other. Shizuru dared to smile a little, hating herself for what she knew to be the weakness of the expression, and hating it even more when Natsuki responded with her own weak equivalent.

She folded her hands on her lap and tried to broaden her grin.

First things first, she reminded herself, falling back to the basics: she was actually doing her own version of breathing exercises. Establish the situation.

"Natsuki."

There was no response to that, save a small movement of the head.

Well, naturally, she told herself with irritation. Establish the situation, not her name, Idiot.

"Are you terribly hungry?" she asked the girl as casually as possible. "I am sorry I forgot."

Natsuki shook her head.

"I see. Still, my apologies. It is just that..." Shizuru began, before changing her mind halfway. "This is quite a situation, is it not? A surprise as well."

Natsuki nodded.

How to do this, how to do this.

Natsuki opened her mouth. Before the girl could get any words out, however, Shizuru suddenly saw the green eyes glaze over with something that warned her Natsuki was about to raise her mask-that rare mask Shizuru had seen only once before. The thought was so sinister that she cut the girl off immediately, letting out a deep and rushing sigh. How many times had she herself employed that same trick? Fate must be getting back at her!

"Ah, but enough of the politics for now," Shizuru heaved, raising the hands she had folded over the table and smiling at the girl. "I have had enough talk of it tonight though, haven't you? Let us set it aside for now, meum mel, if you would permit me this selfishness for now. Just for the moment, until we can have our dinner. I need a reprieve and I daresay you might welcome it too."

That stopped Natsuki from saying whatever she had been about to say as well as from putting on her facade: Shizuru saw a shudder of something vague and unreadable pass over her lover's face in its place. Though she could not have given a word to it, the sight of that flickering emotion gave her the urge to shift in her seat, like a guilty child.

She settled for changing the topic instead.

"Please sit with me," she said casually. "Our food should be here soon."

Natsuki wordlessly made her way over and settled on the indicated chair. She turned to Shizuru, who was facing her.

Their eyes held each other's before both looked away.

Shizuru had the urge to fidget again. Deciding to rid herself of it by doing something else, she reached across the table for her cup. Only to find it empty. She was just about to get the jug to fill it when she realised that she had taken quite a bit of wine already, and unwatered wine at that. While it certainly was not enough to make her even close to inebriation-or even general fuzziness, come to it, for she was as prodigious a drinker as any true Himean-she felt that she wanted to approach Natsuki tonight with a perfectly clear head. For that, she needed to water the rest of her drinks, starting now.

"The water?" came the words from her companion.

She had been rising from her seat to fetch the other jug, set on one of the low cupboards: every drink for every person earlier had been unwatered. In light of the circumstances, it had been merited.

"Yes." She started as if to sit again, but changed her mind. "But I can get it myself."

"No. Please." The younger woman was already up and at the cupboard in a flash. How she moved so quickly without thumping frog-leaps on the floor, Shizuru truly did not know. "I will get."

Natsuki carried back the jug and brought it to her carefully.

"Thank you, Natsuki." She eyed her cup. "Perhaps you would be so kind as to pour it until it reaches halfway?"

The young woman did just that.

"How far, the wine?" she went on to ask, getting the wine jug too. Shizuru looked at her helplessly, feeling even more fidgety with all this consideration. She pointed to about two fingers' width below the rim of the cup.

"Here," she said softly. "If you please."

Again Natsuki proceeded to do as she had asked, doing it a little more carefully this time. The Otomeian's black hair slipped over her shoulders as she leaned down, towards the table, and the cascade of it drew Shizuru's attention. The rippling shine on the hair led her eyes irresistibly towards that pale and serious face.

"Forgive me, Natsuki."

The green eyes glanced at her with the words, although they returned almost immediately to the task at hand the next moment. Shizuru went on, closing her eyes as she spoke to her girl.

"This should have been our day together, " she continued deliberately, her ears picking up the fine rush of wine slipping into the water and bloodying its clarity. She repeated her words. "This should have been our day together. I promised you that. I promised you we would have it all to ourselves and be uninterrupted, and yet I-

"No."

She tore her eyes away from the hearth and towards Natsuki, who had finished what she was doing. The Otomeian had set down the jug and was now smiling faintly at her.

"No, Shizuru," the young woman reiterated, timbre ringing a note of exasperation. She frowned humorously as she spoke in her usual concise style, the staccato of her speech beating her point into her auditor's ears: it seemed to be telling Shizuru not to interrupt the rhythm.

"It is not your fault," she said. "Do not tell me sorry. No need for that, Shizuru. So no."

The older woman could only look at her powerlessly.

"Silly," was the chiding conclusion. "Poor, silly Shizuru."

Shizuru smiled now, amused by the words.

"I am," she whispered. "Am I not?"

Natsuki nodded.

"It was good," she said simply and with her distinctive gravity underlining the words. Her tone seemed to be warning the older woman again not to rebut her, and Shizuru took the hint. "Today was good. I enjoyed the ride. The stop at the cliff, it was good too. The play, it is fine if we miss it today. There are many others, and I do not mind. I really-I was very happy. I thought you knew."

Shizuru stared at her, surprised by this onslaught of speech. Natsuki grinned at her lover and brushed her fingers shortly against the woman's jaw.

"Shizuru, I liked today," she said. "You made me happy. No need to say sorry when it was good, or you make it seem that the good is meant to be bad."

The kiss in those green eyes softened the rebuke, and Shizuru felt that she dared not blink.

"Shizuru." Natsuki was looking earnestly at her now. "Thank you."

The girl pushed the goblet towards her. Her eyes were drawn to the motion, but did not focus on the goblet. Rather, they fixated on the linen-swathed hand that offered it.

Oh god, she could not help thinking. She can make me feel such a fool, sometimes.

She touched her hand to the other's face, grin softening when she felt the warm cheek lean against it. The muscle beneath the soft skin moved under her palm: Natsuki was smiling again.

Really such a fool .

"You're welcome, Darling. But did you like it enough for me to merit a kiss?" she asked, pretending seriousness.

The girl smirked, and there was relief in it.

"Hmm," the young woman murmured, although she did lean forward. "Could be. I think."

"Then that makes me happy," Shizuru smiled, barely having time to show her teeth before closing her lips on the ones a meagre inch away. The dark head was already angling to one side to accommodate tongues reaching out. She retracted hers first so that she could suck on Natsuki's briefly. Her anxiety was still at the back of her mind, though, while the fore was occupied with determining what to say, how to say, when precisely to say it . She could not permit herself to run away now and take refuge in this young woman's kindness, especially when the hurdle she had to overcome tonight concerned said young woman too. Unfortunately, the longer she stayed in the kiss, the longer she suspected she might try to hide in it temporarily-and she could make no more allowances for what she had formerly considered temporary.

She pulled away. She saw, too late, that her quick withdrawal wounded the girl, and that hurt her too.

"Natsu-"

A knock sounded on their door. Both swivelled their heads to it and listened to the announcement: dinner.

"Yes," Shizuru called. "Come in."

A group of servants entered, bearing the warmed-up dishes that should have been their dinner earlier. Shizuru watched guiltily as they set it up on the polished table where she sat, all of them studiously avoiding her eyes-as well as Natsuki's, she noticed. Word was out, then. What was that they said about bad news travelling fast?

Once the preparations were finished, the servants bowed and took their leave. The ones drawing their bath left a little later, and Shizuru waited for them to go before finally making ready to eat. She looked at the rich repast laid before her, which she had selected herself and had sent to her steward to forward to the kitchens personally.

She felt her heart sink.

All this food does not make me hungry at all.

She had every reason to be hungry, though. For one thing, she had yet to eat since the light snack she had shared with Natsuki near midday. For another, the food before her was meant to be excellent, as her steward should have inspected every dish here himself. But now the fare she had chosen so carefully days in advance seemed stale and unappetising. Even the scent of well-roasted garlic, something that always made her mouth water, now seemed intrusive. Her belly almost turned at the thought of eating anything. To many others, this would have been nothing of moment; to her, regular and good eater that she was, this seemed like another minor catastrophe in a day-long list of catastrophes. How could she, of all people, feel unable to eat? She could not even seem to summon enough strength to lift a hand towards the food, and that was terrible to a woman who enjoyed good food as much as she did. Was it because she was still unsettled by everything? And was she really that unsettled by everything?

A grumble broke through her ruminations over this little crisis.

"Oh, wha-?"

There was a morsel of oil-wet bread hovering in front of her.

"Ah." She blinked in confusion, only to have the one attempting to feed her smile. "Natsuki."

Natsuki nodded encouragingly; the hand holding the bread moved a little nearer.

"Open," she said, low and huskily. "Shizuru, open. Mouth."

Finally moved to action by the hidden laugh in that voice, Shizuru did as instructed, parting her lips to accept the small scrap of bread. Natsuki nodded approvingly at that and, reminded of how the girl had once done the same when her panther performed a trick she had been teaching it, Shizuru could not but smile. Natsuki nodded approvingly again.

"Is that better, Domina?" Shizuru asked her jokingly, after having done chewing and swallowing the piece. Natsuki slid forward her goblet again in answering.

"Better, yes," she said, urging the older woman to take a sip. "You must eat."

Shizuru paused in the act of sipping her wine.

"As must you," she said.

"If you eat, yes."

Up went Shizuru's brows above the goblet's rim.

"My, my," she said, words echoing roundly as they were spoken half-into the cup. "Does that mean you refuse to partake of any nutrition if I refuse as well?"

A confirmation.

"Well!" she said. "I never expected such a threat. Especially not from my Natsuki."

"Not threatening, Shizuru. You should think of, hmm, a bribe . "

A laugh evocative of amazement spilled from her.

"You are bribing me, meum mel ?" she said incredulously.

Natsuki smirked and riposted, "You are a politician, no?"

Shizuru's face went blank.

"Yes," she said with some wistfulness, thinking now of the latest trouble her occupation had brought her. "Yes, I am."

She wanted to kick herself when Natsuki's face fell in apology.

"Oh, but enough of that! Look, Natsuki, have you tried this already?" she said, grabbing one of the dishes on the table like a lifeline. She slid it to Natsuki.

The young woman looked at her offering with interest, diverted by what she seemed to regard as an item of great strangeness. It was a wooden bowl with a modest heap of tiny, pearl-like objects, each miniature globe a deep and glistening black. It was apparent from her eyes that she had never seen them before. She part-turned to Shizuru but kept her gaze fixed on the alien food before her.

"I do not know this," she confessed.

"Ah, then I have surprised you with it. That is good."

"It is food, Shizuru?"

"Oh, yes."

"It does not seem like food."

"I assure you it is indeed edible and marvellously tasty too."

"What is it?"

"Sturgeon roe," Shizuru answered, before catching herself. Natsuki was a mountain child, a girl who trod paths far inland. Even with all her impressive knowledge from books, what were the chances of her being familiar with the large fish that lived in the seas and the rivers near them?

"I beg your pardon. Do you know what a sturgeon is?" she asked now. Seeing the uncertainty on the girl's face, she tried again in another language, wagering that the girl would have at least run into the term in some Hellenic text somewhere: " Antakaïos ?"

"Oh! Yes, yes." Natsuki's eyes glimmered. "The big fish, no?"

"Yes, it is a big fish."

She stared at the dish again with different eyes. The Himean thought she seemed about to poke and pry at the little black orbs facing her, dissecting them in an effort to prise more knowledge from the strange things.

"This is that big fish?" she asked now. "The eggs of it, I mean? That is what 'roe' means, no? Eggs?"

"Yes, yes, yes, and yes," Shizuru said with a laugh, amused by the other's burst of enthusiasm. "These are the eggs. The fish itself is very large, as you say."

"And you-how did you call it?"

"The fish? Sturgeon."

"Stur-zheon."

"Yes, perfect."

Natsuki purred gently in her throat, still dissecting the miniature pearls with a green stare.

"Sturgeon eggs," she mumbled slowly. "So small ."

Shizuru's eyebrow lifted: "Why, did you think they would be bigger?"

"Mm-hm." She supplied an explanation: "That fish is very big."

She shrugged as Shizuru looked questioningly at her.

"I think of the duck and how big it is, and how big is the duck egg next to the duck, but now I see it is not the same," she rambled, quite to Shizuru's amazement. She grimaced as she considered her error, and suddenly addressed Shizuru in her splendid and scholarly Greek: "It is a mistake, I see now. One must pause before claiming things in nature are so easily analogous."

She appeared both surprised and glad when Shizuru burst into laughter.

"So you thought the rule would apply as well, Little Scholar?" the Himean chuckled, leaning forward and giving the girl a kiss that she could not have held back even had she used all her self-control. She followed that with a quick squeeze of the girl's arms as thanks for cheering her up. It might have been inadvertently done, true, but part of her said it was not. And she noted and valued the effort even more because she knew what it cost Natsuki to do such a thing, even for her sake.

"You are a wonder, Dear Girl," she told the young woman. "And I swear that even just listening to your flawless Attic makes me weak in the knees. Now let us finally address the matter of these sturgeon eggs and why I asked for them to be brought in specifically for us tonight."

She picked up some of the small eggs on the plate before them, using the wooden spoon provided.

"They are eaten mostly for the flesh, of course, but there are some kinds even more valued for their roe," she said, trying her best to keep the mood light; certainly she would do it for this young woman, if not herself. "This is an example, and this particular roe is prized highly by epicures. Adding more to its value is that it is difficult to ship far inland-which is why I guessed you had yet to try it, given your prowling grounds."

Natsuki affirmed it. She brought the half-filled spoon to the girl's mouth.

"Then, would it please you to sample it?"

Natsuki acquiesced. She did not disappoint in her reaction.

"Well?" Shizuru said, although she already knew it had met the Otomeian's approval, judging by the glimmer in those emerald eyes.

"What think you, Natsuki?"

The girl looked in wonder at the dish of black globes.

"I am-it-it is very good," she said, large eyes opened wide. "Very-oh, Shizuru."

Shizuru laughed, feeling her spirits lift further. This girl really did know how to make her feel better!

"Very Shizuru?" she repeated, earning a mock-frown. "I suppose it must indeed be good, then."

Natsuki sniffed, still unable to help smiling at the dish of little eggs.

"You like it too, Shizuru?" she asked.

"How can I not, if it is very me?"

"Grr."

"Yes, I do like it," the older woman grinned at the weak rumble. She picked up some more with the spoon again and lifted it to Natsuki. "That is why I wanted you to try it. I am so happy you like it as well."

She found the wooden utensil being taken from her hand, however, and turned her way instead. Natsuki arched an eyebrow when she attempted to protest.

"You like too," the young woman said with determination. "You eat too."

The crimson eyes regarded her with as much fondness as amusement.

"As you wish," she said, letting the girl spoon-feed her. She had to add first, however, "That may be a dangerous thing if applied to me as regards you, though."

"Shhh. Eat."

Though both understood that Natsuki's hushing of her was merely a jest, they nevertheless went through dinner more quietly than usual. They hardly finished half of the dishes that the cook had prepared so painstakingly for the day, and that was where the apprehension both were trying to hide manifested, for their bellies were too unsettled to do the exquisite cuisine the justice it was due. Ironically, it was the one with the smaller appetite who actually did her best to keep them keen on eating: Natsuki took on the position of server for both of them as she took from the plates and urged Shizuru to accept whatever her hand brought. Shizuru was grateful, of course, and did her best too to eat each crumb the girl offered. Even so, the distress was too strong; the two of them felt it, individually and as a pair. It was there in a shallow feeling in the belly, it insinuated itself into each hard-to-swallow crumb and heavy gulp of wine. They had hardly touched a third of the meal in total when both concluded that they had had enough, and rang the bell that would deliver a servant to their rooms.

"Please," Shizuru told the man who arrived. "Do take this down to the kitchen or the servants' quarters-to any people still up. We are unfortunately full already, and there is still so much here. It would be a pity to let it go to waste."

The man looked at the spread before him, eyes lighting up. How lucky!

Shizuru read the expression in his look and permitted him to ring for more of his comrades from among the servants, who readily arrived to take away the exquisite fare she and Natsuki had not been able to finish. They went about the task quickly, eager to sample the terrifically expensive food, and thus it was that the two women found themselves alone again. They seized this opportunity to go finally to their bath. It was still reasonably hot, as Shizuru found when she tested the temperature.

"Please allow me," she said, stepping away from the water and facing her waiting companion. Turning the younger woman around, she loosened the fawn dress Natsuki wore, sliding the soft wool off the Otomeian's shoulders. Then she removed her own clothing, putting everything in the basket the household slaves had left for the purpose. When they were both naked, she led the way into the water. She seated herself against one edge towards the shallow end of the pool, her eyes fluttering when the warmth closed in on her.

"Ohhh," she moaned, letting exasperation whistle out of her lips.
"Finally."

She felt the water lap and opened one eye: Natsuki was hovering uncertainly nearby.

"Here, Natsuki," she murmured, extending a slender arm. "With me."

Natsuki followed and sat between her legs, back against her breast. Only their shoulders were out of the water, and their heads touched gently as they found their fit.

Shizuru said it again in her mind: Finally.

She put her nose to the black hair and released a sigh. Natsuki murmured worriedly.

"I am fine," she assured the girl. "Really."

Natsuki mumbled something she did not understand and suddenly lifted away. Her back straightened at the loss.

"Natsuki, where are you going?"

"Uhhh."

The young woman waded through the water to reach the other edge of the pool, and Shizuru saw that the girl had left something there, sitting on the tessellated floor. It was a small leather-skin pouch, and Natsuki retrieved it before wading back.

"What is that?"

"Something... earlier." She looked apologetic as she smiled at Shizuru. "I forgot."

"What is in it?"

The pouch was opened to disclose a handful of small flowers, their delicate petals perfectly-formed and snowy.

"My!" she said, eyes growing. "Flowers? In winter?"

Natsuki made a sound that was almost a scoff.

"No longer winter, Shizuru," she reminded. "Nearly over."

"The point being nearly, Natsuki."

"Hmph." Natsuki squinted. "Still, yes, winter flowers. They bloom as winter dies."

She pronounced their name in her language and Shizuru repeated it.

"So they grow in your lands too?" the older woman asked, taking one from the tiny heap in Natsuki's cupped hands. The petals were firmer than what she had expected judging by looks alone. "An interesting shape."

The dark-haired girl in her bath nodded.

"In the bowls and valleys, there are more," she said. "There is less snow, but still cold."

Shizuru continued to handle the flower in her hand with care.

"Did you get these from..." She paused, remembering the least snowy or ice-bound of all their visited venues today. "The cliff? Earlier?"

An affirmative.

"How did you get them without my noticing it?"

The Otomeian looked smug. Shizuru thought her adorable when she did that.

"Keeping it a secret, were you?" she said. "Were you out to surprise me, Natsuki?"

All that got was a lift of beetle-black eyebrows. Then, before Shizuru could further quiz the girl, the latter suddenly lifted the handful she had and held it above the older woman's head. Opening her cradled hands slowly, she let the tiny flowers cascade over Shizuru, on whom they fluttered like gigantic, but still-light flakes of snow.

Shizuru smiled gently, watching as some of them slid down her hair or brow to float on the water.

"Very pretty," she said to the girl, who seemed to be gauging her reaction. "Thank you, Natsuki. I adore them."

Natsuki was pleased by that: she inclined her head bashfully. The older woman drew her in and they resumed their earlier positions in companionable silence, now more at ease. The tiny flowers had done their task.

The two women remained quiet for some time in the water, neither ready just yet to actually begin the scraping and rubbing of their daily ablutions. Shizuru had her legs outside of Natsuki's, and the latter played with those legs that hedged hers, tickling them with her fingers under the water. The Himean permitted the girl to do as she wished, sighing when the tickles became firm squeezes on her thighs: a tender massage that helped wick away some of the stress from her muscles. There was a good deal of that, she apprehended. She rested her head on the edge of the tiled floor behind her, content to be pampered this way as she considered matters.

I think I see, she was thinking, her eyes shut. She is worried about it too. She wants to know, as Nao-han put it, what is going to happen to all of us.

Shizuru knew that was only a matter of course. Natsuki was involved deeply in what was happening, especially by virtue of being involved with her. Even so, it was interesting that the girl would not ask the questions Shizuru knew teetered on the tip of her tongue. It was interesting because Shizuru knew she was going through the same reluctance too, and because the fact that they shared it made her hope that whatever she had to say-for it would be she, certainly, who would say something first-would find resonance with the girl's thoughts. She wanted to believe Natsuki was as bothered by everything as she was, because if she could believe in that, then perhaps she could believe her proposal would go smoothly.

But 'smooth' is a relative term, she warned herself, aware of the rough road she would travel even after the proposal succeeded. 'Smooth' to one may be 'crude' to another. If she did indeed bring Natsuki with her, how could she possibly prevent the deprecation that would be thrown on the young woman by her own people? Barbarian princess brought home by eccentric patrician: she could hear it now, much as she did not want to. Natsuki would be turned into a curiosity, an exhibit of her foreignness as much as Shizuru's eccentricity. That would hurt. The fact that the mere idea already hurt Shizuru now made it worse, because Shizuru knew that whatever she might feel about it the girl would feel stronger. Did she really want to subject Natsuki to that? Would she really go so far just to keep the two of them together?

And the answer was yes. Yes, she would. Did it bother her that by doing what she wanted she would be exposing not only herself but Natsuki to the aspersions of others? Yes, it did. But did it bother her more than the thought of being separate from the younger woman? No, it could not. Nothing was more awful than that option, at the moment, and nothing was less of an option. She would simply have to weather those difficulties when they came and hope that she could act as a worthy shield for the girl, even while knowing that what she shielded against were not mere arrows and swords that could be deflected: they would be words, and words passed through even the most solid of walls.

So all I can pray is that you forgive me for putting you through it, come the time, she told the image of Natsuki in her mind, an image that merely blinked at her and never spoke, for reasons she did not know. I pray you will understand and continue to understand.

But now she needed to begin, for this quiet friendliness between them had gone on long enough. She was more or less prepared and no longer had any excuse for delay. Natsuki was with her and, she knew, was waiting for some clarification within this fog.

"Natsuki," she called, feeling the kneading fingers pause afterwards. "I said we could talk after dinner. Did I not?"

The massage began again, Natsuki humming to her.

"Dinner is concluded."

Again just a hum in answer.

"I think we should talk now."

Natsuki stopped.

"If you want," she replied softly.

Shizuru did not miss the nervousness creeping into the low voice. She lifted her hands from the water and placed them, dripping wet, on the Otomeian's shoulders.

"May I know first how you feel about it, Darling?" she asked, clasping the lean shoulders like a hawk her prey. "I trust there is no need to say what I am talking about. You heard us earlier, yes?"

A nod.

"What do you think?"

She felt the bones under her palms roll uneasily, and copied the girl's earlier remedy for her own nerves: she started to massage.

"I, um, I think it is a surprise," the Otomeian managed to say, prior to glancing at her over one shoulder. "No, Shizuru?"

Shizuru smiled dryly.

"Indeed," she agreed. "Quite a surprise."

Natsuki nodded and looked away again, but the Himean continued to prod her.

"Is that all, meum mel?" she asked. Again the tension under her hands; again her attempts to calm the shifting bones with a rub. "For instance, do you consider it a good surprise or a bad one?"

When Natsuki answered, it was with an unexpected note of humour. Even if it seemed a little contrived to Shizuru, she allowed it to pass.

"Shizuru," said the girl. "I do not like surprises."

Shizuru chuckled, hoping her own amusement did not ring false.

"Yes," she said. "I suppose you would not."

"Hm?"

"What I mean to say is that I suppose that is in character for you."

"Umm."

Shizuru returned to the topic: "So it is a bad surprise after all?"

Natsuki's shoulders heaved: the young woman sucked in a breath. Shizuru refused to release her shoulders, and that told her she should answer.

"It-it depends, " she finally said. "I think it depends. You said to me once, Shizuru, thuh-thuh-that both values, they are for most things at once, no? That some things are both that."

The fair-haired woman nodded absent-mindedly, forgetting that Natsuki could not see her with the way they were. She did remember having said that once, during one of their more philosophical conversations.

"True, yes, I said that. Do you think this demonstrative of that, then?" she enquired.

"I think it depends," Natsuki repeated.

"On what?"

"Whom."

Shizuru's brow furrowed before she understood.

"Ah," she said. "On whom, then?"

"You."

"Right." Shizuru laughed flatly. "Naturally."

The girl turned a little to look at her, peeking from the corner of an eye. Shizuru caught the beautiful green ring as it flashed around the pupil's black, then slid away.

"Yes, of course," Shizuru murmured. "You are right. As ever, Natsuki."

Their bodies moved slightly against each other.

"How is it then?" Natsuki asked, also very softly. "In your eyes, what is the value here, Shizuru?"

Shizuru's head bowed, and a few locks of hair slipped forward to dip into the water.

"What indeed?" she said, realising that there was now enough space between them for her to look at her reflection on the water's surface. A small white flower floated over her reflection's right eye, and she noted that with distraction.

"You are right, of course," she repeated. "About the simultaneity of occurring values even in this case. This is an excellent example of a situation both good and bad. Quite obviously, it is bad because it presents hindrances. It introduces new obstacles to what had been a plan all but perfectly smoothed over. Among other things."

"And, um."

"Yes?" She felt a little ashamed for leaping so quickly at Natsuki's answer. "Yes, Natsuki?"

"The good?" Natsuki followed, prodded further by Shizuru's hands again massaging her shoulders. "It is that you-you will be closer to what you want, no?"

Shizuru saw the reflection on the surface of the water look surprised, dark red eyes widening.

"Would I?" she asked it and Natsuki quietly. "But what do you mean, what I want?"

"Urban praetor," she heard the girl say to her. "One step under consul."

The younger woman paused before continuing, not seeming to notice how mournful her words sounded instead of seeming exultant in what she claimed to be the good of the matter.

"Yuh-you told me before, Shizuru. You would one day be praetor. Urban praetor is best. You said and I remember. "

Shizuru watched, hypnotised, as the reflection in the water stared at her angrily.

"I am wrong, Shizuru?" Natsuki asked.

Shizuru was broken out of her trance by a ripple coursing over the surface of the water. She watched now with a little less fascination as her reflection was smudged by the tiny wave, the only noticeable points remaining her eyes: blood-red and still uncertain.

"No," she said in her huskiest register. "No, you are not wrong, Child. I did say that. Once."

The movement of black hair in front of her let her know Natsuki had just nodded.

"Good, so it is good too," the younger woman said in an easy manner. Still, Shizuru could feel it was not easy to do at all, and that was sufficient to cause her another measure of pain. "And bad, too, a little."

Shizuru swallowed the rising lump in her throat.

"Yes," she said.

"Hmm."

"Then, Natsuki." Shizuru hesitated, truly anxious with this coming question. "Then you think I should go? Do you welcome that idea?"

It took only a moment for Natsuki to respond, but that moment stretched torturously long.

"Do you want to go?" the girl asked back, final tones dropping in a fatalistic timbre. "You want to go?"

Shizuru's reflection was broken by yet another ripple, and one that she felt twinge outwards from somewhere around her chest. It dragged her into wrapping her arms around the younger woman's neck, eradicating the image of herself from the water by insinuating her body in the space where the reflection had been. Better. She did not want to face herself right now.

Her head rested against Natsuki's, her cheek pressing into the crown of the girl's hair.

"Oh no," she said, eyes shut. "No."

Natsuki said nothing. After it was clear Shizuru was not about to say any more, however, she raised one hand and held it against the older woman's own mane, stroking the damp fibres with her palm. The water from her hand matted them down against Shizuru's scalp and held there as she continued petting the Himean's head as one would a sulky child's.

She hummed as she did it.

"Thank you," Shizuru whispered later, glad for the comfort the girl was trying to give. "I am fine."

"Mm, you say."

Up went light brows at the remark.

"You do not believe me?" Shizuru said lightly, not really expecting an answer.

The hand on her hair continued petting her. She chuckled and removed her arms from around the girl's neck. Her hands went low on the brittle waist, and she felt the strange undulation that always earned, a ripple of Natsuki's muscles and spine accompanied by one of the water.

For someone who seems to fear dancing, she said to herself, breath coming more quickly at the friction between them, she dances beautifully if you know how to touch her body.

She frowned the next instant, realising how she had phrased it in her head. Knowing how to touch Natsuki-well, that was a piece of knowledge that should and would only ever be hers, was it not? That was a great part of her resolve to bring Natsuki along when she left for Hime, after all: the need to ensure that no one would even try to come near the girl in her absence. The jealousy of her feelings told her that the best way to assure herself sole proprietorship of this young woman was to safeguard it with her own presence. Again, selfish. But not all of it was selfishness: having Natsuki with her would permit her to safeguard Natsuki herself. How could she possibly rest easy on her own if she knew Natsuki was so far away, so distant from her sheltering hand? For, by this time, she had all but cast off every thought of Natsuki as her attendant or bodyguard. As far as she was concerned, she was now Natsuki's bodyguard.

Who could have imagined such an irony only months ago? She mused on the shift in their relationship with fascination, finding new appreciation for everything that had brought them here. Had anyone told her prior to leaving Hime that she would find such a treasure as Natsuki on this campaign, she would have laughed. Unthinkable! But now what was unthinkable was relinquishing this treasure, and that too was something she would have found laughable not too long in the past, fool that she had been.

The problem with the treasure in her hands, however, was that it was no mere parcel of gold. It breathed. It moved and thought and had a mind of its own. She could not and would not allow herself to forget that. Yet she could barely countenance the idea of it every moving, thinking, or exercising its mind in a way contrary to what she wanted of it. Hence, she had to think deeply on what she was about to do, which was to remove this treasure from the land whence it had come. As for most other living things, such a removal could be tectonic in effect. Was she wrong in wanting to hazard that earthquake anyway? Would her treasure think her wrong in doing so? A mind of its own; a life of its own. Would she, perhaps, be taking away a great part of that life in so uprooting the girl?

But it would only be a year, she reasoned out, both to herself and the young woman with her. Only a year at most. That was not too long, was it? If indeed it were a deprivation to Natsuki, it would at least not be a permanent one. Or rather, not yet. Besides, Shizuru would ensure that it would be a comfortable and enjoyable period for the other woman, even with the possible bad opinions headed their way if they went through with this. She had to ensure it for, otherwise, how could she tell herself she was worthy of having this girl? If she could not even make her happy, if she could not guard sufficiently against the troubles, then what right had she to take such an exotic beast and call it her own? Exotic beasts were meant to be protected from whatever sought to damage them, whether it was the careless collector or the game hunter. And Shizuru knew-she just knew- that many a careless collector or hunter would die to get their nets on Princess Natsuki of Otomeia and Ortygia.

That would kill her, she thought, knowing that part of what animated the girl was freedom. It would kill her to be placed in a net and kept there to be studied. Natsuki was meant for other things: she was meant to be running freely, happily, as much as she wished. Surely she could not be wrong in wanting to take the younger woman with her for now if part of what she intended was to keep the girl from falling into others' nets. But what of the net she herself would be using, which would, for all its well-meaning fabric, still be a net?

I cannot get away from that fact. I cannot pretend that I am sure I myself am not merely putting her in a gilded cage.

"Nhh... mmn..."

The low moans in her ear woke her to the body chafing against hers, and she realised she had begun to massage Natsuki's hips during her cogitations, her distress coming out in the rough scrape of fingers in what was actually meant to be hands clenching and unclenching. She would have apologised had the younger woman not seemed to be enjoying it, going so far as to rest her head on Shizuru's shoulder and start fluttering her lips against Shizuru's neck. When Shizuru ceased the movements of her hands, those lips stopped too. An instant later, Shizuru felt teeth graze the skin near her throat. The false bite was followed by a slow-lapping tongue.

She hissed.

Good lord, she thought with surprise, feeling warm all over as the moist organ traced intricate whorls near her jaw. The hand over her hair started playing with her ear too, a finger tracing the inside of the delicate skin and setting her eyes aflutter. The hedonism of it! Was it even right for her to feel like having Natsuki at this time, even with everything on her mind?

But her body seemed to decide that, right be damned, it did indeed feel like having Natsuki just then. Shizuru shut her eyes, seeing splashes of light in her shuttered vision. She held it in for as long as possible, but finally decided that a warning was necessary when Natsuki's other hand raked from her hip to her torso, setting off a minor sunrise in her blind horizon.

"Natsuki," she murmured, eyes opening as the girl twisted to better nibble and gnaw at her skin. "Unless you feel up to it tonight, I would advise you to go easy... Darling."

Natsuki went on with the assault and ignored her. What could one do in the face of that?

"Very well."

She wrenched the mouth from her neck with a pull on black hair, slanting her head in order to meet the tongue still out and reaching for hers. She twisted her own tongue around it first before jerking an inch backwards again, wanting to see if the girl would follow. She did.

Good, she thought, moaning at the ferocity of Natsuki's kisses. You do want it.

She felt Natsuki's weight shift, and knew the girl was about to turn so that the kiss would be easier. Shizuru denied it, however, and gripped the young woman's waist to hold her.

"No," she said, speaking to surprised eyes. "Tonight, like this."

And resuming their kiss with fervour, she used her hands to outline Natsuki's form, running them up the young woman's sides. When she reached the join of Natsuki's arms to her torso, she slid her hands forward and over two round breasts, palms over them as she pulled Natsuki flat against her body. Her own breasts were crushed between them, and the feel of the lean and hard back on her chest was wonderful. It was such a small back, but the flesh underneath was strong. She broke their kiss yet again to push the younger woman a space away, enough for her to look at the back now intriguing her. She studied it with her eyes as well as her hands.

Strong indeed, she thought, using the tip of a finger to outline the pale terra. And such a tensile strength. Natsuki's back was well-muscled, as every part of her, but muscled in such a tight way that she looked even thinner than others of the same slight size: she was a tall girl, after all, even if she was shorter than Shizuru, and the tallness showed in the stretch of her form. She had barely padded ribs like bands of iron, ropy strands of hardworking flesh taut under still-adolescent skin. Her skin was beautiful. It was white and silky to the touch, even with all the scars.

"Your scars," Shizuru murmured, outlining the delicate tracery of war-wounds. Most were too light to be seen but some stood out in relief against the whiteness, minor constellations of pain that echoed within her too. This one was clearly an arrow wound, narrowly missing the vital organs: that one, a wound from some bladed weapon, which had obviously sheared the skin away. A dozen hairlines of hurt, a handful of leftovers from old lacerations. Shizuru had to shudder. She knew her girl was a warrior but that did not stop her from asking outraged questions in her mind. How could anyone have hurt her Natsuki like this? How dare they hurt her Natsuki like this?

"No more," she uttered, unaware of the emotion in her voice. "Never again. My dear girl."

Natsuki twisted to look at her.

The young woman smiled slowly when she understood why Shizuru was so troubled.

"You too," she replied. "See, Shizuru."

And reaching for Shizuru's hand, she pulled it forward over her shoulder, stroking a long and depressed welt on the forearm that was the desperate memento of a long-dead foe. Shizuru still remembered it whenever she reminisced about her earlier, more reckless days in battle: the feeling of surprise when the tottering man had suddenly righted himself as she made to pass, believing him finished; the horror in the split-second where he swung his sword up, then down at her with that final, immense spurt of strength the dying had; and finally, the ringing sound in her ears as she threw up her arm against the blow, having neither space nor time for anything else. The sword had fallen on her arm like a hammer, beating into the iron of her manica and crushing it inwards to bite her flesh. The pain had been blinding, she remembered even now . It had been the thick steel of the arm-greave that broke her skin, smashing bluntly in and nearly breaking her bone. But Fortune as well as her own wits had saved her from certain amputation, for she had managed to slide the sword away as it continued along the arm-greave, shaving off her sleeve in the process but keeping her life-and limb, more or less-intact.

"Like this," Natsuki was telling her, kissing the fierce scar gently along its line. "You have scars too, Shizuru."

Shizuru watched silently as the other continued exploring the mark with her mouth. Natsuki pulled the skin between her lips, she tasted it with her tongue, and did all of it with such tenderness that Shizuru realised, suddenly, that her face was blushing.

"I know, meum mel," she said, bending her arm at the elbow so Natsuki could keep mouthing the scar. Her other arm angled down and forward, slanting over Natsuki's hips to slip between her legs. "We are both so."

She penetrated her easily and started moving. Natsuki kissed her arm feverishly and moaned to it, as though using it as replacement for the older woman's mouth. When Shizuru moaned too, impatient and aroused by the younger woman's groans, the latter threw a hand in the water and reached between their hips to help her.

"Yes," Shizuru groaned, closing her eyes when she felt Natsuki's fingers enter. "Yes."

They moved with each other. At first, it was still slightly controlled. It was only their hands that thrust deep and deliberate into each other at first. But it did not take long for the restraints to break. Soon they were both bucking fiercely, wet flesh mashing into each other's palms, and every muscle in both bodies seemed alive, twitching, gloriously and explosively freed. Their voices too joined the sudden liberation, and each shuddering jerk of the hip held a cry, a groan, or a gasp.

"God," Shizuru managed to say in this chaos. "Natsuki, my sweet, warm Natsuki..."

She was answered by a whine and some words she perceived as Otomeian but did not understand. Surrounded by water as they were, Shizuru felt a sweat break out on her body. Thighs and hips on fire as she continued pushing against the thing plunging inside her, she clenched her teeth and heard the wind slipping through them, all sex and steam. A part of her was aware that the girl's arm was likely sore by now from being pounded between their bodies, but she could not stop herself from bucking, any more than she could stop making Natsuki buck harder against her. She could feel Natsuki's discomfort in their position from the sudden jerks her torso made in the water, but she could also feel her pleasure. That pleasure was undeniable. It was squeezing on her fingers, plumping around them, sucking them in hungrily, until there was only that great pulling spasm, the two of them one complicated and rigid machine as they came violently against each other.

And then there was the exhausted silence. Natsuki's head had fallen onto her shoulder, and Shizuru rested her own head against it, listening contentedly to the sound of the girl's soft gasps as small aftershocks jolted her. The gasps were desperate and high-pitched and so unlike the girl's usually controlled tones that she ended up tickling the girl's insides to force out more of them.

When she saw that her lover was already feeling pain from the continuous strokes, she stopped. As though the release they had just experienced was what had been necessary to break through her reserves, she decided she could wait no longer for their discussion. She knew she had to say it now, while they were still so closely bound together.

She drew in a laboured breath and felt the girl do the same.

"Hhaah."

It was Natsuki breathing. It moistened Shizuru's arm, the air condensing on her hot skin. She retracted the arm and noted the red bite-mark Natsuki had left on it. She almost wished the girl had bitten through, so she could keep this particular scar. Suddenly she felt a twitch inside her and realised Natsuki was removing her fingers; both of them were still inside each other. She did the same with her hand, but instead of letting it fall limp, raised it quickly from the water and pushed her fingers against Natsuki's mouth. It was clear what she wanted the girl to do.

Natsuki did it.

A purr welled up in her throat at the girl's compliance.

"Natsuki," she breathed, amazed by the sensuality of just feeling that soft tongue curling around her fingers. "You are so beautiful. You are mine, aren't you? Tell me you are."

Natsuki hummed to her and she took that as a 'yes'. She could not fathom any other answer.

"Then," she began, voice deeper than usual, "will you come with me?"

There was no answer, but Natsuki's mouth was still busy sucking on her fingers.

"Will you, Natsuki?"

She felt the coiling muscle on her digits pause, and took advantage of it to say something further.

"Please come with me to Hime."

The wonderful sucking feeling stopped.

"Natsuki?" she said uncertainly, heart doing a wild tattoo all of a sudden. " Meum mel ?"

Silence.

Her breath caught and she slowly took her fingers from Natsuki's warm mouth. She moved the wet hand to frame the young woman's jaw instead, holding it with her thumb and leaning in to speak into the Otomeian's ear.

Even if her words were beginning to sound nervous or panicked, she could not have cared less.

"Please come with me to Hime," she requested again, urgently now. Her legs crooked at the knee by instinct, caging Natsuki's limp body so it could not escape. "Listen to me, Natsuki. It is true that I can do nothing at this moment but return there, circumstances being what they are, but I shall come back here immediately, whether after the year of office is done or earlier. I shall come back here sooner or later."

Her heart, already doing dangerous flips inside her, sank deeper when there was absolutely no response from her companion. What had seemed such a warm, living body earlier now seemed to cool into stone.

"It may even be earlier," she stressed, picking up on the mute apprehension radiating from her companion. She hoped it was merely apprehension at the thought of being away from the place the girl called home for so long. Oh, by all the gods, let it only be that!

"Either way, it shall only be around a year or so," she said, "which is not too long for a-a vacation, really. You could think of it as a holiday, Natsuki. I promise I shall make it seem like a holiday for you. I would make it worth your while, I promise it. If only you would come with me."

Natsuki still was not answering, and that made her strive to fill the silence, dread rising to unfamiliar levels. Why was Natsuki not answering? Was it shock at the invitation? It had to be.

"I can show you around my country. I would show you everything-and there is much to see," she said with unconcealed eagerness, her hand having now moved to hold the other woman by the shoulder. She was rambling now; she could not help it. It was taking all of her strength to keep her hands from shaking.

Why this silence, she thought, trying to swallow the dread. Why this silence and stillness?

"There are such sights, My Darling!" she said, her breaths coming quick and shallow though she strove to control them. "You will most likely have read about them already, but it is still something else to see them before you. Of course it would be going on spring when we get there, and perhaps the warmth of our climate may shock you. Even more the summer. But-well, I could show you my favourite summer villa then! It is a beautiful place, Natsuki, a beautiful place. You would like it. I know it."

Even as she talked, she realised she had to do what she had been dreading all this time: she had to face those eyes that so often told her more truth than she could handle. She had to see Natsuki's eyes; she needed to see the answer.

Please, she prayed unconsciously, summoning up her resolve to turn the young woman by the shoulder. Please let it be all right. Let her eyes tell me it is all right.

Blood roaring in her ears, she pulled the younger woman carefully, turning the light body to sit sideways on her straightened legs. Then she lifted her gaze.

And wanted to weep.

Chapter 40

My profound gratitude to the reviewers and all who sent messages last time.

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Casting grains over paper - Standard scribal practice to help ink set by letting the grains absorb any excess ink still wet on the surface of the paper (the grains being sand, of course).
  2. Cursus honorum - Literally "Way of Honour"; the ladder of political positions up which one had to go in order to reach the highest office in the Republic (excepting dictator, naturally).
  3. Falx - A polearm weapon like the rhomphaia (s.v.). The falx's blade is more curved in shape than the rhomphaia's, which means it is designed specifically for slashing moves.
  4. Military tribune - Not an elected tribune of the soldiers; ranked below legates and above cadets, the military tribunes often performed staff duties for the general and were sometimes given command over soldiers as cavalry officers.
  5. Pilum - The standard-issue Roman spear. The original pilum did not break apart after first throw, and was modified (some sources claim) by the great Roman consular named Gaius Marius into one that did, for the same reasons Shizuru has here.
  6. Rhomphaia - A polearm weapon, similar to the falx (s.v).
  7. Triumph - The military parade of honours, achievements, and booty that an army often performed upon return to Rome if the soldiers had hailed the commander with the accolade of "imperator" in battle, and the Senate sanctioned the petition for the triumph.
-

Inter Nos

par ethnewinter

---

The senior legate of Shizuru's army rapped her knuckles on the desk, frowning direly at the many sheets of paper before her. The ink on some of them was smudged and though it would have irked her at any other time, she paid that carelessness no heed today. The work! There was so much of it. Natural that some papers would be smudged when she barely had time to cast the grains over one sheet before beginning another.

She rotated her wrists carefully and winced when an uneasy creak came from the right one. There was a dull ache starting already, no surprise. She was used to this discomfort as an occupational hazard, especially as her job description combined duties heavily taxing to the wrists. The only thing that bothered her any more these days was actually her sight, of which she had perpetual worries. Was it worsening? Could she still tell a falx from a rhomphaia a distance away? Could her peripheral vision still spot an incoming spear fast enough for her to dodge? Those were only some of the myriad practical considerations: there were her duties as a senior legate too, which not only involved her work as official chronicler but also included the task of running Shizuru's communications office. Reading, writing, or rerouting letter after letter after letter!

She needed a test. She looked over at the desk by the wall perpendicular to hers, trying to make out what the military tribune seated there had written. It took a while-and, she would admit only to herself, a little bit of guesswork-but she found she could still read the first word. Good. So there was no significant deterioration from the past year. Thank the gods for that much.

Though I'll still not be winning any archery contests anytime soon.

"Harada-san?" It was the young man whose work she had been eyeing. "Is there something wrong with what I did?"

"No, it seems all in order," she responded, smiling to allay his fears.

"I was just wondering if you weren't sick of this paperwork yet, Masato-san, and taking to doodling on the spare sheets yet."

He laughed easily.

"I've no hand for drafts, even as doodling," he answered. "Besides, just being able to work with such a great chronicler as you is an honour, so I'm still fine with all of this."

"Flattery!"

"It's the truth!"

He smiled at her, the corners of his eyes producing a few crow's feet; he was younger than she, so she recognised them as being natural to his face instead of the products of age. Masato had a very likeable face, broadly-shaped and deeply lined at the corners of his mouth, the straight brows above large eyes giving him an open expression. In terms of beauty, however, it suffered from a significant flaw: his nose. That appendage was too small to be properly Himean. It would not have been as noticeable had its other flaw only been that of being boringly and perfectly straight-as indeed the commander's was, but since that nose was appropriately long and also sat on a face of spectacular proportions, no one really saw that feature as a flaw on the commander. Masato's, unfortunately, was not only small but a little curved and boyishly snub. It had none of the bony, bumpy character Himeans preferred and as such drew some animadversions of foreign blood, specifically that of the conquered tribes on the edges of Upper Fuuka. Chie herself knew, though, that he came from good, pure-bred city stock. A pure Himean, though his nose might not have looked it.

"The general can tell you, Harada-san," he was saying to her.

"Aspiring chronicler that I am, myself, I actually volunteered to be assigned these duties so I could work with you." He caught himself and glanced at the other person with them, whose desk was opposite his. "And Akiko-san, of course."

Chie's personal aide did not acknowledge the mention of her name and simply went on with her work. The other two exchanged a smile.

"That's nice. For myself, I consider working with Akiko an honour," she said to Masato, who grinned back. "As you can see, her work ethic puts everyone else to shame."

Akiko finally looked up from the sheaf of parchment and answered her.

"Not the general," she said matter-of-factly. "Fujino-san manages to finish twice what I do without looking harried."

Her employer of five years winced.

"Shizuru-san gets an accolade but there's no mention of me, eh?" she said in still-good humour, having been subject to the young woman's prods and pokes for half a decade. "Besides which, Akiko, it's almost irritating that you accepted my praise so easily. Now that's not very modest," she clucked.

"Akiko-san doesn't like to beat around the bush," Masato chuckled.

Their subject merely turned back to her papers.

"It's part of my work ethic, Harada-san," she said in her prosaic voice. "It's called efficiency."

"Brusqueness, more like," Chie returned, hugely amused: she always was whenever it came to her top aide's unremitting candour. She leaned into her chair, and its curved back felt good to her.

"Akiko here is a dour one, Masato-san," she said to her other assistant. "And I love her for it. She's the one who pushes me into doing every little bit of work I need to do, and never hesitates to whip me into rephrasing one of my works if she thinks it's not up to par. She's the one responsible for whatever you may think is laudable about my work, so she's actually the one who should get the credit."

Akiko sighed, tucking her shoulder-length brown hair behind an ear. She scribbled two more lines before taking the sand-box and finishing the paper before her.

"Harada-san's just flattering me, Masato-san," she said. "Don't mind what she says."

She looked up and at Chie.

"I'm done with my share. Would you like me to finish yours, Harada-san?"

"Ah, so the flattery works after all."

"No, it doesn't. But the salary does."

All three smiled.

"Speaking of salaries, there's something odd in the financial ledgers," Akiko said, catching the others' attention. "I noticed it earlier."

Chie looked at her enquiringly.

"The accounts set each ranker's total share of booty at ten thousand sesterces," Akiko enlarged, "which is about right. But the final payout of booty share per ranker is officially listed at eleven thousand."

Chie frowned. "Are you sure?"

"Yes. I've even run up the figures again for undivided booty, just to see if the total is accurate."

The senior legate had risen to look over the papers on Akiko's desk.

"Let me see," she said, bending over the sheets. "And the total you got was?"

"The one stated," Akiko answered, pointing to one of the papers.

"Which, when divided across the members of the army, does come to ten thousand per soldier. But the directive for issuance of scrip states that each promissory note should have eleven thousand."

She fetched another sheet from one of her drawers and displayed it to her superior. The directive, as expected, had Shizuru's seal.

"See?" Akiko said, as Chie studied the document.

The senior legate nodded.

"She's right," she told the only man in the room, not wanting to isolate him from the discussion.

"Could it be that whoever did the accounts tallying up the booty missed something?" he suggested, a few wrinkles on his forehead. He could not imagine the general making such a mistake-everyone working for Shizuru Fujino eventually discovered she had a great head for numbers-so he immediately concluded that it had been the author of the other document who made the mistake. However, he missed a fact that rebelled against the logic of his conclusion.

It was Chie who revealed it to him.

"This is your first time campaigning with us, Masato-san, so I suppose you don't know," she said. "But the person who made that directive is also the same person who did the booty's tally."

Black eyes gleamed in surprise.

"You mean..." he started.

"The general," Chie told him. "She does all the accounting herself, usually, and checks her work against that of the official accountants. Only afterwards does she approve all the ledgers and send them on to us for finalisation."

Masato was confused.

"Then I don't understand," he said. "It's not like her to make such a mistake. Is it?"

Akiko produced a sound from the back of her throat.

"She never makes mistakes," she stated positively. "That's why I said it was odd."

A brief silence came upon the room, all three officers squinting in thought.

"Well..." It was Masato who spoke first; the two women looked at him. "The general has seemed a little unlike herself, lately."

Chie and Akiko exchanged glances. Both knew what Masato meant, since they were among the officers working nearest the commander aside from having served with her in another campaign. As such, they had been among the first to note what Masato was mentioning, although neither had mentioned it.

"I suppose," Chie now said, shifting her weight to her other leg. "It's probably just because she's tired too, Masato-san, though she doesn't let on much."

Masato nodded.

"I know-I thought so," he said, before scrunching up his face in dislike. "It's all this, isn't it? The people back home do pick on her something awful. I'd be tired too, and enraged, I think. It's just Fujino-san's way not to be angry the way we are, I guess, but Jupiter! How I'd roar if it were me."

Chie smiled humourlessly in agreement.

"I feel the same way," she said, before lifting an eyebrow at him. "Say, then, Masato-san: so you don't agree with the others who say this is actually a good thing for her, being a technical promotion up the cursus honorum?"

He shook his head emphatically.

"That's too simple-minded," he volunteered. "I believe she's been genuinely surprised by this election-all evidence points to it. Even with the talk about her cousin having been the one to place her nomination, I still don't see enough to say that Fujino-san herself orchestrated this. The same goes for her allies back home."

"So your opposition to it stems from the fact that it's from an unverified source?"

Masato moved both eyebrows in agreement, looking at her with that clear, open expression.

"It's all shadow-work, Harada-san," he replied. "How can I say shadow-work is a good thing, even with a shadow-gift? It's not like a person can feel safe opening a gift of wine if he doesn't know from whom it comes. Let's say he's lax and he does open it. Maybe he'll drink it fine down to half the container. Maybe it'll still be fine down to two-thirds of it. But what if there's poison settled down in the last third? By then he'll have become complacent because of the first two-thirds, and won't think anything of drinking it all up. Whoosh! Dead! No, Harada-san-I think we should be suspicious. That's why I think Fujino-san is, too."

Chie regarded him with a smile in her eyes.

"Well-put, Masato-san," she said. "You're being wasted just doing these papers. You should be in the Plebeian Tribune."

He was surprised and held up his hands with embarrassment.

"Oh, maybe, but it's still for the future," he said, cheeks red with pleasure. "Though it's kind of you to say it, Harada-san."

"Don't think it's flattery!" she said in mock warning. She raised her arms and stretched, turning to Akiko afterwards. "Would you two mind handling the rest for me, then, and finish up? Take a break if you think you need it. Anyway, we've finished most of today's work. I'm going to go see Shizuru-san now and ask her about that issue with the booty distribution."

The two subordinates assented and she went off, thinking about what Masato had remarked about their general. It was true that Shizuru had been unlike herself lately, though Chie had not really expected anyone other than herself and the other veterans to notice it. That Masato had was testament to his perceptivity, she thought. It would be wise to keep an eye on his career from now on, to ensure that his talents would be reserved always for their side. She would commend him to Shizuru, though she supposed her friend would already have noticed. Having so much of it herself, the younger woman seemed to sniff out talent even before it went on full display.

Her thoughts returning to their commander now, she reflected on what exactly had been unusual in the other woman's manner of late. It was hard to say. Shizuru's deportment was generally so imperturbably dignified that it was difficult for many to see changes in it at all. Certainly she was still generally imperturbable these days and, as far as Chie was concerned, that patrician dignity was intact; but something was different and had been different for the past four days, ever since that private conference with the Ninth's primipilus and Suou Himemiya in Shizuru's quarters. What was it that had changed? She could not have given a name to it if she wanted to be precise, but if she had to guess, she would say that underneath the near-impenetrable wall of civility, the general was being sulky.

Funny thing, that, she thought with a twitch to her mouth: I never could've imagined it before, and even after having suspected seeing it, still can't imagine it by myself now. She did not even know how or why she had decided that the general was sulky. It had simply popped into her mind the first time she felt the change, and lingered there afterwards. It actually strengthened the impression that she had never before imagined it could happen. Given that fact, she was fairly sure she had not simply plucked the label 'sulky' from some assumed tendency about her friend; rather, it had leapt out at her from the very back of all possible labels, asserting itself out of the sheer strength of impression. Hence Chie believed her instinct was right in this case: General Fujino was sulking.

She chuckled aloud, ignorant of a nearby slave who shot an alarmed look her way. Chie was now on the first floor of the gubernatorial palace, where Shizuru had occupied one of the unused reception rooms for her office. She hastened towards it.

All six people inside looked up when she entered, though only five offered a smile: the general's girl was present, and her eyes were downcast. Chie held a hand up and issued an all-inclusive greeting, walking immediately towards the desk in the middle of the room.

Her first thought was that, even with the smile on her face, Shizuru still felt sulky.

"Welcome, Chie-han," Shizuru said, setting down the letter cylinder she had been in the midst of opening. "How goes it with your fort?"

Chie brushed a lock of hair from her eyes.

"Under siege by paper," she sighed in response. "Still, it goes as well as can be hoped, I'd say. Akiko and Masato are finishing up. How are you all here?"

"Quite well. Do sit down." She nodded to one of the men in the room as Chie took her invitation. "Kenji-han has decided that he wishes to be relieved of his duties when my replacement arrives."

"Ah. I see." Chie made herself comfortable in the chair. She eyed the tall, ginger-haired legate on his feet. "So you're going home too, Kenji-san?"

His lean face quirked in amusement as he gave an explanation: "Miyabi will kill me if I don't marry her soon."

They grinned.

"Dear me," Chie managed through a giggle. "I wish I could say that a betrothed was the primary reason for my decision too."

The other legate's heavy brows closed in, rust-haired and angry, and his lips thinned.

"There's that other thing too, of course," he said, with a nod to Shizuru. "I signed up for a campaign with Fujino-san. Not some paltry replacement chosen by the couch-generals back home, whoever he or she turns out to be."

A light, almost embarrassed laugh from the general.

"Kenji-han," she said. "We know not who it is yet."

A sniff from her loyal legate: "No one who can compare."

"I'm on his side this time, General," Chie remarked, stopping when she remembered something. "And Taro? Has he come here yet?"

Shizuru said he had.

"And?"

"He has yet to decide. He asked if he could take some time to think on the matter."

"I see. And Suou-san's staying."

Kenji interrupted them, asking if he could go ahead. The pair excused him and resumed their conversation.

"That's another legate resigning, then," Chie said absently, glancing at the other people in the room. Two of Shizuru's scribes were present, along with a military tribune conversing seriously with one of the former. They occupied desks at the other sides of the room. Shizuru's own desk was in the centre, surrounded by buckets of scrolls and various paraphernalia that included an abacus, a shield, and a military-issue pilum -Shizuru's modification of it, Chie noted.

And, of course, there was also the black-haired girl on a seat near the general's.

"I see you're busy, so I shan't take up too much of your time," Chie began. "My question's about the distribution of booty."

Shizuru's head moved.

"Akiko saw something odd about the order for the amount to be put on the payout notes," Chie continued, going on to explain the issue to her friend. "So I came here to ask why it says eleven thousand per ranker when the total in the booty accounts says it should only be ten thousand."

The blonde woman smiled, resting her back against the chair and folding her arms casually as she pretended to think.

"It seems quite a disparity, true," she answered. A finger tapped twice on the proud slope of her cheekbone. "But not if you have read the note that states the added thousand sesterces are actually a bonus."

Chie's eyes widened.

"Oh, I haven't seen that yet," she admitted. "I suppose it must have been in the last of the papers you sent today. We haven't finished them yet-though I guess Akiko or Masato should've seen it by now."

"Indeed."

There was a moment's pause; Chie's eyes narrowed.

"The bonus is coming from your own coffers," she accused Shizuru.

"Yes, it is," the general answered, crimson eyes dancing for an instant. "Why, Chie-han, did you think I would use the State's money to bestow an unsanctioned gift on the legions, deserved as it may be?"

The senior legate smirked.

"No, I don't think you'd do that," she retorted jokingly. "Although I do think you would cut the State's bite on the rankers' shares of booty by working out the money distribution ahead of schedule."

They smiled cunningly at each other.

"Strictly speaking, it is not a reduction of the State's share but of the unlawful shares its employees take," Shizuru said, folding both hands on her lap. "Going from past experience, the Treasury officials will try and cheat the rankers into smaller shares if we distribute the booty in Hime, after my triumph."

The nostrils of the perfectly straight nose pinched as she added: "Distasteful."

Chie agreed, smiling at her friend's concern for the rankers as well as the woman's unusual manoeuvre. The Treasury officers would be rankled, of course, but they could hardly voice their irritation aloud-or not with impunity, anyway: the woman responsible for confounding their corruption was the same one who had already put thousands of talents into the state coffers. A very profitable campaigner was Shizuru Fujino for both State and soldiers.

She heard a shuffle of cloth and knew Shizuru had crossed her legs.

"Of course, they'll have to wait to be paid after all the loot is actually converted into hard cash," Chie mused aloud. "But even so, their shares will already be safe because they'll have been given the promissory notes before even returning to Fuuka. That's smart, Shizuru-san. Very smart."

"Why, thank you for the compliment."

The senior legate pointed her chin at the general.

"Very tricky too," she said suddenly. "The bonus from you?"

The smirk was in the gleam of Shizuru's eyes.

"I suppose you plan to announce that bonus in a speech to the legions?" Chie guessed.

"Yes."

"Else they misattribute the largesse to someone else, eh?" The senior legate frowned in thought. "Since the directive was for all payout notes, that means even the legions posted elsewhere-say Sosia, or Argentum-are going to get the same bonus."

"Of course. It would be unwise to bestow such a gift on merely one section of the army."

Chie's eyes dropped; she studied her feet. "That's... nearly two hundred talents per legion you'll be spending for that bonus. A thousand talents for the whole."

There was silence; a very faint colour reached Chie's cheeks as she looked up at her friend, who regarded her with twinkling eyes.

"Yes, I did the numbers in advance!" she burst out, laughing in embarrassment. Shizuru laughed too, having been trying to withhold it earlier; both of them knew of Chie's distaste for numbers.

"Anyway, that's remarkable open-handedness-though we both know you can afford it."

Again, the subtle gleam of crimson eyes.

"I do not think I can truly contest that, at any rate," the fair-haired woman said to her friend, who listened to her attentively. "After all, I plan to spend even more than that. I have yet to write the directive, but I have decided on it."

"What is it now?"

Shizuru's eyes stared into hers, little red points in Chie's vision.

"It has been well past a century since the army has had a pay raise, so I am going to implement a pay raise for everyone in mine, before I leave."

"A pay raise for everyone." Chie considered it, then felt a shiver creep down her neck when she realised how much money that would entail. They had five Himean legions with them, which meant just about twenty-five thousand legionaries. Twenty-five thousand salaries to raise.

"That will be expensive," she said. "To say nothing of the trouble you'll be making for yourself once Senate hears of it."

"It would come from my own purse initially, until I can push legislation in Hime for the matter. Still, I do not intend to wait for the legislation first. Given the prevailing attitude to pay raises, it would be safe to say that the currency should have inflated beyond the pay raise my legislation would have stipulated at its introduction by the time the bill is passed."

Somehow, that did not dispel the shiver.

"That's-by how much do you intend to raise it?" Chie dared to ask.

"Double the present one."

The shiver erupted into a full-blown shudder. The senior legate did not have to do the sums to realise it: that was so much money! And Shizuru talked about it as though it were nothing.

"Then, since it's currently five hundred sesterces per year for each soldier, that would mean a thousand instead," she said, once able. "That comes to...?"

"Twelve and a half million sesterces," her friend finished for her. "Five hundred talents for implementation. So I estimate that I shall be spending at least fifteen hundred talents more before I go."

My god, Chie thought, staring in shock at the other woman. She says it without even batting a blonde eyelash!

"Of course, that does not yet include the cost of mass production for the new model of the pilum," Shizuru was saying, still in that nonchalant voice. Her lips pursed momentarily as she added: "Regardless of my-no, our, rather-impending return to Hime, I believe I shall still have it done. After all, I do intend to return to this place as soon as possible."

Chie noticed that she had a glance to the girl near them at that statement. Oh, the unease in a certain pair of green eyes! That definitely had to be the reason for Shizuru's odd demeanour of late. Was it not always?

"Uh, the new pilum," Chie began, nodding at the item propped up nearby. "It's rather neat a concept, as far as weapons go. Though how you thought of it, I can't imagine."

Shizuru acknowledged the compliment gracefully, remarking that someone else would surely have devised it had she not done so already.

"It is rather irritating when your enemies use your own spears against you immediately after you throw," she sighed, obviously reliving several instances of it in her mind. "Or, sometimes, simply keep them for a while and use them against you another day. It happens so often, and I have long thought about it. How could we prevent them from casting back at us the spears we cast their way?"

"You solved the problem impressively." The short-haired woman stretched her arms. "How precisely does it work now, this new one?"

"You hoist it with an arm, take aim, and throw. Ideally, it should work then."

"Stop teasing me," Chie said with a smile.

"Very well." Shizuru nodded at the implement they were discussing. "The join between shaft and blade is now a weak pin, which breaks at first impact. Not only does this ensure that the enemy cannot return the spears immediately, but that they cannot take them for plunder and later use. I do not think they will spare the extra effort to not only pick up such a broken weapon but also figure out how exactly we put said weapon back together-for we can, or our artificers can. The mechanism should be sufficiently foreign to confound our foes in the meantime, however. Hence, we not only preserve our own skins but also preserve stocks. Chances are, most of our thrown pila should be left on the battlefield, broken in two but ready for repair by our mechanics."

Chie nodded appreciatively, loving the good sense of the invention as well as the imagination it had taken to think of it.

"You'll put the old military spear, the hasta, out of commission," she said with admiration. "It'll work, I bet. Who else would've thought of making a pilum that breaks apart after first throw? Still..."

"Still?"

Chie grinned unrepentantly: "You'll light another fire under the conservatives' arses. And maybe some other bums too. Let's just say most of Senate."

Shizuru smiled.

"True," was all she said, and very dreamily.

Chie laughed.

"I love your unconcern," she told her commander.

"Because their whining truly concerns me far less than the safety of the soldiers. They are not the ones on the receiving ends of the enemy spears, being quite free to lecture on tradition's importance over practicality as they lounge in their comfy couches."

"Well, that's a good way of putting it. But they still won't buy it."

"Again, something I believe deserves unconcern." This time, it was Shizuru who showed her teeth unrepentantly. "After all, they might not buy it, but I can always buy them."

The senior legate hooted with laughter, drawing the curious glances of the others in the room. The general merely smiled at her friend.

"Jupiter, you're wicked," Chie said when she calmed down, eyebrows wiggling. "But you're right. As always."

"Ahh." For some reason, that prompted a slight twist in Shizuru's expression. "No, Chie-han. I am not always."

And then she added with a humourless smile, "But I wish I were, vain though that wish may be."

The atmosphere in the room changed, as though a gust of the wind outside had somehow blown in. Chie hesitated after Shizuru's final words. What could she say to that?

A little to Shizuru's side, she could almost feel the general's girl fidgeting too.

"Chie-han."

She snapped back to attention, meeting Shizuru's eyes.

"You said that Akiko-han and Masato-han should be finishing your work soon. Perhaps you would indulge me in providing company for a short walk?" The eyes, which she would have sworn to be bleeding something earlier, were themselves again: warm with a serenely banked fire. "I believe I need a break too. Sitting in a chair all day stiffens the joints."

The legate agreed.

"I know what you mean," she answered. "Come on, then, and let's stretch our legs a little."

"Yes."

They rose, with Shizuru casting a look at the Otomeian who got up with them.

"Natsuki."

Chie held her breath, awash with curiosity; the Otomeian girl looked strangely as if she were expecting a slap.

"Did you not say you had some matters to discuss with your fellows?" Shizuru asked the question casually, even far too casually for Chie to consider it normal. When had her friend ever been casual when it came to this girl?

"You should do so now instead of worrying about it later," Shizuru continued. "We are not going very far, perhaps only to the trade street nearby. The nearest one, with the locksmith whose wares we perused last week."

The dark-haired woman opened her mouth, only to be cut off when Shizuru shook her head.

"Go on," said the older woman. "I promise you we shall be fine. If you finish quickly, you may come for me if I am still there. We shall not loiter any further than that street. I can go unassisted by you a moment."

Something painful crossed Natsuki's face. It was so young, so tenderly hurt, that even Chie felt wounded for her. Even more so when Shizuru spoke again with brutal finality.

"Now go," the golden woman uttered. "Child."

Poor girl, Chie found herself thinking, looking at the strangled expression in the Otomeian's eyes: she obviously did not want to leave her charge yet. All the same, she acquiesced to Shizuru's order and left the room. The two women watched her. Or rather, one pretended to watch her and the other pretended not to.

And for being the one to send her away, the former thought, while observing Shizuru from the corner of an eye, you'd think she wasn't the one who gave the order from the way she watches her so yearningly.

"Please take care of matters while I am away," Shizuru said to the other officers in the room. A tribune rushed to hand her two cloaks, and she gave the earnest young man a smile.

The pair exited the room and started to walk down the corridor.

"A cloak, Chie-han." She handed one of the wraps to the legate, who accepted it. "How are you, really? Not merely as concerns your work."

"By myself? Well enough, thank the gods. You?"

"Well."

A lie, Chie thought. "That's good."

"I am a little worried, though," Shizuru said, when they reached the main hall.

Chie waited, and was disappointed when Shizuru continued: "For the army."

The senior legate looked at her friend and commander.

"Do you mean with your, er, replacement?"

Shizuru nodded.

"I can only hope he or she treats them well while I am away," she explained, perhaps a touch doubtfully. "Or as well as can be expected, at any rate. Being stationed in a land such as this for so uncertain a mission is hard to a soldier. One must know how to make it better for them, and that without giving too much kindness or brutality."

She was too delicate to say what she really meant, of course, but Chie picked up on it: the only reason the legions had thus far been willing to put up with this 'uncertain mission' was the fact that she was their commander. Every ranker of Hime knew by now of the maxim that Shizuru Fujino could not be beaten-or had never been, anyway, and seemed unlikely to-and that her soldiers always came back from campaign loaded with wealth. The promise of glory and gold was always a great force of motivation. Even so, that was only a small part of it, Chie knew. There was always the thing between Shizuru and her legions, that which could not be explained simply but could nevertheless be expressed in one sentence.

Shizuru's soldiers loved her.

"So long as they know you'll be coming back, they should be set for anything coming their way, in the interim," Chie responded, although she was a little doubtful too; they still had no idea who the replacement would be. Would they love him too? Perhaps, if he was fortunate, but never the way they loved Shizuru, and never that much.

"I hope," she continued, "whoever the newcomer is, that he doesn't play too much with the legions' positions yet. Unless he actually knows what he's doing. But it's a tricky thing even then. The greener legions could suffer if he tries to put them too far afield without having their confidence."

Shizuru sounded agreement. Her choices of where to station each legion had been the results of care and calculation. Out of the five Himean legions total in her army, she had two legions of her veterans and another that was veteran from another general's campaign. The remaining two legions had been composed of raw recruits, which the legate Taro had first blooded at Stych Gorge.

"The Fourteenth and Eleventh have proven themselves, of course," Shizuru said. "Taro-han and Nao-han assured me of this much after they used them with the Ninth at the gorge. Hence I saw fit to leave them in Sosia's garrison instead of taking them with me here. At least, being stationed in the middle position, they would feel safe in the thought that they are accessible to both the Argus and Argentum garrisons-both veterans-which should give them more confidence in their defence, should anything arise. Impending help gives the most desperate soldiers hope."

They were out of the governor's mansion now, and walking down the path through its grounds. Officers and soldiers passing by saluted them.

"That's true. But I doubt you intended to leave them there for mere defence," Chie guessed.

"Yes. I actually meant to take the Fourteenth with me on the first incursion into Obsidian's lands," Shizuru confessed. "Blood them even further, so as to make them true veterans. After all, it is a poor thing for a legion not to develop confidence enough to avoid relying on support for hope."

"I understand. Well, if they're marching directly under your command, it would've taken no time at all. Who's the primipilus you put in charge of the Fourteenth, by the way? I forgot."

"Kazama-han."

"Oh, right!" Chie burst into laughter. "She's a beast, that one."

At Shizuru's glance, she explained: "All sweet smiles and nice words, but Nao's equal when it comes to bloodwork and war. Thoroughly frightening woman."

Shizuru smiled too, always pleased by compliments to her centurions. She was extremely fond of all of them, as was true of any general worth her salt.

"What about the other greenies? The Eleventh?" Chie asked, only to receive a slight smirk. "What is it?"

The fair woman chuckled, bestowing a dazzling grin on her friend.

"I had intended to leave them in the care of my senior legate," Shizuru confessed, drawing an embarrassed chuckle from Chie. "But I suppose that plan must undergo revision."

"Heh."

"Worry not about it, Chie-han." Shizuru gave her friend's shoulder a quick pat as they emerged through the gates and into the street. "I already guessed you would prefer to remain in Hime afterwards, in order to make good on your promise to Senou-han about pressing your suit. Or am I mistaken?"

Chie confessed it reluctantly, unable to shake the feeling of abandoning her friend. After all, Shizuru had just admitted to needing her services for the campaign once she returned. She was about to say she had changed her mind when the commander stopped her, shaking her golden head.

"No," Shizuru said firmly. "If you would prefer to stay in Hime even when I return to resume my mission here, that is fine. After all, I believe you can aid me as much there as here, being as skilled in politics as you are in war. I always need more help with the Senate, after all. Unless you would decline?"

"It'd be my pleasure!" Chie replied quickly with relief, before catching herself. "But who will be your senior legate?"

"I already have someone in mind."

A while passed of her waiting before Chie groaned long and loud.

"You're not telling me, are you?" she accused Shizuru, who pretended to look innocent. "At least let me guess."

"You have one attempt," Shizuru replied.

"You're going to elevate one of the present ones-I'm betting either Kenji or Shouhei."

"No." Chie groaned again and the fair woman giggled. "You shall soon see. It is not someone who has ever served as legate for me, in fact, and I fancy it shall surprise you when I acquire this person's consent. It may be difficult, I admit, for this person has been away from the public eye for a while and seems generally set on keeping up that state. There may be some reluctance."

"Oh, now I wonder. Still, that presents a problem for you, doesn't it?"

"Perhaps so, but it is a problem I may overcome." She looked up, eyes fixed unwaveringly on the road before her. "I have every faith that I shall."

The senior legate inhaled deeply, smelling the salt odour of the nearby sea and the people, and the smoky scent of old and new fires.

"I'm sure you will," she said to her friend, whom she adored for her familiar yet still-surprising-sometimes confidence. It was so easy to adore someone who could be sure of herself with neither arrogance nor illusion. "Don't you always get what you want?"

The retirement into weariness in Shizuru's eyes... she should not have said that, she saw. She regretted it immediately, but found cause to be glad for her own slip afterwards, when she realised Shizuru had only been waiting for an appropriate opening in order to talk about whatever was bothering her.

They were walking in the public market now, and Shizuru slowed to peruse one of the stalls. The merchant came to life at the sight of the two army officers, pushing forward his best wares and urging them to touch and try whatever they found to their taste.

"I do not always get what I want, really," Shizuru said, waving the merchant away to show she needed no assistance. "Sometimes I think the gods like to remind us of that."

Chie sucked on her teeth for a second before daring to ask it. She had a feeling Shizuru was waiting for her, which was the only reason she had the strength to hazard a question at all.

"What happened?" she asked. "Did you have a fight?"

"I suppose. Although I do wonder about what exactly constitutes a fight," Shizuru replied, voice a little sad. "Should I say, rather, that it was a disagreement?"

"Differences, I guess," Chie replied, taking a look at the wares too. "What's wrong? Or is it impolitic to ask?"

The other woman made a vague gesture of the hand.

"No. I suppose the truth is that-that I did wish to speak to someone about it."

She lifted a set of beads to her eyes and pretended to frown at it in inspection, although Chie could see she was frowning at something else entirely.

That was when Chie realised, with some surprise, that Shizuru was angry.

"I suppose it may also be part of the reason I am here," the latter was saying, setting down the beads and moving on to another stall.

Chie followed her meekly. "I never realised-I had not thought it possible to be so discomfited."

She caught herself and added, for clarification: "With her, I mean."

Chie nodded understandingly, knowing the truth of what her friend said. That was because she guessed that this was Shizuru's first fight with her young woman. The first fight-the first time for anything-was often a thing in itself, and it overwhelmed you with how lonely it could be. She knew because she remembered her own and remembered how, at the time and perhaps even now, it had seemed to be something she carried along only in herself, without the other person's involvement save as provocation. She knew, too, that once you spent enough time having fights and making up-and, sometimes, not making up-with another person, even the fights would soon become things to be shared. They became no longer matters of loneliness you thought you carried alone, but simply parts of what bound the two of you.

But this was Shizuru's first disagreement with her Otomeian girl and, for now, it probably felt something like a separation.

"When did this happen, if I may know?" she asked, respecting the other woman's solitary pain enough not to tell her what she would know after a little more experience. "Only recently, I believe?"

"Four days ago."

"I see."

"As you recall, that was when we had news of significant events that transpired in Hime."

"Yes, I remember," Chie said, running a hand through her hair. It had more volume than usual, as it had ever since they arrived in this region: her wavy hair tended to do that in weather such as this. She peeked at Shizuru from under her brows, warm brown eyes glimmering. "I take it you're going to ask her to come with us, then?"

"I have."

"Sorry, what?"

"I already have asked her."

Chie swiped her locks from her eyes, looking at her friend in mild surprise. And, seeing the darkness in Shizuru's eyes, she thought: Goodness me!

Shizuru said it before she could ask, although Chie herself doubted she could have worked up the courage to ask this particular question.

"She denied me."

The bitterness ripening that answer! Chie froze in shock at the statement. The Otomeian had denied her?

The younger woman continued.

"She denied me thrice," she said, accents laden with a running, deep bitterness that gave her friend the impression that part of her was thinking, How dare she deny me? Not that Chie would blame her for thinking it, since the legate herself was of the opinion that anyone denying Shizuru would be a fool bird indeed. Oh, how that that particular bird done it? But the chick in question was certainly different from all others. That one flew a different path, if not a wholly different sky.

"Thrice did she deny me, giving such reasons as would a wearied-yet-still-courteous woman some common skulker, attempting such evasions as would fool only the most foolish." Shizuru spoke with some of her usual calm, but it stayed only as far as the surface. Her undertones still expressed a far different emotion. "And that even though I attempted to reason with her, giving her time even to think on it. Four days, Chie-han. Last night I asked once more-for twice did I ask her the first night-and still she refused, giving me paltry reasons for answer."

Giving her head a shake of disgust, she finished: "Not reasons at all, in fact."

Chie bit her lip at that. She was rather grateful that her friend was speaking to her of it-not to mention a little glad to know something others did not, because her nature was to like special intelligence of any kind-so she contributed her reply. Even so, she had the feeling of treading in a trap-laden path as she talked, for she understood this much: the patrician's pride was terribly rankled, and the pride of a patrician was a terrible thing indeed.

"I did notice things were a little strained between you two," she said carefully, avoiding her friend's eyes as they moved through the sidewalk stalls. "No, that's not right. More than a little strained."

"Oh," Shizuru looked sad for a moment, then replaced the expression with a light frown. "Really."

"It's understandable, if that's the case. Even more if she's said it thrice now."

Shizuru shot her a swift glance.

"I am no fool, Chie-han. I do not persuade myself that she takes perverse pleasure in doing it." She shook her head again, forcing her tawny fringe to run riot over her brow. The wind ruffled several curls up at the edges and Chie thought they made Shizuru look almost as though she had tiny horns. She did not find it unattractive.

"I do not imagine malice in her refusals," the horned goddess in front of her said disconsolately. "Even so, I cannot help but feel-feel-I feel mocked by her stubbornness. Do you see what I mean?"

"Yes, I understand."

Shizuru looked anxious. "Is it wrong of me to feel so?"

"No, it's just natural, " Chie assured her. "Don't beat yourself up over that. It would be wrong, though, if just feeling that way were reason enough to make you give up asking a fourth time. Whatever happened to persuasion?"

"I believe it met Natsuki."

Oops, she thought, when she was unable to resist a chuckle. She could not help noticing too that her friend's voice, even now and with the anger, loved the name of the young woman. The way she said it!

Natsuki .

Chie bent her neck to one side, then the other. It gave a satisfying pop, and she sighed.

"Even so, you're not really mad at her, are you?" she asked.

The red-eyed woman threw her another unreadable look, suddenly glancing away just when the legate thought she was about to recognise what was there.

"If you could see her face when she says it," Shizuru said, before giving one of her lovely, forbearing sighs. "Can anyone really stay mad at such a child?"

"Which doesn't really answer the question."

"Precisely," Shizuru said dangerously.

Chie took the hint and changed her line of questioning.

"Anyway, no matter what happened," she started, "you're still going to try and persuade her, right? Even after these times?"

She saw Shizuru pause, holding in her hand a glittery piece of yellow-brown stone she had picked up from a display. She held it in the light and Chie saw the silhouette of something frozen in it-some insect or bug. What her friend was holding was amber. Shizuru seemed to consider the entombed creature carefully, frozen as it was in some crystal plane of existence. She herself seemed frozen in that plane too, in that moment.

That was because Shizuru was remembering.

Try and persuade her, the young general was saying to herself, echoing her friend's words. Shall I try and persuade her more? The answer was yes, of course. But the firmness of that resolve did not alter her apprehension. Each time she thought of how to do it next time, she also thought of how she had done it last. She would think on the first three times and then as now, she would be ashamed.

It was painful, she thought, to be shamed by oneself, especially in front of the person one valued most. Her shame was in what she had done, and how she had reacted to Natsuki's refusal. First had been the shock, of course, of having her fears be realised. But then there had been the attempt to recover, during which she put together her injured confidence as one did a precious, broken crock. Only to find that what she had thought merely broken was actually shattered. How many reasons had she given; how many questions to find the contrary reason? All to no avail as, at the end of the bout, Natsuki had pronounced yet again: "I cannot."

And the apology accompanying each denial had been meaningless, really. Perhaps it had meant something to the Otomeian speaking it; perhaps not. To her, however-to Shizuru, the asker-it meant nothing at all. She heard it each time it was spoken; some part of her mind recognised the signification; nevertheless, no part of her accepted it. How could she accept it? To do so would mean she was accepting the reason requiring it.

Hence it was impossible for her not to be angry with Natsuki, especially when she could not even afford to recognise that Natsuki had, in fact, said the word "Sorry".

She had been so angry. It was only a natural outcome of frustration, so it did not shame her too deeply. What really shamed her, however, was the wrath coming with it. Anger was one thing; wrath, another. Anger could be cold. It could be chilled to the clarity of ice. But wrath to Shizuru was always hot, fiery and unreasonable when it bubbled. And it had bubbled that night she pressed Natsuki in their bath... so much so that she had actually imagined seizing the younger woman by the arms and shaking her until her teeth rattled. She had not acted on the temptation at the time. Even so, the mere knowledge that it had passed was shameful.

And it only grew to be more shameful, for she had acted on it last night.

As though anyone could force such a creature by bruising her so, she thought in self-revulsion, brows slanting so suddenly that it confused the senior legate, who thought the expression for her. She shook her head at the short-haired woman, smiling lightly to make it clear she felt no displeasure with her.

Not with you, Chie-han, she told her silently. Only myself.

She pointed out to Chie some minor detail about the amber in her hand, even as she continued her contemplations. Where was she? Oh, yes: bruising Natsuki . Very easy to do! Fair people bruised easily, of course, and Natsuki was so fair she could be considered pallid, if not for the colour that came so easily to her face. Unfortunately, the same alacrity applied to the colour that came to her knocks, as Shizuru had noticed. A modest bump on the arm would quickly see a mark in an hour; a knock on the shin bloomed blue in minutes. Natsuki had such thin skin, luminously white and beautifully translucent, enough for you to see the fine traceries of her royal veins. Such thin and tender skin, for all the hard flesh underneath; so thin that you tended to feel only the firm strength it sheathed, forgetting the tenderness of what lay above.

Which I do, sometimes, as I did last night, she admitted angrily. I forget even my own strength. And that is unacceptable.

Added to everything was the fact that this-the incident last night-was not even the first time she had forgotten such things. If she really thought about it, how many times had she carelessly subjected Natsuki to her force? What manner of greenhorn wielded strength so recklessly? Oh, how she hated that residual recklessness in her! Everything in her life thus far had been directed to the goal of weaning out such undesirable characteristics as recklessness and loss of control, such things as might prove her undoing. Now it seemed there were still vestiges left, deep in the corners. Her sole consolation now was that they only ever slipped from hiding around one person. That offered only the slightest balm to her pride; the consolation was still largely flat. In the end, the sole witness to her lapses was the one who mattered most of all.

And could that even be why I forget, she wondered. For it was only ever around Natsuki that she experienced those high flares of dark humour, only about Natsuki that she experienced losing her control. And such control! It was so envied, so admired, in fact, that it had grown fabulous among her foes and followers alike. Shizuru knew that, so she valued and tended to it. But at times like these, all that careful tending seemed for naught. Oh, how it would shock them, all those admirers! How they would marvel at Natsuki, who could crack the hide on that fabled composure and squeeze out the pulse hiding in it, squeezing out Shizuru's self-possession until it was no more than a shrivelled pulp.

Shizuru winced at the memory of how it felt to be so undone by another. Still so fresh; still bleeding the drops, the pulp stinging within her . She continued to remember.

Remember, for instance, the awkwardness of the past four days, with the two of them hardly able to have a conversation that was not forced. Remember the coldness of the nights now, with her working late into the morning and Natsuki waiting wearily at her side, waiting with an impregnable aura of solitude that drove Shizuru deeper into the work, further into the numbers. Remember, even, her attempt to fix everything the fourth day-yesterday-with the awkwardness of resuming sweet words unspoken for a while, trying to overcome her own unease with a parody of confidence. Only to receive again the same answer.

No .

Remember the rising wrath, the scorching dissatisfaction with a woman who had only ever given her satisfaction until then.

Another private wince.

Never before from her, this discontent. Nor this pain.

Natsuki had been cruel in her constancy. She had refused to waver. Shizuru remembered too her own cruelty of the night before, choosing to relive it in self-torture. She remembered it with the sorrow of a woman who had done some wrong, perpetrated some meanness, and now took both satisfaction and shame from the experience. She remembered being disgusted with Natsuki's incessant and meaningless repetitions of the same reasons, the same themes and excuses. She had been so disgusted with the reiterations, in fact, that she had gone to bed straight after that first fruitless argument, leaving the girl standing awkwardly at the other end of the room.

She also remembered having blown out the lamp wordlessly, speaking only when she realised the girl remained near the window.

The memories returned at the thought of Natsuki's slender form, a cold silhouette drafted by the low moonlight.

"Natsuki."

She had frowned at the time, her face turned to the small but inflexible back of the other woman. She had been angry still when she spoke her name, but had been unable to find the heart to truly growl at her.

"What are you doing? Why do you not come to bed yet?"

She had known the answer, of course, and it had only made the wrath rise quicker. It had seemed natural to wait for Natsuki to turn around, to attempt to answer, before cutting her.

"Why do you stay away?" she had asked again, before the girl could reply. Showing a twisted smile in the silver light, she had continued speaking casually to the Otomeian: "Is your determination to distance yourself from me so strong that you already do it now?"

That had struck Natsuki like a slap; it had shown. Shizuru had known it was unfair of her to say such a thing, even if only as a stinging tease, but some part of her took satisfaction in the hurt she caused the young woman. It was a very human thing she had done then, she thought: to be hurt and want to hurt back.

"Shi-Shizuru, no," Natsuki had begun, shaking her head slowly. "That-"

Shizuru had cut her off yet again: "Then come to bed already."

The Otomeian had obeyed, radiating a mute apology. That might have been what prompted Shizuru to turn her face away so that she would not have to watch the girl climb into bed with her. That had been and was still part the problem, was it not? That, no matter what she did or said, Natsuki had refused to get angry and only ever seemed apologetic. Shizuru was amazed by it, even now: how many stinging little words had she let loose that night, she wondered, how many traps? A dozen, perhaps, or more than a dozen. Each trap had failed. Each time, Natsuki had flatly refused to get angry, evading each invitation to a quarrel even as it hit her hide. She had refused Shizuru even a salve that, petty as it might be, Shizuru had nonetheless needed in order to vent her fury. Perhaps had she done so, in fact, she might have been calmer later-as was true of most lovers, had she asked any about their quarrels or jealousies. However, Natsuki gave her no opportunity to expel the building steam.

All she ever gave Shizuru, it had seemed, was refusal and apology.

I hate it, the Himean had thought then, upon realising those two things from Natsuki, combined, were somehow unbearably close to pity. She had never been one to take well to pity, given her pride. Her dignitas permitted her to take no charity, and she would not take it even from the woman she loved. It tore her apart to see the unremitting gentleness that permeated all Natsuki's actions when it came to her-the oddly unwavering tenderness the girl could have even when she was flatly refusing her. Was that not insupportable? Was it not infuriating to have the girl continue to show such kindness, such partiality to her, while nonetheless declining her offer? For that was the oddity there, the thing Shizuru could not understand: if Natsuki could feel enough for her to refuse to become angry at anything she did even while remaining short of temper with most others, how in the world could she continue saying No?

It seemed as though the young woman was saying her affection for Shizuru was enough only for that: either it was pity, which was terrible in itself, or it was merely a passing like. It seemed that she liked Shizuru, but not enough.

How can it be enough, Shizuru had asked sorrowfully that night, as the other body had gone under the covers. How can it be enough when I want her to feel not merely 'like'?

It was that question that had turned her over in their bed, so as to face the young woman and promise her, darkly: "This is not yet over."

Natsuki had gone rigid.

"You must know this is not yet over," Shizuru had repeated passionately, her words coming out in a hot rush. "I will continue to ask, Natsuki. You must come with me. I don't-I just do not understand why you will not come with me. The reasons you give, they are weak. I told you. You say King Kruger would not permit it; I contest that highly. Why would he not? I would return you to this land in a short time, more knowledgeable about the world and having learned more than he could ever have hoped for you to learn about other cultures from your apprenticeship under me, as my bodyguard here. Even had he some reservations about it initially, I have no doubt that my influence would be powerful in swaying him-that I could persuade him swiftly to change his mind. I could do it in front of you, if you like, that you may witness it for yourself."

There had been a choked sound from Natsuki, followed by an attempt to voice a protest. Shizuru had stopped her before she could go further.

"The same goes for your argument about your duty. I know your command systems by now, and know that there are sufficient captains and even a second-in-command to take over for you should you be gone. As for your duty to the kingdom, I already pointed out it could be easily arranged such that your duty would be to accompany me and learn from our land-as I have done from yours."

Again had been the attempt to get a word in, edgewise; again her frantic refusal, an echo of Natsuki's too.

"It cannot be so that you merely fear to be away from your native land. It is so short a time. A year, at most. Would it be so hard a thing, were you with me? Natsuki, you must see the force of my argument. Is there something you are not telling me? Why will you not come with me? In god's name, why will you not come with me?!"

She had been surprised after that outburst, for she had found herself suddenly pinned and kissed by the other. She had almost thought it assent then but realised otherwise when she felt the restraint in the body above hers: the body that had, apparently, simply been trying to hold her down in silence. This from Natsuki, who had always been glad to listen to her when no one else possibly could. And the hurt she had felt then-the injury of being so weighed down by someone else's rejection-had been terrible. Natsuki had been her own personal gravity, dragging her powerlessly downwards to her knees and into the silence.

Now this, she had thought in her grief, trying to dislodge the girl.
Now you even refuse to hear me.

Natsuki's lips had been insistent and unmoving. Shizuru had bitten the girl lightly at first to make her move her mouth. When that failed, however, she had bitten a little harder, and a little harder after that, and still a little harder: hard enough, in fact, for her to eventually feel the copper juice of the Otomeian's blood on her tongue. Even then, though, the girl's mouth had stoutly refused to go, silent and silencing.

Something inside Shizuru had welled up, rebelled at this treatment. She had a right to plead her case; she had that much, did she not? Yet, there Natsuki was, attempting to deprive her even of that. Not this too, she had thought in frustration, I cannot be deprived of this too. Up had come her arms, gripping Natsuki around the arms and pushing her up and away. And then holding her suspended, holding her too hard but not realising it at the moment, or not until she felt the sharp indrawn breath against her face. She had felt the anxiety of muscle being crushed tight and saw, only then, that it was not her own. It had been so hard to tell: at the very moment Natsuki had mutely rejected her words, she had felt as though all the pain in the world had coalesced and become hers.

A light whine had sounded when she finally relinquished her hold, and it made her know, with a twinge of guilt, that she had indeed hurt the girl.

"Hmnn..."

The two of them had sighed at the same time, and had eyed each other sadly in the dark. And, though neither could see it, both their faces had been regretful.

"Natsuki."

At that, Natsuki had sighed again, almost with resignation. Shizuru had stroked the abused arms gently then, feeling the pulse of blood in the girl's arms, life returning to the vessels she had just constricted. That was when she had known that she should apologise, for she had not intended to hurt her that way. Or perhaps she had not intended it knowingly, at least.

Even then, it had taken a while before she managed to say the words. Who would have known if Natsuki would reject them yet again, even before they came out?

"I'm sorry."

The body atop her had shuffled down, Natsuki's head going to her chest in an unexpected gesture. It had been unexpected enough for her to feel guilty all over again.

"Sorry," she had murmured once more, starting to feel as though she could now return to being the young woman's lover. She had moved her right hand to the other's mouth, near her own breast, and stroked the younger woman's chin with a shaking finger. It had been the lip itself she had sought to soothe, but she had not been sure if touching it would hurt, so she had decided to stroke the skin below it instead. And that was when she had found that Natsuki's jaw held a faint tremble too, which was enough to rock her further back to her calmer senses.

"Natsuki, I am sorry," she had repeated in an urgent whisper. "I did not mean to hurt-"

A nuzzle had cut her off, brushing against her chest.

"I know," had been the unexpected answer, which had made the regret throb harder. "All right."

Before she could say anything, the girl had followed: "Sorry too. Shizuru."

"Ahh."

At the same time the breath left her, she had drawn up the body resting above, pulling it until she could kiss the other woman in a sublimation of all her feelings. It had been a rough kiss, and that because she had known that it would take that, first, before she could truly be gentle with her again.

"No," she had whispered afterwards, holding Natsuki's hot cheek with one hand. "It was my fault."

Then had followed the softer kiss between them. Then, too, was when she had taken the time to feel that the girl's lip had still been plump: between her teeth like a segment of fruit, both sweet and coppery. Shizuru had tasted the blood she had drawn, and it had been enough to keep her from going further.

"I am sorry," she had said once more, after pulling back. "Very much so. I merely wanted so much to talk about it. To be given a chance."

There had been no answer to that, but she had not expected any. She had continued.

"But I suppose you are too tired to listen to my blather today."

She had felt the girl's head turn a little away, and had known it was because the other was afraid the wrath would come again. It was at that moment, having Natsuki turn from her, that she resolved to let it be for a while.

Just a little while, for us-no, for me to calm down.

"We shall talk about this again, but not tonight."

She had pressed another kiss on the injured lips. Natsuki had nodded, looking at her in the dark. To some extent, she had been glad she could not see it too well then: she had been glad, just that one time, not to have to see those green eyes that drew her so quickly out of herself. She had not wanted them to hurt her any more that night and prompt her to hurt them in return.

The sharp glitter of light on the amber in her hands pulled her back to the present. She looked at it again, trying to distance herself from the memories a little. She did not want to dwell once again on that ache. Better to look at this thing instead, this little piece of amber. Better to look at it as though it were the only thing that mattered.

The dead insect in the stone stood out darkly.

Just like my wrong, she mused helplessly, suddenly remembering the ghostly stripes of her fingers on Natsuki's arms this morning. She had seen them when they bathed together, and it had horrified her to see just how badly she had hurt the girl. It caused another inward groan: that wrong was fossilised too.

My wrong is forever crystallised now, she thought. Not outside, even, but inside her. And, though she forgave me, the memory of what I did shall remain. She and I shall always know that I once intended to hurt her.

She should not have hurt her, really. She should have known better than that. But it was hard to think of things in terms of what you knew and what you did not. Knowing you should not do something was rarely enough to prevent you from doing it. For instance, the cooler part of her knew she should not even have thought of bringing Natsuki back home. But that hardly compared to the strength of the part of her that was determined she would.

But now she was a little afraid of something, and it was something she had never really considered before, in her plans: was her love for Natsuki so injurious, then, as last night had proven? Would she be liable to hurt her again, and in a far worse way than that? If so, she truly had no right to take her to another land out of some muddled claim to love, or to passion. Or perhaps, it was better to say both, as with the words passionate love. Not all loves were passionate, she had come to understand recently, and she knew now where the line lay. All passions went too far. Otherwise, how could they be called passion? And she knew now that her love was of the most passionate kind.

It frightened her.

This was partly a result of having identified it for what it was, she thought. Having been able to name it, she had imbued it with even more power. And it was growing, in fact, even more quickly than she herself could have imagined. She had a notion of its hunger: she felt, sometimes, that it was eating her alive. But what should have been primarily a concern for herself was subordinate to that for another. She wondered-would it eat Natsuki too? Would it reach a time where she would renege, even, on her promise to return the other woman to this land? What was the scope and breadth of this thing's hunger? Would her love for Natsuki be so vast, perhaps, that it would someday engulf the younger woman's life?

No, that could not be all there was to it. She pushed back against the fear, argued for herself against herself, defending her affection for the other woman as something more than pure selfish hunger. She wanted her: that was a given. But she wanted so much for her too.

She wanted her always safe. How could she ensure the integrity of that strong-yet-delicate body if it was so distant, far in a land where someone less skilled as a commander might place it in harm's way? This was the reality of their lives: to be soldiers meant to risk life and limb, to place it in the trust of both Fortuna's favour and a tactician's cunning. Shizuru knew she had both things in spades, and that was what had used to console her when she thought of the battles through which they would go. But now? Now both things were uncertain variables, not the constants her soldiers trusted to be in her. And if the uncertainty that spelled for her rankers' lives was painful already, then how much more was the thought of how it could affect Natsuki?

There were other things she wanted for Natsuki, too, aside from safety. She wanted to feed that enormous hunger for knowledge she often felt in the girl; she wanted to take her to the best booksellers and have her buy out their stocks. Then she would have the young woman pick out those tomes she most favoured, in order to commission specially-made, tastefully decorated copies of those scrolls for her own keeping. She wanted to give her a personal library, so she would no longer borrow from those of others. She would fill that library such that every book-collector in Hime would colour green with envy.

She wanted to show her a world beyond the library. She wanted to take her to the Forum and show her the edifices, the seats and structures upholding Hime's law and culture. She wanted to bring her to the games whenever there were any, and let her cheer at the races, urging her to place bets whenever she sighted a charioteer she found promising. She wanted to bring her to the Porticus Margaritaria and take her shopping, watch her delight in the sheer diversity and excellence of the wares to be found there. Then, whenever she had to part from her momentarily to go to a Senate session, she wanted to pass by the Porticus herself and get something that would put the light into those lovely green eyes-or perhaps stop by the great flower market and buy blooms and lilies by the dozen, great sprays of colour and scent to bring back home. She wanted her to laugh with surprise at the gifts. She wanted her to be happy.

She wanted to live with her, as they already did now, but in her own house. She wanted her to lounge in the foliage-and-flower-strewn loggia of her mansion, while overlooking the view of the city considered the most powerful in the world; to see the brilliant dark blue of the sky from her home at night; to watch the splendid drift of constellations in her arms. When the warm days arrived, she wanted to bring her to the summer villa and let her frolic on the beach, stepping high and fast into the water until each droplet of surf kicked up by her feet was a crystal bead on her flanks. She wanted her to soar into the water like one of Poseidon's thoroughbreds, a creature that belonged to both the sea and the sky. Was it so wrong to want to give all of this to her? Was she really so wrong?

Her eyes misted, and she shut them.

"Shizuru-san?"

She opened her eyes and looked her legate, who was eyeing her with great interest.

Up came the polished hunk of amber in her hand.

"Think she would like it?" she asked the other woman, suddenly smiling. It was so stunning a sight, even to her friend, that it confused the senior legate for a second.

Chie stared in puzzlement at her, then at the object, before nodding.

"I'd guess so-it's an interesting little thing," she replied, as Shizuru smiled at it. " Would she like it?"

"I believe so."

Shizuru made a gesture to the shop-owner, who gladly quoted the price of the bauble. She produced the money and pocketed the amber with satisfaction.

"Thank you," she said sweetly to the merchant, who flushed pink with pleasure. Chie chuckled a little at that.

"Natsuki likes such 'interesting little things', as you put it," she said afterwards, as they went their way through the long street full of traders and their stalls. She gave a wistful chuckle. "Any little thing that might be deemed a point of interest, were it an actual gem or a measly rock. Sometimes I think she would be just as pleased with my gifts were I a poor woman only able to give her paltry things bought second-hand."

"I wouldn't call the things you've picked up for her paltry," Chie said with amusement.

"Some of them might be, monetarily speaking." At the legate's quizzing glance, Shizuru explained: "I have actually given her a rock, you know. To be precise, a terrifically cheap but nice-looking marble I picked up from the ground. To think I meant it as a joke..."

The other woman laughed. "She liked it?"

Shizuru laughed too.

"My girl is a wonderful recipient. I give her marbles still every now and then, if I find any rolling around." She shrugged lightly, allowing herself to feel better for a moment with the good memories. "On occasion, I actually buy them when I find one I think she might like. Glass ones, for example. Glass fascinates her. She says it is water frozen without the cold."

Chie chuckled at the fanciful idea.

"What does-" She paused halfway and amended her question. "Oh, does she play with them?"

The answer sparkling in Shizuru's eyes made Chie laugh again.

"As I am forever saying, such a child," the younger woman said with a grin. "It is why we used to frequent this street and the other, similar areas, if you have noticed. They have such things as would interest her. Knick-knacks of all kinds."

Chie hummed thoughtfully.

"'Used to', Shizuru-san," she said. "You make it sound as though it's a thing of the past. I don't think you need be so pessimistic, if you'll let me say so."

Shizuru smiled softly her way.

"Thank you, Chie-han," the younger woman said. "Thank you for that. I suppose I know that too. I merely said it that way because—well, we had not been out in so long."

"There is a lot to do. Doubt you could find the time."

"I could have made the time." Shizuru smiled that gentle smile again, only now it was directed to the greying sky. "I could and should have."

Chie said nothing to that, knowing it was not her place to respond to such a confession. Instead, she chose to remark on another subject, tangential to this one.

"Some things do put out our plans with the timing," she said with feeling. "This news! Four days ago, we were ready to take on the Mentulae. As Suou says, those curs back home who like to pick on you did it at just the wrong time. Everything's gone awry. The timing is just brilliant."

Shizuru nodded absently at her sarcasm. "Such things do have a marvellous way of appearing at the worst possible time. To think it had to happen then, of all days, too. That particular day and time . "

Tilting her head curiously as Shizuru sighed again, Chie arched her brows in query.

"That particular day? Why was that day so special?"

Something about that put a falter in her; Chie saw her hesitate, and did the same.

"You don't have to sa-"

"No, I do not mind," Shizuru waved, shaking her head slowly. "I do not mind, Chie-han. After all, it did not come to realisation."

"Oh."

They walked a few steps more, Chie watching the street they trod.

"What was it? Had you something planned?" she dared to ask again, a little later. She had a feeling Shizuru would answer, and that was too tempting a possibility to let pass. When the rueful sound passed her friend's lips, she knew she was right.

"That day," Shizuru said, her voice low and beautiful. "That day was indeed special."

Chie kept silent.

"It was when I planned to tell her that I loved her. Not as one loves a passing mistress. As one loves another whom one already feels a permanent part of one's life."

The short-haired woman actually froze in her tracks. Shizuru continued walking, however, so Chie had to rush to catch up after that.

"You-you were-Ecator! Really?" Chie spluttered, earning an amused look from her friend as well as the shopkeeper at whose stall they had paused. She waved her hands frantically, eyes wide. "No, I mean, rather, that I'm not exactly surprised you feel that way-well, all right, perhaps a little-but good gods! Shizuru-san, that's quite a confession!"

Shizuru smiled and said nothing.

"Wait," Chie said, catching herself. "Wait, now. If you planned to tell her that then, does that mean you'd never told her anything of the sort? That you, er, loved her, for instance?"

"Before that? No, strangely enough," Shizuru replied with strange detachment, looking over the items in the stall. "Foolish of me, no?"

"Well, I-I don't really know. I don't know what to say."

"I felt the same way for a while," the other replied with a chuckle.

"Not knowing what to say, that is. And then realising what to say, only to realise it too late."

Something flickered over Shizuru's face; another instant, and it was gone.

"Ah, well." The blonde sucked in a deep breath, and regret rasped it. "It cannot be helped."

She resumed her walk and Chie followed, still wondering. She was not really that surprised, as she had remarked, that Shizuru felt so much for her Otomeian lover: it was already clear to everyone who had regular contact with the pair how much Shizuru adored her foreign girl and how many things she would permit of said girl that no one else would ever be allowed. That said, she still could not help but be astonished by the final, established fact coming from the woman herself. Shizuru, avowedly loving someone? And doing so in such a headlong, dedicated manner? How many ears would rattle, how many hearts sting at that?

She stopped herself with a curious thought: would the Otomeian girl's ears have rattled too at it? Would her heart have stung, only with happiness?

Of course it would have, she insisted almost angrily, her natural compassion letting her feel some sadness for her friend's thwarted plans. No matter how different that bird is, she should've been glad for that too. I can't accept it if she weren't. If the woman telling you such things is someone like Shizuru Fujino, you can't be anything but thankful. It's just not possible!

"I know I should have done it earlier," Shizuru was saying, bringing her back to attention. "I know it now. But I did not."

Chie nodded very slowly, still coming to terms with this unexpected confession.

"I guess you're not really the type to be cavalier with words like that, so I'd understand why you didn't," she said after a moment.

Shizuru looked thoughtful at her answer.

"Do you think so?" Chie's commander asked.

"I-yes, I do. Definitely."

There was a pause. Then Shizuru said something that caused even greater wonder than her words before.

"Yet I felt it even before I knew I should say it."

Chie all but stared at her, and the younger Himean nodded at her legate's dumbfounded expression.

"It is so," she confessed. "It took Suou-han, too, to make me realise it. Now I only wish she had done so earlier, or that I had enough strength to see it on my own, before that. My girl is not someone to be treated lightly, after all, and at the very least, she has long deserved to know without uncertainty the strength of my regard for her. I should have clarified from the beginning that I never saw her as a mere bedwarmer."

She smiled at the still-speechless Chie.

"I am new to this, Chie-han, and yet a tyro at affairs of the heart," she said. "But I do not think that should excuse me from the mistakes I make in this matter, any more than a novice commander's greenness to command makes her any less liable for errors made with her army. I am the one who takes the lead in our relationship, it is true, and thus the one more at fault for such errors than she would be. Yet I have failed her in this thing, and though you may tell me now that it is not as grave a failure as one in battle, this is in a sense a battle of epic significance to me."

Shizuru's eyes fell to her feet, lifting and setting down with near-mechanical precision, and their automation prompted her to smile, because she thought of the other part of her that beat regardless of her will but perhaps in tune now to another's. Something about her in that moment was so lonely then, and so sublime in that loneliness, that Chie forgot even the wonder and shifted almost entirely to concern.

Oh, that fool girl, she thought, without real rebuke but with a touch of sorrow at Shizuru's forlorn expression. She had never seen Shizuru forlorn, and it hurt to see it now. Did that girl even know what she had done to their commander?

She tried to comfort her friend, knowing there was very little she could do or say but knowing that she needed to try at least.

"Most of us don't see it before someone else does, either," she said with care. "Please don't blame yourself for that."

"Perhaps so," came the still-smiling reply. "But I can blame myself, at least, for missing the chance."

Chie turned her head at her friend's fatalism.

"You can still tell her now," she suggested gently.

Her friend's lips moved in yet another soft smile.

"Now," she echoed, looking wistful. "Perhaps I could tell her now. And then, too, I am asking such a thing of her—"

She broke off here and shook her head, liberating a few strands of golden hair from her loose tie.

"No," she uttered, still giving Chie that fond and regretful smile. "I fear I cannot. Consider the circumstances in which I shall be telling her that. Then consider the fact that I mean what I want to tell her, beyond no uncertainties at all. I am a politician, so she knows I am no stranger to manipulation. Surely you understand."

Chie looked at her tenderly, heart going out to the younger woman. She did understand. But it was still so unexpectedly romantic coming from someone known for being ruthless in her outlook that it staggered her even as she thought of it.

"But I shall certainly continue my persuasion, of course," Shizuru conceded a little later, drawing from Chie a smile.

"That much, at least," the legate replied.

She stopped when she noticed someone waving at them from a nearby shop. It was a tailor's store, and it was one of her fellow legates waving from the doorway.

"I say. Well, it's Suou-san," she said to Shizuru, who turned at that moment to see their comrade.

They came over, exchanging greetings quickly and coming into the store to get out of the cold. The shopkeeper offered refreshments for the three officers-which they declined-but insisted on fetching wine anyway. They thanked him for his trouble and talked while waiting, looking over the bolts of cloth he had put up for customers' inspection.

"How good to see the two of you here," Suou was saying as she stroked a grainy, reddish-brown fabric. "Doing some shopping too?"

Shizuru, standing next to her, answered: "Oh, we were merely stretching our legs... although I did end up purchasing something."

She extracted the amber she had put into her pocket earlier and displayed it to the other patrician, who nodded appreciatively.

"Very nice," she said. "The wasp's preserved nicely. For Natsuki-san?"

"Yes."

"She'll like it-she's the type for that sort of thing," Suou returned, before explaining in reply to Chie's droll look: "You know, the curious type. I imagine she likes such curiosities."

The woman who knew best that specimen of the curious type agreed.

"Yes," Shizuru said. "Indeed she does."

"And you, Suou-san?" Chie started, walking around the little shop.
"What brings you here?"

Suou reached for yet another bolt of cloth as she answered.

"Just updating my wardrobe," she said. "I had intended to do it come this time, anyway, even without everything else that's happened."

"Setting in for the cold?"

"More like the damp." She smiled and held up a large square of patterned light blue cloth to her front, twirling foolishly for the sake of her friends' laughter. "They assure me this country gets terribly wet come the thaw, flooding rivers and all. I thought a few more full-sleeved tunics might be useful. How is this?"

Shizuru said she suited it, as did Chie. The Himemiya held the fabric away with her arms and eyed it pensively.

"As I thought," she murmured. "Blondes really do go well with icy hues."

Smiles tugged at the others' mouths from the double entendre.

"Shizuru-san doesn't wear blues so often, though," Chie noted. "Do you?"

Shizuru made a vague gesture at her clothing. She was in a long, white tunic that was belted around the waist, with the tight reddish-brown breeches used by the officers for winter under it. Over her shoulders was a yellowish cloak, its fabric thick but of obviously high quality.

"Often enough, I would think," she said. "You simply do not notice because you are so often with me on army duties, Chie-han, and we all tend to wear the standard military issue gear then."

"Ah, true," Chie answered.

"Where is she, anyhow?" Suou asked.

"Where is who?"

"Obviously, tha-oh, never mind," Suou said, pale brows rising as she spied something or someone through the open window of the shop. "Here she is now. I suppose you sent her on an errand?"

The other women turned to the direction she was facing just as a blast of black hair and wind entered. The new arrival shut the door behind her, frantic green eyes easing when they settled on her general. Something in her body seemed to sigh.

The three women stared at her in varying degrees of surprise and interest. To Chie, particularly, her appearance was a strangeness, something she had yet to see.

I don't think I've ever seen her so anxious, the legate thought, silently assessing the girl's flushed countenance. It's so different from her usual cool.

It was different indeed. It was obvious the newcomer had come from outside at a great rush, for the perpetually straight hair seemed wind-tangled, rolling tendrils around her face. They coiled around her whiteness and Chie imagined, suddenly, that this was how she must look when Shizuru took her: her black hair damp on hot cheeks, the petal mouth parting. Lovely. She was such a lovely young filly. Certainly worth hiking up a tunic, as the soldiers would say. A more articulated picture came to her all of a sudden, and she found she had to look away.

She had imagined, for a small instant, being the one hiking up her tunic.

Dangerous! she thought with a scowl at the floor, refusing to look at Shizuru's bodyguard just yet. Chie had always thought the girl beautiful, true, if a touch cold in her haughtiness-but that just now had been pure heat. It stunned her. Then again, perhaps she had always known it was there too. But now she had actually felt what she had known, and the power of it made her ask how she had failed to do so before. The nerve-searing pull of it! She struggled for words, shaking her head inwardly. How did someone so frosty manage to be so suddenly sexual as well?

And if she felt like that, if the sight of the girl this instant could make her feel like that-how did Shizuru possibly feel?

She remembered the third Himean in the room. She looked off to the side and was relieved: her fellow legate's eyes were fixed only on the couple before them and had not seen her slip.

"Sshhh."

The hissing sound was the Otomeian, obviously about to say her superior's name yet hesitating before she could finish it. Chie turned again, only to have Shizuru's tall form blocking the view of both her expression as well as the girl's.

There was a moment's silence. Chie did not know what was passing during that time, for she could see neither of the pair's faces. Then, she heard the Otomeian murmur something. Shizuru's head dipped and then nodded.

"Finished?" the taller woman asked the raven-haired one. "Already?"

Again the unintelligible murmur in reply.

"You must have rushed through your duties," Shizuru said gently, her voice carrying a faint reproach.

This time, the answer took a little longer. Both women listening in to the conversation heard it, however, and heard the plea under the words.

"My-my first duty is to you."

Suou and Chie heard each other's indrawn breaths at the same time. Shizuru's hand twitched at her side, as if it would rise. Would it?

The proprietor of the shop chose that moment to return.

"Oh, how lovely," Suou said, so naturally that Chie secretly found it hilarious. "The wine's here."

The words worked, however. The tension having been broken, the cups were distributed and the shopkeeper hovered again by Suou's side, Natsuki doing the same behind Shizuru. The commander beckoned the Otomeian closer, however, and handed her the wine.

"Here, Natsuki," she urged. "Wet your throat."

The Otomeian hesitated before taking the cup, lifting it gingerly to her lips. Shizuru stopped her just as she was tipping it, however.

"Natsuki."

Everyone was watching them again, even the shopkeeper; there was simply something in the way Shizuru said the name that called attention. Besides, the girl herself was something to see in her reactions too. At the moment, her expression was bewildered, strange eyes luminous between strands of fallen black.

"It is unwatered," the older woman explained with smile. "Your throat is delicate and I do not want it to be shocked. Mind you do not take it in a gulp."

Comprehension invaded Natsuki's face. She nodded bashfully. As the young woman finally began to sip, Shizuru turned a wide smile to the shopkeeper.

"It is an excellent vintage you have served us," she said graciously. "It is my pleasure to have had some of it."

The man beamed at the compliment, diverted from his curiosity about the couple before him. Shizuru continued the diversion, chatting with him shortly as she finished the cup of wine returned to her by Natsuki, then ending the conversation by promising to visit his shop again sometime soon. After having thoroughly charmed the man, she then turned to her fellow Himeans.

"Shall you excuse us now?" she asked. "I believe I should return to the office. You may continue as you are, Chie-han, being finished with your work, but you may walk back with us too if you would rather return now."

Chie nodded.

"Thanks," she said. "I think I'll stay here and keep Suou-san company."

"Why, thank you, much obliged," the Himemiya purred, sending smiles to the others' faces. "It's always fun to have Chie-san along, you know."

"The way she says it makes me worry," Chie said humorously to Shizuru. "Go on, and don't worry. I'll do the worrying, though, to be honest, I don't really think there's cause for it."

The crimson eyes softened at the message, and Shizuru bowed her head gently.

"Thank you again," she said. "Good day."

They bade her farewell too, watching her back wordlessly as she exited the shop with Natsuki. To be precise, Chie watched her back wordlessly, while Suou occupied herself with asking the shopkeeper to wait for her decision-another way of telling him to leave them alone for a moment. He took the hint with utmost delicacy, all the while wishing he had better ears to eavesdrop on them from the next room.

"Something's wrong and has been wrong for a while, I see," Suou said, as soon as the man had gone away. Chie was only mildly surprised at her lack of preamble, and nodded silently. "Would you care to inform me?"

The older woman eyed the young patrician a little warily, wondering if it would be fine to talk to her about Shizuru's problem. She did not know this young woman as well as Shizuru did, and though she knew they were great friends along with Suou's sister, she still wondered how much that should reassure her here. After careful thought, she ventured: "Yes, though I don't really know that much, really."

"When the subject is Shizuru-san, it's a given disclaimer," Suou ventured. For all the humour in her mouth, however, Chie noticed the younger woman's eyes were cold as ice. She was a little encouraged by their clarity nonetheless. The purity of those eyes betrayed no taint of malice.

"Has it anything to do with what occurred-and should have occurred four days past?"

Ah, so she had been aware of it. Again Chie nodded.

"She mentioned something about you being the one who made her aware of it?" she asked the patrician.

"It?" After a musing pause, Suou brightened with understanding. "Oh, that. Perhaps. I just drew her attention to the matter, to be honest."

"She was grateful."

"Hm."

She gave her answer readily, only realising afterwards how it might have sounded: "She said she only wished you had done it earlier."

Suou let out a fine stream of mirth before Chie could qualify the words.

"Is that not what all of them say?" The exquisitely blonde, perfectly classical face was alive with hilarity. "They do evade the issue as long as possible, then feel the fool later for having done it consciously. I believe it's their choice, you see."

Chie grinned at her, liking her more than before after that observation.

"That's rather perceptive of you, Suou-san, though perhaps a little cruel," she said.

"Honesty is that, generally." Suou rolled her eyes with a chuckle. "At least, now, she should have worked that out between the two of them. It's better to have such things aired and out. Do you not think so, Chie-san?"

She halted at Chie's expression.

"Why," she began. "Whatever's the matter?"

Chie made a small movement of her head, then looked away.

"That," she said, hesitantly. "It's not aired yet, that is."

Suou took some time to assimilate the words before comprehending what they meant, at which point she stared at her fellow legate. Her chilly eyes conveyed disbelief, frozen in their lucidity.

"What do you mean?" she asked in a low whisper. "She didn't tell the girl, after all?"

Chie looked wistful. Suou took the hint and frowned direly.

"It seems she wasn't able to," the senior legate explained gently, looking more and more wistful by the second. "I think they were interrupted by the news just then. You know, the news about her election as praetor."

Suou frowned.

"How troublesome," she ventured. "Still, she should have been able to say it later."

"No. She didn't."

"Good heavens, Shizuru-san is becoming surprisingly slow here, then. Did she tell you why?"

The older woman shook her head, raking a hand through her dark hair. Then she looked at the other woman-and was caught off guard.

When she was being serious, she realised, Suou actually looked terribly like her older sister.

Something about that prompted her to disclose what she knew.

"She asked her to come to Hime," she whispered.

Suou was unsurprised. "Of course. And?"

Chie's face spoke for itself; as did Suou's, in fact.

"Oh dear, " Suou uttered.

Chie nodded at this expression, agreeing with the feeling behind it.

"Dear me," Suou said again, looking puzzled beyond countenance.

Chie sighed: "I know."

"I can't say I expected that."

"Me neither."

"So that's why."

A silence settled over them, and it was pregnant with worry for their mutual friend.

Suou broke the stillness first, shaking her head slowly.

"She must feel awful," she said quietly, her lips thinning with displeasure yet again. "Oh, what a fine mess! How could it have turned out this way?"

Chie exhaled wearily.

"I don't know either," she admitted. "I couldn't have imagined it, myself. Turning out this way, that is. I mean, it's Shizuru-san!"

Suou smiled wistfully, knowing what the other woman meant.

"I know," she said. "You simply can't imagine her first-or any other-affair to end with her being turned down in anything, right?"

"The worst of it is that she can't even tell the girl the one thing I think would be sure to persuade her."

"Oh, yes. Yes, that might work if played well, as a matter of fact." Suou's eyes flashed, gleaming suddenly as she came to a potential solution in her efficient, terribly practical mind. "Now there, Chie-san, is a thought. I would certainly tell her if I thought it would convince the girl to bend to my will. Shizuru-san can still do that, at least, and I agree with you: it would be likely convince Natsuki-san to come with her, and would have a better chance of doing this than anything else. Yes, she should tell her. Phrased properly, it would give her what she wants."

The look Chie gave her in response was odd, to say the least. She arched an eyebrow in query as the short-haired woman moved away slowly, going to the window and looking outside.

"No, Suou-san," Chie said shortly. "I'm afraid she can't."

"Oh? Why so?"

"Because it would convince her."

There was no reply, and Chie supposed she did not have to look behind her to know the young Himemiya's answer. So instead, she looked ahead.

She looked out and saw she could still see the subject-or subjects, rather-of their conversation in the distance. A sigh escaped her: Shizuru's hand was already going to bury itself in the Otomeian's hair. What she could not see was the heavy quiver that passed through the Otomeian at the touch, the longing shudder going all over the girl's body like a part of her soul being freed.

"There's the rub," she murmured to Suou, who had come to her side and was also watching the couple vanishing from sight. "I think she won't tell her now because she really does love her. Isn't it a surprise to know your friend can be so romantic? Because I never would have dreamed it of Shizuru-san."

Chapter 41

Illustration:

Please remove the spaces after the full stops.

ethnewinter. deviantart art/Contagious-137526897

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Carbunculus (L., s.), Carbunculi (L., pl.) - The precious stone known as the ruby.
  2. Denarius (s.), Denarii (pl.) - Ancient Roman coin/currency; often minted in silver. For this story, it takes 6,250 denarii to make a silver talent, which is the amount of silver a man can carry.
  3. Garum - A smelly sauce more or less popular among the ancients, and immensely so in Rome. It was made in a process that would generally turn stomachs in modern times. There are several kinds of it, however, with some being rather lighter of flavour and odour than others. Here, assume that the garum referred to is generally the stronger variety used as a sauce.
  4. Pavo - Latin for "peacock"; show - off.
  5. Smaragdus (L.) - The precious stone currently known as the emerald.
-

Inter Nos

par ethnewinter

---

In the latter half of February, Shizuru was finally able to learn all of the legal decisions on her impending replacement, which would most likely happen sometime in the following month. Letters had arrived from Sosia and Argentum at a steaming gallop-and several horses nearly dead with exhaustion could attest to that, to the stablemasters' irritation-disclosing the responses of each legate to the commander's query: Will you request transfer of duties to the as-yet-unnamed replacement, or will you come home? Shizuru read the answers in her office, tossing some denarii to the last wind-bitten courier to come with a scroll.

"The verdict is in," the commander announced cheerfully to the others in the room. "Toshi-han says he shall stay where he is in Sosia and so shall Aidou-han in Argentum. Thus far, only three legates have declared they shall seek to stay on with the new commander."

One of her senior scribes looked up from his desk, eyes narrowing.

"Toshi-san and Aidou-san," Aisuka returned. "As expected. One is after experience, and one after finances."

Shizuru smiled at him. "Succinct way of putting it."

"Added to Himemiya-san, that makes it an interesting trio choosing to remain, doesn't it?" he asked, his greying hair glinting in the torchlight. "Does it bother you that the less seasoned legates are the ones who shall stay, General?"

The general's beautiful face turned thoughtful.

"I see not why it should," she replied. "For all that they are less seasoned, each one is capable in his own right. Do you not think so?"

"Of course, General," Aisuka replied, somehow managing to convey the meaning that he had his doubts about the matter yet still deferential in that unvoiced opinion.

"Among them, whom do you think least seasoned, at any rate?" she asked.

He rested his writing hand over a sheet of paper and said, "If I remember right, Fujino-san, they all came into your service at the same time, and it's each one's first campaign as a legate."

"Save for Aidou-han, in Argentum."

"Yes."

And he said no more.

"I have heard it said by many a cook that different meats season differently, some more slowly or quickly than others." She smirked lightly: that slightly sardonic, rather superior, very knowledgeable, and yet- yet, even with all that! -eminently likeable smirk only she could do so well. He was not proof to it, and he found himself smiling back. "Do you cook, Aisuka-han?"

"No," he said, and going along with her analogy: "But I'm fond of meat, whatever kind it is. Sometimes, however, I can't tell which meat is which. My palate, I'm afraid, is just crass."

She laughed, as did the others in the room.

"I think it depends, really, on the cook to bring out the flavour," he told her, watching her odd eyes lighten with appreciation of his use of the metaphor. "And thus far, I can't fault the cook who's been taking care of everything here, for us."

She smiled down at her desk.

"The cook," she said, taking up her quill again and glancing up to briefly grin at him, "has always had excellent staff, I am sure."

He accepted the compliment with a nod and returned to his own papers, still meditating on her words. It always pleased him to receive praise from his employers-for he was a truly good worker and he had the pride in his work all truly good workers did-but praise from her stayed with him longer. That was because she was a great woman, he thought, and a nice woman too. He would know, for he had served for another great woman once before, and not a nice one, either. Aisuka had been scribe once to Shizuru's archrival, or the woman who proclaimed herself Shizuru's archrival, and had found it a trying experience.

To be sure, he thought Haruka Armitage formidable in her own right, a true Himean without an inch of corruption where the standard was for a mile; however, he also thought her a difficult, dreadfully contrary character. It had been with some relief that he had finished his duties in one of her campaigns some years ago, his ears near-shot to deafness after her incessant braying-for that truly was the word to describe Haruka Armitage's manner of speech. Thus it had been with pleasant surprise, afterwards, that he had greeted her supposed archrival's polite summons, seeking an interview about a position with her.

Charming, had been his first thought upon that preliminary talk. Shizuru Fujino was nothing, he had decided at first impression, if not charming. She had seemed the opposite of Armitage at the time: soft of speech and graceful of movement, exceedingly subtle in all her actions. And so generous! More generous than other people; certainly far more generous than Haruka Armitage, who squeezed a denarius so tight she made the silver run blood. He had been offered nearly twice the amount Armitage had paid him for his services, although the young Fujino did warn him too that he would be well used in exchange. The money was not what made him accept her offer, however, nor was it her charm.

Indeed, many things about her had initially put him off before the actual meeting: she was too young, perhaps too inexperienced even with the awards she had won for fighting in battle; she was too good-looking, and good-looking politicians were always suspect for the havoc they could cause among personnel; she was far, far too patrician-everyone knew that the old-blood patricians tended to be highly eccentric. Aisuka was too knowledgeable about these matters to find the qualities attractive in an employer; doing background research on her, he had not actually been "all that drawn".

No, what had eventually drawn Aisuka to her was the tingling in his spine he felt upon meeting the young woman, a tingling that told him she was great in ways Armitage would never be-or anybody else, for that matter. Aisuka had had the premonition of something vast and immensely powerful looming on the horizon, had felt a presentiment of something about to dwarf everything he had ever known. He had dashed immediately towards it.

She had proven the premonition true. Accompanying her from amazing campaign to amazing campaign, Aisuka had offered countless thanks to the gods for sending him that intuition about her. He might complain to his fellow scribes, sometimes, about the incessant work she gave them, or the way she dragged them around with her one nauseating carriage ride after another... but the truth was that he enjoyed working for her.

Shizuru Fujino used her subordinates well. But she also paid them well in return: not merely in gold or cash, but also in glory. Her victories were such that one could not help but be proud of having had a part in them, of having been part of something greater than oneself. Aisuka as a scribe and a human being was prey to that elemental hunger: the hunger to take part in something that would live on forever in the great pageant of history. And there was no better place to do it than at the side of a woman who seemed poised to outrun everybody in that very pageant, such that all others would only ever be treading the road she had already marked.

He had been quick to see, during the first campaign, that she had her own similarities to his previous employer too. Like Armitage, Shizuru Fujino had unquestionable authority in her decisions, for all her vaunted delicacy. She might delegate with care, she might request in her voice full of honey, yet the sting lurked under the sweetness, always poised to strike should she be gainsaid. And she was never gainsaid; something in her aura forbade mutinous notions.

She was also incorruptible, but the incorruptibility was not the same rigid thing it was in Armitage. Rather, her incorruptibility was a supple and nuanced construct, like a flexible but eminently cutting sword. Indeed, Aisuka often thought that the best metaphor for comparing his former employer with his present one: whereas Haruka Armitage was a wide and old-fashioned broadsword of the most stubborn metal, Shizuru Fujino was a slender katana of the most tempered steel. And while Aisuka admired the obstinacy of the former, he much preferred the elegant strength of the latter.

There were some difficulties her particular character posed sometimes, however: difficulties he had never had to face with Armitage. Her subtlety made her moods difficult to read, as opposed to her rival's blatant fits and furies. Shizuru Fujino, he had swiftly discovered, had different ways of expressing displeasure, and they were ways that made one ask if she was actually expressing at all. She did not rave, nor did she suppurate. Heavens, the woman did not even properly curse! No, she stayed still and calm all throughout. And at the same time could charge the very air to make the whole room shiver.

Those times were actually rare and far between, so infrequently did she lose her temper. He remembered the last time such a thing had happened: just recently, mere weeks past. A departure from normal. Of course, suspicions ranged from the issue with her sudden election as urban praetor-which made it hard to tell if it would be proper to congratulate her on that achievement-to possible difficulties with her foreign lover, the Otomeian cavalry officer assigned to safeguard her. What was that she called the foreigner? Ah, yes: My Girl. As though she were warning everyone else to steer clear of the young woman or face her wrath.

Her Girl was another departure from normal, come to think of it. Still, Aisuka had not been among those to blame his commander for taking up with the young woman. The foreigner, even with her alien looks, was widely held to be of alarming beauty, even if a touch too slender and too small-nosed. At least she was no discredit to his commander as far as looks were concerned. On the other hand, he knew that was not really the point of contention by those who disparaged the relationship.

Whatever the case, Aisuka preferred not to meddle with the matter, so he concerned himself not with it. He liked his concerns distinct, isolated; he focused them now on his commander alone.

The recent frigidity was gone, he thought, sensing the atmosphere in the room. That was good. The general's moods could be disturbing to the younger workers, and sometimes to him too. All was calm now.

Or was it?

Truth be told, he had sensed some difference in the general of late-another development. He had been among those to notice the irritation in her some weeks ago, and he was also among those to notice its disappearance. Thus he marked the advent of a fresh attitude, a scent of something he recognised with some surprise. It was, he was sure, the scent of the general preparing for a battle.

How odd to sense that now! Where was the battle? None were imminent, as far as he knew, and he was high enough in the chain of information to be fairly certain. Of course, it could merely be that he was misidentifying the feeling. He could have mistaken her circumspection for something else. Yet intuition told him he was correct: the commander was being strangely wary and tentative these days. Of and due to what, Aisuka just could not tell-and that was an utter pity. The other senior officers were probably already making bets on it. It was army custom to do so.

A low, hardly audible humming started in his throat at this new subject. What if there were bets starting on it already, in fact? Aisuka liked a good wager, and often made a little money on the side that way. There might be a chance for a good gamble on this one. Perhaps it was best to consider the options as early as possible. It occupied him for a while.

He supposed that if he had to place a wager, his money might be safest on the Otomeian girl.

"Aisuka-han."

He was startled, looked up at his general.

"Dreaming already?" She gave him a light smile. "I must say that is not very like you."

He shook his head and apologised.

"My mind wandered to some other work," he said quickly. "What were you asking? My excuses for the slip, General."

"Are not needed. I understand it is getting quite late already," she answered. "Should we stop, you think?"

He felt the eyes of the others on him and nearly laughed aloud. Fools, he thought. When she asked a question like that, the answer was usually already decided, no matter the response she received. Well, they were still young, all these other members of her staff in the room; they had not served long enough with her to realise that, for all her seeming deference to the desires of others, Shizuru Fujino always did and got what she wanted. Her enquiry was not a point of decision, but a point of form.

"I wouldn't mind, Fujino-san," he said with usual obsequiousness, bowing his greying head to a woman twenty years his junior. "Of course, I'll do whatever you decide."

She nodded, set down her own quill. There was a low sigh from the others.

"Well, it is decided," she announced. "We may conclude for the night."

The others hurried to arrange their desks at her dismissal, knowing the general's quirk on constant tidiness in the workplace. Scrolls were rolled up and put in buckets, buckets stacked up neatly in the corners. In the midst of this shuffle and movement, the great wooden door to their office creaked open.

"Ah, Na-"

The general's voice faltered when she looked up, so everyone else looked too.

"-tsuki."

Aisuka remembered his thoughts earlier, thinking them validated by what had just entered their presence. The general's Otomeian girl was certainly alarming in beauty tonight, and far more than that: she was wearing something the likes of which neither he nor the other Himeans had ever seen before. Such an odd costume! Was it the dress from her country, perhaps? Why did he not remember it from their brief time there, though? He would have remembered something like this, especially had she been the one wearing it.

The general's girl had a tunic-dress that was very bright, very white, and slashed to the thigh at the sides so that the front and back strips brushed her feet like separate banners. Her legs were covered in tight and creamy wraps of wool to keep them warm, and the dark leather bindings of her footwear held these even tighter, crossing the legs just below her calves. The most outstanding part of her attire, however, was the great furred pelt atop her shoulders: grey and fading at the edges to a dusty, wolf's grizzle blue.

The commander stared. Aisuka gaped. Indeed, everyone in the room gaped, until the girl made a nervous flick of her head that woke them from their stupor. And even then, it was only the general who recovered enough to glance at the others, some of whom remained staring. That further pushed the general out of it: Shizuru saw something familiar in her staff's gazes, something she felt whenever she looked at her girl. It displeased her.

"My excuses, everyone," she said, eyes narrowing just the barest fraction. "But I believe you have done enough for today. You may go now, with my wishes that you have a good night."

This time, it was not just Aisuka who read the message in it. Unspoken but discernible were the words: Leave us.

They gathered up their effects in a hurry, the youngest dropping her quills clumsily because she kept sneaking glances to the Otomeian watching them.

"Good night to you too, General," Aisuka said in exit, sparing the Otomeian a fleeting nod out of courtesy. The others followed his example. "Thank you for today."

"And my thanks in return, Aisuka-han," Shizuru Fujino replied. "To every one of you."

He bowed again and scurried around his desk, leading the way out. Shizuru watched as her subordinates left, bowing and murmuring courtesies to her. It did not go unnoticed that some shot a final, fleeting glance over their shoulders in turning away, their eyes on the Otomeian. When the last straggler had gone, Shizuru got up and went around her desk, holding out her arms to her last visitor for the day.

"And a good evening to you too, Pretty One," she said with a sweetness that would have made Aisuka pause had he tarried a little longer. The Otomeian came up for an embrace, and the fur on the young woman's shoulders tickled Shizuru's neck and chin. "It is a good evening now that I have seen you. I take it that it is time for us to go?"

Natsuki pulled away, but not before dropping a kiss on the edge of her jaw.

"Yes," she said. "Dinner is ready, Shizuru. We can eat."

She spoke as though it were a simple meal to be identified that simply, though both of them knew it was not. Shizuru's lips twitched at the younger woman's bare speech. She had long thought it opposite to her own, which tended to be layered over with many levels of meaning. Time had shown her it was not so, in fact. She had since seen that Natsuki did not so much lack complication in terms of meaning but only in terms of presentation. Her approach, instead of layering over, was to cut away. And perhaps it made her communication the one that was subtler, for all its simplicity.

This was not a simple dinner, as Shizuru had noted. This was intended to be a night of revelation between them and, for once, it was the younger woman doing the revealing. She had set upon the idea two weeks ago, after they made up their first true argument, but had only offered it to Shizuru another week after. It had taken her time to prepare, she had explained, not just what she needed but also herself. Shizuru understood that it must have taken a great deal from her to set her will to this, to make herself vulnerable by being the one exposing herself for a change.

To be sure, Shizuru expected nothing like a full exposition of the taciturn girl's thoughts and feelings. Rather, tonight was to be an exposition of Natsuki's culture, her roots, the place whence she came. This was what Natsuki had claimed it to be. Shizuru guessed at the presence of an explanation there, in the more banal topics, something important Natsuki was trying to say to her. She thought it was very like Natsuki to try to say things this way instead of directly voicing them: again the trimming away of meaning, the use of it as fuel for the fire. Shizuru felt it her task to draw already discarded words from the girl's actions, and she already had a few guesses as to the words involved in tonight's undertaking.

This is I, she imagined hearing the younger woman say. This is who I am. I need you to understand.

So be it, she thought anxiously, in equally silent response. So be it, this mute declaration of identity. She would listen-if it could be called listening-and she would try to understand, since it was for Natsuki. And there was the defining reason behind so much, now: had anyone told her it was necessary for Natsuki that she throw herself into the inky Underworld and crawl back out unassisted, she would have done it in an instant.

Now she stepped a little back to appraise the Otomeian all over again, leaning a hip against the desk in her consideration.

"I am glad," she said, angling her head slowly to one side. "And you, what is that you are wearing? You look lovely."

She saw some immense relief break free in the girl's face, like that of a person being reprieved from a death sentence, and she knew then that the younger woman had been afraid she would not like it. How intriguing. Did Natsuki worry about her that much? Was that why she had come into the room with that odd hint of fear and defiance, the one that sometimes wafted from her like a tantalising yellow smoke?

"My clothes," Natsuki replied, still a touch uncertain. "My home dress."

Shizuru continued to take it in.

"The dress is not so very different from the Himean and Greek ones, is it? Save for the legwear, and the splitting of the tunic between front and back below the waist."

"Yes."

The red eyes travelled to the silvery, blue-pointed fur.

"The wraps are certainly something else," she remarked, sweeping its soft tips. "What fine fur. How it does suit you: you are so pretty in it, Natsuki. Is it something you often wear, your people?"

"Yes. Pelt, I mean." Natsuki's face was still glowing from the compliment. "Fuh-for the cold."

"It is most unusual... and most handsome. Do show me!"

She laughed and reached out for the girl's hand, twirling her around playfully. Natsuki was surprised, but turned anyway.

"You look like you belong in a forest, or a white mountain, or a frost-speckled plain. I am almost afraid to touch you for fear you would melt away like a fleck of snow."

Natsuki laughed at her foolishness. How nice to be able to make her laugh unselfconsciously again!

"You touch me now, Shizuru," she said, eyes darting to where they were handfast. There was no effort to break the touch, however.

"That I am," Shizuru averred, eyes hooding a little as she leaned in to scent her: it was nice to be able to do that unselfconsciously again, too. "And if you do not melt now, I am glad, for it means I can attempt to make you do that later, in a more pleasurable sense."

The Otomeian flushed scarlet.

"Silly," she said brusquely, a choke in her voice. She cast about for something to use as a lifesaver and found it in her hand. She pulled from Shizuru's grasp, doing it with enough of a final clasp to show that she was reluctant to do so.

"Shizuru." She held up the parcel in her hand. "You like chestnuts?"

The older woman angled her head again to one side.

"Why, yes, Natsuki," she said. "I rather do."

A pleased rumble came from Natsuki's throat. As soon as she loosened the drawstrings of the pouch, a wonderful smell hit Shizuru's nostrils, which she immediately identified.

"Oh, roasted chestnuts!" she exclaimed in delight, as Natsuki presented the bagful of mahogany-skinned shells. She bent over to examine the contents of the bag more closely. "And still warm. How delicious."

"For you."

Shizuru looked up. "For me?"

"I-if you liked them, I thought. Maybe." She nibbled at her lower lip. "I hoped."

"Thank you," Shizuru said, chafing her lover's cheek with a callused thumb. "I think most people do like them. Thank you, meum mel. I rather missed them."

Natsuki's pink cheeks turned red again, and Shizuru eyed them appreciatively. The girl nodded at the scrolls on the older woman's desk.

"Not finished?" she asked shortly, while Shizuru returned to her seat at the table. "Still more work?"

"Oh, merely a little left. I simply need to read this note from one of the local bankers and the rest can keep." She crossed her legs. "I know I promised to spend the evening without work, with you. We can go soon, do not worry."

The young woman fell into a seat on the stool next to hers, which was always there for that purpose.

"I will wait," she said simply. "It is all right if I wait. Do not worry too."

The Himean lifted an eyebrow, amused.

"Why, thank you for the assurance," she said, returning to her work. Breaking open the cylinder she had mentioned, she read through it swiftly and set it down scant moments later. If her haste amused Natsuki, she did not know, but there was a bemused expression in the younger woman's eye.

"I am finished, Natsuki," she announced, receiving a beckoning motion in reply. "What? Oh."

She watched as Natsuki took her hand and held it open with pale fingers, dropping two shelled chestnuts into it. The Otomeian pointed to the parcel she now held on her lap, quickly chewing and swallowing the chestnut she herself had been eating.

"You read very fast," she said in her husky voice. "I just opened. You will eat a little?"

Shizuru smiled, bringing up her hand to look at the pair Natsuki had placed there.

"Of course," she said. "I must try them immediately. And if you think that fast, perhaps you would suffer me to glance at just another letter, then?"

Natsuki acquiesced graciously. Shizuru cast a nut in her mouth.

She spoke her verdict: "Delicious."

"Mm."

The general picked up another cylinder from the bucket beside her, breaking it open and going over the contents. She ate the other chestnut in her palm. "I did not know your people ate chestnuts too."

She was both surprised and amused by Natsuki's swift reply.

"We do," the latter said. "We eat chestnuts too. And walnuts."

"Ah." Shizuru took another shelled piece from her, trying not to grin. "And almonds?"

"And almonds," Natsuki insisted, haughty. "And meat like you, the meat of sheep and pigs."

"And cattle, goat and deer."

"And cattle, goat and deer, and also cheese."

"And black bread," Shizuru teased, smiling with near-credible innocence. "And milk to drink, during meals, and great tankards of foamy beer."

Natsuki arched an eyebrow at her, knowing she was being baited but unable to help biting anyway.

"And no foul sauce," she bridled. "No strange, fishly-fishy-fish-smelling sauce."

Shizuru put a hand to her mouth and muffled the laughter.

"True," she agreed, trying to bury her nose in the scroll so that those emerald eyes would not bore into her. " Garum is rather fishy, is it not?"

Natsuki seemed surprised that the older woman knew what she had meant; it seemed she had made the retort almost as a private joke to herself.

"I know you do not like it, Natsuki," Shizuru giggled further at her face. "I did notice, you know."

There was a pause before Natsuki answered, and when she did, there was a peculiar note in her voice that made Shizuru look at her a second time.

"You know this?" the raven-haired one uttered. "Then, if you know this..."

Shizuru smiled hesitantly, a little puzzled by the glimmer in the other's eyes.

"I did," she answered slowly. "Why, Natsuki? What is it?"

There was no answer, save for the unfathomable one glimmering in those eyes again. And even that soon subsided after a moment, the bright green irises downcast and darkening.

"Natsuki?"

A negative movement of the head, as though to say it did not matter. Whatever it was Natsuki had been thinking was lost in the dark pool of unspoken words she seemed to always carry with her, and further forgotten when she went on to remark on the "foul sauce" itself.

"I thought-I wondered how you could eat it," she said to Shizuru, who listened attentively. "It smelled-it smelled so- and I worried it was only I who smelled it and my nose was going bad."

Shizuru grinned.

"No, I think your nose is still perfect," she said with a mountebank smile to make the other giggle. It worked, of course, although it was accompanied by a sniff.

"But later I knew it was so very foul, and I was surprised because your people eat it and you eat it and you like to smell good things so much." The Otomeian misinterpreted Shizuru's suppressed look of amusement here and hurriedly added: "I do not-I do not want to insult your people, Shizuru. I know, I see sometimes some of you think what we eat bad too, or maybe foul. I do not intend to insult."

The red eyes widened at her fretful explanation, their golden lashes outcurved and fanning.

"I understand, Child," the older woman said amiably, surprised by her care. "There is no need to explain. Even I know it is indeed foul. Do go on, please, and do not worry about me mistaking your words."

Natsuki nodded. "I wondered very much why it smelled so. I asked."

Shizuru threw her a steady look.

"Not me," she accused. "You did not ask me, did you?"

"No, I asked another."

"You could have asked me."

The stunned look in the Otomeian's eyes made her smile, and she waved it away.

"I am not hurt," she said swiftly. "I do understand why you might have hesitated to ask me, so I am not fool enough to take offence that you asked someone else. Even so, I wish you to know that you may always ask me anything. Anything at all."

Natsuki was embarrassed after that, and kept her eyes on the floor. Shizuru had to prompt her to go on.

"I learned, I found the name was garum, and I knew then it was popular among you," she said cautiously. "I knew it was popular with many other peoples, too."

"True. I suppose you should have come across it in some of the texts you have read, at least."

Natsuki made a sound of agreement.

"But I knew not what this thing was, and how it was made, and what was in it," she said. "How does one, um, achieve such a scent, I wondered. So I went to look for that, and-and I found it was of fish insides, let to ferment for a long period."

"So you discovered it, hm?"

"Yes."

"Yes, it is indeed made that way."

The appalled look in the green eyes made her giggle, and after a while of that, even Natsuki giggled too.

"It is strange." She shook her glossy black head, mouth halfway between a grin and a puzzled frown. "It is fish insides, Shizuru, and you even let it stand, as if to let it spoil. I think it is strange."

"I suppose it must seem so," Shizuru avowed, still covering her mouth. "No, I see it must seem so. It must make you wonder what sort of people could come up with such a mad notion: to take fish innards and let them cook under the sun."

Natsuki squinted into space, seeming preoccupied with something else. The older woman put a palm on top of her head while waiting, stroking the Stygian-black tresses with a gentle hand.

"Shizuru," the girl called in the next moment, suddenly adopting an awesomely grave mien. Shizuru admired the handsomeness of such an expression on her, mindful of keeping her own face sombre: she worried it would trouble the girl's pride not to be taken seriously after such an effort.

"You like it?" came the sharp question.

There was a moment's hesitation.

"Do I like garum, you mean?" Shizuru clarified.

"Yes." Again the awesomely grave look. "You like it?"

"Well, not excessively, I should say. I eat it too, however."

Some of the gravity was lost: Natsuki's lips parted.

"But I do not eat it overmuch and have recently grown ill of it, so it is fine," Shizuru went on, returning her stroking hand to her lap. "Let us just say I do not dislike it, rather."

The pink lips closed, the plump lower one was sucked in thoughtfully before being wet by the tip of a nervous tongue. Natsuki took more than a few moments before she talked, but Shizuru waited patiently for her, glancing at the contents of a scroll on the desk in the interim.

She had read a few columns when there came the expected murmur.

"Uh, Shi-Shizuru?"

"Yes, Dear?"

The sideways glance from under the long black lashes actually made her knees tremble. Had it been any other girl, Shizuru would have thought it a practised move. She would have told herself, she is trying to reel me in like a fish. But this was Natsuki, and she had long since learned that Natsuki did things like this without knowledge of how potent they could be in the game of charm, and despite that—or maybe even due to that—Shizuru thought they were even more potent when done by her.

"If you like, you should eat," Natsuki went on to say. "This garum . The smell is not so bad after a while, to me, so you should."

A corner of the pink lips curved up timidly, glossy from having just been wet, and the girl finished: "I will learn not to think it so bad. This is not trouble, Shizuru. I can do this thing for you. If you like it, you should eat it, no?"

The wide eyes, the vibrant shade of a new leaf seen through a dewdrop, came again to her. Once more she felt the delicate shudder as they brushed over her face. Oh, she thought, don't look at me that way. Not here, where someone might interrupt me if I do what that look asks, tempts me to do.

She ripped herself away from the compelling gaze, invoking propriety and cursing it at the same time.

"Thank you, though you need not undergo that torture for my sake. I do not like garum to the point of ever missing it if it were to be banished from my table," she lied, silently bidding goodbye to that once-firmament of her daily dinners. Her hands on the desk clapped together. "I believe this should be enough for today. And I am just about ill with reading this other scroll, so perhaps I should continue tomorrow. Gods know this particular piece is not really conducive to working up an appetite, in any event."

"What, um." Natsuki paused, looking at the cylinder she had indicated. "What is it?"

"Would you like to see?" Glad for something to divert her from thoughts of ravishment, Shizuru took up the scroll and unfolded again it so that Natsuki might peek inside. "Another speech from the House. I generally have copies sent of each senatorial speech my people might think pertinent to me, as you know, and this one apostrophised me quite a bit in tangent." She smoothed her long fingers over the paper. "This speech is from one of my more noteworthy opponents, a senator named Sergay Wang."

Natsuki scowled.

"Opponent?" she asked, looking displeased. "An enemy?"

"A Traditionalist, to be precise. Therefore, one in principle as well as sometimes in practice."

"And he mentioned you?" The cool eyes darted to the scroll. "Here, he did?"

"Yes. They never miss a chance, even if the chance is distant, in tangent." Shizuru nodded at her companion's expression. "Wang-han, he knows the game well. He generally manages to squeeze in references to anything on any foundation. To some extent, I appreciate the skill it takes too, though not too much when what is being said is negative and about me, of course."

Again Natsuki's brow furrowed.

"What does this man say?" she demanded. "What does he say of you?"

"Nothing new... merely the same old things about my being a danger to the Republic, my perilous ambition, my overly patrician arrogance, etcetera ad nauseam ." She waved a hand lazily in dismissal. "To be honest, I cannot even feel insulted with what he said, since it is nothing new. It is not one of his more remarkable speeches. He has better ones."

"He does-he makes-remarkable speeches?"

"On occasion. He is renowned for his skill as an orator."

"He is so good?" Now the young woman seemed more worried than peeved, and it made Shizuru smile to understand what had caused that in her. "How good?"

A finger smoothed away the crease on her brow.

"I suppose better than most," Shizuru answered her, adding a cooing note afterwards. "Of course, that may very well be hardly anything. Nonetheless, he has fine rhetoric, often enough... Although, yes, I do think he is overly in love with the scesis onomaton. Sometimes, he strings together whole paragraphs of them, and it becomes a little tedious to listen to-like a vain man in an empty room, pleasuring himself to the rhythmic up-and-down bob of his own mouth. Tee-e-dious spectacle," she drawled, even more aristocratically than usual. She was pleased when Natsuki giggled, red-cheeked from the picture she had imagined.

"You should not worry," she assured her. "I am yet certain that, for all his skill, he still cannot trounce me."

Natsuki's brows arched, a dark swan's wings in an elegant lift.

"Shizuru," she said, "no one can trounce you."

The older woman replied with a penetrating stare, a little surprised by the conviction in the girl's voice.

"You sound so certain," she said curiously, for all that she was certain of the same thing herself. "Do you really think so?"

"Mm."

Shizuru was about to ask if it pleased the girl to think this when she was stopped by the pride gleaming in Natsuki's look. She saw then that it did please Natsuki to think that of her; it was the pleasure a woman feels when she has found a perfect lover, as she often thinks the first one to be, and believes this lover can do anything. It was such a girlish fancy. She was amused that Natsuki could actually regard her with such worshipful admiration, but she also marked that fancy well, and the look that indicated it: she decided to remember both from then on so that she would never give Natsuki cause to be disappointed in her, nor she in herself.

"Shizuru, Shizuru," the young woman smiled uncertainly, her call having brought Shizuru back to attention. "Which one is this? The one you said? This scesis?"

"Oh, the scesis onomaton?" Remembering that the Otomeian was not actually specifically trained in rhetoric and was only familiar with some of the devices through her perusal of so many texts, she explained carefully. "It is when the speaker emphasises the idea through a series of more-or-less synonymous sentences, closely strung together. I use it too, though nowhere near as often as Wang-han."

She saw that there was a request to leap off the younger woman's tongue, held back by her typical hesitation to ask something for herself.

"Yes, Darling?" she said. "What is it?"

Natsuki smiled, her little nose scrunching briefly.

"This scesis onomaton," she said with great care. "You can make one now? To show me, maybe?"

The Himean looked at her with great fondness.

"Yes," she said, suddenly assuming a deadpan look. "I think myself not so very bad at rhetoric."

Natsuki breathed a chuckle. She knew Shizuru was renowned for her rhetoric as well.

Shizuru inhaled, then leaned forward.

"How your beauty breaks me, Natsuki: you drive me to distraction, you move me to madness, you send me past sanity and shatter all good sense," she uttered passionately, making a point of staring into the green eyes as she delivered the example. She was satisfied to see them shine as she said the words; she was even more satisfied to see the anxiety behind that shine, for that at least told her Natsuki had seen through the example and into the confession.

Natsuki looked away for a second, obviously embarrassed. Shizuru could read pleasure in the embarrassment, so she permitted the green gaze to stray from her.

"You put another."

Shizuru moved her head enquiringly.

"Yes?" she said.

"You put another," Natsuki repeated softly, turning back to her with a small quirk of the brow. "You put what I asked and put also the alliteration."

Shizuru nodded, acknowledging the statement.

"Indeed I did," she said. "And also..."

"Also?"

"You do not notice there is at least one other?"

"One other?"

Shizuru was about to tell her when she shook her head, hand up like a royal calling for silence.

"Do not tell," she commanded imperiously, before softening. "You will say it again?"

The Himean acquiesced to her wishes. It took a while, with her scowling direly at the floor in thought, but she eventually found the answer. When she gave it, she turned a bright face to the older woman, who smiled back encouragingly.

"Anaphora, I think," the girl said. "You repeat 'you'."

Shizuru brought together her hands, clapping softly as she laughed.

"Quite so, meum mel," she said. "Very well done."

She beamed at Natsuki's flushed, proud face.

"I gave you not one, but three," she told her. "You see how I favour you, you lucky girl?"

Natsuki smirked.

"Pavo," she snorted with gleeful insolence, causing Shizuru to laugh. "Pavo, pavo."

"Impertinent brat," the other retorted, kissing her fleetingly. "Divine, impertinent brat. I am of a mind to keep kissing you here, since you insist on being so cheeky tonight, so we should go now. May we?"

Natsuki agreed. They rose at once and left the room hand in hand. Shizuru stopped to bid the remaining guards outside the door a good night, noting in passing the knowing smiles lurking in their eyes. What had they thought she and Natsuki were doing in there?

She permitted herself an inward shrug at the query. If it amused her soldiers to have a lusty commander, that was fine. Besides, she wanted it firmly set in every man and woman's mind that this delectable little catch was hers, and only hers for the having. No soldier was fool enough to even try to come near his commander's 'favourite', and Natsuki was the sole title-holder of that, in her case. Therefore she saved herself a great deal of jealousy and Natsuki, a great deal of irritation.

As they walked on, she threaded her fingers through the silky dark hair. Natsuki moved her own hand carefully around the taller woman's trim waist, fingers so light on the leather belt that Shizuru could barely feel them. The hand holding the parcel of chestnuts swayed loosely at the girl's side and every few steps or so she would jangle it idly, the dull thock-thock of the chestnuts in it like the sound from the marble-board of a child.

"Embarrassing to say, I am actually quite famished," Shizuru told her, stroking the soft skin at the base of her neck. "I am eager to see what you have had prepared. You did have it prepared?"

"Mm, yes."

"I see." A pause. "Merely out of curiosity, Natsuki, do you know how to cook?"

"Um-not very much." They glanced at each other. "Only very simple things. I can roast and make some stew. Such things - such things as you make during hunting, or on the march."

"Preparing venison."

"Yes." She smiled suddenly, green eyes taking on newfound confidence. "I can cook with herbs too, and such things as I find in the forest. I know how to forage."

"A child of the wilderness." The older woman put a suitable note of admiration in her voice. "You have knowledge of herbs and medicines? Of what plants are good and what are poisons?"

"Mm-hm. It is important if you go out much, and often hunt."

"And you do, I suppose."

"I like to hunt."

"You really do belong to Diana after all."

They were silent a little while, still walking.

"Shizuru?"

Shizuru looked down at her. "Yes?"

"You can cook?"

"Only things on the march. Perhaps much the same things as you do," the Himean replied. "I daresay I can make a tolerable stew, myself. But then, I suppose it is only to be expected of both of us that all we can make are simple dishes."

"Us? Why?"

"I am a patrician, a noble by birth and brought up in an affluent household. You are a patrician of your people, related to their royal clan and brought up under your king's supervision. I grew up in a mansion; you in a palace." She quirked her eyebrows drolly. "Spoiled monsters that we are, we could hardly have been expected to learn complex cooking."

Natsuki laughed, for it was true.

"I am a spoiled monster," she growled humorously, making a slight face. "You are a spoiled monster."

"Gorgons," Shizuru agreed, nuzzling the top of her head.
"Chimeras."

The girl's wit was sharp as ever: "Not sphinxes?"

That made Shizuru laugh. She stopped at the door to their room and bade Natsuki show her in, as she did not want to rob her of the pleasure of the flourish and presentation.

"Reveal your secrets," she said playfully, "oh Great Sphinx."

Natsuki went ahead of her, opening the door gingerly and swinging it with a creak on its hinges. Shizuru stepped in and into what seemed another world.

"Not a secret, maybe," Shizuru heard her say, as she walked ahead. "Maybe... just me."

"Ahh."

It was Shizuru who sighed. After recovering from the first jolt, she swept her gaze around the redecorated room. So many changes! Gone was the citrus-wood table lent to her by the Argus governor: it was set aside, pushed to one wall, along with all the stools and chairs. These last had been decorated by lush fur covers, and some of the same furs were hung on the walls. Still, she doubted they were to use these refurbished seats. Rather, she guessed they were to go with the true Otomeian custom of dining on the floor.

She judged this from the low table that had usurped the taller table's former place. It was set over a gigantic rug stitched from several separate pelts. There were many cushions over this rug, of a great many sizes and patterns and textures in covering, but not very many colours: most of them were black, white, or brown; brown in various shades and mixtures, from the colour of red earth to that of dark wood. The brightest object in the room, aside from the lamps, was an enormous tapestry that hung half the length of one wall. It depicted a winter hunt, with wolves and hunters worked in red, black, and gold thread as they sprinted on a white and midnight blue background. A connoisseur of art, she paused over it. Beautifully-woven for all its simplicity of colour, was her verdict, and it pleased her that the girl had such good taste in picking it.

Being a Himean-and thus a lover of bright tints-Shizuru was amazed by the sombreness of the hues: not just in the tapestry, but with the place entire. At the same time, she was open-minded enough to see the appeal. It reminded her of the monotonous and uncomplicated colours of Africa Province, where one could look out at cities of entirely brown roads and houses all painted white. In that place it was the shimmering heat that prompted the lack of daring shades blazing at the beholder's eye; in this frigid country, she supposed it was the same extremity of weather, only on the reverse end of the scale.

While she had been noticing all this, the younger woman had moved ahead, removing footwear to get on the rug. Now she shot the Himean an expectant look. But Shizuru did not move, for she was experiencing a secondary jolt: she was too busy taking in the image of her companion amidst these odd surroundings, taking in the strange belongingness Natsuki had with this glut of peculiarities. Herself a woman who slipped smoothly into place in any situation, the Himean felt herself for the first time at a disadvantage; her bright blue, orange- and gold-embroidered tunic seemed a blazing disturbance amidst the restrained colours; her height, at odds with the depth of the table before her. Why were their tables so low, anyway? She had always thought it ridiculous given the stature of their people, and she would probably have continued to think it ridiculous in any other setting save this one, where she was the minority and the foreigner... and, therefore, the ridiculous thing instead. Even the girl crouched by that table struck in her some awkward hesitation, some deep and silent awe.

She belongs here, she realised with a sense of astonishment. I have never seen how much she belongs here, for I have never seen this, or her in this. When last had she seen Natsuki in such surroundings? In Otomeia-it seemed long months ago-and only for a fleeting instant then. Since the girl had been assigned to her so early in their acquaintance, she had not had much of a chance to observe Natsuki in her native element. Further, it had been Natsuki who had always acquiesced to dance along to her tune, trying to make her peace with a culture that, before meeting Shizuru, she had only ever encountered in texts. Now she was the one playing the pipe, it seemed, and Shizuru would have to be the one to follow the rhythm. It was form of surrender she was demanding of the older woman tonight, and Shizuru saw it only now.

She wishes this of me tonight, she mused, still frozen. To join her in this unfamiliar place she has made of our familiar bedroom. Oh, she had expected this-but she had never thought to face it in a form of such clarity, to realise the gap between them with such... what was the word for it? Vividness? To see the girl she wanted to belong to her in this situation, belonging so perfectly to an atmosphere so unfamiliar, hit her like a slap.

Again she looked at her. She had grown accustomed to Natsuki's manner of reclining on the floor whenever possible and on some occasions had even joined the girl in doing it. Even so, she found herself amazed all over again by the thought of people who truly did this all the time: conducting affairs on the flat ground, so close to the earth. The truly Himean part of her-for, even with all of her radicalism, she was still a true Himean-acknowledged it as barbaric; but her curiosity and especial favour for Natsuki slid that judgement away from the fore of her mind. She was a person who condemned hardly anything immediately, especially when it was related to this young woman, and thus gave herself the chance to try to accept what she saw. Thus it transpired that she was snatched up by the fascination before she could even begin to truly think on what should have been the savagery .

She looked at the dozens of cushions on the floor, and at the low, wide table. She looked at their newly low-to-the-ground bed, of which only the thick mattress now remained where it had been, layered many times over with even more cushions and blankets and furs. She forgot to school her expression in that moment. It was the nervous flash of green eyes that reminded her what was happening and what she had to do-for this was about a young woman who was unusually brittle in both pride and dignity. Shizuru hesitated another moment and regretted it at once: she saw the sharp recoil, the quivering worry in those young eyes, more like a girl's than ever before. And that was when she described to herself the shape of Natsuki's anxiety.

She went forward a few steps, stopping just short of the thick rug and smiling.

"How wonderful it all looks," she breathed. "It is very strange to me, of course, but not unwelcoming."

Her words caused a little of Natsuki's apprehension to melt away.

"As I am a stranger to this, perhaps you must direct me," Shizuru invited, not knowing where she should go next.

The Otomeian nodded, crawling to kneel at the edge of the rug, just before her feet.

"We take off these," she said, nimble fingers swiftly undoing the laces to the Himean's sandals. "Put up the foot, Shizuru. Yes."

Later, when the other one was unlaced as well: "This too."

When her feet were bare, Natsuki bade her sit on a large square cushion of the softest sable. Then the girl drew close a basin of warm water, still kneeling before her.

"I will wash them, Shizuru," the girl announced, and then began.

Until now, Shizuru had not said anything in return, so awed was she by her companion's acts. Here the Otomeian was on her knees: of the blood royal, yet so natural in her assumption of such duties as washing and drying another's feet. She even did it with the lovely care of someone who knew how to do it best, like a well-used slave-girl. Ludicrous thought! Still, she did it so well. Had she washed any other's feet before? Oh, but Shizuru did not like the thought of that. Natsuki could wash only her feet, if at all, and no one else's.

"You prepared this?" she asked, looking around the room again, marvelling once more at the transformation. Wholly Himean it had been when she left it this day; utterly foreign now that she had returned at night. "Only you?"

Natsuki made a negative movement of her head.

"Some help," she murmured, still bent on washing Shizuru's feet as tenderly as possible. She even spared time to chafe the surface of each toenail with her thumbs. "I had a little help."

"Of course. I could hardly expect to trouble you by yourself so when all of us are deadly weary."

"No trouble, even."

"Thank you for the thought, then."

Natsuki finished by drying off her feet with linen cloth, pinching the toes good-naturedly before returning to her seat. Shizuru arranged herself to face the squat table better along with her partner. Her feet dug deep into the cushion as well as the rug. The white fur, she noted with almost sly relief, was very smooth and dry. That meant it was clean and free of one of the things she feared most in the world: those accursed pests known as lice.

She noticed Natsuki give her a knowing smile.

"This pelt is most comfortable," she said casually, to avoid the topic. "I see why you use it. It is so warm. It is good for such lands as these."

Natsuki permitted herself to be diverted.

"Yes, it is why," she said slowly. "You understand now? It is cold here but even colder in our lands. And it is colder to sit up like your people, on your high chairs and stools, and have the legs dangle from the seat, uncovered."

She gestured to her legs, tucked warmly under them.

"It is better to sit like this so that the legs are warm with the rug, and with the heat of the body close. It is good to be warm near the earth when the air is cold."

Shizuru smiled at her words, and at her way of saying a true thing simply.

"Indeed," she said. "It is better to be warm."

Natsuki nodded again.

"Now for a drink," she said, placing a bronze cup before the older woman. "For your drink..."

"Beer, I suppose?" Shizuru guessed, knowing that beer was to the Otomeians what wine was to her people.

"They often drink beer very often, my people," the Otomeian agreed gravely. "But I do not drink."

Shizuru's mouth twitched. "Yes. I know."

"But I have now, if you want."

Shizuru readied her stomach, so used to the smooth and sweet warm wines of her country, and took the plunge into the foamy dark and bitter sea.

"Well, for the sake of rounding out the experience, I suppose I should have some."

Oh, never mind the offence that frothy stuff would be to her gullet! She would have gulped down a barrel of it just for the sight of that gladness she saw in the girl's eyes. Natsuki poured her a cup and set the beer jug away, gesturing to two other jugs that remained.

"Your calda- spice wine and warm water with honey," she said, with an impish smirk. "For after you drink that, to calm your throat."

Shizuru giggled. "You know me so well."

Natsuki smiled, then caught the question in the other's upraised brows.

"What, Shizuru?" she asked.

"No milk tonight?" Shizuru asked her.

"Ah, no." Her eyes sparkled with hidden mischief. "Tonight, I drink wine."

They laughed.

"Very funny," Shizuru said. "Though I wager it shall be more water than actual wine."

Natsuki had the grace to look discomfited.

"It's quite all right," Shizuru said kindly. "I understand you are not overfond of liquor."

"Mm. It is strange in my head."

She reached for the jugs and began to portion out her own beverage. Shizuru stopped her, however, and asked to take over the task.

"Please allow me," the older woman said. "I know how you like it: one part wine, three parts water. Now, do tell me what is all this I see here, this food you have had prepared so kindly for us."

Natsuki acquiesced and began to describe the food to her as she poured the drink, looking at what the Otomeian was pointing out even as she did so.

There was an abundance of meat on the platters, she could see: various red and white meats, dark and light, sliced and sausaged, salted and smoked. There were cheeses too in wedges and thick, soft slabs, as well as a great wicker basket of different-coloured loaves. She could see the black bread of which Natsuki's fellows were so fond, as well as a very white bread that reminded her of her countrymen's own. There were some fat, round rolls and also some that were flat. And she smelled that scent, the warm fragrant odour of something she had come to know as a staple of Otomeian fare.

"Butter?" she asked, to which Natsuki nodded. "I see. I thought so."

Again the minor frenzy behind the green eyes. She hastened to reassure her.

"I am not averse to butter-I rather appreciate the particular taste of it," Shizuru said swiftly, as the girl nodded.

"But, umm." Natsuki chewed distractedly on a corner of her lip, and Shizuru stared at it with equal distraction. "I have this too."

She removed a cover from one of the dishes and revealed a wide saucer of olive oil, which made Shizuru laugh.

"You are too considerate, really," she giggled. "And I am grateful for it . But I shall try your butter." She turned next to the great platters of meat. "Your people do eat a great deal of meat, yes?"

"Mm, yes." At Shizuru's pointed look, she said: "I eat only enough."

"Which do you prefer, meat or grain?"

"Hmf." She shook her head. "They are fine. Both."

"Oh, the indecision of youth! Let us say that bread and your porridges fall under grain. Now choose only one."

Natsuki thought it over for a while. Suddenly, she grinned.

"I like fruit," she said, to Shizuru's hilarity.

"An elegant way to avoid the question, " the Himean remarked, a little ironically. "But very well. You are the host tonight, so I shall permit you to escape with that." She set aside the jugs and passed Natsuki her drink. "Which fruits do you like, though?"

The answer was surprisingly quick: "Apple."

"Oh, really?" Shizuru made a mental note of it. With a sudden grin of her own, she remarked idly, "We have excellent apples in Hime, you know. Very crisp and fresh."

Natsuki refused to bite, but seemed to acknowledge the bait with a small smile.

"And a great many other fruits that you would enjoy. I love grapes myself. Have you ever tried grapes fresh from the vine?"

Still that small smile, but she answered anyway.

"No," the girl said.

"There is nothing quite like them."

"Mm."

They grinned at each other. Shizuru shook her head humorously in exasperation, recognising when she was beaten in battle-though not quite in the war, of course.

"Dear me, there is so much food here. How shall we finish it?"

Natsuki gleamed, still chewing her lip with that provocative half-smile.

"You can, by yourself, no?" she said.

"Indeed." Shizuru smirked her way. "Are you going to force me to eat more than half of even your share again, you accursed Spartan?"

The younger woman smiled a little wider.

"What if I did eat it all?" Shizuru said merrily. "What then, my dear, would you find with you if I did that each day? Methinks you would be horrified to find in my place a bucket of lard for company, a great waddling pouch of butter: soft to cuddle against, but oh so tremulous!"

Natsuki rewarded her with a sexy gurgle of laughter, pushing forward some sort of pie.

"A danger for me, maybe," Natsuki was saying. "At night, especially."

Shizuru giggled, knowing this was about her tendency to roll over and atop the Otomeian as they slept, always soothed into more comforting dreams by nuzzling into the girl's soft white breasts.

"You would have to wear a full metal cuirass after all," she replied. "Better to endure that weight than be crushed by the waddling butter pouch."

Natsuki made a face.

"You sleep well, Shizuru," she said with a naughty smile. "I think I can push you off the bed."

"And what makes you think I would not wake with all that noise and tumult?"

The black brows rose and her eyes widened, as if she were surprised Shizuru had even asked that.

"Butter is soft, you said," she answered smartly. "You drop, it makes no sound."

Shizuru smirked.

"Now I am beginning to wonder if I should have coaxed out this smart tongue after all-the Sphinx does not just bite, but also stings," she murmured, delicately taking a bite of the pie Natsuki had put before her. "Oh, that is good."

Natsuki nodded, continuing to watch her. After a few moments of this, Shizuru stopped eating and turned glibly her way.

"I do not know if I should be worried that you are watching me eat without doing so yourself-I feel like a pig at the trench," she said with a twinkle in her eye. "With the herder watching approvingly as I am fattened for the slaughter."

There was a girlish crack of hilarity.

"I will eat, I will eat," the Otomeian chuckled, picking up a piece of meat on which the skin had bubbled from roasting. "I will eat..."

She held up the meat and finished: "... pig."

Shizuru laughed too.

"Is that pork?" she asked, opening her mouth to receive a titbit Natsuki picked for her from the same dish. "Ah, yes."

"Pork roasted," Natsuki explained, and Shizuru was fascinated with the way her low voice made even those words sound like a bedroom whisper. She gave a low chuckle at the fancy.

"It tastes interesting, as though there is a slight sweetness in the background. Ah, was it cooked in milk?"

"Yes. Good."

"Thank you." Shizuru raised her eyebrows. "Impressed yet?"

The girl sneered.

"No," she said.

"And here I have been all this time, only ever trying to impress you. To think that it has all been for naught, and all my brilliant devices have failed!"

"Hmf." Natsuki swung her head away disdainfully at the dramatic jest. "Why try to impress me?"

"Natsuki."

The edge in her voice caught Natsuki off guard, and the green eyes turned her way were wide and vulnerable.

All the better.

"I have always tried to impress you."

Natsuki's facial expression was broken, torn apart by a sudden burst of emotions. Shizuru held her own peace, however, and merely smiled at it. The younger woman looked away when she finally remembered herself, flushing with renewed ferocity and chewing furiously on her lower lip. Shizuru noted it and finally acted, using the back of one hand to turn the girl's head her way again.

"Pax, little one," she said tenderly. "Be at peace and chew not on your mouth so angrily when there is far more suitable fare here for your teeth. Between the food and my lips, of course, I shall leave it to you which one you find more appealing."

Natsuki frowned shakily, but failed to keep the expression for more than a mere instant. Shizuru chuckled her under the chin.

"Come," she said, cooing again to her. "Will you not smile a little for me again?"

The girl swung a look towards her that was nearly a glare, taking her by surprise.

"When I - I met you." Natsuki paused, frowning deeply. "When I met you, Shizuru, I was very impressed."

Shizuru made a droll face, settling herself back onto her cushion.

"Aside from thinking me not right in the head?" she joked.

"Yes."

"Oh." So much for that being a joke: Natsuki had not even hesitated. "Well."

"First. You were-you are very tall." Natsuki paused with another sharp glance at her, quelling her rising humour. "I did not think your people to be Otomeian tall."

"Ah." Now she was beginning to understand. "Which I am."

"You are." The younger woman's expression eased, smiled. "I saw, too, your officers."

"And some of them are also tall," Shizuru said in understanding. "But some of them are not."

"Yes, and you are so tall even among them." Natsuki squinted and Shizuru saw the old trooper, Mino, in the gesture. "Some tall, some not, so it made me think."

"Until you saw the others-the rankers, that is?"

"Yes." Natsuki's eyebrows drew together thoughtfully on her white face. "More short. Then I knew the truth, and I knew you were very rare."

Shizuru looked up, a smile in her eyes at this pronouncement.

"Rare, am I?" she asked.

The smile infected Natsuki too, who nodded.

"I am honoured you think so." Shizuru bowed her head. "I am honoured my unnatural size has made you impressed."

She went on later: "Though it is rather sad that the thing that impresses you is not really something over which I had any control. I wonder if I should still be honoured."

Natsuki hummed playfully to her and picked out of a piece of venison, offering it. Shizuru nibbled at her fingers in mouthing the food and the younger woman giggled at the ticklish sensation.

"Otomeian tall," she said with a smirk, watching her lover eat. "And not right in the head."

There was an answering smile from the older woman that was just a little rueful.

Natsuki continued: "Red eyes, too."

Shizuru swallowed the food in her mouth, following with a sip of the bitter beer.

"Ah, yes," she replied. "But you are hardly one to talk, with such as eyes as you have."

Natsuki frowned.

"But green is-green happens among you," she supplied.

"Among my people?" Shizuru nodded in agreement before starting abruptly. "It does not occur so often among yours, does it? In fact, I have not yet seen anyone else with green eyes among the Otomeians." She laughed in wonderment. "Dear me, Natsuki, you do stick out, do you not? Hair and eyes and demeanour all!"

Natsuki affirmed it with an embarrassed look.

"But with you, Shizuru," the Otomeian persisted. "Among you, you have these too. Green eyes."

"No."

"No?"

"Certainly black hair occurs among us-though rarely of such sheen and lustre as yours. You are wrong about eyes like those, however. I have never seen eyes like yours, in fact."

"Hm? But, no."

"Think of an example for your case, if you can."

"Um, the senior primipilus."

"Her eyes are light, sharp yellow-green, not true green."

Natsuki thought on it, and seemed to realise she spoke the truth.

"Um, her body-servant?" she suggested next.

"Erstin-chan? Sea-green or, more properly, aquamarine. It depends on the light, but they are more like a pale, greenish blue."

"Um-ah! The governor."

Chuckling softly at the anticipation of victory in the young woman's eyes, Shizuru shook her head.

"Hazel and flecked, which is the usual shade for supposedly 'green' eyes among us. Not so much green as greenish brown. Again it depends on the light."

"Ohh."

"Yours are the oddest of all, Natsuki. For see! No matter what the light, no matter what angle, they hold no other colour but green in them. There are no impurities in your eyes whatsoever. Dark green at the edges; a cool leaf-green in the ring; a white, lightning-bolt green shooting along the flakes. I see no blues, no browns, no yellows. And I have must surely have spent hours by now in just staring into your eyes."

She paused to contemplate said eyes again.

"Yours are remarkable for sheer purity, for being so unadulterated," she told her. "Merely green through and through like... like something I saw once. Shards of broken glass. Or like multi-faceted smaragdus, shot with flames at its core." She held out one hand, pleased to see Natsuki incline her head automatically to lean into it. "Never have I seen such a true green, and I doubt I will ever see the likes of it in another. When the gods created this colour they must have marked it for your eyes and your eyes alone."

Natsuki, even in the midst of her furious embarrassment, managed to contribute a touch of her own. She slid her eyes to Shizuru in a wily glance.

"You are good at the talk, too," the girl said, her true green eyes dancing above reddened cheeks. "That too made me impressed."

Shizuru grinned.

"So you say," she said, patting and then releasing her face. "Yet you hardly seemed so the first few times I talked to you. If I recall, you regarded me with a countenance that clearly said, What foolishness does she talk to me?"

The girl laughed.

"No!" she denied roundly. "I did not think that."

"Really?"

"No." She made a comic face. "Silly. And those were early days, Shizuru."

"Yes, they were. Though they were not really so very long ago."

Both women stopped to think about it, for it was true.

"Not so long," Natsuki agreed softly, sobering.

"Yes." Shizuru's voice was quiet too. "And now I can hardly sleep easily without first talking to you about your day or mine."

The girl's eyes were so wide that they looked stricken. She plodded on, however, still quiet-voiced and smiling.

"It is true," she confessed. "Surely you must have noticed from our recent disagreement."

Natsuki swallowed, opened her mouth, and swallowed again.

"Thuh-the work," she said hesitantly.

Shizuru shook her head.

"I could have put it off," Shizuru said, dismissing that excuse swiftly. "It was merely that I needed something to do to keep my mind away from the fact that we were not talking-or not as usual, anyway."

She threw a sharp and quelling look the girl's way, stemming any apologies before they could come.

"Please do not feel guilty, Natsuki. We have already spoken about it and both know where the blame lies, and most of it was on me. Let that be the end of the matter and know that I, for one, am immensely glad you are again talking to me."

It seemed to her that Natsuki's eyes, in that moment, were shining very brightly.

"I am, um." She stopped, pausing to nod shyly to Shizuru, and drew a breath. "Glad too."

Dropping the morsel in her fingers to her plate, Shizuru reached over to touch Natsuki's hand.

"Welcome," she said with a grin. "Welcome back. I missed you."

Natsuki's hand turned over to hold hers, and the girl had a smile.

"I am here."

"Yes. Right now." Her luminous eyes, edged with a rich scarlet in the lamplight, slid slyly upwards. "But what of the future, Natsuki?"

The hand holding hers tightened: she had surprised the Otomeian.

"If I miss you this much even when you are within my line of sight, from such a thing as this..." She paused just long enough to make the girl think she would let the statement hover. She threw it at the girl's feet the next instant, though, like a soldier announcing siege with an unexpected bolt. "What more if you are not with me?"

There was soft inhalation from Natsuki, almost a gasp. She herself half-chuckled and half-sighed. How many times had she done this the past weeks, still trying to persuade Natsuki to agree to her demand? She was intent on doing it to the last second, of course, but the young woman's nervous reactions sometimes made her feel like a nagging suitor, and she felt a little bad for it.

At least, she reminded herself, before she could be tempted by the idea of pressing further, at least this is better than trying to push her.

"Fear not, that is the most I shall say about it for tonight," she said, squeezing the smaller hand. "I merely mentioned it in passing. Tonight is about you. Forgive that little selfishness I edged in, please. Say you forgive me and I shall promise to see to the rules and play nice tonight."

Natsuki's fingers fiddled against hers. The girl let out a nervous laugh.

"Nuh-nothing to forgive," she said. "It is all right."

Shizuru smiled pleasantly, still trying her hardest to reassure her. Oh, the restraints one never imagined in courtship! She had to attempt moderation where she had it not, and soothe the other woman too while trying to catch her in hand. It was very like trying to coax a skittish wild creature, when she could so easily throw the rope around its neck and lead it home.

"That is the kindest forgiveness of all," she said, with admirable composure for a woman who felt herself much tried. "Very well. As promised, I shall keep to the rules for the rest of the night."

The younger woman gave her an amused look.

"I made no rules," she pointed out.

"Yes, but you forgot you lived with a terrible and inveterate lawmaker," Shizuru retorted immediately. "And the second you turned around, she went and did it for you."

Natsuki laughed favourably. Meanwhile, Shizuru looked at the table, pretending to take her time deciding what to eat next. In the midst of her considerations, she noticed that some of the crockery Natsuki had set out was different from usual, and she turned her attentions to it.

"These are from your land, are they not?" she asked curiously, pointing to the pots and plates, their red geometrical patterns bright on a white background. "Or are they Greek? They seem Greek, and yet there should be more human figures on them, I should think, were they indeed Grecian in make."

Natsuki's eyes lit up at her assessment.

"Not Greek, but ours," she said. "Fewer human portraits on them, like you say."

Shizuru appraised them all over again: "Your pottery is beautiful."

"Thank you."

"Do some of these represent myths?"

"Not so many." Natsuki stretched out an arm to point at some of the motifs. "Many are only plants and animals, simple ones. Like this. This one, it is from our forest, especially. My forest, my old home."

Shizuru frowned as she tried to remember the word for the depiction of the beast Natsuki had singled out.

"Yes, I recall hearing mention of it before," she said. "Would you tell me about it again? What did your people call it-will you tell me of the au-rot? Or is it au-ros?"

Natsuki laughed.

"You are a great fool," she said in her language to the older woman, who lifted an eyebrow at this insubordination. "It is the au- rox . Aurochs."

"Indeed," Shizuru said dryly, amused anyway. "Go on, Smart-tongue. Tell me about the aurochs."

Natsuki lifted her chin grandly.

"I will tell you of the aurochs," she concurred. "You will eat and I will tell you of the aurochs."

Shizuru's head dipped and she said, "Yes, Oh Wise Woman."

"Am wise to know it is not au -rot ." Natsuki looked away and sucked in her lips when the Himean shot another dry glance at her. She also waited for the latter to take some bread first before starting, her voice unconsciously dipping into a husky timbre. "I will tell of the aurochs, the great dark beast of my forest. The forest is great and dark too, and everything in it is great and dark."

She paused dramatically and her large eyes grew larger, the green in them vivid and sparkling.

"It is not a forest you know," she began, hooding the older woman's eyes with her cool voice. "It is not a forest of Otomeia. It is a giant's forest, where the shadows of the trees have no space between."

Up came a hand, only the index finger stretched to point upwards.

"My cousins, the Otomeians, were also frightened of this forest because it was full of shadow beasts, like demons, and sky-tall trees. Trees so tall they stab at great Zalmoxis' sky. Trees so high they are said to be like blasphemy."

Shizuru nodded, thoroughly enjoying herself. She had asked Natsuki to tell her several myths or legends of her home before, and had discovered then that the girl had a skill for tale-telling-not entirely surprising given that it was a thing much practised by her people. She even seemed to forget her shyness enough to fall into the narration, although Shizuru suspected it was easier with her because Natsuki felt more at ease with a familiar and known audience. How lucky that they should be comfortable with each other, then! The girl's usual nervous stutter vanished when it happened, and to listen to her silky-low voice without a stammer, Shizuru thought, was to be serenaded by the muses themselves.

"So I recall," she said now, briefly. "Your true ancestors were not of the faith of Zalmoxis, of the Otomeians."

"Hmm," Natsuki said with a nod. "We were people of the dark forest. The Black Forest."

"And thus perhaps a little closer to the lore of the Mentulae, in fact, than of the Otomeians: that is, believers in the spirits of the trees."

"And the earth. But so do you believe in such things, Shizuru."

"Yes, but in a different way. But you, do you adhere to the cult of the Otomeians now?"

Natsuki hesitated.

"Yes," she said. "No." She shook her dark head. "It is complicated."

Shizuru smiled: "I suppose so. I shall hazard a guess. Do you mean you adhere to it only insofar as necessary, Natsuki?"

"Yes."

"Dear me, I seem to have found myself a pragmatic girl. Please go on with the story."

"Yes." Natsuki hesitated before starting, however. "But what is that? A prag-ma-tick?"

Shizuru explained it to her.

"Oh. I understand." She squinted again to show her indecision over the matter. "I do not know. It could be I am pragmatic."

"You are not sure what you believe?" Shizuru was amused. "My, my."

"I am not sure what is better." Her brow wrinkled; she was such a serious young woman. "I believe, I think there are many gods."

Shizuru nodded her head. "Including the Himean as well as the Greek gods?"

"Yes. And even, maybe, those of Egypt."

"Those of Egypt." Shizuru frowned. "You know they consider their ruler a god?"

"I know." Natsuki grinned. "I do not know if their pharaoh is truly a god but sometimes they call you a half-god, no?"

"Because of my divine ancestry?"

"Mm, they say."

"My divine ancestor is so far back in the line all that is left in me must be a mere drop of divine ichor now. I am no more than human flesh and blood as is, I believe, even the Egyptian pharaoh."

The Otomeian chuckled before suddenly turning red, to Shizuru's puzzlement. Does she really think me so arrogant as to consider myself an actual god, Shizuru wondered. The Himean could not know the young woman was thinking of all the times she had considered Shizuru's attentions the equal of some divine visitation—the appearance of some benevolent god who knew best how to please and even took great delight in giving that pleasure. Had she not heard it said so many times that the older woman was descended from a deity of love, after all?

"Could be," she said shortly, rubbing one flushed cheek with a knuckle.

Shizuru gave her another curious look, but let it go.

"So you consider all of these gods likely?" she asked. "They do not exclude each other?"

Natsuki sounded affirmatively. Before she could explain herself, Shizuru stopped her to place some food in her mouth, bidding her take a drink before going on, as well.

"I do not know very much oh-of gods and magic. Not for me to say if they are, really," the girl said later. "But I think it is better to give each one the respect of... hmm. I forget the word. Ah! Possibility."

Shizuru smiled at her.

"As I thought, you are pragmatic," she said with a deep chuckle. It passed through Natsuki in a shiver. "Hardly a bad thing in a girl. It merely means you are as level-headed as I have always thought you to be. Very well, now that we have settled that, please do continue with the story. You were speaking of the forest?"

There was a consenting rumble.

"I talked of the Black Forest," she said, licking her lips. "Where my true people lived. We were a tall people too, Shizuru. My cousins the Otomeians will tell you."

"I see it in you."

"Hrm." She tossed her head, like a horse throwing its mane. "We were like the forest where we lived. In that forest, everything grew tall. The wild wolves there grew twice so big as the ones we see here. Their howls were twice so strong. They sounded like-like-like the great horn your callers use for battle. The great one with the sound that goes round and round?"

"The big bugle?"

"Yes, that. They were so loud, and to hear them howl was like to hear an army. It would make the lightning shiver go through the old ones, the ones that had seen what the wolves were like and what they could do."

"I can imagine."

"The wolves were powerful," Natsuki went on. "But, sometimes, you would hear the wolves cry at night. Not the long howl but the whimper, and they would sound like dogs beat with the stick. It was a great bellow you hear after that dog whimper, Shizuru. More powerful to hear than the wolves, and a little like an ox. But not an ox. More as an ox from your gods' Underworld, an ox from the one the Greeks call Hades."

"Dis, Pluto. Master of the realm of Erebus."

"Yes, Dis. Like an ox from Dis of Erebus." She inhaled slowly, majestically. "This sound could make even the wolves cry. That they had tried to hunt the horned beast of this sound and failed and died. That the wolves had been crushed under the foot of the aurochs, the urus, the great and terrible black ox."

Shizuru nodded, spellbound. Natsuki glanced at her and saw she was snared by the story: the girl nodded too in satisfaction.

"My people lived long in that forest," she went on. "We knew its creatures, its spirits. We knew, too, the aurochs. We faced it, running it down into a pit for the hunt and spilling blood to get its wide horns. Much blood it cost, Shizuru. The hunting of the aurochs, it was for the strong and the ones with courage. And sometimes even those two were not enough. It would stamp the ground-huf!- and the earth would shake and the leaves would fall and, if you were slow, you would too. I saw."

"You saw?" Shizuru's eyes snapped wide. "You had been to one of these hunts?"

Natsuki's nod was grave.

"You could not have been very old, Young One, " Shizuru said somewhat apprehensively.

"I was small." The girl met her gaze. "I was riding, it was my first horse, and I saw. It was very close. My uncle watched too, and he said it was good that I saw."

Shizuru wondered if it was truly "good" to have a child watching such a thing so closely. After all, if she had her facts correct, Natsuki could not have been more than seven years of age at the time this had happened. Hunting those beasts sounded too dangerous for a child, even if the child was only playing spectator! Nonetheless, she held her tongue.

"It was the time before winter, the time of autumn," the girl told her, in that lovely deep voice that echoed in Shizuru's dreams. "The autumn, the fall. And the leaves fell, many, around the hunters, and to see the hunters fall was like to see the leaves. It is something I remember now when I see the leaves change colour, red like the blood of a hunter, and drop to the earth."

The older woman smiled, still a touch disturbed at the thought of the girl-child before her and the girl-child's violent memory, but enchanted anyway by her imagery.

"Yes," she said, pouring herself a little wine now for her empty cup. "I see how such a thing would stay with you."

Natsuki inclined her head.

"But, Shizuru," she said with vast mystery, her eyebrows slanting down in earnest. "Even if we hunted the aurochs, we owed much to it too. This is why the hunt of it was for us a sacred thing and not-hmm-not a time to throw spears and arrows with hate or hunger at the animal, but with respect. It was a hunt for courage, not for only meat or food or fur. So it was a hunt to face a thing of respect, and to win the courage with respect."

Shizuru tilted her head to one side to show she was listening.

"I say we owed much to the aurochs, and this is why," Natsuki continued, still looking intensely at her. "There is a story... a long time ago story... about the aurochs, and how it was the aurochs that took away from us an enemy that wanted to try to pass our forest, and maybe try to take our homes. It is a story when the ones we fight now, the people of Obsidian, were not yet so many, and Obsidian was not yet himself."

The blonde woman leaned a little closer.

"The Mentulae?" she asked, even more intrigued now, if possible. "Does this story include them?"

"Yes, they are here." Natsuki smiled a touch wickedly. "They were a smaller people then, as they are small people now."

Her auditor broke into soft laughter.

"Indeed," Shizuru said, regarding her affectionately. "Fine wordplay."

Natsuki looked dignified.

"So, from what I understand of your words, the Mentulae did not have as many territories and people yet, at the time of this tale?" the Himean clarified. The younger woman answered affirmatively. "I see. What you said earlier: do you mean they were considering expanding into the lands of your forests?"

This time, the younger woman smirked.

"Yes," she said. "Stupid. They could not then. They cannot now, even with my people gone. It was very stupid, their-what do they call their priest again?"

"Druid?"

"Yes, druids. Their druids should have said to them."

Shizuru lifted an eyebrow at the reference: "Their druids? Why their druids?"

"They worship spirits of the trees too, Shizuru," Natsuki said, speaking snidely now. "More than my people, different from my people. They were afraid to cut down a great tree, they did not think to make an offering in exchange. We did that, and we knew it was good because we lived with the big trees and they were still good to us even if we cut from them. But the Mentulae live on wider land and lighter forests than our forest. They did not understand."

"I am sorry for taxing you with my queries, but what did they not understand, meum mel?"

The girl held out her hands as if to say it should be obvious.

"That people like them would not know how to keep a forest like ours," she said. "They were grown used to small, thin forests as they have. They live next to their little trees and fear the big ones. They look for the wide spaces to ride their little horses. My people lived with the trees, Shizuru, deep in the heart of them. We rode our horses between the hanging branches. We knew to find the rare space for passing, ourselves, and were not afraid to make a rare space for passing, ourselves. They are bad at the trail, at seeking the path that is not made already."

She paused, frowned deeply for a second. "It is like to a person only good at following a thick rope, who will not find his way through net of very small thread. A fine net that is even more... complicated, because it is poked with the many needles of many combs. Like to a person who sees only in the day because he is blind in the twilight."

Shizuru smiled with her teeth.

"You really are very good at this, Natsuki," she said delightedly, at which Natsuki merely tossed her head, as though to signal she should be silent and listen to the rest of the story.

"What I mean is that they did not see that they were a people who could take and keep that forest only if they cut through it," Natsuki told her sternly. "To make a space for them, a space they knew and could move in and guard and keep. But they were-and they are still now-people afraid to cut down a great tree, they know of no offerings to keep the spirits of the tree well after the cut, and they think of the spirits as unreasonable. Thus they could not cut for their paths. They could not keep something they could not pass. They could not take."

"The druids who worship the trees," she concluded, after this unusually lengthy dissertation. "They should have understood. The land was not for a people such as them."

Shizuru was sitting up straight now, the smile on her face gone.

"Why, of course!" she said. "As you say."

She gave her girl a glance with even more respect in it than before.

"Not good forest people, are they?" she said casually.

"Some of them are horse people and forest people too," Natsuki told her. "But they are horse people only of the wide and flat places. They are forest people only of the thin forest. A weak people because they do not-how do you say? Adapt?"

"Adapt to other terrain, yes."

"Yes, that. You see?"

"I see now," Shizuru answered. "And I understand. It may be we shall need to use that knowledge in the future, and I shall remember."

Natsuki inclined her head lightly.

"Good," she pronounced. "But that is so. Now I go back to the story."

"Very well." Shizuru looked at her apologetically. "I am so sorry for making you digress."

"No. If it helps, it is good." She accepted the morsel of food Shizuru put to her lips and swallowed it first before continuing. "Thank you, Shizuru. I was talking of-of the Mentulae that time, no?"

"In the time when Obsidian was not yet himself, you said."

"Yes. He was not Obsidian. It was one of his early grandfathers that was their ruler, I think." The young woman tucked back a wing of raven hair behind her ear, the shimmer of its movement silvery even in the amber lamplight. "Even then, they were a people who thought to grow bigger, you know. That was the time they began to spread out and push out their limits, their-their-uh, what is the word? The province of Terminus."

"Terminus? The boundaries," Shizuru supplied helpfully.

"Yes, the boundaries. And part of these boundaries was our forest."

"And this forest they sought to take by force," Shizuru finished for her. "Is it not so?"

"Yes, it is so." Natsuki bowed to her shortly. "In that time, that autumn time, they came one year to do it. They came to the edge of our forests with their faces shadowed by the shade of our trees and threatened, and posed, and promised to come into the falling green."

Shizuru sighed, again enjoying herself mightily.

"They came, yes. They came and they were very many. They came so powerfully because they wanted not just the land but also our riches, the great riches of my people from our ancestors, and from great battles we had won." She growled, thin hands describing a great host, an imaginary army in the air. "They came with their little horses, many, and their swords and spears, and their tread was so powerful we heard it deep in the forest, from the ground. They were many, and they had much greed for our lands, our gold. They were many, and they were powerful."

Her gently curling hands froze, her lips curved up.

"But our people say that the power of the many is nothing in a forest, nothing in the dark space always between dawn and night," she said, smiling that small, proud smile. "It is nothing when you know not that forest, and know not its creatures. And the Mentulae, though they were many, were nothing in the end because they knew not our forest. At all."

She shifted lightly in her seat, the sound of her legs over the rug feathery to Shizuru's ears.

"It was the dark time," she continued. "The cold, black time between night and day. The Mentulae made camp near the boundary, near the thick trees of our forest. My people watched them from the tops of those trees, because my people can climb a tree and sit still there, like the night-cat. They watched the Mentulae and counted their fires. And they saw the druids come up, to their big flat altar, a great big stone they brought, and lay the man they chose on it and kill him."

Shizuru exhaled slowly, knowing this custom of ritual sacrifice in the Mentulaean ways of augury. On that point her usual tolerance for foreignness always failed her: surely human sacrifice was savagery!

"They tied the man before the cut," Natsuki recounted. "And they tore him at the belly. The insides were like many fish still live but dying, spilled from the net. Two old druids came to him. One druid-their druids do this-took the insides from him and held up the liver.

He cut it open to see more, to see the future."

The older woman was too deep in the story to say anything, but nodded.

"My people say there was talk between the two druids over the liver," Natsuki said. "That the two looked to be arguing over it. But the older druid, the one whiter of hair, silenced the other and took up the liver. And my people saw, they saw from his black eyes that he would say it was good to come into our forest. My people said it was a lie to him, as some crept close to listen, and the other druid covered his face in shame."

Shizuru frowned and murmured disapprovingly, as she knew Natsuki wished her to do.

"So the old druid started to say the lie," Natsuki went on. "He put up high the liver and said it. But, as quick as he said it, there was a great startle noise. It was a noise my people knew well, so they did not startle where they hid. But the Mentulae were surprised and thought it was great and earth-bound thunder."

Her countenance darkened, a pretty scowl on her features.

"Here is the wicked thing of men," she said, mysteriously again. "Here is the wickedness of the old druid. He ignored the thunder, the warning, and told the lie again. He tried-he tried to use the thunder for his lie too and said it was of their gods, that their gods sent good signs to them."

"Wicked indeed," Shizuru whispered. "I have also known such men, such women who interpret even the clearest portents and muddy them."

"Yes," Natsuki agreed, herself speaking in a voice no more than a whisper. "A wicked thing, a soiled thing. But the lie came out, Shizuru. The thunder grew so loud he could not make the lie heard, not any longer-and the beasts of thunder burst from our forest."

A fierce, terrible joy overcame her face, and Shizuru found herself burning in it.

"My people say the aurochs came out and ran to them-hah!-and the sound hurt the Mentulae's ears. The aurochs came close to the wicked druid and he was like to a stone, frozen with fear, and one beast threw him."

"Ah, it hit him?"

"Yes. He was dead. It hit him like thunder." She made a dark expression with her lovely face, trying to convey the horror of the moment she was describing or perhaps the ferocious beauty of it. "The aurochs caught him in the belly. The horn ran deep, deep in him until he flew away and his insides were outside. The others caught by the aurochs were also dead, and everyone else was yellow with the scare. And this was because of what the old druid spoke. So did the gods send good signs to the Mentulae!"

Shizuru chuckled darkly, shaking her head at the strength of the images in her mind. She could actually see the old druid being skewered and thrown by that monster.

"Later they said the other, truer druid looked at the liver again, but it was crushed," Natsuki said, to end. "And so he looked at the wicked druid's insides instead, because the gods did the cut for him. And this-this is what my people, the ones watching, heard that he said: their gods, their Tuatha, said not to go ahead. That it was clear to them their Tuatha did not wish them to go into that forest because it was not their place, because any forest that could grow demons of oxen could also grow demons of men."

She dropped her eyes to the floor after concluding, and the fine black length of her lashes cast pinprick shadows over her skin. Shizuru held her breath and the silence, lengthening the magic of the moment before finally finding it in herself to break it.

"What a beautiful tale," she said, sighing with deep and heartfelt appreciation. She meant it: the hair on her arms had stood up at the end. "And told by such a beautiful teller. Thank you for saying it to me."

Natsuki bowed gravely, pink in the cheeks. "I am glad to tell. But I am not so good, really."

"You were excellent. In fact, you deserve a reward." She got up and, to the girl's mystification, strode over to the closet near their bed. She opened it and extracted a leather purse, returning to place it on the table. "And here is your prize, Story-teller, Word-weaver. Here is the recompense."

Loosening the mouth of the parcel, she extracted from it a spiral of the brightest gold, the thin metal ring worked into a shape such as would fit on Natsuki's lean upper arm, and the ends of it made into the arrow-shaped head and curling tail of a snake. A carbunculus stone was embedded into the top of the golden serpent's head, its glassy red surface winking in the light. It was a beautiful piece of jewellery, and she knew Natsuki could see it.

"I had meant to give this to you before, along with the saddle," Shizuru said softly. "But I fear some events intervened. Therefore I am finally presenting it to you now. Your arm."

Taking her silent companion's arm, she held it straight and slipped the spiral on it, bringing it from the wrist and fitting it finally on the slender bicep of the arm. Natsuki regarded the object mutely, eyes wide and lips slowly parting.

"As I thought, it becomes you," Shizuru told her, still holding her hand and bringing it up to her lips. "There, and give me your cheek too, Child, for a kiss."

But Natsuki beat her to it, lunging quick and light towards her to give her the kiss instead. Shizuru fell back, laughing, hands stretched backwards to keep her from collapsing entirely.

"You like it, then?" she said, surprised when the answer she received was another catlike spring away from her lap. "Natsuki? Where are you going?"

Still the springing agility of her as she leapt to get something from a drawer in an obscure corner, then the lithe leap back. Shizuru watched every movement in fascination: the girl was so vibrant, her presence at once sensual and aesthetic, that every twitch of the muscle seemed part of a carefully prepared dance. Every action was alive and beautiful. Oh, Shizuru groaned, hit by desire for her all over again, I really do want her . If she could only have her, if she could only know that she truly had her!

"Ah!"

Uttering the triumphant cry, Natsuki presented a small, flat box to her, handsomely carved out of wood. The girl's face was flushed as she handed over the object, and her breathing anxious.

Shizuru took the box with careful hands, looking curiously from it to its giver. She was surprised, she had to admit, and tried very hard not to show it.

"This is for me, Natsuki?"

Natsuki gave a jerky nod.

"Well!" She smiled just as jerkily in return. "Thank you, Darling. I did not expect this. Thank you."

Natsuki frowned.

"Open," she commanded, sounding a touch imperious again. She was being defensive, and Shizuru could feel it. What in the world did it mean? "Shizuru, open. The box."

And, realising she might have transgressed the older woman's authority, suddenly amended with a trembling addition: "Please."

"Very well, as you wish." Shizuru undid the clasps and removed the smooth black lid. She stilled at the sight of what Natsuki had given her. "Why, Natsuki. This is lovely!"

Natsuki hummed quietly, rocking slightly in her crouch now. Shizuru noted the action only distantly, but still recognised the frenzied tension being held in check by her companion. She shook her head and tore herself away from the glittering object in her hands, looking at Natsuki to smile brightly at her.

"Natsuki," she uttered again, putting everything into the syllables. "Natsuki."

Natsuki continued to rock on her shins and knees. Again the wafting scent of her fear and defiance; her eyes were so wide they were boundless.

"I adore it," Shizuru finally told her. "I really adore it. Is it truly for me?"

There was another quick nod.

"My beautiful girl. Thank you so much."

Shizuru stared again at the gift nestled in the dark cloth inside the box: a torc woven out of cords of silver and gold, fashioned into a tight spiralling rope that curved into an arc she knew should encircle her neck. The ends of the arc ended with two knobs which, upon closer inspection, were discovered to be the heads of two wolves, each biting down on a bright red gem.

"Wolves," she said, admiring the fine metalwork of the heads. "Wolves' heads holding carbunculi in their fangs."

There was a strangled hum of agreement from her companion, who still had yet to abandon her unease. Shizuru smiled again her way, trying to dispel the worried scowl on the young woman's face.

"The distinctive jewellery of your country," she said, knowing the torc was most favoured of all ornamentations among the Otomeians.

"This one is especially distinctive, however. What detail there is on the wolves! Oh, Natsuki." She allowed herself to break into a laugh, channelling both gratitude and surprise into the sound. "Natsuki, Natsuki, you darling! I love it!"

The Otomeian finally let through a smile, flushed and a picture of gladness. She held out her hands, and though they were much aged with scars, all Shizuru could see was her face, which held in it the simple but unassailable joy of a child.

"You like?" she asked in a breathy voice, obviously greatly excited about the present. But she remembered herself the next instant, and tried to look stern; she failed magnificently, and swiftly gave up. Instead, she looked at her own outstretched hands. "You like it?"

"Oh, you little fool, how could I not like it?" Shizuru laughed again, leaning forward to peck her lips. "I like it, I like it so very much. It is beautiful."

"Good, good." The girl nodded to herself, and looked down in an effort to hide her growing smile. Suddenly she remembered her hands, which were still aloft. "Oh, I will place it for you?"

"Yes, if you please." Shizuru placed the torc on the slender, many-lined palms, trying to keep hers from trembling. Natsuki had never given her a present like this, she thought, or never one quite this overt. This must surely mean something. Yes, it simply had to mean something.

Ye gods, please tell me it is good, and that it means something.

The delight was nearly unbearable. She felt the coolness of the metal go around her neck, the reassuring weight of it on her skin. It was heavy enough to tell her it was true gold, true silver, yet light enough to be bearable over her collar. The carbunculi, she could tell too, were particularly fine, like little drops of blood close to her throat. Oh, never mind that she was a rich woman, that she had no need of yet more gold and silver, or even carbunculi; the torc might have been woven out of old twine, for all she cared. Natsuki gave it to her! That already made it impossibly valuable.

"Good," she heard the young woman murmur, while coming to sit again before her. "Very good, Shizuru. It is beautiful on you. You are beautiful."

She raised a hand to finger the knob of one wolf's head. The metal was no longer so cold, but she had expected its cool to dissipate slower. It was only then that she realised she had been blushing, and thus warming the metals quicker.

"Natsuki..."

She trailed off in silence. She searched for words and found nothing appropriate, or rather, nothing sufficient. Again something that only ever happened with Natsuki. It was hard to talk, she thought, when the young woman you loved was looking at you in such a way. How could she talk? How could anyone talk then, with the feeling of hope having just ringed their throat and bound it with two glittering drops of ache?

She decided not to try it, knowing whatever she could possibly say would still come short of its intent. Moving swiftly, she instead drew the girl before her into a tongue-melting kiss that continued until she felt Natsuki's pulse race almost to dangerous speeds.

"Thank you again," she said earnestly, cupping the other's face as though to claim it that way. "I am glad for the gift. Here I must ask, however, in case I have been ignorant: is there an occasion warranting it?"

The answer was still out of breath: "No occasion."

"I am doubly glad now." She had to pause to breathe, herself. "I am glad, and yet I hope you have not somehow felt compelled, perhaps, to give me this gift due to some unfortunate things of late." She asked, a touch worriedly: "Did you, meum mel?"

Natsuki shook her head.

"I see." She sighed again, resting her forehead against the pallid, white one. "I am happy."

A few moments later, she laughed. Natsuki was startled and moved her brow away.

"So this is why you were in an excitement over fetching it earlier," Shizuru observed, rather brightly. "Oh, this is fortuitous, is it not? See, we have given matching gifts to each other-and at the same time too."

Their merry eyes darted from the older woman's neck ornament to the one on the younger one's arm.

"Yes," Natsuki said. "Strange, no?"

Shizuru breathed in languorously, savouring the feel of the gift on her.

"Perhaps," she answered. "Perhaps not."

She detached herself from Natsuki's arms, but only so that she could rearrange their position on the soft rug. They tangled closely together again in the blink of an eye, as though neither could bear to be long without the other's skin.

"We are like peas," she said gaily, moving so that she could place the girl's head on her lap. "Like peas from one pod."

But the dark head moved gently at that, turning so that it could face her. The profound look Shizuru found there, one that made her breath catch, arrested her momentary joy and froze it into something else.

She felt a small shudder. Natsuki spoke.

"Like peas, could be," the girl told her quietly, sounding so grieved herself Shizuru could not summon the strength to contend with her. "Could be, Shizuru, but we are from different soil."

Chapter 42

Below is a very pretty piece of art Mlle medoty made recently, and which shall no doubt amuse you terribly if you think on Shizuru's persistent requests to Natsuki in the previous chapters as well as this one. Thank you very much to the artist who, one thinks, has made one fall in love with Natsuki even more with that particular picture.

me-doty-77. deviantart art/quot-Come-with-me-quot-140623679

(Please remove spaces after the full stops.)

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Century - Military unit within the Roman army, composed of 100 men and their leader, the centurion.
2. Cohort - There are ten cohorts in each legion, each with about 600 persons (500 soldiers and 100 non-combatants).
3. Cunni - A latin profanity: "c*nts"
4. Nomenclature - An agent used by politicians when performing their patron-client duties. Clients for the more popular politicians in Rome were significantly numerous, so it would have proven difficult to recall the name of each one. Nomenclatores were used to address this problem: they would stand beside the politician as he received his clients and would whisper each client's name and social details to the patron politician.
5. Octet - Military unit within the Roman army, composed of eight men. Each century (s.v.) divided its soldiers into octets.
6. Strigil - Flat-bladed implement used for bathing. It was used to scrape away oil and dead skin.

7. The Seventh, the Ninth - This is the standard naming pattern for legions, which are all assigned numbers. For further reference, the names of the legions Shizuru has with her are the Seventh, the Eighth, the Ninth, the Eleventh, and the Fourteenth. The first three are veteran legions in this story, although the Seventh is not a veteran legion of Shizuru's (which means it served and gained experience under another general in a previous campaign, and not with her). Incidentally, if you are wondering where the other numbered legions are (e.g. the intervening legion between the Ninth and the Eleventh: the Tenth) they are stationed elsewhere.

Furthermore, for those interested, here are the present (as of this chapter) locations of Shizuru's five legions for the Northern Campaign: the Eighth and 5 cohorts of the Seventh (1/2 of the Seventh) - Argentum; the Eleventh and the Fourteenth - Sosia; the Ninth and 5 remaining cohorts of the Seventh (1/2 of the Seventh) - Argus.

8. " Vah!" - An Ancient Roman expression used to signify, among other things, pain.

---

Inter Nos

par ethnewinter

---

It was a nightly battle.

Over the next days, Shizuru waged war with her lover in a fight of will, trying to get the foreigner to agree to go to Hime. It was the sort of battle where words were laden with snares and lust was a risky corner. She threw it in their conversations, in their silent exchanges, and gnashed her teeth privately at each failure. She threw her on the bed, against the wall, anywhere with a hedging side, and tried to wrangle the 'yes' that would declare herself the victor.

"Come with me," she would say, brow gemmed with sweat. "Come with me, Natsuki."

And the only response would be that persistently sorrowful look-refusal-whereupon she would ask again and continue her thrusts with wretched vigour.

"Do you not want to come?" she would ask, a dark smile spreading on her face. "Natsuki. Do you-not want-to come ?"

Sometimes the girl groaned in frustration from her insistence, right before shattering furiously in her hands. The dark head would throw back and, if it was the third or fourth time for the night, hammer itself rhythmically on the bed as the pale body thrashed for that instant of sadistic pleasure. Shizuru would take pity whenever that finally happened, because she would no longer be able to ignore the spasms of the overused flesh protesting around her fingers. Even her own climaxes were often painful too, because it truly took a great deal from her to withhold it for so long while watching her lover struggle on the sheets. When the moment came that she thought Natsuki could take no more, that to keep pushing would be too cruel, only then would she sigh and tell herself to try again another time. Only then would she relax the self-restraint and grind herself so ferociously against the limp, wet form that it took no more than an instant to blind her, the pleasure so strong it crashed afterwards in her head as a migraine.

" Vah !" she uttered, clutching her head afterwards with one hand. "Too much."

She was atop the other woman, one hand still resting on the inside of the latter's thigh, both thighs hedged by the latter's legs, which were still spread wide as if to receive her. Their skin pressed together was wet, and her hand was sticky. She brought up the sticky hand and fed it to Natsuki.

"My head," she whispered, waiting for the other to finish cleaning her fingers with those slow, sluggish strokes. She laughed in self-mockery, her breath whistling past the Otomeian's ear. "Dear god, it does hurt."

The licking at her hands paused long enough for the other woman to make the derisive sound she had recognised by now as meaning: I told you so; it is your fault.

She sniffed right back.

"You know, if you would only say 'yes', I would cease having to suffer drawing it out," she said with a pout, even knowing her partner could not see her. "What do you say to that?"

The answer came when teeth nipped at her fingers. She frowned, head aching too much to dwell on another night's failure. Instead, she settled for releasing her feelings in a groaning sigh.

"You are..." She shifted a little, but did not abandon her position. "Obstinate."

"You are so obstinate," she repeated. "Natsuki."

Natsuki gathered enough of her wasted strength to reply. Her voice was ragged and small but bore, even then, the cool husk of her strength.

"That!" she puffed scornfully. "You too."

Another sigh. "And does that not tell you that we belong together?"

The younger woman did not answer this time, but gave her fingers one last kiss. Shizuru moaned softly and turned over onto her back, barely able to enjoy the pleasant tickle of the priceless furs heaped on their bed. Their room had returned to its old Himean appearance from Natsuki's redecoration of it a week ago, but not entirely: she had told the girl to keep a few of the foreign furnishings, and had asked for the pelts, in particular. She knew Natsuki liked to curl against the soft warmth of them, a feel of the cat about her, a streak of the wolf: a hybrid creature at once feral and elegant. Shizuru liked to see her against them, so much so that it was not even dislodging to superimpose that image of the girl on her memories of her own bedroom, back in Hime. It was a pleasing picture, and one she wished to see come true.

"Oh, the ache. This is ridiculous." She finally managed to sit up, her sight going bright from vertigo. She shut her eyes when her head swam. " Ecastor !"

There was a rustle of movement from the limbs nearby; she could not see it, but she heard Natsuki crawl slowly away, towards their end-table. She remained where she was, legs over one side of the bed, and furiously massaging her temple.

Soon she heard the rustling approach return. Natsuki was moving back her way, still slithering on the sheets. Involuntarily, a tired smile came to her mouth: amazing that the girl still managed to move, after everything she had done. What a lovely challenge was there in that stamina, that resistance. Simply lovely... and damned infuriating.

"Shizuru."

She looked up at the whisper. Natsuki was crouched at her side now and holding a little cup. The Otomeian poured a small puddle of the water from that cup into one hand and held the hand to the top of Shizuru's head. There, Natsuki tipped it, very slowly, and the fair-haired woman felt the trickle of coolness run over her scalp, soothing the pounding she felt deep behind her eyes. The girl's hands were wet next, and she used the drops of water on them to massage Shizuru's temples herself.

"Better?" the young woman whispered, still clearly exhausted from their exercises. "Now?"

Shizuru smiled gratefully. "Yes." It was true: the cool water had taken away some of the heat in her head. "Thank you. You are sweet."

Even with her terrible weariness, Natsuki still had an answer to that.

"No, Shizuru," she muttered ironically. "I am obstinate."

Shizuru blew through her nose in amusement.

"Quite right," she agreed unreservedly.

She relaxed under the attention for a while, letting the tender hands continue the massage. It was not long before the pain had waned enough to permit her to take the cup of water away and take the other woman by the waist, laying her back so she could stretch comfortably atop her again.

"We should really sleep now, you see," she murmured. "We may wash in the morning. Pardon me for doing this to you again, as we have to wake early tomorrow."

Natsuki rumbled.

"Nnh," she said. "It is all right."

A few seconds of silence passed, and Shizuru thought she had fallen asleep, until she disproved it by speaking again.

"Shizuru..." she whispered, arms folding about the older woman's slender body. "Your head?"

"Much better now."

"Um." She drew a breath and called her again. "Shizuru?"

"Yes?"

"Often, now... this. Why?"

"From holding myself back," Shizuru said, a little puzzled. "I have said this to you already."

She felt heat next to her cheek.

"Nn-no," came the other woman's answer. "I mean, why or-why do it?"

She laughed throatily into the young woman's ear for reply and felt her tremble at the rush of air.

"Really," she said, as though in disbelief at the question. "You should know the answer to that yourself, meum mel. You should see it in what I have done tonight, as I have been doing nearly every night. You should see why I save mine for the last moment."

And she knew she was right, because Natsuki said nothing. A malicious thought came to her all of a sudden and she smirked.

"A good thing I am not a man," she said.

Natsuki was amazed by the remark, and pushed her up with a stare. Shizuru held the position, holding herself up by her arms.

"It is difficult enough to keep myself from spending just from touching you," she went on nonchalantly, by way of explanation. The torch-hot blush raging over her companion's skin was ignored. "And I am a woman. They say it is even more difficult for men to hold back from release when so tortured by stimulation, and you are nothing if not an inundation of that."

She let herself down again to nip the angrily pink ear before saying, with conscious wickedness: "Were it so and were I a man, I might spend on you in seconds. It would hardly suit me to shorten your pleasure... not to mention possibly inconvenience you with certain-hm-side effects. Aren't you lucky, in that sense?"

It had the desired result: Natsuki's body went rigid, flaring into heat and pushing involuntarily against her at the same time. It amused her terribly to elicit such reactions from the girl, particularly since the stimuli she used were such forbidden words, things she would never have been able to mouth to any other. The first time she had said such sinister jokes, Natsuki had stared at her in shock, face seeming to say, Oh, I never thought you could say that! And yet some of the black magic had gone to the disturbed girl, the fear-thrill of the forbidden shown in the quivers that coursed through her body at Shizuru's laugh.

Now she gripped the older woman's back furiously, her shaking hands clawed. They dug deeper when Shizuru only chuckled.

"No-buh-bad," the Otomeian chastised quietly. "You are bad."

It was Shizuru's turn to shiver. How did Natsuki make her voice sound that way, she wondered. Even trying to be gruff, it was alluring, as musical as the low snarl of an angry cat. She turned to kiss her gently on one cheek and then the other, an ironically chaste action to follow so ribald a jest, and felt the cat's distress subside in a purr.

"I am," she whispered, deciding to stop this train of thought before it could continue to its logical conclusion-which had been reached so many times tonight that it really would kill both of them to continue. "I am bad, yes, for keeping you up so late. Please forgive me. And go to sleep. You may yet have a few more hours of it."

Natsuki released a sigh too, and Shizuru smirked at the relief it held.

"You too," Natsuki told her, describing her collar with trailing fingers. "Sleep."

"I shall as soon as you do," Shizuru rolled to one side, Natsuki following her so that they were still facing each other. Shizuru pulled the younger woman in, holding the sleek head close to her neck; Natsuki yawned once she had settled and it trailed off into a soft mewl. "Rest now, My Darling. Please rest."

"Hard to get up," Natsuki complained almost sulkily, even while nudging closer. "To-tomorrow."

"Perhaps. You need not rise early, actually." Shizuru smiled, torn between guilt and triumph for what she had done to the younger woman. "Is not your own errand in the late afternoon? You need not accompany me in the-"

"But. Yes, but no..." She was mumbling now, barely beating back the sleep. "I will. Go with you."

"No, it is fine." Shizuru cupped the back of the black head protectively. "You need not, truly."

"No." Natsuki shoved further under the older woman's chin, her breath tickling Shizuru there. "No. Will go early."

"But-"

"Shh."

"Natsuki."

"Grr."

Shizuru sighed in capitulation, seeing there would be no convincing her this time. At least, not if she wanted the girl to actually rest, for she had a suspicion: Natsuki would stay up until it was time for her work, to ensure that she was not tricked into sleeping in.

"As I thought," she said, teasing even in surrender. "Simply obstinate."

She felt the lips on her neck smile slowly and knew Natsuki had a reply.

"Quite... right."

The result of all this was that, the following morning, Natsuki's prediction proved true: it was indeed very hard to get up. Days-or, more properly, nights-of their furious exercise could still take a toll on the healthiest bodies. Though they numbered among the ranks of the athletically elite, they were not immune to the effects of excess. The price finally fell on that particular dawn, when the two of them rose feeling creaky and ill-rested. The girl, in particular, yawned so terribly throughout their breakfast that Shizuru felt the guilt keenly-enough even for her to try and persuade the younger woman to return to their bed. To no avail. And once again, the older woman had no recourse but to frown and sigh. Obstinate.

At least, she consoled herself when they were in the office, she will have plenty of time to rest herself, while keeping guard over me here. As Shizuru went through the usual routine of interviews and client-visits, all that was required of the girl was to sit quietly by her chair, on the little stool. Visits to the general's headquarters were regulated, duty officers and legionaries stood guard outside, and her staff accompanied her within: one could not possibly imagine a threat approaching the location. Therefore, Shizuru supposed the young woman watching over her could rest then. There was nothing to stop the girl from dozing at this time, was there?

This was one of those occasions where Shizuru's understanding of Natsuki failed her; she had assumed the girl's idleness during those times they were merely at her desk. She was correct in that the sum total of Natsuki's duties at those times was merely to sit still and observe. Nonetheless, she had not fully understood that Natsuki approached those duties with the same determination she did every other: Natsuki did it constantly, Natsuki did it assiduously, Natsuki did it to the point of practical exhaustion.

Perhaps had the Himean asked the girl for an opinion on these banal hours of their routine, she would have gotten a sense of it. Shizuru already knew that her girl was a thinker. What she had yet to learn was how constantly that thinking streak in Natsuki blazed, how deeply the reasoning under Natsuki's curiosity ruled. It was persistently mathematical, this reasoning: it was ever pragmatic. In this was one of the differences of their nature: Shizuru, while eminently capable of cool and calculating thought, was still capable of the occasional daydream when whiling away time; Natsuki, the consummately grounded observer, was very nearly not. Or rather, it might not have been so much a question of capacity as it was of courage. The girl would not permit herself to daydream for, most of her life, her only experience with daydreams had been as nightmares. Surely no one could blame her for eschewing that little pleasure so many others had, of the occasional pleasurable trance?

Whatever the case, Shizuru had not yet fully realised that the girl next to her was perpetually note-taking in private, even while appearing unconcerned with everything nearby. That was part of her feint, of course: having been compelled into wary observation of her surroundings all her life, the Otomeian had long learned that people did not take well to being so obviously watched. Therefore she pretended apathy and set her enchantress's gaze only on those she wished to freeze.

But in Shizuru's offices, she had no need to freeze. Even should the occasion merit it, she knew her older lover well enough now to see that the Himean could do it even faster than she could. She might have the constant winter, after all, but Shizuru could bring in an unexpected blizzard.

Thus she was forced into the watch, and her diversion of note-taking when doing a watch. She was a critical note-taker, one whose mind raced with endless connections and relations and categories. She tried to work out the How's of this foreign culture hedging her about, the What's and Wherefore's. She was perpetually absorbing everything and everyone in it, yet retained a focal point to this universe that beat in her head like drum keeping time. Shizuru, Shizuru, Shizuru. Why did Shizuru do this? How did Shizuru do that? Always she overheard people asking the Himean commander the same questions, and sometimes she was the one asking too... but more often than not, because of her pride and her nature, she tried to ask herself. And thus learned a great deal without really intending it.

For instance, she had often asked herself why her lover did not employ a nomenclatore as did the other Himean nobles, when receiving clients. Certainly she understood part of the reason was Shizuru's great memory. Still, she also understood that Shizuru invested effort in trying to remember and invoke each client or soldier's particulars in an instant. After a while, however, she had come to notice each client's pleasure, each ranker's grin of delight at being so remembered; she had noticed how Shizuru's warm familiarity with them made each one better disposed to accept her counsel or decisions. Herself not of a personality naturally inclined to seeking familiars-as well as descending from royalty, which dictated no real need to remember the names of those significantly lower-she saw the value of it in Shizuru's dealings; it was something she thought would be well to remember.

There were other things on which she pondered. She took note of the obsessive organisation the Himean demanded in all matters, a mode of organisation that permeated even to Shizuru's command of the army. She wondered about the Himean's manner of dictation, which she had never seen anyone do before: speaking to three scribes at once for three different letters, switching from one to another in between columns of words, yet never actually losing track of where she had been. She marvelled at the older woman's ever-surfacing unorthodoxy, which tampered with everything and spared no one, yet was forever making things better where people had previously thought matters already best.

On such things did she think, and on thinking of such things did she labour, Shizuru's quiet and seemingly uninterested girl. Thus it was that she actually had no rest by the time her errand was due, and thus it was too that she found herself yawning, at the end of particularly long interview, in unison with her general.

It was at this point that someone she thought among the army's more interesting creatures entered. The Otomeian-coloured patrician Shizuru called a friend, the cunning one called Suou.

"Owls hoot by night and yawn by day-or was it cats?" said the blonde and blue-eyed woman, strolling in with the indifferently haughty posture of her rank. "Whatever it is they say. Good afternoon."

Shizuru's staffers quickly returned the greeting.

"It might very well be bats. Welcome, Suou-han," Shizuru said, her yawn interrupted and abandoned. The Otomeian watching continued hers with nearly royal leisure. "Pardon the yawn, please."

"Consider it pardoned. I've been doing it all day, too." She looked about. "Chie-san is not here either. So she hasn't recovered from her cold yet?"

"No, unfortunately. I hope she gets better soon."

Suou nodded. "Yes, although she did send a note to say she'd still be meeting me and Sugiura-san later, for an evening drink. So she might be feeling a little better."

"Well, then." Shizuru smiled and laced her fingers across the desk. "How goes it?"

"It goes... but there is something that might have gone the wrong way, just now." At the other woman's quizzing look, she clarified. "Trouble."

"Trouble?"

She occupied the client's seat, facing Shizuru across the desk. "A grievance lodged against some of the soldiers."

Shizuru nodded, not seeing anything meriting true animation in the news. But that was before Suou continued.

"Lodged before me ."

And with her swift grasp of nuances, the commander of the army immediately understood the suggestion. Suou was her youngest legate, true, but the Himemiya was also in a sense the most important, due to her name and connections. For the complaint to be lodged expressly before Suou's desk meant that whoever had placed it was terribly serious-and, perhaps, terribly wronged. The provost marshals rarely thought it necessary to refer disciplinary matters to someone as high up as a legate; they dealt with all the usual problems themselves, like the angry parents of the local girls taking up with the legionaries, crabby tavern-owners after the brawls, and so on. These things Shizuru, like every general since time immemorial, expected and had learned to tolerate; any other misdemeanour she had also learned, she could not. It brought out the angry gleam of blood in her eyes, as it did now. Her feelings were akin to those of a proud parent, suddenly disappointed by a formerly well-behaved child.

She flexed her spine to prepare tired muscles for yet another task, stretching her arms over the desk. The girl next to her watched the motion fixedly, green eyes riveted to the muscle sliding under her long arms. Shizuru did not notice it, but the other Himean did. The latter swiftly pretended not to have seen.

"Credible?" Shizuru asked briefly.

The other patrician was just as brief, although there was still a flickering smile in her eyes for what she had witnessed Shizuru's bodyguard do. "Looks like."

Shizuru shut her eyes in annoyance.

"Please tell me it is not rape," she responded. "I do not cherish the thought of cutting away noses today."

Suou denied it. "No, not rape, thank heavens. Alleged theft of the property of a local..."

Shizuru waited impassively.

"Who happens to be one of the more influential citizens," Suou finished.

"Ah!" The general nodded. "Political."

"More than anything-the plaintiff's representative was rather haughty about it." The other patrician smiled wryly. "He intends to be difficult, I imagine, though I also imagine that, between the two of us, we can prevent any such posturing. The irritating part is that it's a more or less complete case, too, with witnesses. There would have to be witnesses, the direct victim-the slave carrying the stolen goods-included. Whoever the fools are, they apparently did it while stumbling around drunk."

A soft click of the tongue. "And how are the witnesses so certain the perpetrators are from our legions?"

"The idiots were wearing some of their gear-not the older-issue ones of the local garrison, so easily recognisable."

Shizuru winced; the other officers in the room were very subtly leaning in too, trying to catch as much of the conversation as they could while pretending immersion in their respective papers.

"Inelegant," the commander said at length, a look of distaste on her face. "Inelegant."

"I agree completely."

"The names?"

Suou's silvery brows rushed together, and she crossed her legs leisurely while talking. "We're not sure yet, although we are trying to figure it out right now. However, Nao's supervising the culling with the other centurions..." She smiled her slow-to-complete grin. "So we should be assured of names sooner or later."

"Right." Shizuru rested her chin on one hand. "I should suppose so. The items stolen?"

"Just some nice pastries and two jugs of wine. They accosted the slave on his way to transporting the goods-supposedly sustenance for some of the master's nephews, who were out on some business late." The legate dropped her eyes and grimaced at her feet, which were speckled with mud; she had come from outside, after all, and outside was wet. "I suppose the soldiers were just out to continue their little drunken party and saw the slave as easy meat. Overall, just trifling things were taken, really, even if the wine was-according to the plaintiff, anyway-a very expensive Falernian. Still, I personally see little trouble there."

"Theft has a nearly magical power of imbuing value, which means even a stolen pebble is no longer a mere trifle." The crimson-eyed woman inclined her head to one side, as though deep in thought. "Besides that, we must remember that I stated it at the outset of this mission: I would sorely punish anyone who stole anything."

Suou hummed.

"The word of a commander is divine law to the legionary," she said. "You're right. Whatever was stolen, it doesn't change the fact that it is bad form. It was counter-orders. That says everything."

"There is also the fact that it sullies the name of the entire army. Civilians are wary enough of soldiers without having this sort of thing happening, and if an influential civilian happens to be the victim? A word is enough to sow a harvest of distrust for the army."

"And suspicion is a fast-growing crop. I see."

"Rather." Shizuru leaned forward and made a steeple of her hands, putting her elbows on the desk. Her forehead came to rest against her hands as she spoke very quietly, so that only Suou and the girl beside her could hear. "And here I thought I had kept them busy enough."

Suou dropped her voice as well: "You did, as much as you could. It's not your fault."

"No? Perhaps-only perhaps -that could be true if the soldiers were discovered to have come from the cohorts we detached from the Seventh, who are not my veterans... but if they come from the cohorts of the Ninth, then I am easily to blame, for the Ninth is made up entirely of my old soldiers. It reflects negatively on me, whatever the case."

She sighed, letting her eyes close for a moment as she concluded:

"And of all people, they had to choose someone in the household of a significant person? Really, so inelegant."

"If there is anyone to blame it would be the sluggards in Senate," Suou returned. "It's they who have put us in this awkward stasis with nothing to do. You've been doing your best with the hard drilling, but the legions-especially veteran ones, see-get twitchy without actual fighting, as we all know. This sort of thing happens all the time when rankers don't see action."

Shizuru peeked at her friend with one red eye. "True. Nonetheless, I would not say this sort of thing entirely. Why, by all the gods, were they fool enough to be wearing their gear?"

"There were drill field exercises until late the other day, remember? We are surmising it's among those legionaries who didn't bother changing back to their civilian tunics."

Shizuru's brow wrinkled. "And here one would think that the normal thing to do. Is not all that material and sweaty fabric encumbering?"

"You forget something, Shizuru-san: the mating urges." Suou laughed at her old friend's puzzlement. "See, most of them go looking for companionship afterwards-though I'd like to think they bathe first-and they do it in uniform, because..."

"Because local girls and boys, in every locale, have always been mad for the soldier in armour," Shizuru finished in understanding, sighing deeply again. "Oh, I do wish that fascination would wear out! It gives the provost marshals the majority of their problems: all those fuming fathers and mothers, angry brothers, sometimes even sisters, all the new babies made at every corner... Why, I cannot help but feel it cheapens our uniforms when a soldier uses his merely to posture and troll about for a willing boy or girl who thinks it the sexiest attire ever!"

Suou looked at her friend pointedly, thinking it delicious that a woman who indeed made the gear look "the sexiest attire ever" would so complain of that particular phenomenon. And, she noted with a satisfied smirk, the Otomeian girl's heightened colour seemed to agree with her.

"Well, at least it gives them practice in having it on," she replied glibly. "They can't complain come time for the long marches if they're used to having it for that petty hunt as the weapon. Still, you do realise people like us can say this easily?"

Shizuru seemed confused for a second and stared quizzically at her friend, whose beautiful features regarded her with frank amusement. She finally caught on to the joke.

"Oh," she said, with a short laugh. "I wonder."

"How modest of you to do so." Suou raised both brows airily. "But, anyway, that's how it is."

"I see." Shizuru took a deep breath. "I had best see to it now. Yuukihan is doing the inquiries now at the camp, you said?"

"Yes, she has them in assembly on the parade grounds."

"Then we must go there." She rose and was emulated by Suou and the girl beside her, whom she then addressed. "Natsuki, is it not yet time for your errand? It seems we shall have to separate here, for the moment."

The girl twisted her mouth, but did not argue: Shizuru was right, after all. After a few more words, they agreed that they should part, with the older woman promising to meet her in their quarters for dinner, telling her to wait there should she finish ahead of them. It was in recollection of the girl's weariness upon waking in the morning that she stipulated this, not wishing to tire her with this new activity this afternoon; so did she explain it to her friend, as they left to head for the camp.

"I understand," Suou simply said, being wise enough not to ask a question to which she already knew the answer. Instead, she put forward another. "Have you ever attended any of their meetings, by the way? Natsuki-san's with the other Otomeians?"

"A few times, yes." She gave her friend a comical look. "You know... you were there too."

"Oh, not those! Those were expressly with all officers, Himean or otherwise. I meant with their officers presiding, strictly, and you watching as a mere observer."

"Then no, not yet." Shizuru lifted her brows. "Have you?"

"I wouldn't say I was truly in attendance in the sense of having been invited, but I chanced upon one once, when I had some business with one of their barons. Their posts let me in, since the meeting was nearly over." She smirked, and her crystalline eyes were supremely amused. "Either that or they thought I was one of them."

Shizuru laughed. "How was it?"

The legate's teeth flashed white as she answered: "I rather had the sense of seeing many an Achilles."

"What?" Shizuru was eager for her to say more. "Is it for their appearance? They are all fair, I think, save for my girl."

Suou agreed.

"Yes, though her impression certainly doesn't suffer for it!" she said, remembering Natsuki's slender, dark-haired figure next to all those blonde giants, whose presences yet could not manage to dwarf hers. "But more than that. Is it all the gold and silver glittering so brassily on them, like the gifts of Vulcan? Is it their terrible height, colossi as they all are? I wonder. See, Shizuru-san, the impression their officers give is not like ours, who can seem unmartial sometimes unless actually thrust in battle. Some of our officers look more like businessmen, so to speak, while theirs never do."

She shook her head, frowning lightly as she searched for how better to express the idea.

"Oh, I don't know," she finally stated. "It's just that every single one of them, without exception, looks and feels an absolute warrior. Barbaric, and beautiful that way!"

Shizuru nodded in comprehension.

"Yes, I think I see," she said slowly. "They do reek of fierceness, down to the last blonde-or, for Natsuki, black-hair."

"Exactly. A blonde horde." She halted by some legionaries with horses. "With equally barbaric, beautiful monsters for horses. Here are our mounts."

She pointed out the largest to Shizuru.

"As you can see, that one is of the largest Otomeian stock," she said. "I purchased it from them recently."

"Beautiful indeed," Shizuru observed, stroking the muscular neck of the huge bay as the soldiers greeted them. "You chose well. I hope the price was fair?"

"Fair enough! It was worth a fortune." She smiled faintly, something furtive underneath. "Do you know that they generally do not sell their horses? Those particular ones, at any rate. The smaller, more ordinary ones owned by the less important warriors and less affluent among them are the ones they are amenable to selling."

"The breed close to the stock used by the Mentulae?" Shizuru said, thoroughly inspecting the animal. "Truly more ordinary, compared to these enormous steeds. As ours generally look ordinary compared to these too."

"Precisely. As with most horse people, status is generally indicated by the quality of horses owned, and the number," Suou answered with a smile. "We Himeans invest in real estate; they invest in horseflesh. And the investments are terrifically costly."

"With good reason. You are lucky to have found someone willing to sell this one, then," the general returned. "A mare, too!"

"It took over two months of wrangling since we've been here, and a load of gold." The younger woman turned away, so as to conceal the smirk in her eyes. "It's not just the value they have in coin, see. Their warriors consider these horses as they would a partner, with whom they have spent years together. They are not tools for them, nor are they mere beasts for convenience. They invest a great deal in their horses, in each of their war chargers."

Shizuru was silent; it was clear Suou had given her cause to think.

"Would that I had had someone willing to give me one, as a present instead of a purchase. But I'm not so fortunate."

The Himemiya turned to face her friend again and whatever else she had to say on that particular thread was communicated in a look. Suou nodded, telling her she was welcome for the detail.

"Anyway," the younger patrician said, breaking the moment. "I intend to send her back home. For my sister."

Shizuru appreciated the thoughtfulness of the gesture.

"She will adore it," she answered, thinking of her old friend's-Suou's sister's-love for horses. "I am certain."

"I did want you to see it too, first," Suou said, deciding to ride on one of the other mounts, which was one of her favourite horses. While certainly not as large as the Otomeian-stock horse Shizuru was inspecting, it had an especially slender grace about its carriage that she favoured. "You and Chikane have much the same preferences in horses. Please go ahead and ride it this time, just as a trial. Tell me what you think later."

The general acquiesced.

"There are three," she also noted.

The other woman shrugged. "I had assumed another presence, naturally."

"I see." With a snap of her limbs, she swung herself up on the large horse, suddenly doubly eager to conclude her work. "Let us be off quickly. I only hope Yuuki-han has begun to achieve results."

Reaching the camp a short ride later, they found her hope justified: Yuuki-han had indeed achieved results. Shizuru's acid-tongued primipilus had already found the culprits, having worked indefatigably with the other centurions to produce the perpetrators. The guilty soldiers turned out to be from a cohort of the Seventh-a small balm to the general's soreness, since they were not from her old veterans-and were turned in by their fellow octet-members, who had seen them leave the tavern drunken and return to barracks at the times specified by the investigating officers. Both had been noticeable, for they had reeked of liquor and a night's mischief. Their centurion was one Hasumi, who turned over the two legionaries to his cohort's chief centurion. She then passed them to their legion's senior primipilus, named Takashi.

It was Takashi who was tongue-lashing the guilty pair with Nao when their two superiors arrived.

"They are in the drill field, then?" Shizuru asked the soldier who had informed her upon arrival; he had been waiting for them. Everyone in the army knew the general's mania for efficiency and swiftly available information. "Takashi-han and Yuuki-han, as well as the two responsible?"

"Yes, General." He directed two rankers to stable the patricians' horses. "Their century is also there, General."

"Along with Hasumi-han, their centurion."

"Yes, General. Everyone else was sent back to barracks."

"Hmm." Shizuru slowed her walk smoothly and darted a look at Suou. "Then we can take our time. I suppose Takashi-han and Yuuki-han are trying to talk to them."

Both her companions looked at her curiously. Did she really think those two salty primipilii were just "trying to talk" to the men responsible?

"I feel it would be discourteous to, ah, interrupt just yet," she continued, speaking as though thinking aloud to herself. "Yuuki-han and Takashi-han might appreciate me letting them have a few words with the legionaries first. They are the senior centurions of the legion and army. It would only be proper to let them put a gentle word in the pairs' ears before we get to it."

The soldier-also a centurion-leading them swallowed a guffaw, although part of it came up his nose as a snort.

"Why, of course," Suou said, laughing inwardly at her friend's innocent expression. "Of course it would only be proper."

She turned to the man accompanying them, whose blue eyes were dancing.

"Don't you think so, my good man?" she asked.

"Right you are, Himemiya-san, and so's the general," he said, trying to compensate for the delight shining in his face by sounding gruff. "Right and proper."

"Would you be so kind as to inform my two primipilii of this?" Shizuru asked, smiling at her centurion. Invitation to the conspiracy shone in her bright-blooded eyes. "They should also welcome the word in advance, I imagine, to know that we are on our way."

"Right away, General."

"Oh, and please inform them as well that we shall be waiting in the command tent overlooking the drill field."

He grinned. "Yes, General."

He was about to go off when she stopped him.

"Ah, one more thing before you go," she said affably. "Would you also have someone check with the plaintiff to see if he is feeling well enough to come? In the event that he is, please tell him I am inviting him over for an interview to settle this affair; if he is indisposed, then please extend the invitation to whomever lodged the complaint for his sake and wishes to represent him. Whatever the case, be sure to arrange pleasant escorts and proper hospitality for the visitor, for I would like him to be kept in one of the offices while waiting—merely say I am seeing to something urgent, in that time. Keep the person happy; ask the military tribunes how to go about this, since they are well aware of how things should be arranged. I shall send for the visitor when I require him."

"Right away, General," he rapped out, pleased to have been tasked personally by her. "I'll get it all ready."

She smiled at her eager subordinate. "I shall leave it to you, Kitano-han."

How he beamed when she said his name! He saluted her one more time and ran off to do her commands. The two women ambled at an easy pace, smiling and nodding at the legionaries they passed. They were not in too great a hurry any longer, for it was part of Shizuru's intent that her primipilii should have their way with their rankers first. It would save her the trouble of "giving the saltier lecture". The legate agreed with a hearty bout of laughter.

"Crafty, crafty," Suou smirked to her. "And I suppose you shall rescue them from those two raving centurions' clutches and try to talk to them so carefully they'll be grateful and guilty enough to beg you for the punishment afterwards?"

Shizuru shrugged her shoulders and smiled.

"Look at this, by the way." Suou suddenly frowned, turning her icy gaze to the muddy patches on their path. "You can't blame Chie-san for catching cold. We'll be spotted like hogs in a sty before the afternoon is done."

Shizuru made a wry face as well, suddenly reminded of the fact that her feet were freezing: the damp had gone through her boots and socks as they walked.

"It has begun to slush," she said worriedly. "I wonder how well-channelled are the rivers hereabouts."

"The city's safe enough, they say, though that's probably not your focus. Concerned about mobility?"

"Of course." A corner of the tawnier blonde's lip turned up in a fleeting sneer. "I may be about to be replaced, but it does not change my concern for these corners. After all, I have every intention of returning here immediately when that happens, my trip to Hime being only a short stopover."

"I know. And speaking of Hime..." The legate's lips thinned. "Soon, the floods around spring and summer. Ugh!"

"Yes, they should come on in a few more months."

"Exactly. This is one time I am actually glad to be stationed elsewhere, so I do not envy you for your impending return home, short as you intend it to be."

Red eyes peered at her shrewdly.

"The Himemiya manor does not suffer from the floods, Suou-chan," Shizuru reminded. "We both live among the highest spots in the Palatine district-which, actually, is placed high in the entire."

The other patrician shook her head dismissively.

"Of course it doesn't suffer from flooding," she answered. "But that does not save the rest of Hime from the rainy season. I hate the way it affects the lower areas and the districts around the Forum. Not only does it become disgustingly muggy once the floodwaters start to evaporate, but the stench of backfilled latrines is amazing. And not even the precious height of our snobby hill can escape that miasma."

"True, the city does become quite ripe in vapour and aroma."

"Not to mention insanitary. The diseases come on like a plague."

"Oh yes, quite terrible-"

She broke off here abruptly and Suou glanced at her in puzzlement. The blue-eyed patrician could not know Shizuru was thinking of her girl and how, if said girl did come to Hime, she would have to be sent away from the city during that time of flood and disease. The Otomeian would be likely to suffer in that alien, hotly noxious weather; foreigners unaccustomed to it and the diseases spread due to it were known for suffering the most. In fact, foreigners from cooler lands were often among the fatalities come the end of the summer term.

She clenched her hands unconsciously at the idea.

Her fellow patrician's voice intruded on her thoughts, and she welcomed the intrusion to take her mind off her morbid notions.

"Ah, here we are!" Suou's sky-blue eyes lit up as she saw their destination. "And there they all are."

They skirted the grounds shortly, keeping within the growing shadows. Reappearing at the tent erected atop a dais nearby, they chose to display themselves at its entrance, standing there like visiting deities come to observe a judgment dispassionately. The two senior centurions on the field, upon noticing them, ordered the legionaries to salute and snap to attention.

"The general's here for you arseholes," the male centurion, Takashi, said savagely; he was chief primipilus of the Seventh legion. He faced two men standing stiffly to attention, in front of the rest of their century, and his face was like flint. "For you sons-of-bitches! I'm ashamed to have her come here for you! I'm ashamed to be here in front of her, and have to tell her it's you little shits from my legion've given her this headache... and tried to get away with it! Get on the fucking ground and kiss it, you shit. Get down and bow! You've no right to be saluting the general after what you've done. You've no right to even stand up a'front of her. I'll not be sending you to her before you do that for a start on penance!"

This tirade was followed by the senior primipilus, who stalked over to the men with her eyes blazing a menacing yellow, virulent green at the edges. Takashi stepped aside and quieted down for her: he was mindful of the pecking order.

"I should roast your balls, you cunni, if you had them," the army's highest-ranked primipilus said with rancid sweetness. The two observing patricians heard the words hang in the damp air, icicles dripping venom. "Going out and getting piss-blind is one thing, but thieving and attacking someone in the gear is another. Takashi's right-I can't send you to the commander at this rate. You're not worthy of facing the general yet. You're not even worthy of the armour!"

She snapped her fingers in a crack and pointed at the two culprits.

"Strip!" she ordered, to general astonishment. "Off with it."

The two men hesitated, and she rounded on them like an enraged harpy.

"Gods damn you, didn't you hear me, cunni?" she howled, hair spiking wildly around her like a carmine halo. "Take that shitty armour off! Hurry, you little mincing flowers, before I peel your worthless stalks where they are! Be quick about it!"

Hands shaking, the two legionaries struggled to get out of their armour, leaving only their tunics and breeches on. The shed items were picked up by the hapless pair's octet-members, who would put it away for their sake. The two Himeans at the tent continued to watch, their spines ramrod straight and cloaks thrown elegantly over their shoulders. Both their faces seemed majestically serious from a distance.

The chief primipilus of the army spewed another jet of steaming invectives, ordering the tunic-clad pair on the muddy field to divest themselves even of their closed-toe boots.

"Get out of it, you bastard fools!" she spat, alternating with the growls of the Seventh's senior centurion. "Hurry or I'll bury you in your gods-fucked gear!"

The two patricians watching from the tent on the dais struggled with their laughter.

"She'd peel plaster from a wall," one said affectionately, provoking the general's muffled chuckle in return. "Oh, Jupiter, don't you just adore her? I must introduce her to Urumi when there's a chance!"

The other patrician managed to look thoughtful at that.

"You know," she said. "I have always wondered what would happen if I put Yuuki-han and Chikane in a room together, and bade them have a conversation."

Suou fell back into the tent's recesses and dissolved in a peal of mirth, unable to control it any longer.

"I don't know if I would feel sorrier for one or the other," she said, dabbing tears from her eyes. "Anyway, shouldn't we break it up yet? Those poor men might wet themselves from terror."

Shizuru turned away from the sight outside to shoot her friend a flashing smile.

"Oh, right," Suou said, with another breezy laugh. "Not that they'd be safe from that once they get to you."

"Well, we shall see." She held up her hand anyway, which the two primipilii on the field took as the signal to send the men over. "In any case, it is well that we should not appear unduly cruel."

She left the opening of the tent upon seeing the men walk over, accompanied by their superior officers.

"Is that so?" Suou tilted her head thoughtfully. "Truth be told, I used to wonder what exactly was overboard in the army, or what was cruelty. The first time I joined, my mindset was that of a pampered civilian-worse, a pampered patrician. Everything, suddenly, seemed to be phrased as an order full of salt and vinegar. Or so I thought, watching the officers and centurions talk to the men."

The other woman was older than her by a mere year, but far more veteran in terms of military experience. She answered:

"Understandable. I suppose the only thing I can say to that is that it takes time to learn exactly where the borders are."

"Really?" Suou flicked her hair, the pale strands spreading over her shoulders like limp flax. "I don't know. I should like to think I am learning well, and that your theory on time being the teacher applies to me..."

"It does."

"Yet I have seen and heard tell of such people who are accused, sometimes by their soldiers and sometimes by their subordinate officers, of undue cruelty. And these, people who have had the benefit of time, from campaign to campaign."

Shizuru seated herself at her table, still smiling.

"There you have me," she admitted. "Well, time is not the only teacher, really. Good sound, common sense matters, as well as the ability to adapt and see when something calls for a touch of relativity." She tapped a long finger on one smooth cheek. "For myself, I believe I try to seek a balance between the bat and the bait. Certainly not everything should be phrased as harsh interdict."

She quirked a brow at her friend.

"Everything," she said. "Is portioned out according to a proper calculation."

Suou smirked this time.

"Oh, naturally- for you " she granted, taking her post at another table, next to the general's. "Calibrated responses are your speciality."

Truer words had never been spoken: Shizuru proved to her that day that she was indeed a master of calibration, handling the entire affair with her signature and measured delicacy. By the time she had the two culprits in the tent, the plaintiff was already in one of the staff offices, being entertained by some very sympathetic military tribunes and two charming young women-they were prostitutes, but the visitor did not know that, though he may have had suspicions-and flushed with a good deal of food and drink. The wine, in particular, was of the best vintage, according to her instructions. No standard army wine for this occasion! Perhaps it surprised the visitor when he first partook of it, but greater than the surprise was his pleasure at being so treated.

At the same time Shizuru was having her talk with the legionaries, the plaintiff was also being regaled with calculated gossip of how sorely the two culprits were being treated on the grounds, and how angry the centurions and the general were with them. As she judged the guilty, her officers kept up a constant stream of charming talk and flattery for the mistreated party. Treated like a royal dignitary, his complaints met with great concern and beautifully-worded apologies, the plaintiff was thus of a mind to be a little more agreeable by the time he was summoned by the young commander, who saw him in another of the camp's offices herself.

Shizuru informed him of her judgment, which had been to order the concerned legionaries to remunerate the total cost of the doctor's fees and stolen goods from the plaintiff, as well as to suffer a gruelling rebuke by way of the lash before their fellow soldiers. She explained the reasons for her decision, as well as invited him to view the whipping if he wished to see it, which invitation he declined: businessmen were not best-suited to such gory spectacles, he answered a little shamefacedly, and said that the thought of a grave penalty having been enacted was enough. She agreed and said it was just as well, for the men she had chosen to carry out the flogging had heavy hands with the whip. The placid little businessman just nodded and shuddered, saying he was truly satisfied and could happily go home from there.

"But I would still have preferred that he see this," she told her legionaries later, as some of them, along with the guilty pair's century, gathered to witness the punishment. "That he see the discipline expected of my army. I would have preferred that he witness it, so that when he tells others of this matter, he shall be able to say we treated this occurrence for what it was-something alien to us and unnatural, something evil that we flayed upon revelation. I wish this because it did pain me to hear of the incident, and to have to apologise to a man in this matter. Perhaps it pained me more, even, than the whip shall pain the two of you."

They were silent and still, regardless of the damp, ugly weather. It was already dark, and they could see their general's face only through the fickle light of the fire. Oh, but her voice! Her voice was clear and steady as ever, and it was very solemn.

The sound of it drew them closer.

"To steal," the general said, in a soft but still intelligible timbre. "I hardly knew what to say when I heard it. How could I believe it? My soldiers-my wonderful boys and girls-my beloved legionaries. You steal?"

She shook her head and some of them mirrored the action unconsciously.

"I thought my soldiers do not steal," the general told them sadly. "They have no need to steal for I make it unnecessary. My soldiers are not impoverished; they need impoverish no one by the brutal philosophy that requires the poor to thief for the sake of life, and thus they need not make their dignitas the pauper. Why steal when I always provide?"

Her hands went out in supplication.

"Why steal?" she asked again. "Have I ever deprived you of anything you might require? Have I ever withheld from you your due, which permits you to subsist as comfortably as you might desire? Have I not even doubled your pay and given you bonuses to ensure this, all from my own purse? Have I not assured you of a good pension at the end of your service in the legions and with my campaigns? Have I not done enough?"

The two men awaiting the lash bowed their heads, letting their tears seed the already muddy ground. They were miserable with the agony of disappointing her. Suou had been right in what she said earlier: by the time Shizuru had finished speaking to them, both had been so ready to claim their deserved punishment that they had declined even the cords to keep them still as they were whipped. They would submit willingly, they had declared, and with perfect regret.

"My soldiers do not steal," their commander reiterated, eyes at once stern and sorrowful. "They do not steal because I have forbidden them to steal, because I have removed all reason for them to steal, and because-most importantly because! -it is beneath them. Such an act is beneath you, my soldiers, my brave legionaries. It is beneath you, and it is beneath me. What you do reflects upon me, and further, upon your comrades in the army-further, upon all other Hime's soldiers and-even further!-upon Hime itself. Hime does not raise barbarians for soldiers, who pillage where peaceful exchange is proper. I did not think myself a barbarian, raising barbarians for soldiers. Or am I? Have I?"

There was a low murmur, dozens of guttural voices responding that she had not, that she had no fault by them. She lifted her face again at the sound, sweeping them with a faintly sad, if somewhat grim smile.

"Then remember," she said to them, in closing. "Remember what I have forbidden you. Remember of what you and I are unworthy, for we are one in this matter, and what touches on one touches on the other. Never pain me like this again, I ask of you! Never fall so far beneath your pride! To steal is unworthy of my soldiers. To steal is unworthy of me ."

"All of which was very beautifully done," Suou told her afterwards, as they rode back to the governor's palace together. The business concluded, they had left as soon as the lashing had been meted out, letting the other officers sort out the minor matters. "They shan't be forgetting that any time soon, I should think. Everyone was more or less satisfied, which is very well done indeed considering that they were also all put in their place."

Shizuru, who was spurring her horse to a faster pace, smiled into the evening breeze.

"Thank you very much," she said cheerfully. "It was a good day's worth of work."

"That it was," her companion said, nudging her horse in the ribs to keep up with Shizuru's pace. Their escort, riding respectfully behind them, followed suit. "Ridiculous. All because two fools could not hold their liquor. It's foolish to attempt something like that without all of your senses."

"Indeed." Shizuru paused shortly. "I am really so pleased it is over."

Suou nodded, knowing to where the other woman's thoughts had turned. She was of half a mind to tease her friend about acting like a newly-married woman rushing to her wife, but relented at the last second.

"You did promise to have dinner with her," she said instead. "How is Natsuki-san these days?"

"Lovely-wonderful-obstinate!"

A gust of laughter. "I'm sorry about that. So it is still 'No'?"

"As it is, I would prefer to think of it as 'not yet Yes'," Shizuru said affably. Her hair was streaming in the wind behind her, a golden banner at once darker and more vivid than Suou's own. "Oh, Suou-chan, her intractability is impossible. Who would have thought my sweet girl could be as stubborn as a common mule?"

Suou, who thought anyone but Shizuru could have seen that much in the Otomeian's serious, surly nature, smiled at her friend.

"It must be like laying siege to Troy," she said. "Would this one accept any wooden horses?"

"She might, but alas! I am no carpenter."

"I recall nothing about Ulysses having been required to build his device himself." She went on to the alternative they had been discussing. "Have you given any thought to what I proposed last time, by the way?"

"Which one?" Shizuru called back with near-perfect nonchalance. "The proposition about forcibly hijacking and putting her in the ship's hold, or the one about seeking her King's formal consent to transfer all her duties to you? As it is, I must confess I have given thought to both, and one more often than the other."

The younger woman's mirth puffed through her teeth.

"The latter," she specified, seeing Shizuru's face go blank. "I know it's a terrible prospect, Shizuru-san, not having her agree to go with you to the end-but we do have to prepare for all possibilities."

"Yes, believe me, I do see that," Shizuru said, permitting a wisp of the dryness to come through her voice.

"And?"

There was a long sigh that was lost in the wind.

"And I have already sent the letter to Otomeia stating that it should be carried out in that eventuality," Shizuru replied, with a small frown. "Though merely considering the possibility gives me no joy."

"I understand, so I shall not take it as an insult," Suou drawled humorously. "I hope it could relieve you a little though, if you at least knew I would be here to take care of her as I would my own sister."

Shizuru, who had been about to apologise for the unintended insinuation of her earlier words, stopped in favour of casting the younger woman a grateful smile instead: Suou's pledge was deep indeed, she knew, since the person Suou loved most in the world was her older sibling.

"It would," she said sincerely. "If it came to that, it would relieve me."

The other patrician smiled back.

"Of course, there's the question, though: would I make her sleep in my bed too, for my purported safety?"

"I would cripple you."

Their voices joined in a ring of laughter. It was only afterwards that Suou replied, explaining why she had laughed longer and harder than Shizuru.

"See, I do think you would," she smiled, as they dismounted from their horses and parted. "No matter who it happened to be, I think you would."

Is that true, Shizuru wondered afterwards. Would I do that to anyone-anyone at all-for her?

The somewhat ominous words stayed as she walked into the mansion, stopping to change her muddy boots and pick up something that had been delivered to her office. They were only driven away when she found Natsuki in their room, feet folded under her bottom where she sat on the bed.

The young woman was polishing a toothed dagger.

"Natsuki," Shizuru intoned gladly, relieved to find her already there. "Natsuki, Natsuki."

The other woman welcomed her with a tiny smile, glancing cautiously first at the train of slaves Shizuru had with her as they headed straight for the doorway to the bath. Only when they had vanished did she speak.

"Shizuru, Shizuru," she said in a hauntingly low whisper, parodying the older woman's greeting. "Shizuruuu..."

The older woman giggled.

"You are tired," Natsuki said, directing the comment to Shizuru with one of her sudden, serious flashes.

"I am, rather," answered Shizuru truthfully. "And you?"

A shake of the head.

"Good. I had hoped you could rest a while here." She looked her over, noting her companion's attire. "You changed out of your uniform already. Have you bathed yet?"

"Mm." Natsuki scratched one side of her nose delicately and stretched. "But I will help, later."

"I would like that." Shizuru glanced at the dripping water clock on the stand. "As promised, I am in time for dinner. I hope you are not too hungry yet. You have yet to dine?"

"Yes." She pointed her chin at the older woman. "I will wait."

"All right. We may dine after I have my bath, if you would suffer it a moment longer." Shizuru shook her mane out, freeing it from the ribbon she had used for a tie. The mass was pale and shiny in the light, and a pair of emerald eyes followed its swell as it was freed. "How was your meeting?"

Natsuki murmured something vaguely positive. Shizuru made her way over to a chair and placed the package she was carrying beside it.

"That is good." One of the slaves in the other room appeared near the doorway to fetch a bucket they had forgotten, and she called to her. "A basin of water, if you please. And some fresh linen."

"I feel such a dirty wretch," she said jokingly, once the items were produced. "I even had to change out of my boots on the way here, so as to avoid trailing the mud all over. My socks were sodden. Was it the same for you, Darling?"

"Mm."

"All the better that you have already changed out of those damp clothes, then."

She dismissed the slave and washed her face, bending over the basin next to her chair. When she opened her eyes again, she nearly upended the bowl's contents onto the floor.

"Natsuki, you scamp!" she laughed, heart racing in surprise. Two beautiful green eyes narrowed in amusement, a mere two feet away from her face. "Why frighten me?"

The girl had pulled a chair over near hers and sat on it, taking the square of linen from the table.

"Sorry, Shizuru," she uttered, brushing away Shizuru's fringe, matted to her forehead. "I will help."

Shizuru half-heartedly frowned, letting her continue pushing away the wet locks. "You can be such a mean girl. At least make a sound when you step so close like that. Even ghosts are louder."

Natsuki held a small, slightly crooked grin.

"Sorry," she said again, using the linen to wipe the Himean's face. She allowed the older woman to wash hands next, and also patted them dry afterwards. When that was done, she threw a quick look over her shoulder to check that none of the slaves were hovering by the door; assured, she pecked Shizuru's cheek. Her lips were smooth as fine silk, and just as light.

Shizuru understood the words she would not say.

"I know," the older woman said, looking fondly at two lightly flushed cheeks. "I missed you too."

She remembered herself the next second, however, and her state. Making a disgusted face, she drew backwards and warned: "But I would caution against kissing me right now, meum mel . You smell so sweet, and I reek of work and trudging around in the muck. I do not want to defile you when I am so... foully unworthy."

The young woman's mouth suddenly quivered at that. Eyes alight, she took one of Shizuru's hands and raised it to her nose, sniffing deep and aloud. Before the Himean could jerk the appendage free, she suddenly turned her lips to the spot she had just smelled, where the soft skin joined thumb and index finger, and kissed that place lovingly.

"Not foul," she said light-heartedly, relinquishing Shizuru's hand. "Not unworthy. Mmm."

Shizuru smirked at the girl's mischief, aware of her own cheeks succumbing to a faint blush.

"I should spank you," she said under her breath, to the Otomeian's subdued, victorious laughter.

Natsuki returned the smirk to her.

"Mind you I am still the master," Shizuru continued humorously. "You are yet a tyro at the tease, Beauty, for all that you do it well. I shall exact revenge soon."

She stopped to reach down, beside her chair.

"Before that, however, I brought you something." She presented the parcel she had been carrying and handed it over, watching as Natsuki unfolded the cloth to reveal what was inside. "Sweet, perfumed jellies carried by a ship just come from Parthia. They are a delicacy among the girls in Hime, and I thought it might please you to sample them. I had one sent to my office earlier."

Natsuki had opened the jar of jellies and was gazing at the trembling contents intently. As Shizuru had thought, she had never before seen anything of the like.

"Ice that moves," she said wonderingly. "It shakes. What is it?"

"Jelly."

"And it is to eat?"

"It is, yes. Let us have them after our meal, later," she suggested, tucking some wheaten hair behind an ear. "You may try them now, if you wish, although I would recommend taking only one. I would hate to have your appetite spoiled for dinner, and more than one of those can cloy not only the tongue but also the appetite."

"All right," Natsuki replied, with a shake of the head. "Later. Like you say."

"Very well."

"Shizuru." Her lips pulled up almost hesitantly. "Thank you."

"You are welcome."

The servants came out to tell them that the bath was ready, and were directed to fetch the two women's dinner from the kitchens as Shizuru bathed. When they had left, the two women remaining in the room headed to the bath.

Once in the bathing room with her only companion, Shizuru began to undress. She started with her accessories first, removing them piece by piece and beginning with the gem-encrusted cuffs on her wrists. She handed them to the girl, who was ready with a cloth in which to bundle the items. When she had gone to removing the torc around her neck, Natsuki mumbled something about one of her rings being starkly plainer than the rest.

"Oh, that?" she said, glancing at the ring in question: a drab grey band of iron. "It is my senatorial ring-the ring worn by all of us upon being accepted to Senate."

Natsuki murmured again.

"What do you mean 'for you it should be gold'?" Shizuru laughed, handing over the torc as well. "What does that mean?"

The younger woman frowned.

"Gold is your... your metal, I think," she explained. "It is best for you."

Shizuru smiled in puzzlement at her.

"If you say so," she said softly. Suddenly she remembered the time Natsuki had told her that she liked her hair because she saw it as wrought of precious metals. "At any rate, many of the other senators do have golden senatorial rings. Mine is iron because I come from one of the oldest senatorial families-which follow the original tradition of having an iron band."

Natsuki drew together the corners of the parcel and bundled it away.

"Strange," she murmured.

Shizuru divested herself of her tunic as well, and the leather knee-breeches she had under them. The clothes were balled up and put aside.

"Do you think so?" she asked.

"Gold is more... umm. Valuable."

"Implying that when you think of me, you think of something valuable." She smirked when Natsuki's eyes rolled. "Incidentally, you know the crowns, yes? The major awards we have in battle?"

" Corona, " Natsuki replied, with a nod. The girl watched her step into the water. "Like yours, Shizuru. Corona graminea ?"

"Yes, or a grass crown, literally, for all that it is the highest distinction possible in the army." She sighed as she immersed her legs in the warm water, perching on the edge of the pool. Her eyes shut to the blurring vapour. "There are other crowns, the one second in importance being the corona civica, which is made of ordinary oak leaves instead. Would you be so sweet as to fetch me the oils?"

"Ah." Natsuki also brought the strigil . "Here."

"Thank you-no, you need not apply it for me. You have already bathed and I do not want to get you dirty. Just sit there, on that bench, and talk to me please. That would keep me happy."

"Um."

She tipped the bottle of oil into her hand and began to smooth it over her own skin, inhaling with sensuous pleasure its fragrance. "As I was saying, the c orona graminea and the c orona civica are the two most illustrious decorations for valour in battle, and both are made of such simple stuff as leaves and grass. Compare them to the minor crowns, like the aurea, muralis, vallaris, and n avalis, all of which are fashioned out of true gold. Those are intrinsically more valuable because of the material, yet of less honour and value than the first two."

"Ahh." Natsuki pulled up her feet onto the bench, hugging her knees to her chest. She began to repeat the list of minor crowns Shizuru had just enumerated. Once she had finished and gained Shizuru's approval, she went on to say: "I remember these, yes-the gold ones."

"You do?"

"Yes." She seemed to be making an inventory of the ones she moved her fingers as though ticking off in her head. "You have many of them, Shizuru."

Shizuru acknowledged that with a nod, remembering too the time the girl had seen all of her military decorations; Natsuki had inspected each one so closely that she had been embarrassed. It had been such that she had felt compelled to explain to the Otomeian that she had brought them with her because all Himean generals did on campaign, because they were proof and guarantee of a general's luck. Even then, seeing the girl accept the explanation while gazing admiringly up at her had still flushed her cheeks with a healthy bit of colour.

Which seemed the more gaudy then, surrounded by all that gold and silver, she thought wryly, remembering Natsuki's barely suppressed grin at the time. The Otomeian had been quick to mark her blush, after all, and had even worsened it, whether on purpose or not. What was it she had said? You are strong. Yes, that had been it. She had held Shizuru's painfully flaring cheek with one hand and told her, in that low voice, I knew you were strong...

She shook her head imperceptibly to dislodge the embarrassment before it could fully return.

"In any case, that is the way of it," she said. "The less illustrious ones are the ones made of precious material. The higher awards are the ones wrought from simple matter."

"Are they older, too?"

"Which ones are older, Natsuki?"

"Those not of gold." She drummed her fingers rhythmically on her shins like a restless youngster forced into sitting quietly by a parent. "The corona civica, and the corona graminea ? The ones more... illustrious."

She said "illustrious" like a delicate thing, and held it on her tongue like something she did not want to break. Shizuru, who loved it when the girl did that, paused in her ablutions.

"Yes," the older woman said. "Yes. What do you mean by 'older', however?"

"I mean older of, um, of tradition."

"You noticed." Shizuru was approving. "When Hime had yet to become great, when it was no more than a community of people living in a small group of oval, thatched huts where our city stands today, gold was not much in abundance. Therefore most of the materials having to do with traditions carried over from that ancient time are not the precious ones today. Like my senatorial ring."

"Oh." Natsuki ceased her fingers now; the energy shifted to her feet. She curled the toes in and out, alternating from one foot to the other. "Tradition. Value."

The older woman darted an amused look at her wagging feet.

"Natsuki," she began. "You're so frisky."

The girl immediately calmed her twitching toes, looking awkward.

"Is it that you are actually hungry or have you some nasty surprise waiting?"

Two spots appeared on the Otomeian's cheeks.

"No, I am not hungry," she admitted slowly, brow wrinkled. "No surprise."

"Really?" Shizuru studied her with concern. "I am worried you are famished and are trying to be considerate by hiding it from me. You should not."

"No, I..." She stopped and held the back of her neck with one palm. "Only, I..."

"Yes?" At her further hesitation, Shizuru sighed and lifted both brows, quizzing her with a gentle smile. "You what?"

There was a long silence before the Otomeian gave in.

"I waited," she said lamely, lower lip thrusting out just a fraction. "Earlier in-just there, in thuh-the room."

It took only an instant before Shizuru understood the code behind the stuttering speech.

"Meum mel," she said sympathetically, after a swift nibble on the inside of her cheek. She wanted so much to get up and kiss those petulant lips back into a smile. "I am so sorry I took so long; it must have been terribly dreary."

Were you so lonely without me?

Natsuki shook her head, refusing to meet her eyes. Shizuru went on.

"I truly am sorry." She stopped and had a thought. "You could have brought up Shizuki for company... or was there an obstacle, perhaps?"

A downwards screw of the mouth: "Sleeping."

"Oh, I see. What a pity." Her mind went to the few buckets of scrolls she always kept nearby. "Have you finished the books there, by the way?"

"Mm. You read the last to me... remember?"

"I should have thought to ask them to bring up some new ones for you."

The younger woman shook her head.

"No," she said. "Am fine. Now."

Shizuru smiled.

"Yes," she agreed. "Now, / am here."

Natsuki made a sound in accord and they settled to the comfortable peace for a while, the girl's feet still moving, but paddling up and down in a slower, more relaxed motion. Shizuru was taking up the strigil to scrape away the oil upon her when the Otomeian called her name.

"Yes?" Shizuru said.

"About the trouble earlier. The trouble Himemiya-san came to tell?" The young woman twiddled her toes carelessly again. "Yuh-you will tell me, maybe?"

"I meant to tell you about it over dinner. Would you like to know now? I do not mind."

An ardent nod.

"Very well."

So she told her, giving special attention to the delivery, since she was speaking to someone she knew would appreciate it. And in the telling, she realised how much she had been wanting to tell her. It was true that she had gravely needed a soak earlier, that she still needed to dine and then rest after a tiring day. Yet more than anything else, she realised, had been the need to share thoughts with Her. Only then did she find her muscles finally unwinding themselves, working free of the knots in a way that had less to do with the hot water around her than her quiet audience. She continued to bathe while talking, and was already immersed in the water by the time she had finished.

"They were so bad?" Natsuki asked her afterwards, seriously. "You will kill someone?"

"No, not really; and no. Ye gods, you're bloodthirsty." Shizuru pretended to shudder and leaned back against the pool edge. "You terrible girl. Shall you pause from being terrible long enough to get me a drink? I do feel parched."

Natsuki arched her brows.

"Wine?" she enquired. "Water?"

Shizuru chose the latter and soon received it. She thanked her attendant, who perched again on the bench after giving her the chalice.

"Water," Natsuki mumbled. "I knew it was water."

"How so?"

"Could not be wine." A hand waved emphatically in the air as the Otomeian explained with sagacious confidence. "In a warm bath and drinking wine too? You will get too warm, Shizuru."

"Mmph." Shizuru giggled. "Natsuki, Dearest, please try to remember I am not born of the taiga and tundra as you are. Being a winter-weak foreigner, I doubt it possible to get 'too warm' in these lands."

Natsuki laughed shortly, paddling her feet again.

"They are putting dinner there," she said, apropos of nothing. "On the table."

Shizuru nodded, having heard the sounds. She took a drink.

"But... what will you do to the soldiers?" the girl asked, suddenly returning to their topic. "What do you do for that?"

"First, let us make it clear it is not a capital offence," the older woman told her, easily following the sharp turns of the conversation. "Though still a grave one, not least for social and organisational nuances. The punishment varies for such cases, but I elected to have them make monetary reparations equal to the value of the stolen items. That is docked from their pay and share of the booty. Furthermore, for their disobedience of my order, I decided to put them through the chastisement of the whip."

"How many?"

"Fifteen stripes of the lash each."

Natsuki's eyes widened in appreciation of the penalty. "They will bleed."

"Yes, they will bleed."

"Hm."

Shizuru smiled. "They went against orders, intoxicated or not. Do you think me fair in judgment, or was I cruel?"

"You are fair." The low voice was positive. "It is just."

"It relieves me to learn that you think so." She paused and chuckled. "And then again, blood is already involved, so it might not be so surprising to have you agree with me now, My Bloodthirsty Girl."

"Hah!"

Their grins came together. A short while later, Shizuru decided she had had enough of the bath and rose from it, drying herself before doffing the dress-tunic Natsuki had waiting. Thus attired for the night, she went with the younger woman to their bedroom, where the dinner had already been set on the table. The Otomeian professed hunger and Shizuru echoed it.

"Let us have our dinner, before we start eating each other." At Natsuki's suddenly suspicious glance, she laughed. "I promise to let you rest this night, in restitution for the others."

At yet another cautious glance, she held one hand to her heart and the other to the air. "Have I ever broken a promise to you, Natsuki? Perhaps you would like me to swear an oath by the old gods of Hime, to prove my sincerity? I am never forsworn-I could never abide it."

Natsuki wrinkled her nose at the older woman.

"I know," she said cheerfully.

"Very well." And ushering her to the table, Shizuru added the proviso: "But to be sure... I do so promise to keep true to what I have said, and not to take you later unless you release me from that oath."

The younger woman smirked at the disclaimer and muttered something under her breath that Shizuru translated to herself as "terrible woman" or something of the sort. The Himean chose to receive it as a compliment.

They had a pleasant dinner, complete with a serving of finely cooked snails that both professed to enjoy, and whose size astounded them. They finished with a serving of the perfumed jellies Shizuru had brought, and were about to call for the servants to clear away the dishes when a knock came.

A tribune in armour was revealed when they opened the door.

"Begging your pardon, General. There's a message," the man announced with a crisp salute. He looked discomfited and Shizuru realised he had been afraid of interrupting whatever she and her bodyguard had been doing. "From a scout. Said he's from one of the checkpoints by the road south, the passes to Hime. Said you'd likely want to see it, insisted on it."

Shizuru rose and took the missive from him. It was light in her hand.

"Thank you," she said, eyeing the outside of the paper. Not red wax: not to do with danger, then. That was good. "When did this arrive?"

"Just now, General."

"The courier?"

"The scout's gone with his horse to the stables. Said he'd stay there if you wanted him, General."

"I see. Is that all?"

"Yes, General."

She thanked and dismissed him. He saluted and left with a brisk step, looking immensely relieved that he had not come at such a bad time after all. Really, who would like to be interrupted during that ?

"And here we thought the day was over," Shizuru said to her bodyguard, who had pulled up both feet on the chair. "Work comes chasing after me even here."

She opened the missive, which had been sealed sloppily in brown wax.

To the General

Ave! Sighted a party coming in from Hime. Official. Scouts met them. Allowed to pass. Claims to carry proxy commander for present mission, with officers. Wrote this as quick as we learned it, following your orders. Should get to you a day before they get there. Proxy is Takeda Masashi.

Her breath caught in a tearing sound.

Proxy is Takeda Masashi.

"What?!" she whispered savagely. "No!"

Natsuki feet were down on the floor again in a flash. Shizuru read through the short message once more, now no longer caring about the irregular handwriting and rushed syntax. She did not even smile anymore at the use of the inglorious title, "proxy", for her replacement. All she wanted was to read the very end, the name of the truly inglorious replacement.

Takeda Masashi.

Still there, that name, no matter how many times she checked. Of course it would be, she thought in annoyance, no matter how much I want to wish it away out of sheer incredulity. And she was incredulous, what she was feeling was beyond simple disbelief. Takeda Masashi, that fool, was her replacement? How in the world could it have happened? Of all people in the world, why did it have to be him?!

Questions swarmed in her mind like an infestation of doubt. The news so taxed her credulity that she was even compelled to read the missive again. But she received no answers from it save the one she did not want, which was his name along with his claim of succession to her task. Oh, what a travesty was this surprise! She could scarce believe that the man Senate had chosen to replace her was the very same man with whom she had quarrelled only months earlier, the same man she had vowed to detest for the loss of poise he had elicited that time. An unthinking, headstrong idiot who had even had the temerity to practically threaten her with a bared sword, not to mention insult her lover as well. Her lip curled up in a sneer, surprise giving way to sarcasm as her mind began to accept the fact . Just splendid!

This year is one of surprises, she decided, mood gone sour. First was the election to urban praetor, courtesy of my traitorous cousin, and now this piece of prettiness. Suddenly she thought of something from that juxtaposition of ideas. Of course! Takeda Masashi had been the one to introduce that bill, had he not? The letters from Hime had said as much, she remembered. Oh, how doubly foul it was now, how much more this twist reeked! He was more of a rat than she had thought if her notion was true, that he had conspired with her foes in some way!

She wondered how deeply this was related to their argument: if he had become part of the plot because of what passed between them. Had he even decided to participate in this political trickery with the foremost intention of replacing her himself? Could it be some form of petty revenge? Petty indeed, were it so! He stood to gain nothing from replacing her. He might even be said to have been cheated by Tomoe and whoever else had assisted him with this scheme. Even in the midst of her roused fury, Shizuru was rational enough to know that the Senate would probably have elected to further reduce support from her present mission. That would put whoever replaced her in an awkward state of holdover with no chance for gold or glory. Certainly the Senate would not permit any truly ambitious person to take over for her, since Senate's object was always to reduce risks of financial drain. Not for the conservatives the breaking of new ground, which war on the Mentulaean empire would be; they only ever approved of tilling old fields with the same plough.

She knew no one would initiate war on the Mentulae unless her allies or herself were in the tent of command. Therefore, whoever assumed her command by the Senate's orders was likely to have been given injunctions to maintain consistent conservatism in policy- as well as have been chosen for innate conservatism, she guessed. If there were triumphs to be had by her replacement, they would not belong to him but to her enemies, the Traditionalists: and that, purely symbolic, as well as weak. The fool had been tricked into a cheap seat, probably, all because he hated her enough to fall for it!

She had no doubts on that point, in particular: that Takeda Masashi hated her. She remembered his eyes last they had seen each other months ago, back in Sosia: eyes with that dark shade of loathing she understood if only because she had reflected it whenever she looked at him. She had known him to be an enemy then, but this was still a surprise.

I wonder if he feels any victory in this, Shizuru pondered. That puny, puling fool: what could he hope to concretely gain? He would be stuck here until she resumed the mission, which gods knew she would, for no one could prevent her. He would only be pretending to hold it until that happened, there could be nothing more but waiting for him. Unless...

Her head jerked, a swift spasm.

"Natsuki."

Natsuki leapt over, swift as always, upon the call of her name. But Shizuru did not look up at her.

"Natsuki!"

The young woman was startled now, and her mouth was open, stance faintly defensive. Shizuru finally looked up at her, and did so in a look that was very nearly a glower.

The Otomeian flinched.

"Impossible!" spat the word, low-voiced yet angrier than Natsuki had ever heard her. "Even he would be a thrice a fool to imagine it! Goddamn him if he thinks it!"

Shizuru's bodyguard stared at her helplessly, the girl frozen with the confusion of the Himean's mutters, which seemed to have no referent. What was Shizuru saying? Who was "he"? And why had Shizuru said her name first, twice even, with that oddly despairing timbre roughening the air?

Shizuru did not enlighten her: she simply continued to glare and glare.

The Otomeian, for all her legendary frosty bravery, could not help but be affected: she began chewing on her bottom lip furiously under the older woman's blazing eyes. Had it been anyone else, she might not have given in to this show of anxiety, but it was Shizuru-and to her, Shizuru was not merely anyone else. Natsuki was the retainer, the watcher, the attendant; Shizuru was the charge, the centre, the referent. It was as though the girl was watching the sun in her sky suddenly bursting into an even greater flame, with no warning or explanation behind the cataclysm: it merely exploded a threat of apocalypse over her unsuspecting head.

Shizuru was staring at the paper in her hands again at this time, crumpling one end of it in her clenching hand. She was too busy sneering at it to notice her companion's unease, for her own unease was too great to see anyone else just yet. Reading through the missive one last time, she reached once more the accursed end.

As expected, the name written in ink stayed the same.

That will not change, she told herself, to shock her limbs out of their unmoving tension. Damn it, but it will not change. Fruitless to merely stare at the thing. To sit still and ponder the irony is fruitless, for the situation calls for act. And if what is written it is true, the act must come now.

Uttering a curse for the man in her mind, she crushed the ill-omened name and the paper in her hands, and sprang to her feet.

"What hour...?" Ignoring the nervous shuffle of her companion's feet, she turned to glance at the water-clock, still murmuring to herself. "Not too late."

She strode quickly to the closet and drew out one of her cloaks, throwing it around herself. She was pinning it with a clasp when she remembered to pause and address her waiting companion, who had taken to switching from one foot to the other in a closely-checked frenzy of anticipation.

"Natsuki," she said briefly and between her teeth, speaking like a woman close to tearing apart whatever was nearest to her hands. "Natsuki, forgive me. Something-something has come up. Wait for me an instant, yes? I promise I shall return shortly this time. I shall go no further than the corridor. All right?"

And though the girl was uncertain, what else could she do but say yes?

Shizuru stalked swiftly to the entryway and out of the room, shutting the door behind her. At the end of the long corridor, she found two slaves passing by with a basket of laundry between them, and they paused to bow deferentially as she approached.

"A moment," she said, accent unusually crisp. "I need errands run for me, and quickly."

Both men dropped the basket immediately.

"Send for the senior legate, Harada-han, and Himemiya-han, and ask them to meet me at my headquarters downstairs. Harada-han is not in her room, and neither is Himemiya-han, at this time. They are with the governor, I believe, in her private atrium."

The slaves nodded stiffly, a little frightened of the briskness in her words, which was unusual for the woman.

"There is also a scout in the stables who has just recently arrived bearing me a message, which I have already received. Send for him as well, or ask one of the legionaries on guard in the manor tonight to fetch him. He shall meet us in the same place."

Nodding frantically, the two men dashed off to do her bidding, deciding hastily who would do what and who would go where. She lingered only a second after they left to rake a frustrated hand through her hair. Another second and she found a name poised on her lips, but not the one on which she had been calling so many maledictions the past few moments.

"Natsuki."

Her brow was seized by a short spasm of emotion that she thanked the gods no one was around to see. She grit her teeth to push it away, lest someone should suddenly appear. Yet the words in her mind held all of the feeling she was trying to push back.

Mine. She must be. She is. Mine.

Spinning and dashing down the corridor to their room, she flung the door open with uncharacteristic hurry. The report as it slammed against the wall came in time to the shaky flash of green that met her. There were two frantic eyes glimmering with a multitude of questions she knew she would have to answer. That she even felt the need to answer them at the moment was indicative of what she felt for the girl, for she had never felt a need to answer queries unless it so suited her-and if she had to be honest, it would suit her better at the present time not to give any answers.

Still, if the Otomeian did so ask, she knew she would respond. There was hardly anything that emerald look could not wrangle out of her, whether the author of that look knew it or not, and now she could see them trying to wrangle some meaning out of her passion, as well as a little calm. That was when she remembered something about the girl that she should have considered before running out in that manner: her emotions, when flashing out of her hide, often sank into the girl's skin and made a reflection. Each time she was agitated, she could feel her agitation rousing the girl's own.

But the difference is that hers is even more chaotic than mine, she thought, seeing now that strangely empathic quality in Natsuki boiling in those stormy eyes. Hers is confused, because she does not understand all the reasons for the feeling, whereas I do. It was the bewilderment of a child who felt the anger or emotion of someone important—a parent, for instance—awakening hers, and did not know what to do with it. An untraceable light, light that you could not follow to its source because it was cast not from a torch but from the shine of that torch on a mirror. A confusion of feeling, a frustration about which the child could not do anything.

But I can.

Shaking her head slowly at herself, and her recklessness, Shizuru turned to shut the door carefully behind her. There followed a slow, deep breath that seemed unbearably loud in the silence, but she felt she needed to take it nonetheless. She had to compose herself, and the breath grounded her.

Be calm; if you are calm, Natsuki will be calmer. There is no need to make her so troubled as well.

"Pardon me, Natsuki," she said cautiously when ready, turning again to face the girl. "I was rude."

Natsuki started, one hand going up halfway in the air to deny her apology. The gesture faltered, and her fingers curled on the empty air before the hand was drawn back, falling limply to the Otomeian's side.

"No," the younger woman said, just as cautious as she was. "Fine. It is fine."

Shizuru nodded, stopping for an instant before the need for action again seized her, and she strode a little closer. And though she did not know it, her aura was still so menacing that the girl nearly backed away. It was just as well the girl did not, for that would have hurt her terribly.

"I am sorry," she said again, not knowing how to begin explaining her previous display of anger. Her brow was still threatening to cloud, and she focused on batting away the urge to give in. "There are some things, you see-some things that have come up. They are urgent."

The questions were still shimmering in Natsuki's eyes, in the young woman's hesitant stance, but they calmed a little as she spoke. As she thought: the more she explained and reassured, the more it soothed the Otomeian. She tried to continue speaking calmly, wishing now more than ever that she had her chief centurion's capacity to curse, even if only to vent a little in her head. Since she could not, she resorted to moving around instead.

When she spoke again, she was successful in making her voice steady, though her tone was flat.

"I am going to meet some people," she told the Otomeian. "Some of my legates. Chie-han and Suou-chan."

Her auditor said nothing, still frozen. Ye gods, how she wished she could curse!

"I sent for them already," she went on. "Would you prefer to come along?"

A quick nod.

"Very well." She frowned when she saw the girl run to their closet, probably to fetch her uniform. She directed her actions, trying to find some distraction in the process. "It does not call for that, Natsuki. Merely put on an outer robe. I think you should use the green one. The pale olive one I gave you, with the grey trim. Is it there?"

It was there.

"Wear that."

The girl complied with her wishes so hastily that she could not help but note it even in her state. Then she realised that the young woman was being even more tractable at the moment because she wished not to agitate her further.

She stopped her by a pull on the wrist.

"Come here, please."

When her mouth closed in on those soft, sulky lips, it muffled the sound of Natsuki's surprise. She swallowed it up, her own lips making the familiar opening and closing motions that often passed between them: the play that coaxed and coerced at the same time. The younger woman's mouth soon warmed and grew wet under it, and when she tilted her head to better meet Shizuru's supple tongue, Shizuru drew back and pulled at the girl's lower lip with her teeth.

She gazed down at the dazed look Natsuki was giving her, which sank through something soft and heavy in her chest. Suddenly she was the one having to muffle her own surprise.

"You are very beautiful," she said suddenly, the words explaining why she was feeling a sinking dismay in her stomach. She saw now another thing that seemed to compound her troubles: that she would never be immune to the girl's arrows. How did that trouble her? It was in the thought that if she, who saw the Otomeian nearly every hour of every day, could still be so stricken by Natsuki's beauty afresh, how much more would her old nemesis be, when he had not seen the girl for so long? She could only imagine the ache: a hundred times greater than the ache she herself felt at the moment. How was it that beauty did that, anyway? Why did it hurt to see it, as much as it did not to?

She ducked to slide her nose against the curve of the other's brow, kissing the smooth skin with a longing that was better suited to a Penelope reuniting with her beloved after a separation of twenty years. The roil of emotion in her seemed to sublimate in the gesture, and she let the intensity of her desire for the young woman substitute for the anger she could not show. Her mouth murmured another apology for her curtness earlier, in having rushed out and failed to explain-and, indeed, for failing to explain anything still. It was not that she would not explain anything that night; she had no intention of keeping Natsuki in the dark. She just needed to be close to her for a moment: she needed to feel, undeniably, the reassuringly tactile presence of her nearby. It was almost as though she imagined doing so could push away the dangers waiting. Perhaps, for those few seconds where she assured herself the young woman was truly beside her, it did.

The Otomeian nuzzled back, as was her wont, and kissed the older woman's jaw. Shizuru looked down, finding waiting for her those lovely green eyes, greener for the fringed rim of black about them, and that rim blacker for the pallor of her surrounding skin. The eyes blinked, and the older woman stilled at the way the lashes brushed each other across the depths of an emerald sea.

Her breath caught audibly for the second time that night.

"Let me see you," she said, staring as though it were the first time she had seen the girl: sometimes it felt that way still. She held her back with her arms, to better stare at her. "God. Let me see you a moment."

Natsuki looked at her questioningly, suffering the strangely passionate inspection. After a while of it, Shizuru spoke her wonder aloud.

"You shall break his heart."

"Shi-sorry, who?"

The Otomeian's bemusement was silenced again by a rough kiss. Shizuru handed over the crumpled-up paper of the missive afterwards, remembering only then that it was still in her fist. She signalled that the other woman could read it, so she did.

There was a stifled gasp. Shizuru stepped back and began to watch her closely.

"Aah." The girl dropped the paper onto their bed, face covered with concern. Interestingly enough, Shizuru realised, the concern seemed to be for her sake. "Oh. That?"

"Yes."

"That is the replacement?" Amazement rasped the girl's voice. "Him?"

Shizuru said nothing, merely continuing to study her. There was jealousy in her red eyes the entire time, burning hot under her bright brows, but the Otomeian never seemed to notice. Or rather, never seemed to understand.

"Him," she said once more, sounding dismayed. Again Shizuru noted, with some interest, that the dismay was for her sake. But it was explained with Natsuki's next words. "Him you don't like."

It made Shizuru cease momentarily her scrutiny. Her eyes were soon fixed again on Natsuki, however, with the paranoia of a woman afraid of seeing something she would not like yet unable to help seeking it. Had she actually found it, what did she think she would have done? What could she possibly do to the man Natsuki referred to so generically as "him"?

What could she possibly do, even, to Natsuki?

"Yes," she said warily, repeating the girl's words. "Him I don't like."

The way she said it was sullen. She caught herself the next second, however, and looked at her companion with an apology.

"Pardon me," she said, trying not to frown. "I am merely..."

She stopped and tried to think of the correct word, the subtlest word, but none in her mind combined the qualities of accuracy in this situation as well as subtlety. She resigned herself with a sigh.

"... a little put out," she said slowly, feeling suddenly very tired. "A little."

Natsuki moved to her as though wrenched forward by an invisible cord. And then did something quite unexpected.

Shizuru let her head be pulled down by the younger woman's hands, let her carefully impassive face be covered by a flurry of light kisses; she was, in fact, very surprised by this sudden show of tenderness. What did it mean? Did Natsuki sense how truly worried she was, then, as well as all those other emotions in her at the moment? How much could the young woman actually see? She felt like an emotional lattice, the threads of her being suddenly thrumming with foreboding vibrations she could not stave off: the rage and fury and sheer disbelief for whatever foul dealing had brought this latest development mixing all through, spinning a web that had two centres, in both her heart and her pride. Each kiss Natsuki gave her came dangerously close to both centres, and it prompted her to hold her jaw tight, for fear that this compassion would be the end of her composure.

"Why, what is this?" she asked softly, not trusting her voice to speak aloud yet. "Such sweetness... so suddenly?"

Natsuki kept a hand on her face, taking the returning lilt in her voice as permission to keep it there.

"Oh, Shizuru," she uttered, sounding as strained as Shizuru felt. "Shizuru. This..."

"Yes? What of this?" Now she felt a touch confused too under the look Natsuki was giving her. "Why, what is it?"

The girl said something she had not expected: "Sorry."

"Sorry? What do you-" She started mildly and said, the next moment: "Is it that I was angry? I am sorry, Darling, for that. I was not angry at you, do not worry. It is for someone-something else-and was only for that instant. I shall not be angry any more, all right?"

A wildly shaking dark head stopped her speech.

"No, not that. I know," the low voice told her quickly. "Not sorry you are angry. It is fine to be angry."

"Then what is it? Why are you sorry?"

Natsuki made a strangled sound before speaking.

"Look," she said miserably. "Shizuru, you are unhappy."

The Himean's crimson eyes widened, and Natsuki took that opportunity to press their cheeks together again, lips brushing in a flutter against the skin.

"Ah no," the dark-haired woman whispered, voice betraying the kindness underneath that cold appearance. "Poor Shizuru."

Her hand went up to the crown of the older woman's head, gently patting the soft, still-damp hair. The action was so natural that Shizuru's lips suddenly twitched, her sense of humour rising within her notwithstanding the darkness she had been feeling. She felt, all of a sudden, as though she were a forlorn pet being petted into comfort... and the notion was really too outrageous to give her any displeasure. So much for having a royal fit of temper: Natsuki's response rather robbed her earlier furore of its majesty. "Poor Shizuru" indeed!

She released a curt chuckle, shaking her head ruefully.

"Natsuki," she intoned, feeling as though she could now smile a little; how oddly this young woman affected her! "Really, Natsuki... You silly girl."

The Otomeian, still her usual serious self, looked up in confusion. Could anyone blame her? The older woman's moods, after all, had just been swinging like a gamecock fluttering on a gibbet. Still, the lightening mood in the crimson eyes reassured her: as did Shizuru's smile, which had begun to return.

Shizuru kissed her forehead, and she blinked.

"Thank you, meum mel," the older woman said, holding that white face tenderly. "I am all right."

She got a doubtful look in return.

"No, really, I am all right," she repeated. "I have you here with me. How can I not be all right?"

Again Natsuki merely eyed her in puzzlement, still trying to make out what exactly was happening.

"Do not worry so much," Shizuru said, now truly smiling; her companion's bewildered face was too adorable to maintain her foul humour. She addressed one of the suspicions she saw there in a tickled voice. "And no, before you begin to revert to your old impression of me: I am quite right in the head, thank you."

The younger woman was shamefaced at having been read so accurately.

"I am merely very, very glad you are here with me," Shizuru told her. "I am not so unhappy any longer; I really should not be when the situation does not call for such fatalism yet. Who knows? Perhaps I might even have overreacted. Certainly not everything is so drastic, and you serve to remind me of it."

She shepherded the younger woman to their bed, where both of them sat facing each other.

"They are probably not there yet-it shall take some time, I expect," she said, now far clearer of mind due to the calm Natsuki had given to her. "In the meantime, I should so like to speak quietly with you... just with you. Let us talk a moment?"

The young woman nodded and Shizuru put a hand on her shoulder, running it lightly down the sinewy length of her arm. She followed the line of it down to the fingertips and saw next to them, on the sheets, the missive that had caused all this excitement.

"Now then..." She took an extended inhale and glanced at the letter. "As you see, this has precipitated a few things. Or no-rather, it merely announced precipitation that has already begun elsewhere, reaching us now as a trickle. Or should it be a flood? Well, who cares about the metaphors now?"

The green eyes watched her, their owner saying nothing.

"This is why I am meeting them, as you see."

Natsuki nodded.

"It is most troublesome. And certainly most unwelcome, as you know." A short pause. "But it cannot be helped, if it is true."

Again Natsuki nodded.

Suddenly she asked a question: "It is true, Shizuru?"

Shizuru's brow wrinkled at the query.

"I suppose so," she said, before shaking her head and making an amendment: "It is, in all probability, true. There would be no reason for them to lie to my scouts just for the sake of getting safe passage through the checkpoint. At least, no reason for them to lie about bearing my-"

She stopped for an instant before continuing what she had been about to say: "My replacement."

The green eyes were downcast, but Natsuki still nodded. Shizuru did the same.

"Well," she decided. "That was harder to say than I thought it would be."

Natsuki looked up again, clear eyes suddenly liquid with worry. She moved closer and Shizuru smiled to give her encouragement.

"It's quite all right, Darling," she said again. She rested her hand on the bed such that it covered the tips of Natsuki's fingers. "We knew he was coming. Yes?"

The answer was reluctant: "Yes."

"We just did not know it would be... well, that man."

"Um."

They looked at each other in understanding. And the same words passed through their mind at once: of all people.

"Yes," Natsuki told her shortly, lacking anything else. "Yes."

Shizuru stayed silent.

"He is one of... them? He is a Traditionalist?" the girl asked suddenly, brow creasing in curiosity.

One of the golden eyebrows lifted.

"As well he might be," came the response. "Or rather, it seems he is allied to them. Certainly his politics have always been more or less on the conservative end."

The girl looked grim.

"That much was expected at least-I wonder what Chikane has to say on this, no doubt I shall be receiving a letter soon. I am actually a touch surprised I do not have one yet, from her."

"Himemiya-san's sister," Natsuki volunteered.

"Yes, Chikane, the senior consul." She stilled for a second and looked pensive. "Do you know, Child: I actually believe Chikane would have been able to stop his appointment to be my substitute had she wanted. Certainly she has the means to do so, no matter if Masashi-han's allies were truly the Traditionalists and they had all insisted on it."

The younger woman looked disturbed. "Then why?"

"Why not?" Shizuru slanted a wry glance her way. "She had no overwhelming reason to stop it. After all, she is most likely viewing my replacement in the same light I do, or used to do: as no more than a very temporary title-holder of a probably now-meaningless command. Therefore, an empty vessel whose identity does not matter. Permitting the conservatives to seat one of their ilk here would be no great problem, as I would be returning as soon as possible to reclaim the position and Chikane would be legislating to give the campaign teeth, as soon as possible. Besides which, Masashi-han, so I hear, is not entirely worthless, militarily-speaking."

Her lip curled involuntarily into a sneer as soon as she finished the assessment: "She must have thought he suited the part of temporary housekeeper well enough."

Natsuki puffed peevishly.

"But... you and him..." she started, having no intention of finishing the statement.

Shizuru caught on, as she had expected.

"No, she does not know about that," Shizuru told her. "Or, I believe she does not. Suou-chan might, but given this matter we have on our hands now, I believe she did not tell her older sister. Chikane would have kept him out of these lands were it so."

She grimaced and burst into a rueful exclamation.

"Ye gods, the politics!" she said, shifting her shoulders in a long exhale. "And this is my world, eh? At any rate, I shall discuss matters related to this with Chie-han and Suou-chan tonight, so we shall see. I am actually quite glad you are accompanying me, so that you may listen in too." She frowned thoughtfully. "Perhaps you may tell me what you think of it afterwards."

Natsuki nodded in earnest.

"Good girl."

This time, Shizuru was the one who petted her. But she received the touch with less amusement and surprise than Shizuru had, even inclining her long neck towards it.

She reminded her charge of their appointment.

"Yes, I suppose we should go and see if they are there," Shizuru agreed, but stopped her from rising. "Wait, Natsuki. Wait a moment."

The dark-haired woman waited.

"There is something else too," the older woman said softly, eyes very gentle. "Another reason for why I would like you to be there when we discuss."

The dark head moved a little to show her the girl was listening. Shizuru steeled herself and ploughed on, one hand going to hold her companion by the shoulder.

"There is that other thing, and you and I both know it." She felt the girl still under her palm, and her voice grew softer. "We shall need to talk soon about... that other matter. Come to a final decision."

Natsuki's mouth opened, but shut again without having pronounced anything. That told Shizuru she understood, and the older woman nodded. There was no more to be said for tonight, she decided: they deserved a good rest before that, before she tried to persuade her again.

And pray all the gods I get the answer I want.

"Well, then, that is that. We may go now."

She got to her feet, feeling the sweat this new anxiety had brought to her hands, and surreptitiously pressing her cold palms to her robe's cloth: her belly felt empty again, for all that she had just eaten.

"Shall we?" she asked.

Natsuki still looked a little troubled, and very slowly got up from the bed. Shizuru tried to make her relax with a grin.

"We need not do it tonight, Natsuki," she said. "I suppose you may consider it his fault, really." She was only half-joking. "For arriving and thus placing the pressure on you to settle that matter with me."

"Him." The girl scowled suddenly, nose pinching. "Him you don't like."

"Yes." Shizuru had a thought and gave in to the urge to voice it. "And you?"

"Me?"

"Do you like him?"

Natsuki stared at her a long time before giving the answer.

"Good," Shizuru said fiercely in affirmation of the response. " Good . Whatever happens from now on, remember that."

Chapter 43

This is, perhaps, an apology in advance. Therefore, please bear with the political and cultural intricacies for the moment, as they shall explain a good many things about to happen. Also, to the reviewers, please pardon me: my replies may be tardy, due to certain pressing circumstances to which I must attend. Please excuse me.

---

1. A reminder on Hime and Fuuka - Hime is a city state that is surrounded by Fuuka. Think of it as Hime = Roma and Fuuka = Italia. This is not a simple matter of the capital vs. the country. The Ancient Roman Republic was its own entity, separate from the nations who made up the Italians (who were considered allies, but certainly not Romans). Not all Romans lived in Rome either, but often lived among the Italians. They were always conscious of who they were, however, because to be Roman was far better than being Italian.

2. Equites (L.) - Members of the Ordo Equester, called "the knights" as opposed to "the senators". Those of knight rank were usually as well-born as those of senatorial rank, but the difference was that they chose not a political career but a commercial one. Recall that there are restrictions on senatorial businesses, which is the reason the knights are generally the richer of the two ranks. One may consider them the equivalents of the modern "business sector" of the community, with the senators being the "government or political sector", for a simplified but convenient categorisation.

3. Imperator - See note below for Triumph.

4. Imperium (L.) - Authority possessed by a curule magistrate or promagistrate, specifying that said magistrate possessing the authority of his office and cannot be thus gainsaid in that capacity. All commanders of Roman armies are vested with imperium.

5. In utrumque paratus (L.) - "Prepared for either (event)."

6. Augur - A Roman priest of divination, belonging to the College of Augurs. Note that to be a member of a priestly college was a distinction, and in the present setting, members are co-opted by their fellows. Chikane Himemiya addresses Shizuru with this title because Shizuru is an augur, and in the context where Chikane mentions it, she does so for a touch of ironic humour.

7. Knights - See above note for Equites.

8. Pomerium (L.) - The sacrosanct boundary encircling the city of Rome/Hime, which could not be crossed by soldiers or generals for the duration of their service in a military mission or capacity.

9. Tribune of the plebs - An elected official of the Plebeian Assembly, holding the power of both legislation and (more importantly) the sacrosanct veto, which may be applied to anything except the decisions of a Dictator.

10. Triumph (L.) - A victory parade carried out by a Roman general hailed on the field by his troops as "imperator". One who celebrated a triumph was called a triumphator.

11. Vestal Virgins - The female priests of Vesta, the goddess of the hearth. They served the goddess for about thirty years under vows of chastity.

---

Inter Nos

par ethnewinter

---

Shizuru's scouts were wrong: the proxy commander's group arrived not one but a full five days after their notification, so difficult were the land passes and so sluggish was that Himean delegation. From this Shizuru later deduced that her replacement had elected to travel in relative comfort. Understandable, as there was no real hurry to his mission; had there been any actual conflict taking place in the North, the incoming deputation would doubtlessly have proceeded at full martial speed. As it was, they gave her time not merely to prepare for their arrival, but also to react to another missive. It arrived the day after the one telling her who her replacement was.

Hime's senior consul of the year wrote to advise her of several points. Apologising for the tardiness of her letter, Chikane Himemiya explained that she had deemed it wiser to sort out several matters before writing. Her solution to the current nuisance she outlined in this latest correspondence, which Shizuru practically tore open the moment it arrived. The great general had been so starved for news from a friendly hand! Now she finally had it, and her eyes raced all over the page, sweeping over column after column.

Chikane, while deploring most of the unfortunate events that were so troubling to Shizuru, wrote that she believed it better to follow the Senate directives meekly for the moment. Shizuru would be returning to Hime with some of her soldiers, for Senate had determined that the Northern expedition was bloated and had to be trimmed. Therefore, it was decided by the House that Shizuru would detach three legions- Three! she cried as she read, when there are only five! -to take home with her to be paid out. This left her replacement only two Himean legions and the rest of the Otomeian auxiliaries.

Impossible to counter this, Chikane had written on the topic. Impossible, because we must both admit that the tasks originally entrusted to you were all but concluded to the public eye, wrapped up with your usual efficiency. You were tasked to repel Obsidian from all allied and annexed lands-which you achieved at Argentum; to inspect the provinces' garrisons and ensure their integrity against further incursions-of which none have taken place since the battle abovementioned; and, ultimately, to make a show of menace and capability such as would intimidate the Mentulae into forever keeping their boot-heels away from our properties-which, it would seem, you have done beautifully indeed.

Therein is the problem: ever since your brilliant doings all over the North, the Mentulaeans have lain low. This has given us, the members of the House, no more reason to be wary. To use the words of the Princeps, which were invoked again in our latest debate regarding you, Vesuvius has been tamed and all but ceased her rumblings.

Yes, I can already hear you protesting! Before you berate me, attend me first: I did disagree. I wholeheartedly argued against this naive position, as did several others military-minded enough to see the possibility: that Vesuvius only set in for the winter sleep, and shall soon be waking; that the enemy may have only held off on any further incursions for now because the season is winter. We both know that large campaigns, when planned, are normally planned for the warm months. Generals plan their movements for the dry seasons when feet do not sink into the ground or toes fall off from the frost. Hence, if there is any further provocation to be made by the Mentulaeans, it should be happening only then-perhaps soon, in our case, for the cold months are nearly over. Spring comes, and while it brings with it the flowers, so might it the avaricious weeds.

So much did I and those few with the experience-and common-sense-argue to our fellow senators. But now I ask you, Shizuru: how many of our fellow senators truly have the experience to see reason? How many of them have the common sense?

Not many, is the truth. We have with us a House full of armchair generals, thinking themselves experts on matters military where they know nothing. One must allow it is easy to deny the possibility of war when it is so distant, when no threats have come to us for so long from foreign shores. One must consider, too, the innate smugness we all can be accused of having when it comes to our military prowess. And who can blame us, when Hime's armies truly are the best-trained, best-organised, simply best of all in the world?

But forgive me the trickle of panegyric; I need not laud the excellence of our legions to you, who have been instrumental in proving it time and again. There is one final factor, after all: one must also consider you.

Pray do not misunderstand. I do not blame you. However, it cannot be denied that most of the Senate already believes you have cowed Obsidian into steering clear of our boundaries forever. And who, unfortunately, can truly be so quick to blame them, our poor couch generals who see only the generalities? Argentum was magnificent; it was proof-positive of your genius, an example for all future generals and an envy of an achievement for every military man to come. Your parley with the foreign king has become similarly legendary. All our children sitting on their parents' knees will be told the story from now on; the simplicity of your words and their effect on that foreign regent shall live as testament to Hime's influence forever. This everyone can freely acknowledge, as do I.

But the problem is that what is acknowledged by our side may be acknowledged differently by another. Our fellows are now imagining, I believe, that this understanding of the testament holds true for the foe as well... forgetting that what one side sees as a testament to their power can actually be interpreted by the other as merely a momentary self-disgrace, "a bitter insult to avenge, perhaps compounded with interest come time to collect." Indeed: I quote your own words to you now, if you would excuse me for it.

That was what you said in one of your letters, as I remember, when you described your conversation with Obsidian. You spoke of your belief that he would return when able, to attempt again where he had failed.

You saw the peril of his resilient ambitions at the time, as do I and a handful of others at the moment. But the rest do not. Even our friend the Princeps seems to be lacking in the conviction that the Mentulae shall have the courage to attack us direct, which should demonstrate to you the general feeling in the House. Reito-admittedly dulled as I think his mental facilities are showing themselves to be here-is still a man of no mean intellect, as well as an ally to us both. If even he should be so doubtful, then you may well imagine how much more so the rest are. Scepticism reigns, which is ironic when one considers this is the same lot so credulous they once invalidated a law due to an allegation of "inauspicious omens". Yes, I know that was before your time; I had just entered Senate myself, then. Nonetheless, Shizuru Fujino Augur, the inanity of it!

Hardly anyone seems able to imagine the Mentulae as a threat any longer, having heard nothing of them for the past few months. The command you are about to turn over to Takeda Masashi is actually no more than a hollow shell, our fellow senators having sent him only for the purpose of doing a general review. After that review, which shall predictably state that northern disturbance has been settled, they shall recommend the entire mission be terminated before the year is even over.

You may imagine I had something to say about that. Still and all, the atmosphere here has been nothing but stifling. That the House even allowed two legions to be left is actually a feat on our parts, since the general idea was originally that only one need be let remain. The Otomeian auxiliaries could be easily called up if needed, as well as the two other local legions stationed in Sosia and Argus (which, they conveniently fail to mention, are grossly understrength).

But you know I would hardly have let it reach such a pass without coming up with a plan that would allow us to go on with our proper intentions. I promise you that we shall prevail, and do so with a jaunty waggle of the finger to all dissenting faces. For, as I see it, the obstacle we face is nothing: a pathetic attempt that has no more chance of stopping us than a rickety shield would a thunderbolt from Jupiter. I am set to waggle my finger, Shizuru, and I believe you are the same. If you are agreeable to it, let us then unleash upon them the thunderbolt.

It was thus that Chikane reiterated her earlier advice: to go along with the Senate directives and turn over command to her replacement, then pack up the legions she would take with her and travel until they reached Hime. Do that much, Chikane wrote. But only that much.

According to the plan, Shizuru would not actually enter the city of Hime at any time upon her return. She would not cross the sacred boundary of the city, which any Himean general could not cross without giving up both his troops and imperium. Rather, Shizuru would bivouac herself and any legions she brought with her in the Campus Martius, the area just outside the city walls where generals awaiting their triumphs were installed and new legionaries were trained.

That she would do that was actually still in keeping with all expectations: she had been hailed imperator on the field by her troops and thus deserved a triumphal parade. To get her triumph, she had to file a petition to Senate that, after approved, would allow her to carry out the procession. Only after that would she be allowed to enter the city as a triumphator, and then an elected magistrate to still according to expectations-properly assume her new office as the urban praetor.

That, she would never do.

The snag Chikane had prepared to stop Shizuru from being formally instated as praetor urbanus was none other than her newly-elected cousin, the tribune of the plebs with a mouthful of a name: Urumi Nemura Himemiya-Kanzaki. Vested with the awesome power of the plebeian tribunate's veto, Urumi would act as the primary agent in delaying Shizuru's instatement, allowing their other allies to further conspire in preventing Shizuru's triumphal petition from being granted by the State. In other words, to let the fingers start wagging.

The delay had a twofold purpose. First, it would permit Shizuru to retain her imperium and whatever legions she would be bringing with her, parking the latter in the Campus Martius outside the sacrosanct city boundary. Effectively retaining custody of these legions, she could not be ordered to pay out and surrender them yet. The troops were always expected to be part of their general's triumph, so they had to stay with her until said triumph occurred. Preventing this dismissal of the soldiers would mean legions readily available should an emergency arise, or available for marching after the plans had succeeded.

Shizuru knew that whatever legions she paid would be fat in the purse upon dismissal. A recently-dismissed soldier with a fat purse would not be too eager to sign up again for the army right after having just got out of it. Some of them might sign up should she call for enlistments again, yes, but some might not. Those latter laggards would be too busy roistering up and down Fuuka with their newly-gained money. Indeed, some soldiers even outright disappeared, only materialising again when their purses no longer clinked. Keeping her present ones under the standards was an expedient to prevent that little inconvenience from transpiring.

The postponement of her inauguration was also to permit her allies to bring up the issue of her election to office—a perfectly valid issue, so long as she did not formally assume said office before that. There would be a question of its legal basis due to the dubious circumstances of her nomination, a candidacy of which she had not been apprised and that she had not endorsed. Here was where the political convolutions would multiply, for there was no doubt that the events related to this impending debate would set precedents. It would bring into question several items of the mos maiorum, or the way things had always been done.

Given that the problem to be tabled for discussion was a precedent as well, Chikane confessed that was only to be expected. Whatever the case, the senior consul concluded, she was certain all would go the way they intended. They would return to Shizuru her command over the North and-soon after that-over the annexation of the Mentulaean Empire.

Shizuru read through all of this with blazing interest and finished well-satisfied. Even with that annoying detail she had just learned about having to strip her army of three full legions, her friend's letter had acted as a marvellous salve: options were opened, doors unblocked again. Now she could see her way more clearly through the fog that had seemed to envelop her of late. Chikane had lit the way.

Perhaps even, she thought humorously, with a thunderbolt.

How good to have someone so capable covering where you were blindsided! Chikane had put everything as Shizuru would have wished it to be done, had she been there. Looking dispassionately again over the letter, the younger woman even thought that she could have scarce done better herself. The senior consul's plan was as clever as it was elegant. Even so, Shizuru still managed to think of her own bit of elegance to contribute, which she explained to her regular confidant in Argus as "leveraging through letters".

"What is that?" her confidant had replied, a puzzled look on her face.

"Exactly what it says, My Darling."

"But what does it mean?" the younger woman had demanded.

"What is it you shall do?"

"It means I shall talk, meum mel, " she had answered. "It means I have to do a lot of talking."

To which the other had replied, still somewhat puzzled: "Well... if so... then it is good."

"How so?"

"If it is talk you must do, it will be easy for you."

Given that the chief purpose of all their coming movements would be to remove her from the restricting position of urban praetor and return her to the Northern mission, Shizuru determined that two points would have to be strengthened: first, that she had truly been unaware of her candidature in Hime for the past elections; second, that she was infinitely preferable to any other Hime-sent commander, as far as everyone in the North-and even in Hime-was concerned. Knowing the tack her allies would take was a great help, for she now saw an advantage to her remaining time in the region.

Over the days following her friend's letter, she began to campaign tirelessly amongst the local notables in Argus. She explained the situation to each one, hinting constantly at the danger of the Mentulaean king's ambitions. She was careful to phrase the issue of her replacement in such a way that her auditors always left with an unshakeable dismay-hard to credit to any of her actual sayings, yet so strong in the gut-that someone so far less inspiring would be replacing her in such a time of probable peril to them. And with three legions fewer than she had borne!

Shizuru puffed a breeze over the local elite, who felt it on their backs and lifted their hackles. It left them shivering as they looked about in search of an untraceable wind. Questions began to fly around. Why did everyone feel in his bones that trouble really was coming? Why was the special defence commission being given to this Takeda Masashi, who did not only have lesser credentials than his predecessor but would also have fewer soldiers? Could he possibly browbeat the Mentulaean king as effortlessly as Shizuru Fujino had? Could he really protect them as well as she had proven she could, in life as well as living? Remember, after all, that the lifeblood of a province was money: money moving in, money moving out. Countless Himean businesses thrived in the North. Argus itself was a great trade centres, fortunes passing through its docks and warehouses any given day of the week. Sosia was famous not only for its armoury metals but also the ones used for coin and moneys. Always money!

But money needed a good environment to be able to do its job, and that environment needed protection. Businessmen needed to know they were safe to let the cash flow. If the guarantee was weak-as many were now thinking Shizuru Fujino's replacement was, even before his arrival-then business folded up. Already capital was starting to hide, taking fright with the natural paranoia of the commerce-men. Money hidden away was useless! The more of it went into concealment, the nearer the economy stepped to stagnation. Was this what would happen? The business community scented something in the wind and began to bare its teeth.

Shizuru also sent letter after letter to various others in Sosia, in Argentum, and even to Otomeia, entrusting the same task she was carrying out to a few select people that would be her agents, for they would maintain this political campaign even when she had left. She spoke to the Otomeian barons and high officers, some of them through Natsuki, who was herself a high noble. Shizuru told them of the treacheries that had brought her to such a point, apologising profusely for having to entrust them to another's leadership without warning. To her surprise, she found that she did not need to do anything more in that quarter. Strong echoes of pessimism were already coming from those allies, independent of her working.

Natsuki was the one who explained it to her, speaking with a coolly detached observation the Himean general could not fault, and which was verified later through other agents. It was only to be expected, it seemed, that the Otomeians would grow restive at the news of her replacement. They had already grown fond of the foreign commander. They liked working with her, and liked the alien but effectual way she had of going about things. They liked how well she treated them and how, if favour was shown to the Himeans, so was an equivalent one given to them by her. But these were all secondary considerations, Natsuki admitted, and were subordinate to another, primary reason: the Otomeians had been looking forward to her command .

Being a people who liked anything dangerous, the Otomeians had been quick to appreciate their Himean general's flirtations with danger. They had seen the way she could leap into it with her soldiers and come out practically untouched, smiling with the blood-love expected of a true warrior and the luck of a great commander. To be handed over to another general-one who, they heard through the gossip, was hardly as well-credentialed, hardly as daring in combat-was galling to them, for they had just begun to get their stride. They had been looking forward to whatever new battles the strange, red-eyed Himean had promised in the future.

Who was this other person, who had not been the one to meet with their king and request them from him? Could they trust this new general to give them the same thrills, the same fairness? With these questions leaping from one baron to another, from one trooper to the next, all Shizuru had to do was send her own dispatch to King Kruger, not even bothering to involve the aristocratic officers. As it was, those Otomeians had already started sending official dispatches to their monarch. Her informants told her they were complaining themselves hoarse on the matter.

To be fair to Shizuru, she made no bald-faced effort to destroy her substitute's reputation to anyone. Rather, she settled for worming doubts of him into their minds. She fed the notions so subtly through little nuances of mood and manner that no one could later say anything of her attitude to her substitute as being anything other than beautifully dignified even in resignation. The only thing she could be accused of having outright stated, later, would be her suggestion to each person about writing a letter, on the pretext that informing those in Hime of their position could sway the Senate. Other than that, all was hint and implication, and sometimes barely even that.

But precisely because of the sly way she set it all in the motion-and perhaps this was the malefic aspect of it-the result was that the apprehension about the replacement commander was stronger than if she had blatantly cultivated it herself. This was true of any notion wormed into a person's mind instead of being spoon-fed. That most of them could not trace their dislike of the coming man to Shizuru made them believe they had formed the dislike themselves, and as with most self-formed notions, the antipathy was encouraged and developed further with no more urging from the woman who had actually seeded it in them.

Within two days, the first letters to Hime had been sent out in a packet, complaining that Shizuru Fujino was a victim of manifest treachery, that she should be let remain in the North to do what she was meant to do. The letters were addressed to friends, to significant acquaintances, to senators whose clients implored them to do something about this travesty. More letters were sent the following day, and even more the day after that. Already the movement was gathering force, and everyone, from the lowest trade merchant to the highest shipping magnate, was turning to the pen to cry foul for both Shizuru's sake and theirs. Think of the perils to the Northern territories, they hounded, over and over again. Think of the perils to our business!

Should it continue-and Shizuru knew it would-her return to Hime would be prefaced, accompanied, and even concluded with hundreds of letters, all demanding her reinstatement in the Northern Mission. Something to think about for Senate and those senators who were patrons of those who had written; something over which the knights or equites, the powerful plutocrats who made up the backbone of Hime's economy, would see blood .

Apprised of all this, her confidant had concluded: "You are so scheming a woman."

"I am a politician, Child. I scheme like any other."

"More, maybe... and better, too."

And remembering the girl was, besides being her lover and attendant, still one of the Otomeian regent's favourite attendants; still a royal princess of the blood, aside from being a titular noble of her adopted people; and while still very much a cub, a cub possessed nonetheless of teeth, she asked her gently: "Does that displease you?"

"You do not scheme against me?"

"Never."

"So I cannot be displeased."

Which got a laugh out of both of them. Natsuki's pragmatic opinion of her cunning aside, it was her Himean friends who were most impressed by her scheme-or perhaps even alarmed by it. This latest design from Shizuru, they realised, hinted at just how different she was from the rest of them, how strangely close her ideas could come to demagoguery. Truly no one else of such patrician birth could have thought of such a-a-oh, a populist thing to do! Demagoguery was traditionally the province of the plebeians, and most of the plebeians themselves refrained from it. Using the force of mass opinion, indeed!

It was brilliant, of course. It would work too, so much was true. The equites with investments tied to the North would agitate, and the senators would have to listen. It would work. But that confidence did not stop some of her friends from wondering what had put to her mind so outrageous a notion.

The senior legate herself, who loved Shizuru dearly, was still heard to comment to Suou Himemiya that their mutual chum was a freak, a product of some mischievous god wanting to see what would happen if he created an absurdly un-patrician patrician. And the Himemiya, coming from a family accused of being so undiluted of blood they had all the earmarks of freak products themselves, laughed herself sore on every side, loving the idea of this perfect but un-Himean fruit coming from one of the orchard's very best trees.

Still, their friend saw no problem in her doings, far more at ease now she had set a ball rolling and did not feel like the one being tossed about. Her intelligence networks-both the one managed by her agents in the army, and the one managed by one of her new clients, Yamada-buzzed constantly, feeding the doubts of her replacement further into the system. If her actions had been unorthodox, as she knew they were, then what of it? She had always been unorthodox, at any rate, and it tickled her to start something new in retaliation.

"I merely thank the gods I received Chikane's letter in time to start all of this," she even said cheerfully, over breakfast of the day after her replacement's actual arrival: Takeda Masashi and his posse had reached Argus the prior evening. "It always helps to be warned in advance of anything coming. Even a few days' notice can spell the difference between a glancing blow off your cheek and a stunner on the nose."

Her Otomeian companion looked intrigued.

"You have ever had that, Shizuru?" she asked suddenly, repeating the latter part of the metaphor: "A stunner on the nose?"

Shizuru took the detour: "Figuratively or literally?"

"Literally."

"No."

"Oh."

The Himean paused in the act of lifting a dish of tuna.

"Meum mel," she said. "Why do you look disappointed?"

To her credit, Natsuki made a wonderful attempt at looking both innocent and grim. Shizuru laughed.

"Too late-that only makes you look guiltier," she said, taking the saucer of fish. "And if you are really all that eager to see my nose crushed in, Darling, you might try to do it yourself. Spar with me one of these days and point your paw towards this protrusion."

She twitched said facial appendage when Natsuki's face lit up again: it was the alliteration that had done it, of course.

"Well, then?" she prodded.

Natsuki shook her head, pursing her lips for a second.

"No. Not eager for, ah, for that," she said sheepishly. "Sorry, Shizuru. I just wondered."

"The tunny is good this morning. Try some?" Shizuru passed her the dish after she agreed. "What violent things you do wonder, though. At any rate, what about you? Has it ever happened to you, the stunner to the nose?"

"Hmm." Natsuki smirked while tearing a chunk of fish into flaky halves. "Figuratively or literally?"

She smiled: "Both."

The Otomeian looked up.

"Yes," she said. "No."

"So we have the same answers." Her smile soured just a little.

"Speaking for myself, the past year's events have tweaked my poor nose quite a bit. It does feel a mite sore... though, I hope, not out of shape. I rather like it the way it is."

Natsuki chuckled, still occupied with eating her tuna. She suckled her fingers carefully afterwards, pulling them through her lips and licking the sections close to her palm where the oil had run. The Himean watched with mild fascination.

"Will you, um. Will you maybe do what she said?" the girl suddenly asked, still licking her hand clean. "Your friend. The consul?"

Shizuru looked thoughtful.

"Of course," she said. "It was what I always intended to do, anyway. To make a show of departure is only proper, as it would be unwise to act obdurate by refusing to do that much and cede the command. My foes would only use that as further capital for their claims that I am seeking personal power against the interests and orders of the Senate-and through that body, the people of Hime. Chikane did not say that expressly, but it is understood."

She stopped to take a drink, then continued.

"If the senatorial sheep were so threatened by me even when I was just another senator attending the House's sessions, what more were I to be a truculent general with the immediate strength of five armed legions, telling them I refused to follow their dictates? The next thing I know, there would be people claiming me setting up for civil war against the State."

Natsuki was incredulous.

"How does it go there?" she asked. "Why-it jumps there so fast?"

"Hyperbole, I am afraid, is one of the favourite pastimes in Senate. It takes on a life of its own. So, much as I would like to, I cannot afford to countermand the orders this time."

"Ah-hah." She smiled a touch shakily, which Shizuru noticed. "I see."

To the Himean's interest, the young woman then assumed an intense inspection of the food on her plate, which she began to move around with stagy fuss. Shizuru watched wordlessly, for she understood. Hence she merely waited for the Otomeian to say what was on her mind, unwilling to spare the girl by saying it herself. A few moments passed in relative silence.

When she thought that Natsuki was beginning to lose her nerve after all, Shizuru set her goblet on the table with a little more weight than usual, making an alarum of the sound. She ignored the girl's glance and merely picked up the chalice again, taking a quiet sip from it. Her smiling, steady eyes showed above the rim.

You should talk now, her tranquil nonchalance seemed to urge. Talk now, else I shall do this all day, other business be damned.

Wisely, the younger woman gave in.

"When?" Her question was soft, though it tried to be gruff. "Thuh-the departure."

Shizuru answered readily, having reconciled herself to several matters of late, one of them being that the sooner she returned to Hime, the sooner she could undo her troubles. "About three weeks' time, I estimate. As soon as the Fourteenth and Eleventh arrive from Sosia. Perhaps a day or two shall be allotted to sort them before shipping out, but that would be all. Speed is of the essence, for the sooner I return, the sooner all may be put right."

"Ahh. Yes."

And Natsuki said no more, returning to her act of moving about her meal. But Shizuru followed with the usual question, also with her usual snakelike quickness.

"Are you coming with me?"

The other woman's hand fell limply on the plate, giving up the farce of fussing. She stared at the clumps of food she had just made, seeming bewildered by how they had managed to get there.

And then she looked at the older woman uncomfortably.

"Shizuru," she murmured, in mingled reproach and regret. "Shizuru."

Shizuru sighed reproachfully as well and picked up what was left of her bread roll, dipping it coolly into olive oil.

"Natsuki," she intoned, quite warmly. "Meum mel. You know I love hearing you say my name, but I would prefer a direct answer at the moment. Again I ask, are you coming with me?"

What did she expect, she wondered. Certainly nothing less than the usual slanting away of those green eyes from her, the guilt in them. She finished wetting the bread in her hand, but could not summon the appetite to put it to her mouth, and let it fall to her plate, neglected. The younger woman noticed her action and looked at the food sadly, so forlorn one would have thought it were she and not the bread that Shizuru had abandoned.

Which the older woman found tellingly ironic.

The younger woman spoke: "Sorry."

Shizuru lifted an eyebrow. "Really?"

Natsuki was reluctant, but affirmed it.

"So the answer is still the same?" the Himean asked grimly.

Another terrifically guilty affirmation. There was a pause of breath after it, as though Natsuki were preparing herself for something frightful. What the young woman actually received, however, was an amazed exclamation.

"Such a mule!"

Natsuki looked up. Shizuru had turned her eyes heavenward, looking disappointed.

"We are back to that again," she went on to say. "Again you reject me, hm?"

Something in the girl snapped at that, and the Otomeian stared at her, eyes wide.

"Reject ? No," she said anxiously, grimacing at the word. "That is only, I-"

"Cannot come with me. I know. You say it every time I ask, every day." Shizuru passed a sharp look her way and suddenly replaced it with a droll expression, startling her companion. "This is fast becoming routine with us, really."

The blonde woman leaned forward, wavy tresses falling about her face.

"Have I told you that you are impossible, Natsuki?" she asked, smirking unexpectedly. "That you are the most impossibly, unbelievably, exasperatingly unwavering creature I have ever met?"

This she said with humour quivering in her voice, clear enough for her to be sure that Natsuki would hear it. Her smirk, too, widened into a genuine smile-and while it might have been unforeseen, it was also irresistible to the younger woman. She could not help but succumb to Shizuru's lightness, and so was unable to prevent an equal smile tugging at her lips when she finally responded.

"Yes... every time you say, Shizuru," the young woman affirmed, trying valiantly to stay sombre. "And every day."

"Ara! You do remember."

Natsuki's lips twitched. "What is everyday is hard to forget."

"True. It must be getting tedious to have it every day, though."

"You, uh, you grow used to it."

"I see, but that adds to the tedium. You must be bored with it by now?"

"Could be, a little."

"Would you like to make it more exciting?"

"How?"

"See what happens if you say ' yes ',for a change."

Their eyes clashed in an instant; and in the next, fled. It was impossible, it seemed to each one just then, to maintain this conversation and look at the other woman too without breaking into laughter.

When both had bitten their lips enough, they turned to each other again.

"What a terrible mule my Natsuki can be," Shizuru said, poking a corner of the other's mouth with a finger. "Well, never mind for now. I shall keep pestering you, you know, so I trust you are used to it, Dear. I really would like you to come with me, and I really am adamant in wanting that, so I fear I shall have to keep asking."

She made a dismissive inclination of her head and finished: "There is no use looking so guilty... especially when you still have over three weeks of this in the future, each day of each week, to wear you down."

Natsuki's eyes fell to her plate again. Shizuru was swift, however, and immediately brought up a brighter topic, thus preventing the Otomeian from starting to brood. It was not that the older woman was being more flippant about their discussion, but she felt that there was surely a better way to start the morning with the woman you loved other than taking up an ongoing argument. Furthermore, she too had grown accustomed by now to their daily routine with this problem, as she said.

Although it was admittedly a routine that was slowly undergoing change.

She did ask Natsuki that question, at least five times a day. At least five times a day, Natsuki would tell her no. However, while the successive refusals were not enough to prevent her from asking again and again, they were at least enough to foment a change. It was the irrevocable blighting of what had formerly been an absolute confidence that Natsuki would, after having been sufficiently harried, give her a "Yes".

It was hard to tell from where the blight began. Was it from the constancy of Natsuki's refusals? Was it from the first time Natsuki had given one, even? Or could it perhaps be from the fact that sometimes, when Shizuru looked at that young woman with eyes not glazed with adoration, she caught a glimpse of something she had never truly been able to fathom before? Not that she thought she could truly fathom it now, that strange and glinting thing. She could not even name it yet. It was something seen only when she steeled herself to look at the girl without thinking of how much she loved her eyes, or how pretty was her face when in sternness, or how elegant was the shape of her small nose. It was hard to do that, really. But sometimes... sometimes she would look at Natsuki, and try to look at her as at an unfamiliarity.

What are you, Natsuki?

Pretending herself a stranger sometimes, she would wonder at it. What was Natsuki indeed? An enemy yet not an enemy. An indefinable being that seemed capable of resisting Shizuru's hand, which had shaped everything else to which it had been put. How could that be? She did not like to be vainglorious in that respect, but it was simply that she had never been so confounded before, so persistently resisted by anything that only ever yielded to her otherwise. Yet Natsuki did it so relentlessly. How was it the girl could be so resistant in one way, yet be perfectly compliant in another? What was it that defied her so adamantly in her acquiescent Natsuki, that hard-glinting thing that could not be pushed, pulled, or shaped?

Whatever it was, it attracted her as much as it caused her dismay.

Her doubts of the girl notwithstanding, her desires remained consistent. She still wanted so badly for Natsuki to join her when she left. Perhaps it had relieved her somewhat to know that, gods willing, her plan with Chikane would mean she would stay in Fuuka only briefly before coming back to the North. A good thing if Natsuki was with her, since it meant the girl would not suffer being away from her native territory too long; a good thing too if Natsuki was not with her, since it meant Shizuru would not suffer being away from the girl too long. The latter consideration, unpleasant as it was, was beginning to look ever more likely.

It did not help her diminishing confidence to think of her replacement. Had it been any other senator, she might have been a little less nervy. But to think of Takeda Masashi, who wanted also the same young woman; to think of that man being here, where she would not be soon, and where Natsuki might stay... Intolerable! True, she had yet to ascertain how the man felt, yet to see if he still wanted Natsuki as he had seemed to then. Shizuru guessed he would. She believed it more and more each time she looked at her young woman, sometimes so rapt in the Otomeian's beauty she forgot to shut her mouth, sighing lips parted as though ready to catch Natsuki's. There was no doubt in her mind Takeda Masashi, upon seeing again this beauty, would quite easily do the same.

But if he did that in front of her, she prayed she would remember enough not to kill him.

"You should have told me," she had complained to her childhood friend, Suou, after the woman confessed she had known of the possibility Shizuru's replacement would be the man. "You should have told me who it would or might be."

Suou had been largely impenitent. "Pardon me, but would it have helped if I had?"

"Would it have helped what?"

"Anything?"

"It would have helped me prepare," she had insisted irritably. "I would have been able to ready myself, instead of having it cast unexpectedly at me."

The other woman—equally patrician, equally formidable, and equal to the task of disagreeing with her where hardly anyone else would dare—had denied it.

"Maybe, but not for much good," she had said. "You could have done the same self-readying in a day, were it necessary, and we both know it."

Shizuru had lifted an eyebrow.

"Even so, Suou." The lack of the honorific had been indication of her mood. "It was your duty to divulge such information to me, being my legate."

"As well as your friend, though that does not mean I claim privileges for myself with it." Suou had smiled at her: the lazy, lovely, exasperatingly disarming Himemiya smile. "See, you may still be annoyed with me after this, Shizuru-san, but let me say it first. Punish me from my failure as a legate, yes, but please allow me to explain first. May I not explain?"

"You may."

"I kept it from you because I did not see what good it would do to have known it earlier, whereas I did see the harm. Remember that was about the same time you began asking Natsuki-san to come along with you."

"I am in no danger of forgetting."

"Quite. Now, I admit I never thought she would say 'No', but I thought you would prefer to ask her without having that worry hanging over you. You're, well, you're a passionate woman, Shizuru-san, if you'll allow me to say. Would not the thought of Takeda Masashi's approach have altered the way you asked her, the way you asked it? Would it have altered it for the better, or for the worse?"

And that had made her think. Her friend had been right and she saw it, much as she wished she did not: knowing of that man's approach would have changed the way she had first asked Natsuki, and imbued it with an inner panic, a darker frenzy than had already been there. Suou could not have known it, but she had done Shizuru a greater favour than she knew. The older woman only had to think back to time she had hurt Natsuki, and she would think of how much more she could have hurt the girl, had she known who might be coming. It made her cringe to admit that, but she could not spare herself if she wanted to spare Natsuki: she would have hurt her far more.

That, too, was intolerable.

But what could a woman do? How many times could one accept a refusal whose reason refused to be seen? And she was, as Suou had noted, a passionate woman. It came hard to her to stymie the ardour of her feelings when taking the No's that had become her daily fare, hard to ignore the paroxysmal urge to clamp her hands around her girl's neck and claim it with that collar. Sometimes she would sigh to herself, as though to Natsuki: Why can you so easily refuse me? And yet she could also see the refusal did not actually come "so easily".

Still, ease was relative.

One had to understand the circumstances. Shizuru was a woman who asked and always received. To have been born with all her gifts, her wealth and her ancestry, it was only natural that she should have thus gone through her life thus favoured. And as for the matter of love-why, what else could be expected of a woman descended from the goddess of it? Shizuru was gifted there as well, drawing infatuations and obsessions after her like an indifferent comet trailing expiring stardust in its wake. Given her abstinence from affairs during the time she had been in Hime, it had become all the more noticeable, going so far as to become the stuff of amusement to her fellows and the base of several jokes.

"It's so it gets hard to tell if she really has that large a clientele," the Traditionalist pillar, Sergay Wang, would say, referring to the custom of clients accompanying their patrons when the latter went about Hime. "At least half of that crowd is just her pack of moon-eyed fillies."

And fillies it always had been. It was not so much about men: it had never been about men and few men were actually attracted to her romantically, as though able to sense her preferences with a glance. Yet a good number of men liked Shizuru, and sometimes even lusted after her. But women were different. Women were where she worked her magic.

It had forever been her gift to draw the women. They lost their minds over her, sighed after her, tossed away all judgement and good sense. How many of them had tried to go from pillar to pillar furtively, stalking her tracks as she walked through their beloved city? How many fellow senators had she found to be enemies, simply because their wives went mad over her even when she had never given them cause for it? That was the magic of it: she never gave them cause to follow, treated none of them specially over the others, and yet they seemed to keep coming.

Her peers had long debated what about her women found so attractive.

"She has the natural charisma-it runs in the family," said her favourite cousin, the notorious philanderer.

"She has such a lovely accent, so enchanting," suggested the senator Mai Tokiha, an ally.

"She has all that money," opined the senator Yuuichi Tate, while hiding at a friend's house to escape some creditors.

"She has those pretty red eyes: a novelty," remarked one of the other elected praetors, Suguru Kashiwagi.

"She's a very pleasant woman, really," noted the present junior consul, Yukino Kikukawa.

"She's a shameless flirt!" said the previous senior consul, Haruka Armitage.

But she was not a shameless flirt. In fact, the people with whom Shizuru had only ever flirted obviously would be her friends-and that because there was no possibility of true innuendo there, for her friends flirted back in the same outrageous mood of such fun because it means nothing. With others, she was modulated, charming yet not overbearingly so, and correct in all attitude. That many of her peers viewed her with distrust as a possible cuckold had never goaded her into behaving as one. She continued to let be the infatuated, love-struck women in her wake, unfailingly kind, yet giving them nothing that might be misconstrued as an invitation. Hardly speaking to them save to smile with a "well met" and "good day", Shizuru had to the present kept all her interactions blameless, and her reputation unimpeachable.

But she had still always had the satisfaction that, had she ever even propositioned any of her followers, each one would have leapt the pits of Tartarus to say yes.

So it was only understandable that her young woman now befuddled her, because she was the first young woman Shizuru had ever invited to anything, and because the invitation was not even one that could be considered so damning. Natsuki was not the wife of some other, being asked to play adulterer for Shizuru's sake and her own excitement. She was not some timid maiden, paling at the prospect of being stolen from her homeland by some foreign conqueror against her will. And there was the pity of it: there was the utter pity! Shizuru had since found in herself a great revulsion, a trembling disgust, for the idea of actually subjecting Natsuki to such a rape, or even such a deception.

Had it been merely a matter of lust, she would have done either, she thought; even, perhaps, had it merely been a matter of love. But the fact was—oh, what a problem!—it was not mere lust for the girl she felt, nor even mere love.

When it came to Natsuki, she also felt like .

She liked Natsuki immensely, she had come to realise, and more than she had ever liked anyone else. She liked her enough to find out any unsavoury aspect of the girl's character and not be disillusioned by it. She liked her enough to treat her not merely as one would a lover, who could be an object of affection but an object nonetheless. That is, she had come to like Natsuki to the point of seeing her as a friend .

Apprehending this, she saw she could not keep belabouring the query as she had formerly done so, when her passion had been so strong it nearly overcame her liking. She could not pressure her into it by some subtle cunning, such as by telling the girl the true extent of her feelings and manipulating the fierce kindness and loyalty she already knew was in the Otomeian. She still tried to coax her into it when they bedded, yes; and she still tried to do all manner of things to persuade her, true; but no longer did she ask in a way that could be interpreted as menacing. That did not work anyway, from what she had seen, and it harmed Natsuki besides. While it could come easily to a person to harm a lover, it did not come so easily to harm a friend.

She included the question now in their banter instead of their brooding. Her attempts to entice Natsuki began to swing to the hilarious, partly because it amused her to make the girl laugh while asking the question, and partly because-having tried and failed with so many other things before, good sound reasoning included-she decided she never knew what might work. She made good humour out of all manner of incentives, from the promise of some greyhound pups (which bribe she even raised to an entire kennel, when she saw Natsuki's eyes glimmer) to a pledge of unendingly glorious sex - which word flustered the girl so badly she was unable to make even one of her usual wise-mouthed comebacks, resorting instead to calling Shizuru a 'fool' or 'idiot' in her native tongue.

To be so bothered by the mere citation of sex, Shizuru thought, was very much the Otomeian in her.

She worried sometimes about that too: the force of Otomeian cultural opinion and how much it could influence-or worse, affect-the girl. For instance, she had only just learned that the Otomeians were not a naturally sensual people. Coming from a sex-saturated society like Hime, it had been easy to think that Natsuki's culture was similar at first. So it had bemused her on those past occasions when, brushing the back of her hand against the girl's cheek, the sway in the lithe body would show Natsuki was in a state of passion-yet the face belonging to that body would also show something confused, as if Natsuki herself could not understand what was happening. There had been times when, while Shizuru traced the skin of her hips, Natsuki's face had seemed on the verge of some great outburst... while never actually exploding.

There was, too, that occasion which still made the Himean feel guilty when she thought of it: a week after they first had carnal congress, when she had responded to one of Natsuki's half-hearted protests at modesty by saying laughingly that the girl was so like a blushing virgin. She had spoken it with tenderness, as a familiar jest between lovers, yet Natsuki had responded to that with a look that held faint injury . It had made her wonder.

Much later, after she deepened her studies of the Otomeian culture, she found out the reason for that expression. Natsuki's people were apparently far more taken with the thrill of war and hunting than sensual matters: they sang no songs of raging lust, painted no pornographies on their walls, had no myth stories of gods and goddesses playing cuckold or romancer. Indeed, she found their attitude such that some of the elders among them even considered it shameful to have fleshly knowledge of another before the twentieth year.

They had a belief that the physical body only grew stronger the longer one remained chaste. This was why some-often the warrior-nobles and most socially prominent-even passed their second decade without knowing a lover's embrace. They were lauded for it by their peers. How intriguing, thought Shizuru, that they applauded abstemiousness, where a Himean would often find it worthy of ridicule! In the candid words of one of the official interpreters, who were more familiar with the Otomeians: "They're less curious about it than an honest-to-goodness Vestal Virgin."

Shizuru herself had been abstemious as well, prior to meeting her Otomeian. Despite that, she had still understood well enough the attractions of the flesh, knew exactly what happened between lovers in bed. What was more, she was a gross exception. Most Himeans fantasised about the act, did the act, even, at the start of adolescence. Proper though they might claim to be, Shizuru knew most of her fellows had already soiled their virgin beds at ages far above the Otomeian twenty .

To think of Natsuki, then, whom she had taken at nineteen-was it nineteen? Close enough to the ideal age, true, but who really knew with such strange people? Now she was twenty, yes, and certainly not a virgin any longer. With their affair so public, every one of Natsuki's fellows had to know the young noble was no longer chaste. How did they view that, she wondered. Did they see Natsuki as having been despoiled, violated? Did they think her stunted now from reaching her true potential, in terms of growth? If so, it was Shizuru's hands had done it. If any of them had ever looked down on the girl for such a thing, it had been she who had done it.

She could not ask Natsuki about it, of course. It seemed impossible to ask the girl if any accusations of disgrace had ever been thrown to her from their liaison, if what everyone knew they did each night was ever used against her by the others. It seemed equally impossible to ask Natsuki if her constant refusal to go along to Hime might be partly due to what the other Otomeians would think if she did so, as though in the sway of her lover-and the words despoiler, violation swam angrily in Shizuru's mind here-like a patsy played easily by a foreigner. Shizuru doubted very much that this was so, for she believed she could see the great esteem most of the Otomeians showed the girl. But what if, what if! And so she never asked Natsuki, because she was afraid of what could be the answer.

She could not bear the thought of having ever caused the girl sorrow. One day, reading some verse from a new poet the Argus governor had recommended to her, she had been struck by the writer's theme: a suitor doing his utmost to please his beloved, taking her demure reactions to his gifts as true pleasure. According to the poem, however, the beloved was only pretending for the sake of courtesy, actually feeling uneasy in the suitor's presence. It had spawned a new nagging thought: did she make Natsuki happy after all? She herself was happy with Natsuki, but was Natsuki really happy?

She had impulsively sent out for several bouquets of whatever early flowers could be found in the markets, having them sent to their room for her to present to the girl. Who had received it with her usual bashful surprise, sniffing at the spray with the avidity of one who enjoyed fragrances, her pretty face brightening. Shizuru had asked her anxiously then-perhaps even a little too anxiously, gauging from Natsuki's reaction-if she was happy. When she asked again even after the affirmative was given, mouth dry as she said "Truly?"-well, that was when Natsuki had asked her if she was feeling well, coming up close to hold her with a manner that was almost protective. She had sighed at that moment, relieved that Natsuki truly seemed to be happy. And then, because she was thinking of Natsuki and Natsuki was the only thing in the world that could throw her off-kilter, she had begun to question next if she could keep Natsuki happy.

For the most part, however, she tried not to harbour such doubts. They made her morose, and she had since learned that if she was morose, Natsuki would be too.

But sometimes, late at night, she would think.

Because she was a person who, having had an avenue opened, simply had to scout it, she began to imagine what would happen if she did have to go without the girl. Her confidence having been shaken enough to consider it, she saw it was something to plan for as well. In utrumque paratus, Shizuru .

She had already begun, arranging for Natsuki to be in the care of Suou if such were the case. She would also have to extract a pledge from the girl not to entertain anyone else, though she had to save such a thing for the last moment, and only when she was certain of defeat. But these were things prepared for Natsuki. One day, waiting impatiently for the girl to come back from a meeting with her troopers, she realised she also had to prepare for herself.

How did one prepare for such a thing? For her, it was primarily a mental exercise. She forced herself to imagine how it might be without Natsuki. Unpleasant thing! Even a few moments of it fatigued her. It was true that she had lived with the girl for only half a year, but it was the kind of living together that not even married couples enjoyed: spending days cheek-by-jowl, so attached that her officers joked theirs was the only general who actually cast two shadows, from the morning to the night.

Sometimes she tried to imagine it, when she was waiting to drift off to sleep on late evenings. How would it feel again, she wondered, to be without Natsuki? To not feel the assuring warmth of her in the darkness, to know that no comforting breast would be ready if she found it hard to slumber? How would it be not to wake with the glide of Natsuki's fingers trying to feel the crystal-coloured down of her cheeks without brushing her skin? Could she still wake smiling without the sound the girl made when she did that successfully, that laughing puff, as though the younger woman were delighted for having managed it? Or the stern face that seemed to fall on Natsuki like a veil when they had gone through morning ablutions and ventured out of their room, if someone else happened to run into them?

These questions invaded her only in the dark hours, when she was sure Natsuki was already asleep and could not witness her anxiety rising. She thought of the queries but rarely, astonished that she could hardly come up with the answers, and her chest radiating little waves: waves of tightness that made the hair on her arms stand. And, if she were sitting up instead of lying down, it would be her heart falling: down, down, past her ribs-down into a belly that felt like a vacant pit. She would not know if she wanted to retch, or maybe to rise and walk it out, or perhaps even just curl up on one side.

It was a little frightening.

She started to be even more covetous of her time with Natsuki, reluctant even to let the girl separate from her for a moment. She went so far as to frown when the Otomeian had to go to a meeting, mouth thinning fleetingly. And, when she felt the girl had been away for more than an hour, she would begin to fiddle and drive her staff into such a frenzy of work that they would wonder what was the matter.

One day she asked Akira Okuzaki, one of the military tribunes and an artist of marked talent, to make for her a palm-sized portrait of the girl. She asked for something small enough for her to carry in her pocket or on a chain, the one to which she tied her coin purses and which already had the little wooden wolf Natsuki had carved long ago. Why she tasked Akira to do this, she did not tell; but the tribune noted that the general looked so bothered in ordering it that it seemed almost to be against her will.

She spoke her fears only to the friend to whom she intended to entrust Natsuki, should the fears become real. She sought her during those rare times Natsuki was apart from her, or could not overhear. She thought she could not speak so candidly to anyone else, and be spoken back to as frankly.

"I am afraid I should go mad," she would laugh dryly, face the closest it had ever been to being careworn-and, despite that, or even in consequence of that, looking handsomer a woman than ever. "I think of being so far from her and it seems I cannot think! Was it perhaps the same for your sister, when she had to go through the same thing? Was she so troubled?"

And Suou, pale aquamarine eyes softening, would say it had been.

"Then I must speak to her, if it so happens and I go... I go without Natsuki," Shizuru had continued one day, her voice catching at the last phrase. "I am so afraid it may be, Suou-chan. My god, I do believe I am afraid."

The other woman had looked at her with compassion.

"Do you remember?" she had asked. "Himeko actually refused my sister for quite a time before finally agreeing to marry."

Shizuru's head had snapped upwards from its contemplative pose then, and Suou had continued.

"Chikane was wretched during that time, really," she had spoken. "For nothing. Himeko told us later she had loved Chikane even then, but had hesitated for other reasons. Reasons she explained quite well, I believe, and which I deem quite fair."

"See," Suou had smiled gently. "They might seem irrational, even pigheaded when they refuse, but I do think they usually have their reasons. Women-and men-might love you, might completely love you, but are not incapable of denying you still, given a good reason."

And Shizuru, whose face had gained some life at her earlier words, had become haggard again and started sighing.

"I suppose they might, at that," she had whispered heavily. "Have actual good reasons, that is."

"The reason was not lack of affection, at least."

"Not for Himeko-chan."

"I think it isn't either for your Natsuki. Nor is it fickleness of fancy, either."

"I should hope it would not be," Shizuru had retorted balefully. "And certainly not with that man on his way here."

"Masashi? Has your girl ever expressed attraction to him?"

A bitter hiss. "Gods forbid!"

"Then that's interesting for you to get so worked up about him. After all, surely you're not blind to the fact that scores of others have been eyeing your girl so long, within mere feet of us for the longest time while Masashi has not even been here?"

Shizuru had not known what to say to that.

"Do you not trust her?" had come the question.

"Of course I do, but she has not even made an assurance for me to trust!" Shizuru would cry, goaded.

"Then what do you want, as an assurance?"

"I want..." She had taken a halting breath, voice flagging a little. "I need to know she is mine. Even if I am not here and she is. That everyone shall know it, and mark it, and respect it enough to steer clear even should I be away."

"Then seal her," Suou had advised with cold pragmatism. "If that is what you want, you need to do it. Make it so you know she can never forget you, nor would ever be willing to. Write yourself into her, until she belongs to you even before knowing it. Make her your property-"

And she had rushed to say the next part before Shizuru could protest, seeing the red eyes giving her that objecting glance: "But make it so that she wants to be."

She had added, when Shizuru did not immediately speak after: "I think you're quite far in doing that already, actually."

A hollow laugh.

"So you say," Shizuru said. "Yet she refuses to come with me."

"Immaterial to this discussion right now," Suou had retorted, gaining a surprised look. "Yes, immaterial. Whether she comes with you or not, the true issue is still owning her." At Shizuru's expression of alarm: "Well, do you not want to own her?"

Shizuru's head had eventually dipped.

"Yes," had been the whisper.

"Oh, good! There, then," Suou had affirmed cheerfully, seeming very glad to establish that much. "As I said, the issue is that, and you can own a person even they are miles away from you. Besides which, if she did refuse to come to the end, it is not as though you'll be apart so very long: your plan with Chikane should bring you back in a few months, even. Maybe even less time than we expect, because Chikane's plans gather the force of a gale when she's angry, and given everything that's happened recently, she's absolutely livid. As for me, I would be watching over your property then, like I said."

A thoughtful pause as she assessed Shizuru before continuing.

"Focus on making her yours, Shizuru-san, and making her feel she should be yours: that will be winning the war instead of aiming for just a battle. Forget that little skirmish about going or not going with you! Whatever happens, when you get to Hime, if you still feel like asserting your ownership, why-why, I believe you should go and talk to my sister then!"

She had been quick to grasp the last part of the other patrician's advice, and thinking on it now, as hearing of it then, brought out a gasp. The boldness of Suou-chan, she thought. The utter daring !

To suggest that she talk to Chikane and begin to work out how to bestow the citizenship or Extended Rights to Natsuki... Even if she had long had it flying about it her head, it was still not something she expected anyone else to support. Especially not another patrician of the patricians.

But it did give her newfound determination to hear it. Suou was was no use mincing about it any longer, when she knew what she really wanted. Respect Natsuki as she might, like Natsuki as she might, she also truly wanted to own her. Oh, she still quailed at the thought of forcing her into a thing, but she wanted to know she had possession of the girl, and that the world around them knew it too. The citizenship or Extended Rights would go a long way to helping her there, providing her with any number of ways she could use afterwards to publicly-officially-put the Otomeian in her hands. She could turn her status into one of her freedmen, for instance, which meant Natsuki would be under her tenure and influence forever... Or ask to adopt Natsuki into the family, perhaps, putting the girl under her official custody and ownership... Or she could even-and she shivered at her own mad audacity at this-own her by marriage.

Priorities thus shifting, she began to work more towards that end she had been forced to confess. She had to make Natsuki undeniably hers, no matter any possible future distance, no matter any possible problem. The issue of coming to Hime, while still important, had been relegated to a secondary place; Shizuru had branched out and begun to play for the greater game. What she had to ensure, whether she left with or without the girl for those few months, was that everyone understood where she had drawn the lines-Natsuki included.

She became aware that the girl of her thoughts was calling her and so turned her head in that direction, amused when the Otomeian greeted her with a puckering frown. It seemed Natsuki had been saying something, and she had missed it with all her ruminations.

"You do not listen," the young woman accused. Her eyes were wide with offence, and it was the sparkle of colour from them that alerted Shizuru, more than the words her mouth spoke.

"I do, I do!" the older woman cried, recovering quickly with an apologetic smile. "My mind merely drifted a moment, meum mel. Tell me again, please, for I am so sorry."

The Otomeian huffed, but told her anyway.

"I said about the legions you picked to take with you," she said, mouth still pouty. "The Fourteenth, the Eleventh, and the Ninth."

"Yes, correct. What did you say of them?"

"See, you did not listen?"

A laugh escaped the Himean.

"Natsuki," she said remorsefully, in a cadging tone. "My sweet Natsuki. My lovely Natsuki."

Her lovely Natsuki huffed again, crossly.

"Why them?" she asked Shizuru. "Why those legions? And why the Seventh and the Eighth to be left?"

"Good questions." Shizuru smiled warmly, in an attempt to soothe the ruffled girl. "It is since I expect that my replacement shall ask, specifically, for the Seventh, since it is not originally one of my legions but on loan from another general."

Natsuki said she understood that. Why the Eighth, however, when it was actually one of her veteran legions?

"Because of Argentum?" she ventured. "Because Argentum is closest to the Mentulae? You do not want it weak, so you want them to stay there and not go away?"

"Yes, that is part of it-but there is another thing," Shizuru said. "I expect that my replacement shall be a little more wary about what he does if he knows at least one of his legions is still, almost indubitably, on loan from me."

Her Otomeian companion suddenly chuckled, forgetting all about her sulk.

"He will not like to know that, I think," she submitted.

"But he should be grateful." Shizuru allowed the barest hint of disdain to lift her lip. "I am leaving him one of our most proven legions, with some of Hime's best centurions officering it. The Seventh too, is excellently primed for any situation. What soldiers do remain with him shall be among the best our nation-and yours, of course, I do not forget it-has to offer. How could he complain?"

The younger woman seemed thoughtful, so Shizuru let her have a moment to muse over whatever gnat was still flying about her mind.

"But they-will they follow him?" she eventually asked the Himean.
"They will?"

"Of course. It is still their duty."

"No," Natsuki told her. "Shizuru, I mean to say... they will follow him like they follow you?"

Shizuru smiled as she saw what the younger woman was hinting. The latter continued.

"They will follow him, Shizuru," she decided, offering an answer to her own query. "But not like-I think-not like they follow you. And I think, too, he will see it. They are loyal to you."

"About that, I can do nothing."

"Yes... but not so to him."

"Which would label him a fool, if he actually does believe it."

"Hmm. Not that, anyway." The Otomeian dipped her chin. "It is... that he will want to believe it."

Shizuru's eyes went to her.

"Perceptive," she said with obvious admiration.

Natsuki waved it away. "Also, Shizuru, about the Seventh, I think them loyal to you too. Even if they come from another general, you say. I am wrong or not?"

Shizuru smirked.

"Actually, you are not wrong, Natsuki," she confessed. "The Seventh is actually... let us say, fond of me too. Added to which is the fact that they shall not love him at all once they get word that-as I expect him to do-he asked for them specifically, because by doing so he would have deprived them of the opportunity to be in my supposed triumph. Every legion, to its last legionary, wants to be in its general's triumph, since the glory on that day is for just as much for them as for me."

Natsuki hummed with a minute smile, taking in her commander's thinking.

"And so that will add to their grudge," she murmured. "Will he think of it, that one?"

"Even if he does, what other choice does he have but to keep the legions being left him? Where else would he get an army? I doubt the House gave him enough money to train and call in new recruits-they hate new expenses. As for all the other, already trained legions, they are abroad or being used."

"And you take three more away." She looked up. "Already prepared? The ships you will take?"

"I have already arranged transport, yes."

Natsuki tilted her head curiously. "How many do you take? How many ships for three legions?"

Shizuru widened her eyes comically.

"For three legions, Natsuki?" she said, miming surprise. "For one, you mean!"

She received a look of sheer perplexity, and repeated her answer for emphasis.

"For one legion," she said again. "Not three."

Natsuki gaped at her for a second, moved into speech when she only met that look with perfect equability.

"Buh-buh-but you said, Shizuru," the girl stammered out, clearly perturbed. "You said-I heard-to bring three. What is- one ?"

Shizuru grinned, telling her to calm down, that she had heard everything correctly, and that it was Shizuru's fault for having failed to explain it.

"I am taking only one legion with me by ship. Either the Eleventh or the Fourteenth," she informed the girl. "As for the other two legions, they shall be going by land."

The explanation diffused the Otomeian's confusion, but only for a moment. It returned quickly, even stronger than before.

"But why?" she asked, frowning more deeply. "I do not see. Why by land?" She threw a doubtful glance at Shizuru. "And they will be slow. Spring floods passes, makes soil hard to walk on."

"True, it does that."

Natsuki took a few moments to think on it.

"Tell," she requested, looking faintly irked that she could not figure it out for herself. "Tell me why? Also, why only those two?"

"Because I must keep one legion with me. It would only be prudent as Hime expects to see me return with some troops actually by my side for the triumph-they do expect to see soldiers with me," she said, only her wiggling brows serving to remind Natsuki that there would actually be no triumph taking place. "As for those other two legions, I am sending them overland so that they may do a little roadwork."

The Otomeian's exquisitely tuned nasal apparatus sniffed, caught a whiff of something lurking in Shizuru's studiously bland tone. She tried to stare down the older woman, but soon realised that would not work, and pursued it differently.

"A road, Shizuru?" she asked, leaning forward. "You will make those two build a road from here to your country?"

"Yes-or rather, a better road than presently exists between these regions and the uppermost lands of Fuuka," Shizuru replied. "It should make any further deployments to the North easier from then on, as well as vice versa, just in case travel becomes a necessity in the future between the territories. You know, if ever there should be a difficulty with the sea routes."

Natsuki nodded slowly, normally wide eyes thinned. She was still trying to find something.

"I cannot be accused of transgressing my authority afterwards since improvement of the land route is an essential part of fortification, any future transport of troops overland being greatly aided by it. I cannot be accused of trying to usurp authority either from the one who has usurped mine-ah, did I say 'usurped'? I meant 'been given', sorry! Let us do that again. I cannot be accused of usurping authority from the one who has been given my authority in this mission, because I very much doubt he would be willing to pull out yet another of the only two legions left him for the purpose of mere road-building. I imagine he would be quite glad, in fact, to let my legions do the dirty, hard work that benefits everybody."

The girl was now smiling, starting to see where the Himean was going. Shizuru winked at her and continued, still mimicking innocence.

"Furthermore, it is not merely for defence and military purposes. Being-" She cleared her throat delicately. "-an upstanding young senator, it should only be natural for me to be assiduously contributing to the public works. Why, it may even be considered my donation to my country, a gift I make of my own expense to the public! It should serve as an encouragement to Himeans and Fuukans alike, and those of our Northern territories, to have even better relations with each other."

"Once finished," she went on, "the new via should see a deal of traffic. Commerce and North-South trade would flourish; real estate along the new via would quickly start renting and undergo development. Quite a satisfying accomplishment-not to mention a fine opportunity for personal enhancement and enlargement of following-to whoever is patron of that road, no?"

She shrugged.

"I cannot be blamed if that immense stretch of new road should happen to bear my family's name, for obvious reasons," she said innocently, holding up her palms with assumed artlessness. "Nor can I be blamed, incidentally, if the construction of said road happens to delay two of my homecoming legions and officers in their progress back to Fuuka, thus unintentionally adding to the retardation of their discharge and my triumph. I cannot do anything if their task slows them so much that they are closer to these territories than if they had been marching as normal, making them easily transportable back here should unexpected incidents arise. Say, for instance, if I should-by some strange twist of fate!-be returned to my command without warning."

Natsuki shouted with laughter.

"Shizuru, no!" she cried, head shaking furiously. "Really? That?"

A winning smile. "Yes."

"You are funny!"

Shizuru laughed too, not having expected that remark.

"Why, thank you," she said. "I confess I thought you would say something more along the lines of me being 'scheming', though."

Natsuki nodded, trying to get her sniggers under control.

"You are. You scheme funny," she answered the older woman with a smirk. "Your friends will laugh."

"So they-and even my foes-should. Otherwise, you would prove more Himean than them," Shizuru said, drawing a questioning look from her. "If there is a trait held true of only the truest Himeans, it is the love of the ridiculous. In which respect you actually seem to do quite well, seeing how you can laugh with me at this."

Natsuki made a face, still too jollied to protest with solemnity.

"It is only for such things, Shizuru," she said, affable. "I only laugh when something is funny."

"As do most people, meum mel," Shizuru replied. "You laugh often enough when you are with me."

"Ah, that." Natsuki inhaled languidly, picking up her cup. "But that is different. Only with you."

She said it candidly, so much was certain, for she did not even notice the way Shizuru's face softened nor the faint warmth that blossomed on the older woman's cheeks out of pleasure. When she peeked out again from her cup, Shizuru's colour had already subsided. She poured more water for herself.

"Your plans, they are interesting," she said, eyes fixed on the clear jet issuing from the jug and into her beaker. "Will they take long, you think? To get you out of-of that?"

"I hope not too long. If everything is properly managed, however, it should not take long at all."

"And then you will not be urban praetor." Suddenly she was serious again, the businesslike attitude going back. "What will you be?"

"Merely just another of the other praetors, or so the aim goes," the older woman replied. All of a sudden she giggled, holding up four fingers to cover her mouth after her levity.

"Oh, it is so queer, you see," she told the girl. "This is perhaps the first-and maybe only!-time an elected urban praetor ever decided to invalidate her own election. It is hardly a position where one can complain, generally speaking."

Natsuki smiled a little at her admission, witchcraft eyes gleaming.

"So if not for this-" She made a vague, all-encompassing gesture with one hand, and Shizuru's attention pricked up when she saw that the girl was hiding something-Curiosity? Expectation?-about her answer. "You would not complain, Shizuru?"

Shizuru breathed deeply.

"I must admit I would not. But given present circumstances, that is purely academic." She waved a hand dismissively at the air.

"Timing, as the adage goes, is everything-and the timing for this happens to be grossly inopportune. Therefore I see no need to go along with it, even if I have been elected to that office already. I can still reach the consulship without becoming praetor urbanus, anyway, so there is no real urgency. It was merely an expectation, Natsuki, and not a necessity."

There, was that all right? She could only hope she had struck the right tone with her answer, even if she did not know what tone that should be. It was hard to tell, she thought, just what the girl was thinking at times like this. Sometimes she had the feeling of Natsuki testing her, weighing some inscrutable idea carefully after a random question, and it really did make her worry. Half of her girl was transparent, yes, and that she could easily understand and even see; but the other half was something she despaired of taming enough to read, and pure opacity.

Natsuki was murmuring thoughtfully.

"To be chosen," she said. "And to not want it."

"Natsuki?"

The emerald eyes met hers equably.

"I see it can be strange," Natsuki said. "How some will think it strange to refuse."

Shizuru's breath hitched.

"But your choice," the girl went on. "I see."

It took most of her control not to scowl at the words, for Natsuki had said them so nonchalantly she might not even have meant anything underneath, nothing of the sort of message Shizuru felt she was receiving. It was more like her-Shizuru herself-after all, to speak words with such skirting implication.

But then again, it would be a fool who would underestimate Natsuki and what Natsuki was capable of learning. Had she herself not been learning that recently?

"Essentially, yes, or I am trying to make it so," she said, just as casually as the girl had spoken. A finger came up, flicked away some hair over her brow. "Just because I have been chosen does not mean I must immediately submit to the choices of the many. My choice matters too. Is it not the same for you?"

That was acknowledging the shaft with a vengeance, though she cast it back without the intent to harm; there was still uncertainty over whether Natsuki had really intended there to be a sting earlier. Having established her own capacity to do the same, she now permitted herself to catch only the shortest glimpse of panic in the girl's eyes before going in another direction.

"What if you were elected queen suddenly, for example?" she asked, pretending she had been heading this way all along. "Would that not trouble you, as you once said to me? I know you believe it shall not happen, for one reason or another, but what if it actually did? Look at this odd mischance that has happened to me-never had I expected it, either."

She was speaking now of something that had alarmed her when she first learned it: the fact that Shizuru's Otomeian lover was actually-distantly, it was true, but still-eligible for their nation's chief regency. How it had shocked her when she first got wind of it! It was not even the thought that she had thus far been sleeping with and being attended by a possible future queen that stunned, but the idea of Natsuki becoming a ruler and thus forbidden from ever coming to Hime. The sacred pomerium of that great city did not only forbid generals with imperium from crossing it, but did so all kings and queens as well, no matter their power or diplomacy. No foreign ruler had ever crossed the city's boundary and no foreign ruler would ever be permitted to do it. The most he could do was to send ambassadors, princes or barons, but never could he step inside himself.

Natsuki had laughed at her concerns then, though not out of any spiteful desire to drive home that she would never agree to come to Hime anyway. Rather, the girl had explained, she could never be elected to the Otomeian throne-for the Otomeians, curiously enough, actually elected their rulers from among the eligible: all those high enough in the royal family so as to more or less keep the blood consistent. She insisted on it again now, as tickled by the notion as Shizuru was alarmed.

"It will not happen," Natsuki laughed to her face. "I tell you again. It will not happen, there is no chance."

"I remember what you said to me," Shizuru replied. "You said it is because you are too far from the actual bloodline and they would prefer someone more closely related to the ruling family?"

"And I am not even Otomeian, really!" Natsuki actually giggled, seeming to find the discussion extremely droll. "Everyone knows it. Also..."

"Also?"

Natsuki flapped a hand good-naturedly.

"Oh, many things also," she said, face glowing in the morning sunlight coming from their window. "I am too young, not like the king's sons and daughters. They are all very much older than me."

"Yes. So I see. Where are his offspring again?" Shizuru thought of it. "Installed in the other citadels, reigning over the other Otomeian territories, I believe?"

"Mm. In the lower cities, the plains and valleys. A little far from where His Majesty is."

"I see. So they would be preferred, not least because I suppose they already have experience in ruling their own districts."

Natsuki nodded.

"They are proven, ah, proven fruitful, too," she added. "They have children and are paired. And me? Not even married."

Shizuru was surprised.

"That is a consideration as well?" she asked, pulse pounding.

"Yes," Natsuki told her. "They like for the ruler to be married. Settled,

I think they call it. It is good because it will mean, uh, I think they say it means stability. They also like them to have children, but it is not as important. They can adopt."

But the older woman had a question, which she could not help but put to Natsuki immediately.

"You are in no danger of being married?" she asked somewhat harshly. "The king would not arrange for you to be married, Natsuki?"

This time, it was Natsuki who was surprised.

"He will not," she said sharply, looking shocked. "Not for him to say. He will not make me marry."

"Are you sure? He is your king, as well as the closest thing you have to a guardian. What if he orders it? Must you not follow?"

Natsuki hesitated only a second, but for that second Shizuru's heart stopped beating.

"He will not do that," she insisted nonetheless. "He will not. Shizuru."

But Shizuru asked again, belly still turning over.

"Are you sure?" she asked. "Are you really sure, Natsuki? Because it would not be the first time, you know. Even in our nation we have guardians arranging marriages for their children purely on the basis of profit, political or otherwise."

"Yes," Natsuki told her. "Sure."

"Not as a tool of diplomacy, to cement an alliance?"

"He will not. I am not so good a, um, a guarantee. Not even a child of His Majesty."

"But if he did do it, if it so happened? Would you? Just... if he did." Shizuru had to pause and swallow: her mouth felt drier than an Egyptian desert. "Would you be bound to obey, Natsuki, if he ordered it?"

Natsuki stared back into the older woman's eyes, which bored into hers.

"But Shizuru," she started uncertainly. "I am not-"

"His daughter, I know." Shizuru nodded to show she understood that point already. "But you still have the blood sufficient. So, if it happened, would you?"

"Shizuru, he will not do-"

"Would you do it if the king ordered you?"

"But he will not-"

"Good gods, Child, answer the question!"

The girl bit her lip at the curtness of the order, teeth drawing a red fleck.

"I would not do it," she muttered, adding later with a flashing look of rebellion: "And he will not do that!"

But Shizuru had other concerns more pressing than Natsuki's paltry attempt at revolt. She was too busy thinking of the possibilities. Would the Otomeian King really not do it? If he wants to keep his hide, she thought, he had better not. Time, she saw, to send another missive to the king, perhaps with someone she trusted to convince him should it prove necessary: Do not marry off Natsuki, do not engage her to any other, under any circumstances, else you shall have to deal with Hime's wrath through me.

Although that would have to be worded more diplomatically, when she was calmer and more politic.

She sighed, pushing away her plate and looking up at Natsuki. The latter refused to meet her eyes, and she immediately felt sorry.

"Oh," she breathed, fingers curling into her palms. "Natsuki, I am sorry."

The green eyes flickered up, looking away just as swiftly. She tried again, knowing that was a sign the girl was not actually that vexed.

"Truly, Natsuki, I am sorry," she said, slanting her head to one side and trying to catch the young woman's eye. "Please look at me? I did not intend to be so terse."

The sullen face lifted and turned her way reluctantly. But still the green eyes would not look at her, and still Natsuki said nothing.

"Please, Natsuki?" Shizuru asked soothingly. "I did not mean it, I promise."

The pink lips twisted, and she saw it.

"Please, Natsuki?" she cooed. "Look at me?"

And Natsuki, feathery dark brows still aslant, did.

Shizuru smiled at her. "Thank you."

But the younger woman did not respond, save for a narrowing of the eyes that caught Shizuru off-guard. The Otomeian wanted more and was silently demanding it, so much was clear.

Daring girl, Shizuru thought, challenged by the head-on glare as she began to explain.

"I know that I must have seemed hard-headed, refusing to listen to what you were saying," she told the younger woman, trying not to be thrown off by the cool expression in those emerald eyes. "I must have. But, I am sorry. It was... I was just..."

She exhaled a protracted sigh.

"I would not like you to be forced into being married," she confessed. "It was just that I could not stand the idea of it, so very badly."

Gradually and with effort, as though the girl were trying to prevent it from coming, a smile built on Natsuki's lips. Her cheeks, too, were bathed with sudden warmth, and Shizuru took the change with the helpless silence of a woman too smitten to do anything other than stare.

"What a silly you are, Shizuru," the young woman rebuked her, still having that pleased little smile. Shizuru, ogling her frankly, imagined she saw a spark of victory in that expression, and was engrossed in it. "I think now... yes... too much worry in you. Tsk."

Shizuru smiled back slowly.

"'Tsk' indeed. Though you may be right," she answered. "But I cannot help it."

"Hmm." Natsuki squinted. "But, there is not any worry. The king will not marry me to somebody. I will not be queen. It is just said I can be, because I am a last-a last-scion, I think, is the word? It's just a, uhm-oh, what is it?"

"What is the word? Do you mean-"

"No, Shizuru, wait. Please. I will think of it."

Shizuru waited obediently.

"Ah! A formality." She beamed at having found the term. "A formality."

"It is a formality? To deem you worthy of entry into the register of eligibles?"

"Yes. Only that. You see? There is no worry. No worry for anything, Shizuru. See?"

The older woman took a moment's pause, looking into two shining eyes that willed her to believe.

"Then I am glad," she said at length. "I see."

After that, two red eyes swept the Otomeian up and down calculatingly.

"You know," Shizuru remarked. "I do believe I am glad too that you do not fear me."

There was only an instant of astonishment before Natsuki's eyebrows shot upwards, a surprised grin on her lips.

"No, Shizuru?" she asked provocatively. "I do not fear you?"

Shizuru smirked. "Not enough to withhold your rebuke, at any rate, when I do something that deserves it."

Natsuki pinked with enjoyment; she liked to be thought brave, Shizuru had noticed even before, and that was both a facet of her nature as well as the culture informing it.

"And others?" the Otomeian asked with some provocation again, speaking more as the young lover now than as the subordinate. "They do, Shizuru?"

"Oh, assuredly they do."

"They think you are so scary?"

The red eyes were now twinkling. "Most definitely. I am so very scary."

To her wonder, Natsuki suddenly shuffled to her side and began to nuzzle, chortling while digging her face into Shizuru's fair hair. Shizuru giggled too, ticklish where the tip of the Otomeian's nose brushed her scalp.

"Ah, so very scary," the other growled. "This is the silly Shizuru who is scary?"

"Cheeky!" Shizuru laughed, trying to grab the other woman but failing when Natsuki slid away. "What a rascal you can be, Natsuki. So you really do not want to be your people's Rascal Queen?"

Up tilted Natsuki's head, proud and pretty and surprisingly coquettish.

"I stay only a Rascal Captain," she declared.

"Excellent," Shizuru chuckled. "If you do not become queen, it will be proof I am lucky."

Natsuki shot her a comical look of puzzlement, mouth going open in mute query. She herself merely laughed again.

"Since you can be my pet then," she said. "My sweet little cub. And I shall not risk troubling any nation by calling their oh-so-majestic queen my precious little cub."

The Otomeian snorted disdainfully.

"There is already Shizuki," she noted. "There is the cub."

"Ah, but she is no longer such a cub and she was always more yours than mine, to begin with," Shizuru answered. "But speaking of Shizuki, come, let us fetch her. I want to see her this morning." She had another reason for that, but she did not yet tell it. "Are you finished?"

Natsuki replied positively.

"Let us wash our hands," Shizuru told her, rising from the table. "And then I have something to tell you."

After both had cleansed their hands and stood drying their hands on a towel depending from a wall peg, Shizuru turned to the girl and squeezed her arms.

"You remember what I have to do first today?" she asked, at which the Otomeian gave a nod. She was talking about her meeting with her replacement, who had requested an interview with her the night before, upon his arrival, and had set it for this morning. It had actually been an invitation for breakfast, but Shizuru had chosen to spurn that and reply that she would prefer it to be afterwards-not mentioning that she was afraid it would ruin her appetite to have to share the first meal of the day with him.

Besides which, she also explained to her amused lover, she would much rather start her day with an intelligent beauty than an arrant nincompoop. How Natsuki had laughed!

Now she smoothed her hands over the cloth of the Otomeian's dress, behind the raised wings of the pointed scapulae. When she reached the small of her back, Natsuki moved closer again, and she permitted it.

"I am going to see him for a private interview now," she said, when they were in an embrace. "It is customary, as I told you."

She felt the other woman nuzzle her neck. She continued.

"We shall speak to each other alone..."

She paused before delivering the blow.

"And you shall not be there."

A low huff brought Natsuki's surprise, made even clearer when two hands grabbed the soft cloth of her dress.

"Please do not protest," she said, holding the alarmed body tighter. "It is better if you stay here, if you do not come with me."

Natsuki all but gasped.

"Stay?" she said, obviously struggling with the idea. "Here? Not... come?"

"Yes." Shizuru pulled away enough so that she could look at her. "I want you to stay here."

"Buh-but who will-with you?"

"I shall go alone. The two of us shall be alone."

"Alone? You... two?"

"Yes."

"Only you?"

"Yes."

The green eyes shot to their widest circumference.

" No !" she cried, to Shizuru's astonishment.

She tried to wrench away.

"Natsuki, wait." The older woman held on and tried to stay her, wondering what to make of this unexpected fury. "Wait-please."

But Natsuki continued to writhe in her grasp, pulling again and again on her dress. How slender she was, Shizuru thought distantly, able to feel every sharp and shifting bone. How easy to enfold her this way, even if she put up such resistance, the sweet savage girl. Though, if Shizuru did not get her calm soon, she suspected she might come out of this unforeseen situation a touch bruised, the way Natsuki was struggling.

She spoke, her voice firm.

"Natsuki, be still." She took the other's wrists and pulled them away from her chest, so that she might step back to look the other woman in the eye. "Hear me first, for I do have reasons for this."

Surprisingly, Natsuki replied to that.

"Don't like him!" Natsuki said excitedly, the anger whittling lines on her brow. "Reasons why? You two alone? Shizuru. Shizuru."

Shizuru could not suppress a faint smile at the way the young woman whined her name.

"As well you should not like him-he is from the enemy," she answered, hushing the girl again quickly when she saw Natsuki open her mouth for another protest. Oh, but it was some comfort at least that Natsuki really did not like him! "Here, do sit. Please listen to me first."

She herded her back to the chairs, to the table with the remains of their breakfast. When the Otomeian had begun to at least attempt a semblance of tolerance-glowing still, admittedly-she proceeded through her explanation.

She began with a question.

"First, why do you not want me to see him without you present?"

The younger woman sulked further, bowing her head until a curtain of raven hair veiled her away. Shizuru moved it aside, however, and tucked it behind an ear.

"Natsuki."

She watched the sensitive lips tremble as they parted.

"Not just without me," Natsuki said suddenly. "You said... you two alone. Without anyone else, I think."

"Yes. Well then, why do you not want me to see him without you or anyone else present?"

Natsuki's glance was plaintive.

"You know." It was hissed angrily. "Why ask?"

"Because, even if I did have suspicions, I would prefer to be certain. Hearing it from your lips is still more ironclad than assuming something."

Shizuru smiled patiently as she said this, thinking that this was perhaps the closest she had come to seeing the Otomeian throw a full-blown tantrum. Natsuki had come several times near it before, but never this far, or not yet before her. As she suspected, there still was a youngster's hot temper under those layers of coolness. Of any other she would have criticised this as a sigh of immaturity, but as it was Natsuki, she did not even think to perceive it as a fault. She saw it immediately as merely another thing to adore, to shelter. Thus she was able to speak tenderly to her, and with great sincerity.

"I would like to hear you say it. After all, even if I know you better by now, I would still not dare to put words into your mouth, for I cannot claim to know what you are thinking. If you would bear with me, please answer my question as best as you can. I would be very glad to know, really."

Something in her plea finally seemed to get through, and Natsuki answered grumpily.

"For last time," the girl mumbled, refusing to meet her eyes. "You remember? Wuh-when you fought."

"Here?"

"Mm!"

"I see. For clarification, though, we did not actually fight. We merely quarrelled with words."

That earned her a wide-eyed glare.

"Words?" the girl asked her, sounding exasperated. "He pulled the sword!"

Shizuru nodded a few times, conceding that fact.

"Yes he did," she answered smoothly. "Yes. But that was all: a naked blade to wave around. Trust me, Darling, when I say that blade was still an empty threat. Setting aside the matter for now of my own ability, do you actually think he would have done it? Do you actually think he would have been so foolish as to hit me? In all seriousness?"

Two eyes stared back at her, looking perilously close to tears out of the frustration the other woman could not express properly. She actually heard the Otomeian's teeth grinding, saw the rage-flush suffuse the neck she so often kissed.

Oh, my-that is a temper, isn't it?

The temper exploded.

"You tell me, Shizuru!" Natsuki burst out, shaking with both anger and a sense of her own daring, to speak like this to the older woman. "Is he so foolish to do that, you ask me? Tchah! Is he foolish enough? You always call him 'fool'! There!"

Shizuru opened her mouth to protest, but had to swallow that original intention in favour of choking down a laugh. Really, this girl!

"Very well, so I do call him that," she agreed, holding up both hands in surrender to that point. "Still, that is not what I meant. You see, what I was trying to tell you, Natsuki, is that if you are afraid of him hurting me that blatantly, you need not be. The reason for this assurance is written in our society."

The tempestuous eyes narrowed.

"In... society?" Natsuki echoed haltingly, temper subsiding as she was faced with something she could not easily parry. Her eyes showed some resentment for this unexpected counter, but her tone indicated she was still willing to listen. "Your society?"

"Yes."

"Um..."

She frowned again and it was clear she was discomfited by this turn their argument had taken.

"What is..." She paused. "How? Written?"

"It is written." Shizuru nodded. "In how we are. In who he is. In what I am."

She rose from her seat and knelt before the younger woman, ignoring the unkindness of the cold floor to her knees. She thought it would help calm the Otomeian if she took a slightly lower position, so as to avoid intimidating her further with this onslaught of alien sense, something easily understood by a Himean but generally unfathomable to any other. Shizuru could only hope Natsuki would be an exception in that respect.

"I am a Himean, Natsuki, and so is he," she began, taking Natsuki's twisting hands and calming them with hers atop the girl's lap. She brushed her lips across the knuckles. "I may detest him, yes, but this cannot change the fact that he is a Himean of much the same Class and much the same rank as me. We are both Himeans."

She could see her girl wrestle terribly with the words, it prompted her to open the Otomeian's hands gently with her fingers, trying to calm their tension.

"There is more," she continued. "We are Himeans above other Himeans, products of the most ancient and noble families: patrician on my side, and plebeian on his, but both still belonging to the highest ranks of our nation. Both of us have the predecessors for it, and that is what is most important here. It is because of our heritage that either of us may take part in Hime's affairs like this, that we even have the right to any authority. It is only because of this that we are so important, that we are permitted to take our ancestors' places as the pillars upholding our nation and world, and thus become inviolate lest the whole come down crashing. Yes... think of us as pillars, Darling. Pillars on opposite colonnades but supporting one structure."

She drew the imaginary row of columns on Natsuki's palm with a finger, dotting two places where she imagined she and her foe would be.

"You see?" she asked. "We face each other, we are on different-opposite or opposing-sides, but we are still upholding only one roof, one building." She gazed softly into the emerald eyes and saw some uncertainty. "Do you begin to see this, at least? Can you conjure the image?"

The girl looked down at their linked hands, and nodded somewhat miserably. Shizuru drew her face closer for a kiss. It was Natsuki who actually ended the gesture earlier, tipping her head solemnly.

"Cuh-continue," she pronounced with tattered hauteur, looking suddenly like a forlorn little princess trying to grab at some foreign understanding that kept resisting. Shizuru gave her another kiss, feeling guilty for what she was doing. The avenue she had taken, after all, was the only one where Natsuki could not hope to counter.

"What I meant to demonstrate is this," she said afterwards. "In the sense of which I am talking, that man and I are actually still bound by a... something of a camaraderie, symbolised by the roof of that building, which covers all of us and our other fellow 'pillars'. The same roof, the roof we both uphold, is the one that also shields both of us. We are enemies, no doubt, as are many of the Traditionalists and I enemies, but we are still sheltered by that same roof. Do you see how this could be?"

A slow nod, the eyes unblinking.

"When I say we are sheltered by that roof, I must return to what I said earlier," she went on. "It is primarily by virtue of our ancestry, our heritage, that we are even pillars at all. As often as I have deplored this facet of our culture in the past-for the simple reason that so many incompetent simpletons with the blood but not the capability have been given so many demanding and delicate offices because of it-I cannot get away from the fact that I myself gained what I have partly due to my ancestry. My status, my blood, my heritage gives me the right to everything I demand and everything I could hope to gain... more than through pure skill. It gives me the right to be above and over those who may have the skill, but not the ancestry."

She paused and looked at the girl searchingly. After a few moments of this, Natsuki murmured.

"Mm," she answered simply. "And him?"

"He is also one of those with the ancestry. Not ancestry like mine, but significant nonetheless." She smirked. "He is allied to the Traditionalists. He would have to have the ancestry."

Natsuki slanted her head curiously. Shizuru would have explained had she not suddenly opened her mouth and released a soft, foreign exclamation.

"Yes," the girl said, looking at her with a little more animation. "I see why. The Traditionalists. Tradition. Dynasty is a tradition. The pillars, they stand for the dynasties?"

Shizuru grinned, almost unbearably proud of her.

"Exactly," she said. "Now, this is related to our discussion. Precisely because he is of the conservative sensibility, because he believes in tradition... and precisely because the greatest tradition in our culture is that of those who rule, who must always have the ancestry... he could never actually hope to lay a hand on me. Nay, not a finger, even."

That was exaggerating it, of course, but she saw it necessary if she would persuade Natsuki.

"Even my staunchest foe among the pack, Haruka Armitage, would never actually seek to do anything such as order a sword put to my throat-unless I did something utterly mad like seeking to overthrow the Republic, naturally, but that I would not do. My foes would even seek, in fact, to protect me against many things. Me more than most, and them more than most others, because of their principles."

The Otomeian's brow asked the question.

"Because there would be a message in it," Shizuru explained. "Let us say-purely as an imaginary situation-that something were to happen to me, or that some assassin did happen to murder me. No, please, it is purely imaginary."

She kissed the girl's lips over and over, firmly, to silence the protests.

"I shall explain why it cannot happen, Natsuki, if you shall bear with me."

Natsuki demanded her to explain.

"If that happened, think about what the message in it would be," Shizuru told her. "If I-descended from kings and queens, Hime's oldest nobility, even from Venus and Mars themselves!-if I were to be slain by some petty assassin, then what could that mean for the rest of them? If not even a descendant of Hime's most august founders is inviolate, how much less would they be? If everything they seek to protect, everything they stand for is tradition-and think of their faction's name here, My Darling-then how could they possibly risk eroding the greatest tradition of Hime by harming me?"

At Natsuki's expression, she went a little further.

"This is the same reason the House does not expel those senators who are heavily in debt, even though there is an actual law stating that a senator should be expelled for such a thing. How many senators have actually refrained from taking measures to have their arch-enemies expelled for that, over the centuries? You see, meum mel, the senatorial ranks or upper classes must have a million grudges amongst the lot of them, myself included... yet they still protect each other."

The Otomeian was deep in thought, exerting all her effort to digest everything Shizuru was saying. She still had qualms about it, however.

"But you fight?" she asked. "Sometimes you fight. You try to defeat each other. You try to harm . To defeat is to harm . What is it then? How does-what happens then?"

Shizuru smiled wryly.

"Oh, we harm each other, certainly," she said. "But we harm each other in ways different from the lower castes, for we are of a world beyond theirs, with different rules and different players. We do not harm each other blatantly, unless forced to do so by a situation. Say, in battle, in a civil war. Otherwise, we do not resort to things like an assassin's treachery."

She held the large emerald eyes with hers as she went on, to impress upon the girl her meaning.

"Treachery, for us, is at the end of a passed bill, or an ally's betrayal, or a fateful speech. It is not at the point of an assassin's knife. If Hime breeds assassins, it is manifestly for use against those of low birth, the common, and... and the foreign. If Hime has ever had assassins, these assassins have never been used against a noble plebeian or patrician. Spies, perhaps, have been used by those of my rank against each other. But never assassins."

A stretch, but those few occasions had been gross exceptions, anyway, and universally deplored.

"We are pillars, not to be slain by a poisonous snake in hiding. We are brought down in other ways, ways beyond those of simple violence, and only after a persistent and long-standing hammering."

Thus did she explain to Natsuki why her person was even to her foes an inviolate thing, inviting the girl to imagine it as one of the largest pillars of their society and one of the most resilient. Thus did she soothe her lover enough into accepting quietly her decision to see her replacement unattended. At the end of their talk, she noted how Natsuki not only became subdued, but also extremely meditative, like a person having been given much on which to think. Perhaps it was so: she had given the girl a great deal of information that could not so easily be placed into a simple exposition or one of those scholarly texts the girl was so fond of perusing. It had been an attempt to break down their culture she had spoken, and if Natsuki's discerning questions afterwards were to be any indication, she had spoken well. It took some time, but she did not mind sparing it. What mattered it to her that her foe was waiting? It was Natsuki who mattered, always Natsuki.

When the girl finally agreed, she sighed with relief that the Otomeian seemed to understand her reasoning. What she could not understand was why the same girl, while calmed immensely by that reasoning, seemed nonetheless to grow the more sombre after it. Still, it was perhaps only to be expected, given the onslaught of foreignness Natsuki had just been forced to digest. So she did not belabour her with more when they finally concluded, and left to fetch Natsuki's pet to keep the girl company.

Later, when they had fetched the panther and had gone to the place where Shizuru and her replacement would meet, the girl demonstrated her understanding by addressing the older woman very calmly.

"I will wait," she said, perching on a bench in the atrium that adjoined the corridor Shizuru would be taking. She was still rather quiet and composed, and even quite solemn. But when Shizuru peered at her with concern she smiled kindly.

"I will wait here, for you," she continued, a hand stroking the head of the black feline beside her. "You will know I am here and Shizuki too, Shizuru. We will not go away until you come."

Shizuru looked at the pair with gentle eyes.

"I shall come," she replied. "And I shall do my best to finish as soon as possible, because I shall know you are here, waiting for me."

Natsuki nodded.

"Do not worry."

Again Natsuki nodded.

"I will try not to miss you... if I can," Shizuru said, head already beginning its descent. When they kissed then, she took even more care than usual in running her tongue over the other's smooth lip, in fondling the soft blade of her tongue. She did that because she thought it was only appropriate: to map so seriously the girl's mouth that she still felt its texture later, when she would speak to the man who still wanted that girl.

Chapter 44

Vocabulaire:

1. Animus (L.) - The mind or the spirit half of a person, as opposed to the body.
2. Carbunculus (L.) - Ruby.
3. Corona aurea (L.) - One of the minor crowns, awarded to a man who slew an enemy in single combat and held his ground until the battle's conclusion.
4. Domine/domina (L.) - Master/mistress
5. " Ercle!" (L.) - "By Hercules!" A Latin expression.
6. " Gerrae!" (L.) - "Rubbish!" or "Nonsense!"
7. Hay on that horn - A Roman expression. It was the ancient practice to wrap hay around the horns of oxen that gored.
- 8 . Ineptus/Ineptes - See note below for "Quin taces, ineptus!"
- 9 . Literatus (L.) - Singular of "literati"; a person of letters.
10. Ludi Megalenses (L.) - Games (in Latin, ludi ) held around the end of March or the beginning of April, in honour of the Great Mother goddess, Cybele.
11. " Quin taces, ineptus!" - (L.) "Shut up, fool!" or "Shut up, incompetent!"
12. Tubilustrium (L.) - Held on the 23rd of March (or Martius, obviously the month of Mars), when the war trumpets were cleaned to bring success in coming campaigns.

When Takeda Masashi accepted the role of supplanting Shizuru Fujino in the Northern command, he did it without reservation. He did not dwell on the disadvantages that appointment would hold or the lack of career opportunities it could deliver. He was, as the woman he would replace had predicted, neither imaginative nor audacious enough to contemplate ideas of marching upon the Mentulae, in order to sprinkle zest on an otherwise flat dish. He did not pause to think either, beyond instructing his steward to pack warmly, on the chilly climate he already knew disagreed with him; spring and milder conditions were coming, anyway, and that was apt even past preferences of weather.

Spring, after all, was the season of gentler things-and he would be bringing to the Northern mission what he fancied was a gentler touch. It was also the season of optimism, and he tried to be a follower of that school. A believer in the positive view, was Takeda Masasi. Hence, from the moment his co-conspirator Tomoe suggested to him the idea of taking over her cousin's command, he had bent most his feelings on the appointment to only the sweet relish of vindication.

About five months past, he had had an altercation with Shizuru Fujino. About five months past, he had left that altercation smarting, a little in body (witness the scar on his cheek) and a lot in dignity. It had been a long five months to Takeda, who had not been able to forget even when he returned to Hime. How could he, when the enemy he had thought to leave had followed him? She was at work, in the Forum, where the chatter always seemed to have her in it, whether as hero or villain of the moment. She was in his walks, when he passed the markets near his street and saw the stalls selling little plaster busts of her that girls-who obviously knew no better-bought by the dozen. She was even in his home, in his dreams, repeating her insults to him. What could be more evil than such a persistent intruder? He had put stretches of land and an entire sea between them, but she would not remove her claws from him.

And he could not turn to a friend for solace. The source of it all was not a story to tell others without diminishing the Self-and he thought he had suffered enough of that from her, without him adding to it. The sorrow was a lonely thing he kept hidden, his only company during those rare moments of rupture being a wine flagon and the empty breeze of the evening. He would send his steward away along with all the other slaves, ensconce himself in his study, and pour out his pains to a tooled silver chalice. Begin the fermenting cycle: pressed from his heart and through his muttering lips, into the wine and the cup where it swished, back through his mouth and into the gut-where it roiled so angrily he boiled off all flavour. All that was left would be vinegar. Sometimes, during the third or fourth repetition, his eyes would start stinging, and that was yet another thing to keep to himself, because he was of the old school that thought it unmanly to cry save in moments where duty required it. Ah, but he argued that this could not be considered unmanly! It was his dignity being hurt, the most precious part of his being. Impossible to stop the tears when the humiliation just squeezed it out of him.

He often thought of their quarrel, and always came to the same conclusion: that it was Fujino's fault, absolutely! She was the one who had reacted outrageously to what had been no more than an honest mistake on his part; she was the one who had goaded him undeservedly to the point of sword-draw. He had regretted that, though. He cursed himself nearly as much as he did her when he thought of his thoughtlessness in that action, loving even more the dark-haired Otomeian who had stopped him from doing anything more. He had never planned to do anything more, of course, save to put the blade back in its sheath... but Edepol ! That would have been dead embarrassing. Fujino would surely have added to her ridicule of him had he been forced to put it away by himself, as he had fully intended. Never should have drawn it, looked more of a fool. Yes, he could freely admit that: pulling it out had been quite stupid of him.

It was a good part of why he could not tell anyone what had passed between them. He could only hope his foe would not tell anyone either-she had not yet done so, it seemed-because it would tarnish both his career and his reputation irreparably. Past the fact that a sportsman did not draw on an unarmed person, there was also the more important prohibition: no matter the provocation, no matter the circumstances, one simply did not- could not -think of cutting down a patrician Fujino. It was nearly on a par with thoughts of assassinating holy Jupiter. Sheer anathema, pure impracticability. He knew it. He had always known it.

So why, with that awareness, had he even drawn the sword? What was it that had blinded him enough to do that much, even if it had not blinded him enough to go further? It had to be something in the woman herself. For he could not believe that it was his entirely his fault, and blamed the act rather on the woman who had provoked it. A woman who had been more angrily amused than afraid, knowing her immunity as well as he did. To think of the disdain her eyes had spoken as she looked at him, the contemptuous laughter in those abnormal red rings...

Pathetic, they said, when taunting him on the nights spent with the wine flagon. Ghost-blade for a ghost-threat. Oh, you poor, posturing weakling.

Ah, there were his eyes again. Tears of rancour and recoil. Wound to his animus. Something that did not heal, only kept deteriorating. All the more as the root of their animosity was with her, not with him. And carrying out an affair so famous it reached even Hime, where people asked him to verify it incessantly, not knowing the resentment he carried.

So Fujino does indulge in human urges after all? they would ask, atwitter and giggling. Was she really carrying on with a foreigner, Takeda-san? Tell us if you know anything!

He would curse his luck then, and his own approachability. Why, by all the gods, did they have to ask him, out of everyone come from that benighted area? Why was it he who had to shrug, say he did not know? When the truth was that he knew, he knew the truth and he hated it!

He knew it was true because he had seen the pair before leaving Argus. He had seen the intimacy of Fujino's hand on the Otomeian, and their heads bent together, like lovers whispering. These added to the memories keeping him bitter throughout the friendless evenings. But all the bitterness was reserved for his fellow Himean; the Otomeian he counted free of blame. For him the girl was a victim, an impressionable and innocent thing the Otomeians had sacrificed to a snake. What else could she have done but submit to that snake's authority, its lecherous avarice? How could one put any of the blame on that green-eyed creature whose face one only had to see to understand purity? Such was the depth of his amour! For, from the moment he had seen that young woman, he had been rolled up and known himself killed: he had described perfection in emerald eyes and black hair, and saw everything else grossly wanting. The optimist in him was also a romantic; he had always hoped to be struck dumb by a single look. At long last, it was that Otomeian who had finally struck him.

So when he attempted to buy her from the other Himean, he had done it in a fever of desire and longing. It had been a straightforward approach, and in love, as with the sword, he preferred straightforward approaches. But the fever had proven to have a touch of delirium, for he had committed a slight blunder and, to his chagrin, had unintentionally insulted her. Yet his intentions, his wanting, had been sincere. He had wanted her flesh-what man would not, he asked himself-but he had also wanted more. He had wanted to hear her voice speaking to him and telling him the soft things women said so mysteriously. He had wanted to see her face changing, coming alive because of things that he did. He had wanted to learn everything there was to learn, couched in depths of enigmatic green. Oh, her shut-up, bafflingly inward-looking feel! He wanted all of it opened and made known to him.

But Fujino had stepped in.

It always came back to the woman, didn't it? Why did she have to get everything? No-not get: rather, she took it. What right had she to do that? Not a patrician right, for the age of patricians was over. Their star was on the wane. But some of them, like her, still remained: privileged anachronisms reared on a diet of entitlement and snobbery. People who went their way without regard for what they considered lesser beings. His Traditionalist friends were right in saying such people had to be stopped, else they start to think they could return to being queens and kings. They needed to learn that, in these times, even their privileges had a limit. That they could only take so much; that from them things could also be taken.

Enter him.

This is where I come in, he thought with satisfaction, inhaling luxuriously the sea-salt smell of Argus without disliking it, for once. What mattered it that this place was so cold, so wet and so chilling? He was here on a mission, as personal as it was public. He was here to defend both his pride and the ideals of the Republic by driving home a lesson to Shizuru Fujino, whose command he was taking.

Ironically thanks to her cousin, he mused, thinking of his enemy's relative, who was his friend. Tomoe was the one who had started all of this with a request, and had been the one as well to suggest that he take over for Fujino at the end of their scheme. How glad he had been to comply with that plan! It was a pleasure to do a friend a favour and get something for oneself too, in the doing. Tomoe would have her cousin back, he would have the satisfaction of knowing he had supplanted Fujino in at least one respect... and perhaps another, very soon.

He had every intention of, before long, going a-courting.

"Life is good," he said aloud, happy that the words on his lips were unsoured. "Ahhh."

His steward, whom he had brought with him this time, looked attentive.

"More wine, domine?"

"Yes, Aristion."

The bubbling sound of a first-rate vintage being poured, Takeda's lips smiling as he reflected that he could actually enjoy wine again without needing to see it as an attendant in misery. He took the refilled goblet and Aristion stepped back.

Here's to my triumph, he told himself, while putting the cool rim to his lips. Here's to my victory march. Fujino may be getting hers when she goes back to the city, but it's a triumph will fall short of what she wants. Because I'll be here, and that beauty will be here, and Fujino'll always, always know she's lost those things to me. After all, he was the one chosen worthy enough to take over for her. He was the one who would conclude something she had not been able to finish.

His was the true triumph. His was the true victory.

Although...

He pulled away cup from his mouth, which was again turning down. There was that one little thing, was there not? That thing that slightly dampened his win, for all that he could not place it. Because he was not even sure what that thing was, beyond a ghostly niggling. If he had to describe it, he would say it was a small itch or feeling of unease, a peculiar restlessness that sometimes made him feel that a black shadow was riding him. But every time he turned around to find it or what cast it, there was nothing.

A queer thing.

It was not that this unseen shadow caused him much grief. How could it, with the near-completeness of his victory? Yet there was the very thing of it that made him fret: whatever that unexplainable unease was, whatever the unapparent reason, he felt as though something was still lacking. He felt, oddly, that he was still not enjoying everything as much as he should be.

It had been bothering him of late.

Nothing's gone wrong, or hardly anything, anyway, he told himself, trying to dislodge that unknown burr riding him. All's done, I'm here and in command. What's the matter with me? Why was he letting himself be nudged by something he could not see?

He tried to think on it, but it was especially difficult. Like other men of his variety, he was far more at ease with doing than thinking. He had not yet realised the secret of people like his enemy, who knew it was possible to do both things at once, and optimise results with that combination. For him the operational principle was focus as much as straightforwardness: why tax his mind too when it would be simpler and more economical to fix things by hand? It was impossible to do that in this case, though, when he hadn't found what needed fixing yet. Think, Masashi, Think. What was it?

I bet it's Fujino, he decided, falling back on the usual source of trouble these days. It was probably what she had been saying to him in their few meetings, particularly in the first one since his arrival. Oh, that was another encounter with her that gave him scant pleasure to recall! Amazing how the woman managed to spoil every second spent with her. To be sure, it had not been a reunion he had expected to relish, but it had still left a few more bitter spots than he had thought it would. Was it due to her manner, which was still far too superior considering she was actually the one beaten? Or her words, which had been tartly acid, safe as poisoned honey? Might it even have been because she had not brought the one thing he had been looking forward to in that conference, which was her attendant, the Otomeian Natsuki? Such a pretty name, Natsuki. He had been so eager to see the girl again, after so many craving nights, unsatisfied by the occasional slave girl he used for his sexual needs. Fujino had not even brought her and had smirked upon seeing his disappointment. Though, of course, she could hardly hide her away forever. He had been sure to run into the girl later that day, in a less intimate setting. And she was everything he had remembered, he thought, everything...

He sighed, trying not to be diverted by a pair of spell-binding eyes, a face so beautiful it could cause a calamity. He was thinking of what Fujino said in their first meeting. Yes, focus on it.

Well, then. That first meeting. The more he thought on it, the more convinced he was that whatever was nagging at him had been there. Try as he might, he could not completely deny that something in their reunion had thrown him off-balance, even if he had entered it with all the confidence of a man marching in his triumph. Only to discover his joy in that triumph diminished by the vanquished, who acted more like an invader. She just had to set all plans askew, didn't she? So many of her words and so much of her conduct had been unforeseen to him, who found it galling because he had spent the better part of his journey to the North trying to foresee how she would react to each little thing. Not that way. She had not acted entirely as he had expected. It had thrown him off awfully, several times. Even the opening of their interview had been different from his expectations, her first action so unpredicted it had frozen him.

She had held out a hand amiably.

"I washed just now," she said then, seeming amused when he stared at it. "I assure you it is clean."

He took the proffered hand and shook it briefly, too surprised to be irritated. The truth was, he had expected her to be a little less civil from the beginning, especially as she had refused his invitation to breakfast and moved him to a time she claimed more opportune. Throwing her weight around, he had thought when he received the message saying it. Bloody irritating.

Thus, expecting her to attempt to be even more irritating once they finally met, he had not expected her to even deign to hold a hand out to him. Yet she had done it, and had not even tried to turn it into a contest of strength-as he had been half-expecting her to do. But that was where his lack of familiarity with her showed: had he known her just a little better, he would have realised that she was too intelligent to do such a thing.

Once he got over the shock of her graciousness, instinct kicked in. He sized her up as he would one of his sword-fighting opponents. And found himself astonished again, by what he perceived as her immensity. Nothing physical in that, in spite of her literal tallness over him: it was purely a matter of presence. But what a presence it was! She felt gigantic, was gigantic. It had nothing to do, even, with the dreadfulness of her pedigree. Whatever rendered her so massive, it was purely something of the atmosphere.

But I will not be intimidated by you, he vowed silently, summoning the fortitude given only by dislike, of which he had stored up a great deal. Monster though you may be, I will not be intimidated. He reminded himself of the circumstances, of the fact that this was not her triumph, but his. He reminded himself that he was here to take away, and was not the one to be deprived. It worked, but some little voice in his mind continued to wonder, asking him how he had forgotten this. All those times he had imagined her in Hime, had his memory been playing tricks?

During his musings, his enemy had seated herself. She looked curiously at him.

"Masashi-han?" she prompted, smoothly enough. "You do not care to sit?"

He slowly lowered himself to his couch at the question. Not only was her presence distressing him, but so was her serenity. They might have been meeting for the first time, the way she looked at him. How emotionless she could seem! It was like staring down a statue where you had expected to face something a little more feeling.

"I guess we should get right on," he finally said, unable to find the sociability for the usual chatty preface: the circumstances between them did not merit pleasantries.

"I guess we should, at that," was all she said.

"Protocol dictates I should see you first of everyone," he continued neutrally, envying her the calm and self-mastery he was painfully aware he did not possess, or not by nature. "We have to sort out some things."

"Just so."

"I am supposed to give you this, too."

"Then I shall receive it."

She took the scroll, which he explained was the official directive from Senate concerning the details of his assignment. She unrolled it and he got ready.

"Of course I will tell you its contents," he said.

"There is no need to do so."

An instant of silence, which she spent with her eyes on the parchment, and he with his eyes on her.

"What?" he sounded.

She did not even look up.

"I thank you, but I require no assistance," came her voice again, so modulated it was toneless. "I shall read it myself."

What does she mean "read it herself"? He frowned at the proposition, while inwardly a little comforted by it: she was being childish by refusing his help even here, in so small a matter. It showed he was not the only one affected by the heavy air between them. Even with the relief he felt at this proof of her humanity, however, he was reluctant what she suggested. The scroll was not too thin and reading took a while besides, for the separation of letters and words from each other was always gruelling, and the sorting of them into proper sentences with meaning, piecemeal. Therefore, he was only being reasonable when he protested with cool civility.

"It would be simpler to have me say it," he told her, as she continued to scan the parchment. "It's long, and I already know what's inside. I can sum it up for you."

She answered with greater coolness than his.

"How kind of you to offer that service," she said. "Does protocol dictate too to read and restate the contents of a letter intended for another?"

"Uh..." His lips thinned. "No."

"Then I shall decline the offer." A level glance of her bizarre eyes. "Very politely."

Jupiter, he cried to himself, was the woman ever annoying! Well, not his concern if she wanted to act immaturely. Let her take her time then, and look a brat for having refused the assistance.

"Do as you want," he shrugged.

She only tilted her head.

While she continued to peruse the dispatch, he remembered the wine the governor's slaves had poured for them before being sent away. Picking up his chalice, he sipped some of it while settling in for the wait. It was good, being of the very best vintage... but a few more sips made him realise that the company soured it for him. Back went the goblet on the console table between them, which he noted was of beautifully-tooled chryselephantine. Argus is a rich province, its governor fortunate. He had not stayed long enough to sample its delights during his last visit, unfortunately, having been in a rush to get away. Perhaps he should establish his base here, for this stay?

It was with frank surprise that he gaped when his companion announced she was done.

"You've read it?" he said incredulously, gaining an amused smile in response. Was she joking? But she was rolling up the scroll again, putting it away. So was she serious? No, impossible, she could not have just read the whole thing. For one, her lips had not even been moving, as was the case for most people when they sorted out the words while reading. There was also the matter of speed. No matter what they said about her being a genius: nobody read at a glance! She must have received the news in that scroll from another prior, he that was it.

Yet Senate sent only one official copy, and it travelled with me.

Feeling discomfited by this puzzle, he asked how much she had read.

"Should I recite its contents, to check?" she asked.

"I-no." He frowned, not liking the glint in her eye. "No need."

"Lovely. Now, then..."

She seemed to relax in her couch while retaining an odd and off-putting dignity. His hackles rose at it as well as the appraisal in her eyes, which seemed to murmur a blasé evaluation about him. Everything about her, he thought, was just so insufferably arrogant! The impression was verified by her next words.

"You are to warm the seat while I am away, it seems."

Blood crashing to his head. As for the patrician-hateful, blasted, inbred aristocrat!-she merely sat further back in her seat, appearing to admire his fury.

"You-you-how dare you say that to me?" he ground out, conscious of his face going puce with anger but unable to prevent it. Had he been fairer of complexion, he knew he would be bright crimson already. "I'm not your damned seat-warmer or anything of that kind! If you think-"

"I think that you should calm down," she interrupted, aping astonishment. "I must say I did not expect such a reaction at a mere figure of speech, and one so commonly used for these situations, at that."

He glowered, willing her to see that he was not falling for it.

"That mere figure of speech had an implication in it," he snapped in affront. "One I don't think too pleasant!"

"Actually, some might contend it had more than one," she said cheerfully. "But do tell. What was it you found?"

"That I'm just your temporary replacement!" he roared, goaded.

"I see."

She laced her fingers on her lap and smiled, deliberately infuriating. He glowered again, silently.

Until she said something more: "Yes, that would be right."

"What-How dare you say that to me?!" he howled, shuddering with the strength of a five-month-old fury. It bubbled through his limbs and broke, splashing, on a tongue that had rehearsed that other confrontation several hundred times already, always to the end of putting her in defeat. As he would now, he promised, while pulling himself and all his courage up in the Argus governor's luxuriously padded seat.

"You watch it, Fujino!" he barked. "It's you arrogant lot needs to be told something! If you think I'm going to sit here and let you speak your smart-cracking shit-"

He was unable to continue, for her own rage suddenly struck out at him. The heretofore iron calm he had been envying in the woman snapped.

"Quin taces, ineptus !" she snapped, biting off the words with supercilious venom. "Shut up and recollect yourself! Who do you think you are? How dare you talk to me that way-and without due cause for it? Do not even think of trying to continue it, do you hear me?"

He opened his mouth to answer, and she rounded on him in a flash.

"I mean it, Man!" she growled crisply. "Do - not - try it! Do it and I swear you shall find yourself before the army-singing soprano! I swear to the gods you shall live in regret! Do the wise thing, park yourself on that accursed seat, and be quiet!"

Oh, he gasped, shock stripping the moisture from his mouth. What a temper-she should put hay on that horn! Though he hated himself for it, he did exactly what she said, for there was nothing else to do. His tongue had failed him and gone limp, and all the wind knocked from his chest. Not because of her words: or he thought not, because he could not admit to having ever been felled by just that, even to himself. Rather, it was her face that had slapped him into muteness. What an extraordinary change her face had! It went beyond the lips pulled back, the powerful teeth ready to crunch into flesh. It was pure deformation, the warped becoming of a monster he had only ever seen once before. It had shocked him that time too, and now he shuddered at its return, having never had the faculty of conjuring the exact lineaments of a face, recalling the details of shape from memory. Oh, that he would never see this again, this ghastly horror!

The monster put away her fangs again, though not before smiling nastily.

"If you did read such an implication there, then what of it?" she asked him, speaking in a soft voice he had learned could be more ominous than a roar. "I was merely hinting of something that shall happen in the future, in case it should take place before you are able to finish your supposed custody of this undertaking. How can it affect you so adversely if I express a desire to return in the future and possibly relieve you of this duty that-you would do well to remember!-is truly temporary ? Did you expect to quarter here forever, to stay twiddling your thumbs in the North in perpetuity? Do your directives require that? No? Then please put aside the histrionic pomposity for a situation when it actually may be warranted!"

An oppressive silence, during which time they merely tried to murder each other with their glares. She was the one who spoke again, eyes still stabbing daggers.

"We did not part on genial circumstances last we met," the woman told him. "And while I believe us both aware that we are not enamoured of each other due to that, I also believe that it is hardly sufficient cause for our meeting to degenerate to this manner of trivial quarrel. We are here to meet as representatives of our nation. Therefore it behoves us to act in such a way, instead of behaving like common riff-raff having a squabble. Unless you are truly bent on making this harder than it need be."

He coughed brutishly, hoping to dislodge his fear with that dollop of phlegm.

"That's it, is it?" he growled. "So you do find this hard after all."

"Yes," she admitted with startling honesty. He blinked, some of his heat dampened by astonishment. "Because we do not like each other. I do not like you, Masashi-han, any more than you like me."

"Believe me, I know it," he managed to retort.

But she inclined her head to that.

"Good," she said bafflingly. "Feelings are generally more savoury when they are mutual. While we are being so forthcoming, permit me to say one more thing openly."

She did not wait for permission, however.

"I shall remember this," the woman actually said, face contriving again to look almost ugly. Almost. "It may be in the future that you shall think-or hope to think-I shall not remember, but that is a vain hope. Even so, I shall set my personal feelings to the side for this moment, that I may advise you properly in whatever you need ask of me, as the one taking over for a task securing something that is in our nation's interests to hold safe and dear. I am Himean enough to put this first, Himean enough to do this. I now challenge you to prove that you are the same in that respect, at the very least. Can you possibly diminish the hysterics enough to be capable of it?"

He scowled at her query, his spirit raw from the lashing. It cast the salt on him to know, uncomfortably, that she was right in part. They did need to be calm, to interact with each other professionally. It had been silly of him to think he could talk down to her as any commoner, because he had to admit-since they were being so forthcoming- he knew he had no right to that. Hate it as he would, he still understood and knew that she was a woman whose warnings would have to be taken seriously. Whatever attacks he had for her would have to be phrased in a different way, and not in the manner he had just attempted.

"The sooner we finish our business, the sooner we may part," she told him, when he failed to speak. "I imagine that prospect is much welcome?"

He summoned the best sneer in his arsenal, and then felt a bit foolish, because he was not a man who often sneered, so it felt uncomfortable on his lips.

He replaced the expression with a far more natural glower.

"It would be very welcome," he told her, injecting poison into the phrase. His auditor seemed indifferent, however, for she had already returned to her former demeanour: cool, calm, frustratingly controlled. How in the world did she do that, he asked jealously. What mask was it in her hands, that could swing to place in an instant?

"Very well," she agreed, with a relaxed little wave of the hand that strengthened her already formidable air of aristocracy. "Let us get on with it."

Again he sucked in his lips, exerting Herculean effort to find that mastery of the self every true sportsman held. The trouble was, he doubted few sportsmen had ever needed to test their cool before a fire of this calibre. What a trial the woman could be! But there it was: she had challenged him, and he was not a pitiful man who would back away from a challenge.

Of course I'm a true Himean too, Fujino.

And recalling the look on her face an instant ago, the monstrous thing which had peeked out: Maybe more so than you are.

"Fine," he said gruffly, speaking against the knot in his throat which had threatened to asphyxiate him earlier. "You've a point."

She was content to incline her head. Ignoring the again-aristocratic gesture, he braced himself and started the discussion.

"The Senate has assigned me to take over this mission, which will still retain its original first principles," he recited, speaking verbatim from the text he had prepared and painstakingly memorised before the meeting. "But with a change of leadership, which means there will have to be some changes in approach, and-yes?"

He looked at her witheringly, angry for being interrupted. He might forget the rest of his speech!

"If you please, let us save on the rhetoric," she said blithely. "That is for the army when you address them, not for their present and would-be commanders in private discussion. We are here to speak of practicalities on running this operation. Please excuse me when I say any formal speech now would be quite wasted on me, particularly as I am more likely to dissect it as a literatus than a normal audience." She actually looked self-deprecating. "One of my failings-it is a compulsion I have, you understand."

Impossible not to glare at her and at the same time withdraw. She was renowned for her oratory and literary skill, and he just might come out of one of her analyses battered. He had no expectations that she would spare him that, especially as she had just said it herself. Yet he was reluctant to leave out the speech he had already prepared, for he had devoted so much time and effort to its making, not being a man who found much pleasure in the arts of language. Not like her, who seemed to spew crafty and rhetorically superb lines without giving a thought to it. Again something that gave him occasion for jealousy. Why could he not be like that? Why was it that what came naturally to her had to be that a costly, effort-laden thing to him?

But there was the smirk in her eyes, taunting him, almost pleading him to go ahead and say what he had prepared. No, he would not give her the satisfaction of it. He made up his mind.

His old sword-master used to say that there were times when the only way not to lose was to let go.

"No," he said, swallowed. "Let's skip that, then. I'm sure you've just now read all about it, anyway," he retorted, with a meaningfully wicked glance at the scroll between them. She showed no sign of being fazed by the insinuation, however.

"I'm to keep two legions from the ones you have when I take over," he reminded her, permitting some victory in it. "The rest will be going away when you do."

She merely nodded.

He came out with it. "I'd like the Seventh."

"Done."

So easy! So she had expected it. "As for the other legion to stay..." He cleared his throat. "You have any in mind?"

"I thought to leave the other legion currently in Argentum, if you are amenable to it. The Eighth. Veteran, and very well-decorated. I imagine you may have heard of them before, for they still have the same number as the last time I used them in another mission, another land."

Out swelled his lungs, expanding in a deep breath; he had been meaning to request one legion of her more experienced troops, afraid she would try to leave him with a greener one. Instead, it appeared she was willing to give him one of her best. Of course he had heard of the Eighth! It was the one she had with her during a famous march in her previous campaign, where she tore down three enemy fortresses in the space of only two months. Excellent! Oh, one could hate the woman, yes; but even he was not about to deny that she was a phenom in the field... and thus produced the most experienced and confident troops in the nation.

"That's good," he said, a little mollified by her generosity. "I'll take them."

She angled her head, wine-glass in hand and its contents swishing idly. "Are there any other specific requests?"

They were talking more smoothly now, characters having shifted to state officials discussing a matter.

"That's it as far as the troops go. All items belonging to them will stay here, of course."

"Hm."

He frowned, though not at her-or not entirely. "Another thing. Some Treasury officials came over with me, if you know."

"I do."

"They say you've already done the sums and passed out the notes for booty distribution?"

"I have."

"I have to say that's irregular."

"And none of your concern." She said this very mildly, so he was not quick to take umbrage. "I am aware you intend to argue for the traditional practice of letting the Treasury officials distribute booty only after the campaign is over, which is understandable given your political inclinations. However, this matter is already settled and not up for discussion."

Up shot his peaked eyebrows.

"I don't see why not," he said coolly, lifting his chin. "They're my troops now, and that's the booty they've won."

"The key word being they ." Her lips turned up a little, almost smirking. " You won nothing. Keep out of it."

"Maybe I should say the same to you," he said menacingly, pushed by her directness. "You've meddled with what's naturally the prerogative of the State by dividing it before the Treasury officers could get here."

"The prerogative of the State is that of a few crooked officials, who skim enough off the top to ensure that Hime is cheated out of its proper share and the legionaries who fought in its name are similarly injured." She paused, wiggled her eyebrows. "Or, perhaps, you were actually more concerned about getting your own share-"

"How could I!?" He was red to the neck in outrage. "Of course not! I'm just talking about doing things properly here! In the right way."

"And the right way is the old one, I assume?"

He could not resist quoting the platitude. "The old ways are the best."

She shook her head and gave him a bored look. "Which saying is neither true, nor strictly logical."

"Your devotion to the traditional practice may be minutely notable, but the blindness of it fails to impress," she continued on the subject. "That is a much-corrupted practice you are defending, and I have no intent of humouring you or the other hidebound conservatives by letting a stale custom cheat several thousand soldiers who have only ever given the State honest service. Besides, your command has no retroactive power over my decisions. The most you may do is ask the Treasury accountants later if my books are correct, and you shall find they shall agree with me-five times, at least, since I accomplished all necessary forms in quintuplicate. Aside from that, please save yourself the fruitless trouble . Keep out of it ."

He sat for a moment in silence. He really was concerned about the way she had so casually doled out the spoils herself, eschewing the traditional machinery of the Treasury. Avarice entered no part of his worries for, her impertinent little suggestion aside, he was truly not so thick-skinned that he would consider himself entitled to a part of that booty. Still, all things considered, this was just a little pebble on the road: it did not really matter all that much to his agenda. What to do here? Should he press it?

Eventually, he decided it was best to let it be. He could afford to be the bigger man now, after all, since he was the one who had already won. That was right, was it not? He was the one who had come here in victory, not she. The past few minutes had been so chaotic that he had nearly forgotten that. This was his triumph, and her defeat.

He reminded himself of it.

"Fine!" he said, managing to look very ironic. "Excuse me for keeping my concern for time-honoured custom and due process."

The damnable woman actually replied. "Certainly, you are excused."

He gave her a cautionary glare. "Moving on. Are there any particulars I would be better off knowing?"

"Hmm." She looked, he thought, bored again. "Oh... thousands, I imagine."

He did not immediately catch the gibe there, though he did know from her tone that he was being mocked, and so was immediately annoyed.

"Essential things," he clarified, summoning every ounce of effort to remain civil. "Things relevant to my mission and things your duty to tell me. Whatever I need know so I'll be able to put all things aright."

Ah, that gave him satisfaction! He might be the bigger man, yes, but that did not mean he would hold back on a sting or two. Gods knew she had not done that either, anyway, so fair was fair.

I can put the hate to the side, like you say, he told her silently. But it doesn't mean I forget it.

He smiled at her flinty expression, finally beginning to feel more relaxed.

"Is there anything you can tell me?" he asked comfortably. "If not, I guess we finished faster than I'd expected."

Her lip lifted.

"Oh, there is a great deal I can tell you," she said frostily. "But here is the gist of it: you are in far over your head; your troops' numbers are grossly insufficient, their lives possibly in jeopardy under your leadership; you are unfamiliar and summon little-to-no trust from the foreign auxiliaries; and you are currently undergoing a most peculiar facial twitch around the jaw. Are you well?"

He clenched his teeth and showed them to her.

"You're incredible, Fujino," he said, the tone making it clear it was not complimentary. "You've the nerve to tell me I have to keep our quarrels out of this meeting, but you're the one who keeps giving me reason to. If that's what you really want, stop it with the insults!"

She raised her bisected eyebrow at him; he was beginning to hate that habit.

"Insults?" she echoed. "If you are talking about what I just said, then perhaps you had best think again. Those were not insults. Keep both feet on the ground, if you please, and do not be so quick to get your wind up when no one is insulting you."

She explained: "I was establishing the position. Your position. Surely you did not expect me to lie about it? You were the one who asked what I should tell you, and there it is. I was speaking candidly, since such matters are best spoken without much ado over the polite euphemisms. I mean no insult when I said those things. You are inheriting what is, in my personal opinion, an invidious situation. You must be informed of your weaknesses-if you have not yet been-so that you may address them in whatever manner you wish, directly." Out waved a hand, the palm facing upwards. "Naturally, I shall not presume to tell you how to do that. My only purpose there was to inform, according to the request."

"All right, all right already!" he said angrily. "So you've informed me so kindly. Thanks very much!"

"You are welcome."

He bit the inside of his cheek. "Anything else?"

"Everything else can be settled outside of this meeting. My staff will assist yours in getting settled." She tapped her jaw thoughtfully. "Oh, and I should inform you that three of my legates are asking for permission to stay on, under your command."

Now that was news, thought Takeda, inwardly grinning. So three of her officers were willing to work for him? Smart people, then! Obviously those with discernment, able to see the potential in him.

"Who?" he asked.

"You are acquainted with all of them, I believe. Aidou Yuji in Argentum, Toshi Katou in Sosia, and Suou Himemiya, here."

His face lit up. "Suou-kun! I'd be glad to have her."

"And the others?"

He shrugged, not really caring about the lesser fish after snagging a whale like Suou. A Himemiya serving under him!

"Them too. I'll take them on if you recommend them," he said magnanimously.

"I do, as they are all most able. I expect them to get in touch with you soon, so you may inform them yourself, as you would perhaps wish."

A satisfied nod. "Anything else to tell me?"

"Only this, which I tender to you as the outgoing general, in courtesy: beware the wolf about to bite you in the heel."

He sat up, having waited all this time for the topic.

"Ah! The Mentulae," he declared.

"Yes."

"Hrm!" He cleared his throat, remembered what he had to say on this. He had consulted with some of his allies in Senate, as well as her cousin, and had worked it all out ahead of time. "I don't think much of that threat anymore, actually."

Her voice was suddenly remarkably dry: "Oh, really?"

He nodded at the scroll on the table.

"They sent ambassadors to us while you were here, left before I did. Some big rush, and they said they were sorry for it. But they left a message asking that we send ambassadors to them too-to fix the peace talks. They were going pretty well, it seems," he told her, speaking more casually now that he was feeling comfy. "I met their Prince Nagi. He's one of the king's own sons, and seemed like a decent enough fellow for a Mentulaean. Very courtly and educated."

She made a noncommittal sound, though her face was unconvinced. He made a point of ignoring it, having expected her prejudice.

"Since this mission is about strengthening defence and preventing any more incidents, I think I will meet with them sometime, or send a worthy representative," he continued, warming to the topic. "The Senate agrees with it. We've had our run-ins-" He glanced at her to show he remembered her battles. "But it's about time that stopped. Why keep it going when it's so unnecessary and costly? They already understand now that we can't be pushed around... especially the way you've dealt with their last threat, which put them down pretty good."

Some reluctance in that, it took some effort from him.

"So they've got the message good and learned already," he concluded.

"One wonders," she said impassively. He searched for some more indication of how she was feeling, met that formidable Fujino wall again, and swerved away to continue.

"We need stability now," he said sincerely, leaning forward and resting both elbows on his knees. Only he would know what it cost to do that, to move closer to her instead of keep his distance. "What we need is peace, a fair settlement. The prince himself said it was what they also wanted, and only left without getting the treaty because Senate was dithering so long about other issues that we couldn't give him the time of day-and he was already being summoned back, I guess, having been away so long. A pity we didn't get the treaty done there and then. But I'll make it one of the priorities in my mission. The best defence is to get in quick, while they're still reeling from their defeat, and offer them the bait. Jupiter knows they've taken a spanking from the stick already. Not a good feeling. They'd have to be stupid to try it again! So they'll take the offer, I'm positive."

He stopped there, and was followed by a brief silence, where he supposed she was taking in his speech. But how to read what she thought of it, when her face was so unspeaking? He could only wait patiently.

The accented voice was colourless when it finally made itself heard to him. "A treaty with the Mentulae."

"Yes."

"After our run-ins ."

"Yes."

"Really?"

He answered affirmatively again, mindful of keeping his face stoic as hers. He could already tell from her words which way her wind was blowing though, and was not surprised. Of course she wouldn't like it

.

This was only to be expected: she had been the one to battle with them, the one to send the Mentulaeen King off with a flea in his ear. Yet she would not be the one to permanently remove their threat. In her eyes, he had probably cheated her of that politically defining event she had not yet accomplished. He would be riding on the tail of her scarlet cape, using what she had already gained to achieve the more final solution to this overseas conflict. Natural for her to dislike the idea. Yet what else could he do? It was now his duty, the thing she had started devolved to him. He was not about to humour her by refraining from what needed to be done, and thus take the credit for the conflict's conclusion.

Besides, she already got those victories over them, he thought resentfully. More than enough credit for one person. Why should she grudge this to me too?

" Ecastor !"

He started at her exclamation, the sharpness of her voice. There it was: she was going to carp about being deprived of it. He would much rather she would not, and would take this elegantly, but he supposed that had been hoping for too much. How ambitious was the woman that she could not leave it alone? Well, she did not have a choice in the matter. This was his task now, and he would be the one to finish it!

But the look she was giving him was not one of bitterness, but amazement.

"A treaty?" she said wonderingly. "You are saying you shall make a treaty of peace with them? After what happened?"

He bridled, but nodded quickly.

"And you had one of the royal princes and let him leave?" she asked, eyebrows high on her forehead. "The Senate permitted them to go? What was Kanzaki Princeps Senatus doing? Should he not have been handling it? Should he not have prevented them from leaving?"

He continued to stare at her, mystified by this flurry of interrogation.

Where was she going with this, he wondered. He could not yet see it, and he wished he could. He hated not knowing what was going on in her head-which, unfortunately, was usually the case.

"The Princeps was the one dealing with them," he admitted guardedly. "But they just up and left one day-Senate couldn't do anything about it, time we found out. The message was something they just left behind."

And that was when she did something very unexpected.

She started laughing.

"Oh, of course!" she said, still bearing that odd amazement in her eyes. He felt uncomfortably that she was laughing at him. "Of course the Senate could not do anything about it-though I had expected Reito-han to be more careful. Ineptes! How Obsidian would laugh!"

As he was not really sure for whom the "ineptes" was, nor even where she was really heading, he said nothing to that, and waited for her laughter to subside. She quirked an eyebrow at his stiff posture.

"It was frankly stupid to let them go," she remarked, composed again. "Even by negligence-which might be all the more unpardonable, now that I think of it. Agents should have been set to watch over them at all times, so that they could not leave the city without our knowledge. Nay, even so that they could not set a finger out of their quarters without a pair of lictors ready to chop it off if needed. Do you not agree?"

He let his jaw drop as far as it would go.

"Have you gone insane?" he demanded, shocked by her lack of diplomacy. And to think they said she was a politic woman! "By Jupiter, you must be insane. They were ambassadors, diplomats suing for peace! What are you saying?"

She sighed, giving him a look that told him she considered this another instance of unwarranted hysteria.

"What I am saying is that you should have detained the prince and held him hostage," she told him. "Then perhaps these silly dreams about making treaties with them might have been a little less impossible... But no, that is silly, my apologies. After all, a smaller measure of the impossible is still impossible, and no less definite a state than it is as an abstract quantity."

She sighed and looked terribly patient with him.

"Not that I could get many to understand that," she said, "as I am beginning to see."

His lips thinned, pressed very tightly. His cheeks were warm, too, because he felt she had been insulting his intelligence with that bizarre little aside on the impossible and quantities,. He did not really understand it and so felt patronised.

"I'd not thought you to be a warmonger before," he said damningly, making an effort to keep the attention on their real topic. "But I was wrong."

"And even now, you are that. But I imagine the experience is nothing new." She looked weary, closed her eyes for a second. "Permit me to say the truth here: I care little for what their ambassador said, since their king's actions speak much louder and hold more authority. It is not that I am being spiteful, but being cautious. The berth is wide between the two indicators, and needs must discern which is the truer."

She opened her eyes wide at him.

"And we need to remember two things, Masashi-han," she finished. "Diplomats can lie . Whereas a naked blade is-generally, though not always, hm? - true."

He ignored the allusion to their earlier encounter, not willing to be drawn into it.

"So what... are you saying we should've held them prisoner?" he said incredulously. "Gone and put them to the sword? Started a war immediately? That would've been a good job, wouldn't it? Ercle!"

She turned her eyes to him.

"No, please do not be so deliberately obtuse," she said innocently. "That is not what I meant. But, if you would like the condensed moral here, then very well." She crossed her legs at the knee. "All I was saying is that we should not be so quick to put our faith in ambassadors who speak contrarily to how their armies act."

A pause; he gave her a steady, probing look.

"You think they're going to attack again," he said.

"Yes."

He expelled a long-suffering breath, giving her the wry smile one would give a person with a bad joke already heard.

"Crying wolf gets old," he said dampeningly.

She grinned.

"So the villagers said, right before they were eaten," came her retort, her shoulders undertaking a small heave. "Oh well! I can see you are intent on suing for peace, so I shall simply wish you luck, though I doubt it shall come to anything." A pointed glance. "I hope, at least, that you shall do nothing so reckless as to meet them on their own ground, when you look for that treaty. That would be walking straight into the monster's mouth."

He shifted uneasily on his supple seat.

"Of course not," he told her, smarting because he had been considering it. But certainly not unprotected! That foolish he was not, though the hateful woman seemed to think it. "But if I do, I'd do it with the army with me," he said challengingly.

"Even then, it would be foolhardy," she said, bent on being contrary. "You have only two legions directly under your disposal, combined with a few foreign auxiliaries. Whereas the Mentulae can field a hundred thousand if they wished it."

It came out before he could stop it: "You won Argentum with two legions and the cavalry."

She smirked, and he thought, Shit me.

"Yes," she agreed. " / did."

The unspoken question was clear: did he think he could have done it too, with only those troops?

While he was searching his mind for an appropriate retort, some rejoinder that would preserve his dignity without letting on his self-doubts, she seemed to remember something.

"Most of the troops I am actually leaving are not here, by the way," she said. "The Eighth is in Argentum with half of the Seventh. Only the other half of the latter legion is here with me."

He sucked on his teeth, grateful for the change of topic. He seized the opportunity.

"I heard there's one legion of Otomeian infantry there too," he said quickly. "Argentum."

"Yes."

He shook his head. "They'll have to go."

She shook her head too, seeming surprised. "Unwise. Unless you intend to send other troops to hold Argentum with the Eighth?"

"No, the Eighth can take care of Argentum by itself." He paused, bent an elbow to get some of the stiffness out of it. "I think I'll actually send for the other half of the Seventh that's there, and have them march here to join me."

"And why, pray tell, would you do that?"

"To avoid burdening that city with all those mouths, of course," he told her quite importantly, opening his dark eyes. He could scarcely believe she was asking about such an obvious thing. "Feeding legions is tough. They'll have been eating out that city's food for a while now."

She made a sound in opposition. "Besides, Argentum is being paid handsomely for it."

"Right," he said. "I've just seen the bills this morning, and they're maybe being paid too well for it."

"The area around Argentum does not farm," she reminded him. "So they must import their grain, which makes it perhaps a little less inexpensive."

He agreed.

"But it's still too costly," he told her. "If I move them here, where grain caravans and ships go every week before being sent to other areas, we can have a better time of it and cheaper, I expect, if we buy direct from the warehouses. And that'll be much easier than having to load and send off caravans of oxen bearing Argus-bought grain to Argentum, too. It's the melting snow will make it troublesome to do that. So, better to have the mouths here, where the stuff will be cheap."

He paused: he was pleased with himself, for he had given quite a bit of thought to this, and it was apparent she had not considered it. How had she been handling finances so far, with this army? She probably left everything to the officer in charge of procuring supplies, the praefectus fabrum.

"I hope that'll be enough, though, since two legions are still ten thousand mouths, plus what the cavalry eats. The Senate didn't give me that big a purse."

She said something that rather startled him.

"Then solicit funds for it among the local gentry." Up went that superior eyebrow he wanted to collapse so badly. "Or pay for them yourself."

He glared, unable to believe someone so famous for being tactful had just suggested such a thing. Then again, she had just spoken in favour of detaining a diplomatic party unlawfully, when they were suing for peace. Perhaps she was not really so tactful after all, he reflected, given the number of times she had shocked him already.

"Pay, myself?" he said in disbelief. "I can't!"

"Whyever not?" She smirked faintly. "Pardon me for mentioning it, but I do believe you are hardly impoverished." And though she did not say it, he could hear her inner voice whispering: though not of my league. "It would surely not dent your coffers too badly to pay?"

She stopped then and suddenly looked displeased.

"Or is it that any dent, no matter how insignificant, would see you grudging it?" she asked softly.

He shook his head several times, stunned by the thickness of the woman. And why did she keep insinuating such distasteful things of him? Surely she had to see the measure of his character by now, else she was definitely not as good a politician as she seemed to think.

"That's not the point," he said with frustration. "I don't grudge them anything-I'd pay if I could! But the simple fact is I can't. They're legions of Hime. Soldiers of the Senate and the People. They're not some private army for me to feed with my money and I'm not some kind of... of... ancient feudal lord to keep them beholden to me that way. / know where my place is."

He met her eyes pointedly, hoping she would get the message.

"If the State empowers me to go on a mission like this, and orders me to use its soldiers as I see fit, it's still the one with the greater authority, the real master, and not me," he told her gravely. "It's the one pays for the bills, the one legitimises everything I do. It owns the army, not me. So it's only right that I follow its instructions to the letter, like a dutiful servant does his master. The State is our master, Fujino."

That finally got a reaction: an eyebrow twitched. He grinned to himself and continued it.

"Our armies are its armies, in the end. It's not right to act like they're ours, or trick them into thinking they're personally ours by giving them all sorts of cash gifts or bonuses." He had been told about the unsanctioned raise she had given the army, of course, and the bonus she had given the legionaries. "To do that would be corrupt! It's a dangerous man pays for the nation's army himself and does it with the soldiers' knowledge, as though to tell them they're not the State's concern anymore but his. It'd be turning our honest legionaries into mercenaries... or cheap soldiers-for-rent! So when the State gives me this much, and tells me to make do with it, it's my duty to see to it that it stretches far enough. That means being economical. If I can do that, I'll have done my job well, kept the soldiers fed, and stayed off the temptation to be corrupt. I know what you think of me, but you're wrong: I'm not and I'll never be corrupt."

Having finished his peroration successfully, he eyed his audience like an actor waiting for the gasp. Had it sunk in, what he was saying? Did she understand the lesson he had been giving? What he saw in her face was something that made him believe the answers were positive, for she looked at him as though this were her first time to see him. Yes, he thought triumphantly, swelling. He gloried in her appraisal with cool dignity, feeling a great and wonderful satisfaction suffuse him, from the ends of his toes to the roots of his incorruptible hair.

Yes, he told her, watching the astonishment growing in her eyes. Now you see me. Now you see how different I am from you, how there are still people uncorrupted enough to be like this.

She said his name strangely. He nodded complacently at it, expecting that something in an awestruck tone was coming.

What came disappointed him.

"Correct me if I am wrong, please," she said, her voice deathly quiet. "This is your first time wearing the general's cape?"

Surprise at the query: he stiffened, diminished a little. Oh, so she planned to use that form of snobbery, did she? Not that she had refrained from using every other form of it. Still, she was the one who had said that they should not allow their personal tiff to colour this. For such a rational woman, then, didn't she see? Didn't she understand what he had just said, his moment of glory?

"Yes," he admitted defensively. "But I've done work as legate, among other offices."

"I see." She nodded, and he waited for the insult. "Then you must be aware it is generally conceded that generals do as I have suggested without censure. It is not... such a terrible thing." And her voice softened a little more, turning almost friendly. "It is not so dishonest as it seems. Truly."

Eh? He blinked several times, not knowing what to make of that odd statement. Once again, she was not doing what he had expected. Why would she say that? And in such a way to him? Unable to plumb her intentions, his caution was ignited. What was Fujino's agenda now?

"It is not symptomatic of corruption or power-madness to pay for your own legions," she said, still with that strange gentleness. "Many people have done it—perhaps majority of those who have ever held an army, in fact. There is no shame in doing so. Perhaps this would appeal to your sense of tradition as well. Do think about it."

Suddenly he caught on to it. Edepol, he thought, the woman had nerve! He scoffed at her, amazed by the realisation that she was trying to push him into what both of them knew was corrupt practice, into ambitiously crooked means. Suddenly whatever little esteem he had formerly harboured for her dropped and was whittled down to a splinter: to think she would even try to trick him into this, to turn him into yet another of the crooked politicians it had been Hime's shame to produce. To think she had even pretended to be friendly, just so she could drag him down to that level.

Oh, Fujino! he cried inwardly. I can't believe you'd be so dastardly. I'd never have believed it if someone else told me, if I'd not seen you for what you are myself. I'm not as simple as you think; I'm not as pathetic. What you're doing now is pathetic. I can't believe you'd turn to this just to destroy me, that a Fujino would do it.

Suddenly he felt angry with her again, but not for himself. He was thinking of all those people in Hime, back in their beloved city, who thought so much of her. He was thinking of those girls in the markets who giggled over the plaster busts in her likeness and worshipped them, offered their pure girlish dreams to the silly things. Undeservedly. He was almost glad they were not here to see and be disappointed in their idol. He could only imagine how their dreams would fall, sullied.

"I have thought about it, as you should see if you'd been listening to me," he told her determinedly, setting his face into its stoniest configuration. "And I'll not be that sort of man."

"What sort of man would that be?"

He eyed her darkly. "A power-hungry hound. A man who uses an opportunity to pretend generosity when he's actually usurping the rights of the State, buying off his troops. A man whose ambitions would maybe eat the nation, the country."

She countered. "That is not how I interpret it, nor would it be how most would interpret it. Consider it as a donation to the State. A charitable act to the nation."

"No."

There was a moment of silence. When she spoke again, her voice had lost its attempt at amiability and was hard again.

He was surprised to find he preferred it that way.

"Please reconsider," she said.

"One should never consider dishonest practice."

She did that haughty brow-lift, and again he wished he could shave the offending body-part. "The dishonesty often lies not in the practice but the intent."

"I won't do it," he said, just as haughty.

Another indrawn breath from her, signal of growing impatience. Oh, but he was beginning to enjoy this! How wonderful to annoy someone while constantly retaining the high ground! Had he only known this would happen, he would have brought up this topic earlier, to have much longer to annoy her with it.

"That is a lame horse you are climbing, and it is ready for a fall," she said, making of it a warning. "Climb off it! Forget our petty differences for the moment and listen to fair, sound advice when it is given. I ask you in earnest."

But he was steadfast, unshaken. "I won't do it."

She set her teeth, and he could see her resolve to maintain what was left of what was proving to be a formidable temper. Would she unleash it? He found he was not looking forward to the prospect.

But just when he thought she would bare her fangs again, she merely eyed him quietly, looking vexed.

"Then may all the gods help the good men and women I am leaving in your care," she said in a whisper. "Because it seems you will not do so yourself."

He scoffed. "They'll be fine."

"Not when the Mentulae come to battle."

He frowned, irritated by the oddly chilling feel of her prognostication.

"Gerrae!" he exclaimed, brushing off the strange shiver that had crept on the back of his neck; surely it was just because of the way she had said it! "I don't know why you have to keep being such a doomsayer all the time. I'll take care of them fine, you'll see, and without resorting to that kind of dirty tactic you'd like me to do. I don't owe it to you to do that, but I do owe it to the Senate and the People to act as they see fit."

He received another withering glance.

"Your club-footed sense of conscience should be hidden, not flaunted," she said wryly. "I wish you would stop being hampered by that mash the Senate conservatives would serve up to you as meat. Why, even some of the Traditionalists understand that there is a difference between what is the official line and the official practice!"

"Maybe for corrupt people."

That did it: she bowed and began massaging the sharp line of her nose.

"I ask for the last time-not about the funding any longer, but for the legions' placements," she said wearily. "The Eighth must not be alone in Argentum. It must have on more legion with it. Make it a foreign auxiliary one, if you must, but it must have company."

"I thought you said the Eighth was an excellent legion?" he said, glad to find an opportunity for being sarcastic. "Or you don't believe in the soldiers you're leaving me, so much that you think they'd need support for just that one city?"

"The Eighth is an excellent legion, as is the Seventh."

He interrupted before she could say any more. "Then I don't see why you have to be worried."

"Well, the observer is part of the system," she said dryly, before exhaling with a sound of patent resignation; what pleasure it gave him to hear it! "Have it as you wish then. Do as you will, for it is now your army. Your responsibility."

She narrowed her eyes at him.

"But be sure to keep in mind what you said," she added. "That you would take care of the legionaries. You had best be sure that your marvellously upright ways do not fail them, because they need to be in fine fettle to guard against what could be coming."

It was his turn to speak tiredly.

"My god. This again?" he asked, running a hand through his recently-trimmed hair; he had been sure to get his barber to cut it to perfection before coming here. "I already said we'd be getting a peace treaty with the Mentulae."

"And I already said to watch out for them forgetting about it, just in case."

He threw up both hands, as exasperated by her as she seemed to be with him.

"Why?" he demanded. "Why can't you accept your war is over, your battles here finished? You've rammed it up their arses at Argentum! They've been chewed up, taught who's the authority! Crushed and bugged, by god! Even I will say it, and you already said before that there's no love lost between you and me! Why do you want a war with them so badly?"

She was unruffled when she answered.

"It is not a matter of my want," she said. "But it is because they want it. They want to expand, Masashi-han. They want these lands, the lands of our allies, the lands Hime has, these territories. They might content themselves with pushing to their other borders for now, but it is clear that the next logical place for them to hit, the nearest place for them to hit, shall be these. And why should they refrain from doing it? Perhaps they were defeated once, at Argentum, but even I-the general in that victory-can see that it was not final. Whatever was settled there was a small chat, not the full conversation! Not the final argument. Which is an argument we must win."

"I adjure you to think of it in terms of pure martial strategy for a moment," she went on. "Think like the general you must be, the legate you have been. Think of how many victories Obsidian has been having in his other exploits and how many other armies he has under his command, now that the tribes of the Mentulae are fully united under him. Do you think a loss like Argentum would be final for a man like that, who can still send another hundred thousand to match the ones he lost, and another hundred thousand after, to reinforce that? Perhaps not now-not immediately, because he will still be smarting. But soon, eventually, it should come to him. Think about it. Is it not clear we should be so wary?"

She gazed at him earnestly, her carbunculus eyes no longer scathing, but earnestly asking for his understanding, for him to agree. Even her tone was so sincere and desperate to be heard that he nearly gave in.

He frowned unsteadily as he started to get back his steel.

"Be that as it is," he answered, trying not to be taken in by her speech. "It can't be that bad. Even you say it's not now. And 'eventually' in these things takes several years." He shook his head, growing more firm as he listened to himself. "He won't come back so easily from it. He'll still be cringing at the thought of one of our armies for a good time. And that's why it's the perfect time to make a treaty with them. They can't refuse because they'll not dare it."

Her eyes, it seemed, were sad as she regarded him.

"So you say," she said flatly. "So you think."

"Yes." His voice was strong. "I'm positive."

She just shook her head this time. Because he had been expecting something more, perhaps another attempt to convince him, it again disturbed him.

Awkwardly, he tried to give her reason to believe.

"Look here, Fujino," he said sternly. "I'm in charge of defending this place and keeping it safe, so I'll do my best and do right by it. I don't believe the Mentulae will attack us any more, but I'll tell you now: I'll make sure they don't. I'll bind up that treaty so tight even you won't have a problem with it. I'll keep the soldiers safe. I'll take care of the North, as is my duty. I can handle it."

She was sipping at her wine very slowly, and he had to wait a while before she answered him.

"I hope you are right in what you say." Her beautifully-shaped mouth thinned. "Hime... We cannot condone incursions into our territory."

"I know, and I will handle it," he replied tersely. "I'm not afraid of anything."

She smiled, but it never reached her eyes.

"Oh, really, Masashi-han?" she drawled. "I wonder if you have ever heard of that saying: a certain measure of fear is a necessary part of wisdom."

A necessary part of wisdom. Fear. There we are then, he decided, finishing his remembrance. There was the crux of her arguments to him, it seemed. The woman liked to use fear, liked to manipulate it as part of her argument. She was one to talk about logic! Her last words, he now suspected after having thought on it, were not even really related to her initial topic: they were probably a warning to him to stay away from her Natsuki. Who would not be her Natsuki soon, certainly. Who was the territory she could not condone losing.

Good, he thought, let her be worried about it! He was certain-would make certain-the girl would go to him once she left. She would see he was a much better master, a far kinder lover than Fujino. Why, he only had to think of last night's dinner party, where they had been present, to prove it. Did not last night prove Fujino's rudeness to the girl, how shabbily she treated Natsuki? Did it not prove she herself would be the one to push the Otomeian away, to be her own undoing with her arrogance and cruelty?

The girl deserves better... and that will be me, he vowed, scowling at the memories. If only Fujino'd go away already.

But she would have to wait for the Eleventh and Fourteenth to arrive in the city, which meant anything from a few days to a week. No matter: he could be patient. What was one more week, when he had suffered for five months? Only one more week of putting up with her horrid attitude to Natsuki and to him, her annoyingly superior criticisms, her pitying glance during meetings when he told the officers something with which she disagreed. She did not restrict herself to those glances, either: she had no qualms about telling him what she thought wrong in his decisions. Ye gods, he thought, the woman was just so full of it. She was just so full of herself and her unmatched pedigree.

The men still called her 'the general', too. And called him by his name instead, though they did remember to add the honorific. Still, that was more than a little galling, especially when she had already officially turned over her position to him. He was aware that she was the one with the fabulous aura of an unmatched military career, but that did not mean he could never measure up to it, did it? It was just that he had never been given a command like this before, and never had the opportunity to lead a full army.

Well, that would change in the future. Someday he would be given something that would permit him to prove himself. After he was done with this mission, perhaps, when he might seek election as praetor-and here he spared a giggle, thinking of how he had actually unseated his foe by helping her to that office-and then try to get a governorship in one of the more interesting provinces, one with a certain degree of unrest. He might earn repute for martial prowess then! Who was to say he would not turn out to be another legendary commander? They would see soon, by Jupiter. But at this moment, he just had to focus on proving himself to this new army. Which seemed resentful that he would be taking over it. They could not see his light, seeing only the shadow of their former commander over him.

"Oh." He clenched his free hand. "That's it."

He stopped before he could drain his cup entirely, thinking on what he had just apprehended, the nature of the thing that had been bothering him. Just as he had thought: it had been her fault again. Her shadow was the thing that sometimes obscured the light meant for him, a light he deserved and was being robbed of by this Himean version of Iskander on his high horse. Time to tell her what Iskander had been told, that she was blocking his sun. Time to get rid of the only thing holding him back from achieving his perfect victory. How to do that? How to get her evil away from him?

I guess all I really have to do is wait, he comforted himself, taking solace in the fact she that was just about to leave. Just a little more...

Her ship's going out, mine's the one coming in. Mine's the luck.

He impulsively threw the dregs of wine onto a dirty sheet of paper before him, feeling like indulging in some superstition, like a true Himean would do. He looked at the splatter of the lees and counted the branches in the splash pattern, nodding contentedly.

"I say! A six."

The voice beside him: "Domine ?"

A genuine smile, which he directed to his faithful steward.

"More wine," he demanded. "Water it a little, Aristion. I've got to meet Sugiura-san later, don't I?"

"Yes, Domine . "

While Aristion was mixing his drink, he rapped his foot thoughtfully.

"You know, I think I'd better ask her to invite the other, lower-ranked officers too, when she throws her next party." He fingered his chin, making a note to trim the shadowy stubble on it. "I don't like the way they look at me-it's not too trusting, you know? Like they still don't understand I'm the commander of the army. Me. Maybe if they get to know me better they'll understand it."

Aristion handed him the refilled cup. "Yes, Domine . "

"You think maybe I can ask her not to invite Fujino?" He stopped mid-sip, thought better of it. "No, that'd be stupid, she can't not do it. Hmm."

His steward cleared his throat delicately.

"If I may, Domine, " he began. "Perhaps it would be possible to ask the governor to have a party after the Hime-bound legions have set out? Tubilustrum is coming."

Takeda grinned, clapped him on the arm and squeezed, laughing wholeheartedly.

"Good man," he told Aristion. "That's a good idea, Aristion! It's perfect. She'll have a reason for having the party and Fujino'll have gone by then, I hope. If not, there's always the Ludi Megalenses in April."

Aristion nodded in agreement. "Yes, Domine . "

Takeda swung both legs up on the table, humming contentedly now he had another thing settled. He took an occasional sip. After a while, his gaze drifted again to the spatter of the lees on the paper near his feet.

"See it, Aristion?" he mused loudly. "It's a six."

"Yes, Domine ? "

"Six is lucky for me." He grinned. "Wouldn't you say my luck is coming in?"

Aristion nodded dutifully.

"Yes, Domine, " he told him.

While Takeda was thinking about these things, his opponent was at the Argus port with her senior legate, inspecting the ships one of the legions would be taking. Inspection was their supposed purpose, but when they stood at the bow of one of the vessels, it was Takeda they were discussing.

"... thought him vapid before, and venal into the bargain," were Shizuru's words about him.

Her friend, no longer sniffing from the cold which had afflicted her for nearly two weeks, grinned jokily.

"And that's changed?" she asked.

"Yes, to some extent. I can only hold on to the first opinion."

Theatrical surprise. "What, do you think he's straight after all, Shizuru-san?"

Shizuru met her companion's eyes coolly. "What an odd term to use, Chie-han. Straight is a relative term in politics, if not an entirely foreign one."

The senior legate threw back her handsome head and laughed in the breeze.

"Isn't that the truth." She nodded at her general. "So then, you think he's a bit less crooked?"

The general nodded with a frown. It seemed the idea did not please her one bit.

"I do."

A pause after this admission, as though to reaffirm it.

"He lacks the character for it. One cannot describe him as mercenary, not even the way most of us can be... not the sort of man who would ever be a major player in a game, because he shall lack the initiative and courage to go after the greatest prize. Oh, he is not entirely without his fair points, I shall admit," Shizuru said, and Chie smiled at the faint dislike that tainted the admission. "But they are not points that would ever make him a great man. Not without clout, but a follower rather than a leader. He shall never make his own faction, but will be the sort to join another's. He might reach the consulship during his time, fill it just as his ancestors have done, but he would not be the kind to be remembered for it."

Her eyes focused on the docks below as she spoke, and Chie knew she was looking for her young woman, who had left them in order to fetch the pet named after the two of them.

"On second thought," Shizuru suddenly corrected. "He may not even reach the consulship."

Her friend was curious. "Oh?"

"Do you remember that delirious little speech I told you about after our first meeting-the one he made over refusing to fund the army with his private moneys, should Senate's stipend run a little short of comfort?"

Chie swore, actually hooting from the incredulity.

"I wish I didn't remember it," she laughed, raising both shoulders and wriggling as though she could shake off the irritation that way. "Self-righteous cunnus, isn't he?"

"He meant every word of it."

"The delusion!"

"Really. Remember that he has never held the high command before, either."

"Oh, it shows!" Chie laughed again, savagely. "He doesn't seem to know how the army really works, or how much commanders have to get themselves dirty for the sake of the army. Ye gods, Shizuru-san, what a shambles-" She grasped her friend by the wrist, exerting just enough pressure to show her feelings. "They've gone and stepped in it this time, they really have. The one they sent to replace you isn't worth your little finger-or the nail on it!"

Shizuru met her look gratefully, some of the coolness in her eyes melting away.

"Thank you, Chie-han," she said, before adding: "I know it."

Chie nodded, releasing her and resting one side against the rail. "But what's that got to do with him never making consul?"

Shizuru raised her hand and used it to tuck back some of her hair under her cape, because it was flying all about her face. She wished she had tied it back today, because the sea air was stiff with the breeze, and besides made her mane tougher to comb through until she washed it.

"I meant that he seems truly serious about it-making a name for being terrifically incorruptible. I admit it may give him some fame should he brandish that image in Hime, but fame cannot vote for you, whereas the Centuries can and do," she said mockingly. "They would never vote for him."

Chie smirked as she gave the reason. "Because the voters of the Centuries, who elect the consuls, like to know they can bribe their officials into a little something when they need it."

Shizuru agreed.

"Well, whatever the case, I wish I had tried to talk to him a little more gently," she confessed. "Perhaps I should not have tried to be sarcastic. I now doubt anything phrased as wit manages to percolate through that much density." She shook her head in self-criticism. "I do believe I lost that one, Chie-han."

But her friend denied her the culpability.

"I don't think he'd have listened anyway, Shizuru-san," she volunteered. "Just as he refused to listen to what you told him about the Mentulae." A snort of disgust. "Making peace with them! That prince of theirs must have done some talking, all right. I can't believe they bought it."

"The prince was probably the one doing the buying."

"True." She clawed the air angrily, a gesture of impotence "Oh, I can't get over it! I can't believe the man about to replace you is such a... a spineless bastard!"

But the woman who loathed that bastard shook her head.

"No," she said. "He is not spineless."

A sudden dry laugh from her, echoed by some seagulls overhead.

" Bastard enough, though. He had enough spine to try and answer back to me when we first met again, you remember. Though I could see his heart was pounding in his chest as he did it, poor fool! Besides, he also has a few military decorations to his credit, among them being-if I remember aright-a Corona Aurea ."

Her chief legate, also a winner of that corona and quite a number of other decorations, grunted disdainfully. Shizuru held back her own smile: she had won that award too.

"At any rate, I would not call him uncourageous," she finished, knowing full well she could afford to be gracious since she was one of only seven Himeans to ever be awarded a decoration that reduced the Aurea to insignificance: the legendary corona obsidionalis . "He is not a coward."

"What is he then, General?"

"I do not know. Somewhat... deficient, perhaps? No, that is not the word." Chie dissolved into sniggers as Shizuru frowned at the drab sky, and looked puzzled. "Headstrong, maybe, and a little clumsy. Not entirely stupid, but not too intelligent either. Oh, what is the word for it?"

The short-haired woman had a suggestion: "Average?"

Her general's eyes went wide.

"By god, I believe that is it," Shizuru said, chuckling. "That would be the word. Average to a farce."

She leaned both elbows on the wooden railing, imagining the also-average face that was not unattractive, but only due to simple regularity. Only the pointed eyebrows could be considered unordinary. A regular body, muscular but not stocky, and encased in clear, dark brown skin-perhaps his best feature. A picture, she thought, of what might well be called 'The Average Man'.

She nodded. "You are right, Chie-han. Average and an idealist, besides. How dismal he is."

"And, to use Nao's words, useful as a trickle of piss."

The general's eyes danced. "Well-to consider the pain of those holding it in-sometimes, that might be useful."

"Not when what you face is a blaze the size of a forest fire," Chie followed, looking nasty. "It's no average mission we have here and that's the reason they sent you in the first place. All he has to do is remember what the Princeps said, or Mai, or all the others when they gave the speeches that got us here. The man is out of his depth."

"I know, and so did I try to tell him."

"Wish I could've seen it."

"Oh, he did not impress me," Shizuru said in dismissal.

Chie laughed, but was quickly serious again.

"So you really do think something could happen?" she asked.

"Do you not?"

"Maybe. Probably. Oh, who am I kidding? Yes, I believe you're right about it." The legate heaved a deep breath. "But not right away, I would think. The rivers will be flooding, and I doubt they would cross the borders with all that trouble. I'm thinking summer."

Shizuru nodded. "My thoughts exactly. By that time we should have returned-or so the intent would be."

"Which means we... no, I mean you, more specifically, since my job is to be dawdling along the road," she grinned, recalling that she was in charge of the other part of the army that would be going overland. " You should be going as soon as possible, so you can also be reassigned to this place as soon as possible. I'd say in six days or so, going from the dispatch the marching Fourteenth and Eleventh just sent here. That's what they said, right?"

"Yes."

"So it's only six more days here-a week at most."

"Yes."

"And, in the meantime, you'll have to humour a dozen and one invitations." This was said with a laugh. "What a way to 'end' your mission. No-one who's anyone in Argus wants you to leave without having attended at least one of their parties."

Shizuru's answer was tired, showing she did not think this social task as cushy as others would.

"I must humour them," she told Chie. "After all, these are the same people writing letters daily to Hime, in support of me."

Chie was waiting for something else, and answered only briefly.

"Yes, of course you'll have to attend."

"Indeed." There was a sudden flicker of the red eyes. "I attended one last night."

Oho, there we are! Chie thought in excitement, girding herself for the topic of the week. Here we go.

"I heard about it," she told Shizuru gently, knowing the younger woman would never believe she was not already aware of the gossip.

"Masashi-han was there."

"I heard that too."

Another flicker, with a clearer message: And is that all you heard, you who hear almost everything?

She answered that candidly. "Something interesting happened between the two of you, right?"

Shizuru nodded, distractedly touching her tongue to her teeth. Chie was forced to be patient, though she was already suffocated by the curiosity. How much she regretted having been unable to attend that party! Thus had she missed what was currently the talk of all the other legates, both Masashi's and Shizuru's: the animosity between the two generals, whose coolness to each other had suddenly cracked to life over a sybaritic table-spread of oyster, snail and shrimp.

"I had something of a disagreement with Masashi," Shizuru said with feigned indifference, after a while. "Nothing so dramatic as a screaming fight, or any such thing some might tell you, but we rather argued a bit in conversation. From whom did you hear it?"

Chie named her source: "I had the story from Suou-san this morning, at breakfast. She was there at that party, after all, so it was direct enough to be free of embellishment."

A sidelong smirk from Shizuru. "Not that Suou-han is the type to refrain from being literary."

"Ye-es, but she doesn't exaggerate or add to important things. I trust her instincts in story-telling."

Shizuru shrugged, still seeming very casual. Chie took that as permission to continue.

"Just so I have it from your lips, though..."

"What actually happened?" Shizuru finished for her smoothly, demonstrating she was not entirely averse to taking the initiative in this dialogue. "He was making an ass of himself at dinner and troubling the host badly. I cut him down to size. He left a little early-though not as early as I would have wished. That was all."

Chie wilted secretly at the dryly concise depiction of something she considered so juicy and thanked her lucky stars again that Suou had been present at the event to tell her about it. It was not as though she could demand of Shizuru now to retell the story, after all, once the younger woman had delivered such a terse version: a laconic Shizuru was always somewhat menacing.

But she just had to risk a little tendril by putting it out, did she not? Just for a little probe, a little feel.

"Was it because of-" She hesitated, but finished the question, albeit tentatively. "Natsuki-san, I think?"

Shizuru answered without hesitation, because she understood her friend and understood her friend's need to ask her that thing.

"He was bothering her."

The legate let go of her earlier worries, immensely relieved that Shizuru was of a mind to respond.

"Suou-san told me that too," she admitted carefully. "Though the way she phrased it was more to the point, to be honest. She said he was 'harassing' her."

The younger woman smiled without a trace of amusement.

"He was," she concurred. "Asking so many questions of her across the table, turning the topic insistently in order that he could direct a query her way... The clumsy fool," she uttered softly. "I wonder if he actually thought to ingratiate himself to her with such a ham-fisted method. What a lack of finesse!"

She mentioned what Chie had been thinking.

"If Suou-han told you that he actually tried to berate me for answering his interrogations on her behalf, it is true," she affirmed flatly. "And that was when the argument began. But just so it is clear, I only answered for her because she wanted it of me."

Her eyes, still raking through the people on the docks, narrowed to a mere glitter under the lashes.

"Believe me, Chie-han, Natsuki wanted it of me. I know her enough to know when she requests- pleads something from me. Even without her needing to do any talking."

"Which was exactly what she didn't want to do before all those people, I guess-talking, I mean," Chie agreed wholeheartedly, having seen the same thing before from Shizuru and the Otomeian in question. She could easily picture the begging glance the girl gave her friend when she did not want to answer something, silently asking Shizuru to save her by doing it. And what lover could refuse such a request for salvation when it was done with that face, and that artlessly?

"I know, Shizuru-san," she affirmed. "I don't doubt she wanted you to."

"Masashi did."

The legate was derisive.

"Even I know she doesn't like to talk in front of so many, especially if she doesn't know them," she said. "You're right. That was plainly stupid of him."

"I did try to divert him at first. But the man's persistence was legendary."

"Suou-san said the other legates thought it was amazing."

"It rather was, if you count rank stupidity and lack of refinement amazing." Her gentle accents rode on the rise and fall of a salt wind: "He could not even see how uncomfortable he made my Natsuki."

Chie did not even comment on the unambiguous possessive, knowing the legitimacy of it.

"Poor Natsuki-san," she settled for saying. "How was she feeling?"

"Terrible," Shizuru told her, looking ferocious. "She hates being the centre of conversation at such meetings, and she had to suffer his barefaced attention all evening-which rather directed everyone else's to her as well. Suou-han may have already told you."

Harshness crept into her tone for the first time. "She was miserable about it all night, you know... all the more as he had to start such a scene over it, with me. It hurt her to know people would be talking."

She paused, expression powerless for an instant, and then repeated it.

" It hurt her. "

The legate knew of nothing to say to that, and wisely did not try to come up with something.

"She blamed herself for it," Shizuru concluded, face impassive again. "I blame him."

Chie's brow puckered: she was imagining herself and the woman she loved in the same situation, and was comparing her hypothetical reactions to those of her friend in reality.

"He's the one at fault," she concurred. "He acted like a fool, based on what I've heard."

"You heard right. I agree."

"Well, at least this makes sure she won't be liable to like him," she said, drawing a look from the other woman that made her flinch.

"Does that imply you believe she could have been liable before?" Shizuru asked tonelessly, which the legate was smart enough to take as a lethal warning.

"No, never," she answered quickly, adding a charming smile to the apology. "I'm sorry about that, Shizuru-san, really. It's not what I meant. My stupid tongue's to blame for it, since I wasn't thinking that at all. I just meant that the man was only killing himself further in front of your Natsuki."

The acknowledgement of ownership seemed to work, and Shizuru nodded, inclining her head silently. Chie, well aware of how many things were weighing on her friend's mind, did not tax the younger woman for her severity.

Suddenly Shizuru bolted away from the railing.

"Come, Chie-han," she said, already stalking across the oaken deck of the ship. "I am satisfied with the inspection. Let us go now, if you please."

Chie ran to catch up, knowing the other woman had sighted the girl for whom she had been waiting. Stopping only briefly for a word to the captain and his company, they made their way off the vessel and to wherever Shizuru had seen her Natsuki.

"Oh, there," the legate murmured, when she saw the Otomeian from a distance, even more easily identifiable because of the panther at her side. There were more familiar faces with them: the centurion's body-servant, Erstin, and Nina, Natsuki's cousin.

Shizuru headed for the party like a sight-hound hot on its prey, and Chie had a private giggle over the way people instinctively scurried aside when she approached. Why should they not? The look on the woman's face as she bore down on them was so intent it came across as minatory.

"I always wonder," the fair-haired Himean suddenly remarked, not even breaking stride. "How Natsuki sounds when she is speaking. In her native language, I mean."

Chie was puzzled. "But you've heard it, haven't you?"

"Yes, but I am talking about the feel of her speech, her diction, how she seems. It is hard to get the same effect when we communicate in Himean, since her patterns are changed by the effort of translation. As for her Greek, I think the form of her education affects the speech, since she speaks it so formally-like a philosopher or scholar. I cannot be sure that is her normal way of speaking, since I suspect she is heavily influenced by the chief exposure she has had to that language, which is through literary or scholarly texts."

"I thought she was teaching you a bit of Otomeian, though."

"Yes, but only a bit. We have been so busy lately that I have not been able to continue much of my lessons." She glanced at the other woman. "Not even the interpreters can tell me, since they do not normally hear her speaking, or not in a casual setting."

The legate lifted her eyebrows and suggested a better source of opinion: "Nina-san!"

But Shizuru grinned at that. "I already asked her. And all the girl could tell me was: She talks seriously."

They laughed.

"You can't deny that is a truth, Shizuru-san," Chie said, still grinning. "I suppose you'll be going back to the mansion?"

She did not even say 'office', because she could tell from the look of her friend as she eyed Natsuki that it was not the office to which they would be returning.

"Yes," Shizuru said. "If you would excuse me."

"Of course." They reached their destination, and the legate greeted the pair with Natsuki. "Good day, girls. Did Nao send you for me?"

Meanwhile, Shizuru faced her lover and took her aside.

"You are just in time. I just finished," she said, bending down and turning her head to show she expected a kiss to the cheek. She did it twice, so that both sides would receive the same attention. But she paused when her hand came upon the girl's back and felt damp. "What happened?"

She twirled her so that she could see it, but Natsuki's cloak was midnight blue, the shade near black, and the dress the Otomeian wore underneath was just as dark. "Why is your clothing sodden, Natsuki?"

Natsuki wet her lips. "Just a little."

She felt the thin back once more, displeased by the patches of wet she found all over.

"Still," she said, before it came to her. "Oh. Did you pass through the brush again?"

An embarrassed grin confirmed it; Shizuru sighed.

"I do wish you would stop taking such shortcuts," she said feebly, knowing it was partly because of her impatience of late that the girl made a point of such promptitude. She slung off her own cloak and used it to replace Natsuki's, throwing the Otomeian's soggy one over her shoulder. "No protests, please. I know your feet are wet too if your back is like this. Let us hurry back and get you changed."

Natsuki drew the fresher, drier cloak tighter and huffed contrarily. "Aaah. Don't need to hurry."

"Oh, yes we do: I shall not have you getting sick. Come on, Shizuki!" she called, looking over at her companion's pet, which had been happily getting attention from the other two girls. It ran up excitedly, and she scratched its head before it moved over to Natsuki. "Well, now. She seems happy."

They waved to the others, who bade them farewell.

"We saw a nice pup," the Otomeian explained, while walking. "Shizuki played with it."

"Ah." Yes, she had meant to talk to her about that, did she not? It was as good an opening as she could get, and she decided to take it. "Shizuki did not harm it, Natsuki?"

The younger woman was affronted.

"No!" She was earnest. "Shizuki will not do that. She does not harm things."

And what would we call what she did with my helmet's plume,
Shizuru nearly responded, but did not say.

"And not people too," Natsuki told her.

The Himean nodded slowly.

"A good thing," she said, watching the young woman's pet, which walked beside Natsuki like a fiendish familiar. It was that lazy time after most people had their midday meal, and the day was damp and very grey. There were not many persons on the street at this hour, but the few that were there were obviously stiffening or moving away from their path.

Three guesses why, she thought, noting the nervous glances at their feline company.

She came out with it: "She is getting large, Natsuki. I should not like her to get into a frenzy by accident and imperil some innocent in passing."

The panther's owner was offended again, ignoring the gasps of two passers-by who had just done a double-take at Shizuki, probably having initially mistaken her as an overlarge dog.

"She does not go into frenzy," she said, nostrils flaring for an instant. "Shizuki is nice. She is so-so-so good. She is good with you too, no?"

Shizuru nodded dutifully, unable to gainsay that.

"She never struggles with me," Natsuki continued. "You will see how good she is, also, if you watch her now with the bath. Ask Hermee."

She was talking about the head of Shizuru's personal staff, the Greek Hermias, whose name she had thus abbreviated because Shizuru had been interrupted the first time she introduced him, and been unable to finish the final syllable of his name. The cut-off version stuck, and even when Natsuki found out that it had merely been a mistake, it had gone too long for the girl to replace it.

Shizuru had once asked Hermias why he did not immediately correct Natsuki.

"It is not my place to question the young captain," he had replied, eyes twinkling. "I thought, Domina, that she was within her rights to call me whatever she wished. I thought too, if I may be so bold, that you would yourself permit it."

Whenever she asked Natsuki to call the Greek, Shizuru would see him smile secretly, his expression warm. Natsuki also seemed not to dislike him, perhaps because he always made sure her panther was cared for properly, without her needing to ask. He was never cool to her, for he treated her with the same deference he did his domina . And, while Hermias was beautifully slender and well-built, with sweet doe-eyes and curly hair thick as the bush of a hyacinth, Shizuru was not at all worried by this partiality.

Her pretty Athenian steward just happened to be a dedicated follower of pederasty.

"She does not hurt people," Natsuki was saying again. "She never scratches, and does-she does-lets you get her clean. She is well-behaved and quiet, even when she is hungry. And she is very smart."

It felt as though she were peddling the animal, thought Shizuru, entertained.

"And she never strays from me too far. She stays near, and behaves well. Too, she can fetch if I make her do it. She is also very clean... as you like. A good pet."

"Oh, very well!" Shizuru laughed, holding up her free hand in surrender. "I am buying it!"

"Huh?"

She put her hand on the crown of the younger woman's head.

"I see what you mean, meum mel, " she told her. "And I admit what you say is not without justice. The problem remains, however, that a great deal of people cannot see it, and will have difficulty believing what you know and believe. You remember how Chie-han stiffens each time Shizuki goes sniffing about her toes? That happened just now, if you noticed. Or what about when Aisuka-han and my other scribes turn into statues?"

Natsuki's brow wrinkled.

"I am not asking you to leash Shizuki perpetually," Shizuru went on. "But I am asking you to familiarise her with one again, so that when the situation requires it, she may not grow agitated should you put it on her. You used to put one on her recently, anyway."

"But she was not used to going out then," Natsuki rebutted. "And now she is, and does not need it."

"I know, Natsuki, I know." She tried again. "It is merely a farce, I know, for she does not need it, but it may be a necessary one on some occasions... say if we must go about a busy street, for instance, and more persons would be likely to be alarmed at the sight of her. Perceived precautions sometimes prevent accidents. We do not want Shizuki to be roused by some fool panicking, do we? It would not be her fault, but if she harms anyone accidentally due to that, if she gets frightened and happens to accidentally hurt anyone due to that-why, people would not be quick to blame the one who panicked in the first place. They would set on the mute creature instead."

Natsuki was still pouting, but could not resist contributing a touch of humour to the discussion.

"Who?" she said. "Me or Shizuki?"

Shizuru laughed.

"That depends," she said. "On which one of you happens to be more talkative that day."

The dark-haired woman nodded.

"All right," she said, after a moment's thought. "I will put on her a leash."

Shizuru pecked her forehead swiftly.

"Thank you," she said. "I am glad. I only want her to be safe as well, of course."

"Um."

They walked a little faster at Shizuru's urging and passed through the markets, where they saw a black man with an Egyptian merchant. It was Natsuki's first time to see so dark a person, so Shizuru slowed her walk a little there, to give the girl more time to see. Afterwards, they quickened their pace again, for she was impatient to get to their quarters: not just to get the Otomeian changed, but also since she had something else about which she wanted to speak. They entered the governor's grounds by way of one of the minor gates which led to a path through the gardens. No one else was present, and Natsuki bounded a little way ahead, calling to her panther to follow.

"Keep to the path," Shizuru cautioned, smiling. "The soil here too is soggy. You shall be getting even more water in your boots."

The Otomeian, bent over her scuffling pet, looked up. Her face was animated, and Shizuru saw that she had been keeping it in until there were no others to see.

"Black men," she said excitably, when her general had caught up. "He was from Egypt?"

"Yes, I believe. His master seemed Egyptian, and there are many such persons-people with black skin-in that country. I remember from my visit there." She looked down at her companion's bright face and remembered then how amazed she had been too the first time she saw them, when she was younger. "It must be a shock to you, especially when every one of your people has such pale skin. What do you think?"

Natsuki got the look she had when she was searching for a word.

"Whew!" she finally decided, to Shizuru's mirth.

"Should I be jealous?" asked the older woman cheerfully.

"No. Shizuru. They have many in Egypt?" she asked. "Of them, you said?"

"Yes. Waving palm-fronds and carrying litters the size of a barge, ever-trailing after the nobles or potentates." Shizuru painted the picture for her, since it was not something she had ever seen. "Some of their potentates are dark too, of course, but only along Egypt proper. Not so much in Alexandria, where the pale descendants of the Macedonians have a stranglehold on high positions. Nevertheless, the darker people are the true Egyptians. They have such skin, their complexions dark as jet, some so dark they approach the colour of your hair. Some are soft of sheen, and some glisten shiny-black. The dusk of their complexion is a wonder."

Natsuki screwed up her eyes.

"I have heard of them but not seen," she said. "I-I did not think they would be so dark."

" He was quite dark. There are others of lighter shades."

"He was like Shizuki."

Shizuru giggled. "Quite."

"Do they have black panthers too?"

"I do not know about that. I do not recall any, although I do remember that some of the royals keep lions."

Natsuki digested this.

"Egypt," she sighed almost longingly. "I have some things from there."

The Himean was surprised: her steps slowed a little. "You do?"

"Mm. Some traders passed, before, in Otomeia. Dark men too, but not so dark. Arabs." She glanced at Shizuru. "Arabs go everywhere, I think."

Shizuru grinned and asked what were her purchases.

"Some books. A big painted pot. Glass jars..." She broke off and turned to Shizuru with wide eyes, animated again. " Such glass!"

Shizuru smiled, honestly agreeing. "Egyptian glassware. It is beautiful."

She asked then, out of curiosity: "What made you buy them, Darling? You do not really strike me as the sort of person who comes to a market and goes haggling for the goods with the crowd."

Natsuki grinned, making no attempt to deny it.

"No-and I do not haggle, Shizuru," she said, eliciting a chuckle. "But they did not come to the market first. They went first to the palace, to show the King what they brought from far away, because their leader knows His Majesty. He always goes to show the King first." She squinted her eyes. "So I see them first, because I am often beside him."

"Ah, I see."

"Those, I bought. Because it was so-so different." She paused, trying to give more meaning to it. "I thought it was good to buy because... Shizuru, I think it was art."

"I am sure it was," her lover agreed. "What colours were they, the pottery you chose? The Egyptians are famed for the range and beauty of colour they produce with their faience."

"A lot of pretty blue and yellow ones. Violet too."

"Lapis lazuli, gold, and Tyrian purple? A royal sensibility indeed!" Shizuru said as she laughed. "And here I thought you would go with something more understated."

Natsuki was quick to defend her choices, since Shizuru had been teasing her more and more lately about her own aristocracy.

"I liked them," she said.

Shizuru whistled teasingly. "At least you have taste, imperial as it may be."

She received a dirty look.

"I am often with you," the girl reminded her testily. "Good for you to think I have taste."

"Indeed. You do pick great company." She smoothed the dark hair, which did not really need that attention. It was so flat and straight that it always described the shape of Natsuki's head, which was actually lovely, and so needed no camouflage in hairstyle. "I am always honoured to be in yours, Natsuki."

"Hmm!"

Then they were at their rooms, and Shizuru shut the door behind them and locked it. When she turned again, she found a rapidly undressing Natsuki removing her clothes. She stalked after her quickly, and saw the gooseflesh come up on the skin of Natsuki's back even before the dress was off. She bade the girl sit on the bed and wrap herself in a sheet.

"Even you can get cold," she said as she helped undo the Otomeian's boots, seeing the gooseflesh spread to the pale thin legs. She frowned when she removed a damp sock and touched icy feet.

"I keep telling you to avoid getting your feet wet," she scolded. "They are already so cold normally and now you are just tempting a chill. Colds have been going around, if you have not noticed."

"I never get colds."

"Even so. Take off the other boot now, please. I shall fetch some water and a cloth for it."

When she returned with the items, Natsuki had already divested herself of the other sock and boot. Shizuru washed and dried the girl's feet, refusing when Natsuki proposed to return the favour.

"No, just get in the bed and under the covers," she ordered, sitting on the edge of the mattress too when she was finished. She removed her own shoes and did the same to her feet as she had for Natsuki's. "Besides, I have something I need to talk you about and I must do it with a clear head."

She tossed the rag away and shrugged off cloak and tunic: every piece of clothing to the one around her hips. Natsuki watched her actions with confusion at first, but blushed knowingly when she lay on the bed, making no move to pick up all the items she had just thrown uncharacteristically to the floor.

"Now, meum mel," she said, taking off the last item of clothing on Natsuki. "Kiss me again, and properly, not on the cheek."

They moved under the heavy warm sheets and started, the two of them heavy and warm too and getting heavier and warmer with each passing second.

"But Shizuru," Natsuki gasped, moaning when she felt a hungry tongue swirl in her ear. "Said... talk?"

"Yes," the older woman agreed. "But I also said I needed a clear head."

"The-oh, wait-ah!"

"Forgive me." She looked up penitently, wheezing. "Did it hurt?"

"I... no."

"Then do you object to it?"

A blush, another mumble: "No."

Shizuru laughed shortly.

"Then be quiet and let us finish . No, on second thought: do not be quiet." She crawled down and got a cry for her pains. " Ecastor, but you're sweet, Natsuki!"

Later, when the urgency had been sated and the girl's scent was already evaporating from her mouth and her fingertips, she sat up against the wall and explained.

"It is hard to think clearly, sometimes, when you are with me," she said seriously, with no trace of jest. "I keep thinking how much I want you, and every other thought is about it. This way, it is not so insistent that I can no longer talk so coherently. But make no mistake-even now, moments after having you, I still want you. And that is why we need to talk, Natsuki. I know we need to talk about it."

The dark-haired woman was still catching her breath, head tossed carelessly back against a soft pillow. Her eyes slid slowly to Shizuru, the whites rolling into green.

"I just received a dispatch while I was inspecting the ship, and it said the other two legions should be here soon-in five days, in fact," Shizuru informed her restlessly. "That means I should be going in seven days, or in a week. I should be leaving in a week, Natsuki."

She saw the other's neck move and swallow.

"Shizuru-" Natsuki began, only to be cut short.

"No, not 'Shizuru', not with that tone, not again," Shizuru warned softly, arched brows closing. "Especially not after last night, with what that fool did."

She saw the embarrassment of last night return to Natsuki.

"My god," Shizuru whispered, aggrieved by the sight of her lover's pain. "I should have laid him out!"

"No, no." A calming hand touched her side briefly. "Just..."

"It was not your fault," Shizuru told her, repeating what she had been saying the previous evening. "It was his. Are you not angry with him for it?"

Natsuki answered with feeling: " Yes ."

"So am I. All the more as I know the reason he did it." Her forehead creased, face darkening. "You were too distraught to talk about it then, as was the case too for this morning. But I must tell you now, since I am sure you are aware of it. His reason, darling. You must now be aware of it."

The husky voice was lower than ever, a mere whisper: "It?"

Shizuru said it without pause and a little crossly: "The fact that he wants you."

Natsuki's eyes shut miserably, as though the very thought of being wanted by him were a blight upon her being.

"He did that because he wants you-and will do more than that because he wants you," the older woman said unheeding. Merely saying it aloud made her blood chill with rage. "I am not about to fault his taste, but I do fault his temerity. To try to-even while you are with me. He dared to do that while you were with me."

She snarled, not bothering to hide the feeling.

"You must be aware of what I am saying here. Are you, Natsuki?"

Again the thin neck convulsed.

"Yes," said the low voice, drawn out by her intensity.

Shizuru nodded, satisfied.

"This changes-may change-in a week," she told the girl. "You know I am leaving in a week, whether or not you come with me. You understand? Please answer me."

"Yes."

"Good. That is good." Her timbre softened, as did her eyes. "I am not trying to make it hard for you. I only want to talk about it, Natsuki, because I no longer have the luxury of treating it as a game." She took a moment to clear the lump in her throat. "But I have never thought of you as a game. You should know that, and how I feel."

Another brush of Natsuki's hand told her the girl did, and appreciated it.

"I want to talk now," she continued. "Because all this advance and retreat is making me crazy. I need to settle some things. A week, meum mel, is all I may have left with you."

The lump returned, and she had to groan to dislodge it. She looked nervously at her young woman.

"Is it wrong that I should want to talk about it? That I should want to sit down for a moment, just to talk with you?"

Her companion said nothing, but there were things in the green eyes that detailed what Natsuki found objectionable in the notion. Shizuru leapt to address them, her own eyes taken over by worries.

"I shall not be angry, darling," she promised in earnest, body twisted so she could look better at her companion. "Upon my life, I swear I shall not... fly at you, or... or anything of the like."

She shook her head despondently, suddenly wanting to kick herself for that past mistake, or slam her skull into the wall.

"And I swear to you that I am sorry I have ever given you cause to be wary of such a thing," she said, "for I never meant to do it. I never meant to hurt you before, Natsuki. Or now. Part of the very reason I want to talk is because I do not - I cannot stand the thought of someone hurting you, or doing something to trouble you. I never-please believe me."

There was a rustle as the girl rolled closer, kissing her where the sheets did not cover her hip. She put her hand on the Otomeian's shoulder and caressed it in response.

"I believe you," the girl told her, punctuating it in the way she did whenever she wished to lend her words added power, or final meaning. "I believe you. Shizuru."

The older woman bit her lip, reaching down to pull Natsuki to her body carefully. The younger woman's legs went across her lap.

"I shall not be angry," she promised again.

"Mm."

"I shall never hurt you."

"Mm."

"Do you really believe me?"

"I do." A steady look. "Shizuru."

They regarded each other tenderly, both afraid of the waters they were going to be treading.

"Is it all right?" Shizuru asked her, curling one hand over a naked thigh. "Do you think we could perhaps talk just like this?"

She earned herself a wicked little smile for that.

"Just talk?" Natsuki asked shrewdly. "Really?"

She smiled too. "Yes, for perhaps an hour, or however long I can manage not to be distracted by thoughts of assaulting you with a kiss."

She was surprised by a soft peck on her lips.

"All right," the girl told her, ignoring her wide eyes and resting against her shoulder.

Shizuru was in shock, not actually having expected the girl to finally give in.

"Really?" she asked stupidly, receiving a breath against her neck in response.

"We can talk," Natsuki repeated, her voice firm. "Shizuru."

Chapter 45

There is not much to be said, other than that this is the end of the first arc, but the story shall continue.

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Amo te (L.) - "I love you."
2. Andromache - Wife of Hector, Achilles' noble foe from the Iliad. The blind poet referred to in the text is Homer.
3. Augur - A Roman priest of divination, belonging to the College of Augurs. In the present setting, members are co-opted by their fellows, not elected by popular vote.
4. Bellerophon - See note for Chimaira
5. Cataphract - A military unit made up of a heavily armoured man on an equally heavily-armoured horse.
6. Chaire! (Gk.) - "Hail!"
7. Chimaira - The original chimaera was lion in front, goat in the middle, and serpent behind. Natsuki is written as using the Greek form (chima i ra, as opposed to the Latin chima e ra), though there is hardly a pronunciation difference. Bellerophon was the one to slay this mythical beast. Incidentally, the reference made to a lion and a snake is due to Shizuru's family seal in the story, which consists of a lion's head with a snake integrated into the halo of the mane.
8. Et cedro digna locuti (L.) - A well-known ancient expression, one of the highest tributes to a literary/written work; translated, it means that the work is worthy of being written on cedar. This alludes, of course, to oil of cedar, which was used to anoint valuable pieces of parchment to protect them from corruption.

9. Hector - See note for Andromache .

10. Mater (L.) - "Mother", just as Pater is "Father".

11. Mirabile visu (L.) - "Wonderful to behold."

12. NON AVROT SED AVROCHS - In miniscule letters: non aurot, sed aurochs . This is the "modern" way of writing it, by the way, but assume that within the reality of the story, it is written as all Ancient Latin used to be, i.e. without spaces in between words (NONAVROTSEDAVROCHS). The line recalls one of their conversations, found towards the end of Chapter 41, where Natsuki laughed at Shizuru for calling what should be "aurochs" (ancient oxen as tall as a man) "aurot" during some linguistic confusion. The meaning is: "not aurot, but aurochs."

13. Popa (L.) - A public servant assigned to the stunning hammer during sacrifice involving an animal.

14. Princeps Senatus (L.) - The head of the Senate or Leader of the House.

15. Quaestor (L.) - The lowest rung on the Roman Cursus Honorum or Way of Honour (the standard political track ascending to the office of consul). Quaestors for provinces were assigned to the arrangement of financial affairs.

16. Resurgam (L.) - "I shall rise again."

17. Sal Atticum (L.) - Attic salt: that is, wit.

18. Verpa (L.) - A verbal insult referring to the penis with the foreskin drawn back (in a state of erection).

19. Vestal, or vestal virgin - One of the women assigned to the priesthood of Vesta. Their chastity constituted the luck of Rome.

---

Inter Nos

par ethnewinter

---

Time, so the adage went, devoured all things. Shizuru found to her chagrin that crises could strip the literary triteness off adages like that. The week she had wanted to savour flew past, and left her feeling short-changed by Time, the Great Devourer. Too short, she wanted to complain, much too short! But what could any mortal do—even a mortal descended from Venus?—once tempus crunched its jaws?

Part of the reason time had been so hungry was that she had had so much to occupy her. Even setting aside the duties she had for the army, there had been so many other things left that she could not easily delegate. A master of organisational allotment, she nonetheless understood that there were items best handled by herself, and only left to another after having been properly founded. She had to settle arrangements with her local communications officer—or intelligence head—Yamada, such that the functions of his network would interlink with the core web she would be taking with her back home. She had to keep working on her letters campaign, gathering more supporters. She had to consult with those of her officers who had chosen to seek office with her replacement, seeking out those who were loyal to her and informing them of her plans to reassume the command.

She had to make arrangements for Natsuki, who would not be coming with her.

By rights this should make her bitter: certainly it had soured her mood during the beginning. But she had begun to view this rejection with acceptance. This resignation was the consequence of something that happened towards the beginning of the week, when she and Natsuki had their final discussion on the issue. That discussion ended with the refusal unchanged, but the acrimony over it gone: this because of a certain salve, which the younger woman kept applying to Shizuru in the rest of their time together.

The salve came, in part, in the guise of myriad attentions and favours, all of which the Himean received with delight. Each day of that last week seemed to greet Shizuru with a new offering, and while it made her so happy she thought she would explode, it also bewildered her a little. She had grown so used to indulging the younger woman that it continued to stun her, even after six days had passed, whenever it was the younger woman doing the indulging.

She said this to Natsuki the sixth night, after receiving yet another present: a chryselephantine jewellery box with her name carved into the lid.

"Oh, but this is too much now!" she exclaimed then, thinking of the other gifts the younger woman had thrown at her so recently.

"Already you have caparisoned dear Albinus almost to becoming a bejewelled cataphract! And you presented me with that set of cups and flagon just yesterday."

Her simple words did not do justice to the latter set of gifts, for the mentioned cups and flagon were huge-enough to make Shizuru wonder if it was intended to be a subtle comment on her alcoholic consumption-and cut from the clearest rock-crystal. Given the difficulty of finding chunks of this material big and pure enough for such use, said items were quite costly, and far more precious than if they had been made of pure gold. No stranger to fine things, Shizuru knew that. She knew, too, that the rest of the gifts Natsuki had showered upon her were equally absurd in expense. Playing the hypocrite for once, she clucked.

In her defence, she truly was overwhelmed. The streak of grandness the girl had been keeping under wraps had suddenly exploded, revealing the Otomeian as liberal with gifts as she was: there was a golden signet ring bearing Shizuru's arms and initials, along with an assortment of nine other bands, one for each finger and all inscribed with the weave pattern of the Otomeians; swords in electrum sheaths so heavily studded that they might have been rolled in gems before the metal cooled, leaving them encrusted with dozens of perfect little rubies and sapphires; a set of furs for both her furniture and person, including a lion-skin cloak infused with sweet-smelling unguents; and one of her favourite things in this impressive list, a tapestry heavy with gold and silver thread, depicting a hunting party chasing gigantic oxen under a banner that said NON AVROT SED AVROCHS. The mischief of the little monster, to actually give her this token of her gaffe! She had laughed herself to tears with that one, in particular.

"All that," she said, striving mightily not to giggle now as she traced the patterns on the box. Ah, but the richness of all these things-this was one relationship where parsimony would never be an issue, at least! Especially if what this onslaught of favour validated among her suspicions of Natsuki's past was true. Of course, it did raise some other queries. The evidence already stood to support her inkling that the Ortygian fortune had not been lost; however, she had to wonder exactly how large that fortune was. And how was it that Natsuki had retained access to it, if what she thought was right?

"Now this. I am becoming atrociously pampered!" she said, easily putting aside curiosity for now. She was too much of a legacy-bearer herself to go legacy-chasing, as another would have. "You spoil me, Natsuki . " Natsuki merely smiled and pointed out that Shizuru had not ceased in gift-giving either, and had actually started her own activity much earlier in their acquaintance.

"Oh, but that is different," the Himean replied. "Of course I should continue to dower you with presents. You know I am courting you."

A blink. "Eh?"

She echoed that playfully, tipping her head to one side. "Eh?"

"Eh-wuh-why?" Natsuki obviously found it ludicrous. " Court, Shizuru? Why?"

"Why not?"

The Otomeian swallowed, gulping air like a fish out of the water. Indeed, she felt very much like one.

"Shizuru," she said. "I said already thuh-that... that..."

She could not continue it, and Shizuru had to say it again for her, very warmly.

"That you love me? I remember."

Of course she remembered. How could she forget that? The day she told the Otomeian about her feelings was also the day she surrendered to the inexorable will that permitted Natsuki to deny her invitation to see Hime and Fuuka. Only a week ago, when she had drained all exhortations trying to persuade her, and only after receiving the final and unalterable 'no' had she decided to unmask the depth of her sentiments. She had told the girl that she said it only then because she had not wanted it to guilt her into changing her answer earlier.

Natsuki had not responded, or not verbally. Shizuru had expected that, for she understood that her girl was simply not a talker. So she was contented instead to read the wet in Natsuki's eyes and the outburst of affection Natsuki had exhibited at the time. Or, at least, she had tried to be content with it... because she truly did love her and could not stomach the notion of pushing for a reply when she understood so well how difficult speech was for Natsuki's tongue. As for asking the question itself-whether Natsuki felt the same way-well, she balked at the idea. That would be putting the girl too much on the spot, she decided, and she really did not care to have a confession in that manner, anyway. It was not until the next day that she apprehended how much she had internally sweated over the fact of not receiving a definite answer, for it was also that day any doubts were assuaged.

That day, the one after her confession, Natsuki had given her a necklace. It had been her mother's, said the girl, and she always carried it with her in a tiny cloth pouch, sometimes tucked into her pocket and sometimes between her breasts. Shizuru was not such a fool as to belittle what the relatively simple-looking item was worth, for she knew its value lay beyond the plain silver chain with the exquisite piece of chalcedony at its end. She had seen the pouch holding it several times before, but had also assumed that the drably brown bag was merely a normal purse. She had not thought this treasure to be inside, and had certainly not expected this keepsake of Natsuki's mother. She had never imagined that unremarkable thing had contained something as precious as this.

And to think Natsuki yielded it to her.

Oh, her joy at that moment! It had been so great not even she could believe it, and had whispered out, voice shaky because she knew the answer to this already, if that act meant what she thought it did. Whereupon she was met with an equally anxious, frightened reply.

Two women famed for their bravery in battle: both reduced to quivering, knock-kneed girls at the subject. And even more curiously, ecstatic in that moment of weakness. Natsuki certainly seemed happy-though she also seemed frightened-and Shizuru herself had gone into silent rapture. Outwardly, she had done nothing more than embrace the girl and kiss her and caress her every way she knew how, uttering her name. Inwardly, she had crowed like a lunatic.

Why not crow, she asked herself later, when finally able to settle a little and enjoy the thought with some calm. Natsuki loved her! How wonderful was that? How glorious? All other loves that had been offered up to her were suddenly moot. She cast them from that tiny part of her ego where they had been stored before. In this Natsuki's confession changed her, as much as her own confession had. She felt like a woman having been made to settle for vinegar all her life, suddenly given a taste of true wine. The difference between Natsuki's love and all those others could not even be reduced to only the girl's looks and nature, nor even to the force of Shizuru's feelings. Put very simply, it was this that caused her to value that love so deeply: of all those who had offered her their hearts, only Natsuki who had known her.

Natsuki knew a Shizuru few others did, a Shizuru that (by her own admission, it must be said) could be immensely trying to love. She did not see Shizuru with illusions because-and this was something Shizuru had begun to appreciate only through these later days of their acquaintance-Natsuki had little-to-no illusions to shade her sight. That recondite mind in the girl made its own assessments autonomously and with ruthlessness, as shown in how her eyes seemed to say, after receiving an outside evaluation for a thing, Yes, thank you for that, but of course I shall decide fully once I see it for myself. She rarely made the mistake of thinking an opinion was a fact, nor cherished hopes so overwhelming that they convinced her a desire would become a fact: she was too naturally practical for the first and too historically tragic for the second. In her were combined the enigma of the Arabian attitude with the science of the Grecian mind; if there was anything in which she could be lost, it was not a mist of fantasy, but a maze of thought.

So Natsuki had begun her true evaluations of Shizuru almost independent of public opinion, and they were evaluations based on nearly six months of unparalleled observation. The girl had seen enough by then to know that under the subtlety of Shizuru's veneer was a frightful intensity, and knew also that this intensity rode astride a murderous temper. She knew the Shizuru who lay beyond the farce of endless patience, a Shizuru who could claw as well as any harpy when pushed, and who did not even need so great a push, in fact. She knew a Shizuru who could be strangely and obsessively egocentric at times, so jealous of what she considered part of her being and dignitas that she would destroy a hundred other beings completely for it. She knew the evils residing in the older woman, for she had seen them and seen how many they were. Yet she still loved her!

Which means, Mater, that it turns out to be my triumph after all! Shizuru concluded vengefully, brought to remember one of the admonitions her mother had given her on life. Many years into the past, that formidable woman had cautioned Shizuru not to expect too much from her lovers, or even her wives, when she took any of either. She had warned Shizuru not to let them know all of her.

"They shall not love you for what you are," she had told Shizuru, ignoring the flash of anger this caused in her daughter. "They shall love you for what they think you are. The true you is, regrettably, difficult to love. Looking at you now, I see too that you shall be difficult in love. You shall want to protect so badly that you shall consume. Passion is as much a gift as a shortcoming, daughter, and when it is like yours, it is extreme in both aspects. Oh, I know it makes you attractive to people! But in the end it can only either drive away or destroy, and I fear it is far more likely to turn out the latter, because they shall not have the strength to break free. You will scar the women in your life, Shizuru... and you do not need to hate them to do so, remember that. There are things that scar far more deeply than hate."

You thought my love would scar, Shizuru echoed in her head, still gritting her teeth at the predictions the woman had left: the woman who had known her; the only woman who had been capable of cutting her like no one else-until Natsuki, that is. But Natsuki never willingly cut her, whereas her mother often had. Not out of hate! To paraphrase what the woman herself said, there were things which cut more deeply than that. Sometimes she actually wished her mother were still alive, just so she could see what Shizuru had found. She wanted to show her mother this unique and wondrous creature who both knew and loved her.

You would see your prophecies given the lie, Mater, she thought in vindication. You had not foreseen this, nor did I: that the one I would find would not be a Himean pearl, but a foreign diamond... for this is the shining thing in Natsuki, the one that used to frighten me so much. It is what I cannot even scar, though I know I can touch it. And in the future, it is what I shall hold, safely and without marring its brightness, in my two hands.

It tempered her resentment to know that her mother had been right in at least one thing, however: that it would be a queer fish who could know Shizuru for what she was and love her for it, not just in spite of it. Her mother had even gone so far as to specify that it was likely not just to be a queer fish, but a blighted one too. Shizuru could not deny Natsuki was blighted. But she believed that she would be the one to soothe that blight, and possibly even remedy it.

Returning to the moment, she smiled and took the other's hands. "I know. I remember. I prize that knowledge." She laughed, still unable to get over her happiness over it. "Do I ever! Natsuki... dear, dear Natsuki."

"Then..." Natsuki shook her head again, flustered and flummoxed by the woman before her. "Why court? Me?"

Shizuru held her by the shoulders.

"I feel I must," she answered. "Because I am leaving now and though I love you and you say you love me you will not come along. I know, I remember your reasons as you gave them to me-that you cannot come because of your duties and because you truly do not wish to leave said duties so haphazardly. I understand your dedication, your sense of responsibility..."

She put her hand on the back of Natsuki's neck and went on: "But only a fool thinks that there are things which do not change, and takes these things for granted. I am a selfish person and when I return... I want your affection for me to have changed for the better, so that I may actually stand a chance of getting the answer from you that I really want. I said seven days ago that it would be the last time I asked you, for now; however, there is nothing to stop me from asking again when I return, since that shall be another time. My love is not so light that it would surrender so quickly."

Though Natsuki's face was bewildered for the most part, Shizuru thought it also held a gleam of pleasure at her declaration. She would not be able to confirm anything beyond that gleam, though: she knew happiness still caught Natsuki by surprise sometimes, so much so the girl would flee at its onset, to hug it by herself. The thought of Natsuki doing that made her feel very tender.

Sometimes, it also made her sad.

But she put away sadness for now, because she knew that they had only a little time together, and there would be time enough to be sad once they were apart. In the final days before she left Argus, Shizuru made heroic effort to avoid the gloom, doing it with a mixture of work and play. She blended the two with alchemical genius, travelling all about the province taking Natsuki for outings-while also gathering more clients by stopping at nearly ever house or villa of note that they passed. It was a most effective balance.

She was not above asking Natsuki to do her part as well. "For," she explained to the Otomeian, "I have never forgotten that you are a person of great stature amongst your people, as I am." She did not say that the other reason she asked this of her was that she knew Natsuki liked to have it asked. Shizuru was not fool enough to think that, just because Natsuki often acted submissive, the girl ever lost sight of her own importance. She had both the influence and willingness to help Shizuru in her task: she preferred to have Shizuru acknowledge that first. The tight-lipped princess without a nation was Shizuru's equal when it came to pride, if not ambition.

Whatever ambitions Natsuki possessed, Shizuru had yet to discover.

So Shizuru laboured and loved in one week, with hardly any interruption. Perhaps the only intrusions on her rhythm were the encounters with Takeda, who often succeeded in galling her during those brief meetings but never succeeded in putting her down. He often tried: he always failed. He shot a barb: she returned a boulder. This was not to say that Shizuru's retorts to his many quips were ever crude, of course. Rather, they were so wickedly acute that they pulverised his points to the dot. As indeed she had done when he asked why she had booked ships sufficient only for a legion when she had three to bring back. She had replied, as though in surprise,

"Masashi-han, I cannot believe you ask me that! Obviously, it is because I am honour-bound to use only the moneys allocated by Senate for the task, and the allocated amount comes to only a legion's worth of transport. I fear I shall have to take the rest overland, because it is not my right to spend lavishly my own money for legions that do not strictly belong to me, yes? Gods forbid I should be so corrupt!"

Which reduced him to red-faced silence, his chagrin the greater because the girl both of them wanted had been present at the time. And smirking with distinct amusement.

He had stopped bothering them after that incident, consoling himself with the crux of his triumph, which was that she would leave and the Otomeian would stay. He could afford to be poised, he thought. Thus it was that, on the last night before her departure, he behaved himself very nicely during the farewell dinner party held by the governor of Argus in her residence, smiling so serenely at everyone and everything that Shizuru was alarmed that some change had worked on him without her knowledge... until she realised he was already imagining her absence. She shrugged it away, unwilling to be bothered by the man any more than a fleeting second.

Besides, Natsuki was holding her right hand under the table. For nearly the full duration of the meal, she made do with her left.

There were, besides her legates and Takeda's, several other personages at the table. First were two new quaestors to replace the current ones in both Sosia and Argus, and there was a new governor as well, for the former province. His name was Ikita Senjou, one of last year's praetors.

He approached Shizuru after the dinner.

"I'm also coming with a summons for Suda Yuuji," he said, naming the man he was about to replace in the governorship of Sosia, and whom Shizuru had confronted for his indiscriminate sales of the Himean citizenship to aliens. "Tokiha-san told me all about it. He's to be arraigned for his crimes."

"Lovely," she said, voice as low as his; they were still in the Argus governor's atrium, even if they were distanced from the rest of the people. "But I doubt he shall return if you serve him those summons. Any attempt to call him back to the city shall have him smelling a rat."

"Oh, he won't. The summons is unusually phrased this time."

"How so?"

He smirked. "You've had the news, of course, that one of your fellows in the College of Augurs passed away?"

She nodded, as it had been mentioned in several of the letters she had received.

"Akko Morinaga Augur," she said, not averse to taking the roundabout way to his point. "She will be much missed."

He nodded. "She was getting old, however, so it was not a surprise. And her husband died a few months ago; she missed him badly. Everyone could tell."

"Indeed." She lifted an eyebrow, seeing what he was about to say. "Do you mean to tell me you are planning to summon Suda Yuuji to Hime by offering him an augurship?"

He smiled, enjoying her quickness.

"Not precisely offering," he clarified. "More like telling him he is under consideration and at the top of the list. No reason he shouldn't believe it. His family's distantly related to the Morinaga, and he's also well on in both age and political experience. No matter that it would be more logical for the College of Augurs to co-opt someone actually from the Morinaga family-which is what they really intend to do: they're discussing giving it to one of Akko Morinaga's nephews-Yuuji'll believe it because he'll want to! No one refuses an augurship, and everyone wants it."

She agreed. It was a distinction to be a member of one of the priestly colleges.

"No one knows about the case being prepared against him, since it's all kept tightly under wraps by the few who know it. He won't know it's a trick until he gets back home, all eager to get one of the elite augurships-and then, whack!"

She chuckled. "The sacrificial bull, unaware of the hammer until it drops him."

Ikita snorted. "The sacrificial bulls are clean. This one's dirty all over."

"A cockroach, then, unaware of a descending boot," Shizuru amended, choosing an insect she found especially loathsome because it was so unclean. "I am so pleased things moved so swiftly. May I know which papa shall be pounding him?"

His smile was sly.

"Our Princeps Senatus," he purred.

Shizuru laughed, guessing that Senator Tokiha was responsible for this coup; securing Reito Kanzaki as a prosecuting advocate was as good as a bill of conviction. She had to remember to thank Mai for talking him into it, as she had no doubt the female senator had done.

"Good luck to the defending advocates!" she said.

"Not all the luck in the world could help them," Ikita scoffed. "No advocate could defeat the Princeps given a fair jury."

"I know at least one advocate who could, as a certainty."

"Who?"

Me. She did not say it and changed the subject, however, by asking him how they found the evidence she had supplied.

"Solid," was his verdict. "Aside from the mass sales of citizenship, there were the notes on his peculations and connivance with the tax-farmers. Of course they don't really matter: they're just kindling to the real fire that will burn the senatorial arses. We know it's normal for a governor to make a little money on the side by selling some citizenship here and there for an incredible price. But selling citizenship on the scale Yuuji did, by the hundreds?" He whooped, sounding like a boy. "Half of them will be so envious they'll push for a conviction."

"True: he would have been absolved had he done it in moderation," Shizuru said, grinning. "As for the knights of the jury itself, I suppose their concern shall be more for the elitist principle, however. The Ordo Equester is essentially conservative, and thus against all notions of diminishing the exclusivity of the Himean citizenship by bestowing it so freely to foreigners... unless there lies some significant profit for them in the act, of course. But what Suda Yuuji did benefited only him."

She paused, considered it, and nodded: "They shall convict. But I imagine he would prefer to go into voluntary exile instead of wait for that, once he sees how the odds are stacked. If he stays to the end of the trial you have planned, the sentence shall likely be one of exile anyway."

"Quite right, so you're right that he'll do the smart thing and leave quickly," he answered. "But what we're after isn't so much to punish him directly as to make an example for future governors who might be tempted into doing what he has-and for that, we need him to at least make an appearance in the courts. Public humiliation. After that, he can go running off into gods-know-what backwater. The point will have been made."

"Very well then." She inhaled languorously, looking contented. "Yes, I like it."

"We knew you would," he answered complacently. He had been in on the scheming for the capture of Yuuji, as his brother was a regular prosecutor on the Bribery Court and one of those in on the matter. That brother, the elder Ikita, had been the one to whisper in a few senatorial ears about Yuuji's misdemeanours, convincing those who mattered that it was time to replace the governor of Sosia with someone more savoury—who just happened to be his brother, the younger Ikita. All in all, he thought, working with Senator Tokiha was proving to be a very profitable association. Ikita had been afraid of getting his own version of a backwater for his provincial governorship this year, but Sosia was definitely better than what he had feared, even if it was in this wretchedly damp, cold land. He would have ample opportunity to enhance his purse... but would be certain not to include selling the citizenship as one of them.

"I take it one of my fellow augurs is part of this?" Shizuru asked him.

He answered the real question behind it, naming the augur who had started the gossip about considering him for membership.

"The Princeps also intends to file the accusations as soon as Yuuji arrives," he continued. "The man will no sooner have set foot on our city again than he'll be scouring the list of advocates for someone to defend him. Pah! Nothing to defend. You said it earlier: the conviction is practically assured. Even if he's a Yuuji, they're not a power these days. Too impoverished, too long since one of them got in the consul's chair. That's a family that's used up its clout."

Shizuru touched a tapered finger to her chin.

"They are related to the Terauchi," she noted, naming another Famous Family that was not impoverished, and not without clout either: the last Terauchi in the consul's seat had been only five years ago. "And related by marriage to the Akagi." A staunchly conservative family, long-standing members of the Traditionalists. Also not without clout. "I wonder if that shall present problems."

Even if she said that, she did not look at all worried. Ikita wondered if she was even capable of it.

"It won't be a problem," he replied, smiling at her with genuine liking.

Surprising to find that he liked her confidence. It was often something he found grating on others, but not on her. Now why was that? She was so young! And yet none of her confidence came off to him as the arrogance of youth. He suspected she could back it up firmly.

"I'm beginning to suspect one of the few lacks you have, Fujino-san, if not the only one. You don't chinwag as much as you should!" he told her, softening the friendly criticism with a laugh. "If you'd been reading the letters your more gossipy friends back home have surely been sending you, you'd know that the Akagi have recently cut ties with the Yuuji."

"Oh?"

"Yes, ever since a row between our Yuuji's first cousin and that cousin's wife-an Akagi-whom he's divorced rather bitterly. As for the plebeian Terauchi, they might be popular among the masses. Always were, after that lunatic one of them who tried to stir up a popular revolt. But they've no clout with the upper classes, precisely because of that reputation. The only reason Ryu Terauchi got elected consul a few years ago-five years past, I think?-was because-

"He's actually a Terauchi only by adoption, but really a conservative Higurashi by birth as well as loyalty," she said, laughing too at the intricacies of Himean society. "They let him be adopted by the Terauchi because the Higurashi family fortune was too small to pay for more children to go into a political career. However, they also adopted him out too late for him to grow up naturally aligned to the Terauchi's plebeian cause: he was already past adolescence when it happened. Thus, Ryu Terauchi by law was actually Ryu Higurashi by allegiance. Or so it was said. Yes, now I remember!"

"Not enough, you don't, or you forgot to mention it if you do. Ryu Terauchi, really a Higurashi, was also under the thumb of his mistress, who was a Wang-another conservative family, take note!"

"Duly noted," she giggled, honestly entertained by the intricacies of Himean social alliances. "Oh, you are right, Ikita-han. I should indulge in gossip more often. I do believe I rather enjoy it too."

"Should," he agreed. "It's un-Himean not to. Don't worry, Fujino-san, he'll go down."

She nodded, pleased by this Senate-sent replacement.

"I hope he does," she agreed. "At any rate, my thanks for the information, Ikita-han. I wish you well in your new province."

"Only regret that I couldn't have been here earlier to work with you. No insult to your replacement, but I just wish you weren't going yet." He stopped, remembered something. "You're going tomorrow."

"Yes?"

"Word to the wise. The conservatives are waiting for you." He nodded to her. "Don't know what they'll try, but they're boiling, all right. Armitage in particular is sore."

Shizuru smiled back, imagining the prognathous set of her old foe's countenance.

"Is she ever not?" she said. "I expected it."

He grinned. "She'll be grudging that you'll get a triumph aside from having been returned at the top of the praetors' poll in the elections. She was denied her triumph recently, if you know."

"Oh, I do!" she laughed lightly. "That piece of gossip I simply had to learn."

He laughed too, and they concluded their talk. He left her with an affable reminder.

"If you ever have a question about what's going round the rumour mills," he grinned. "Just ask me!"

After he had left, Shizuru found herself ranged alongside her friend, Suou.

"I see you've met Ikita-san," the younger woman said.

"I like him. Sharp. Not as venal as the man he is replacing."

"Oh, yes, he's honourable. His family's hard up for money, though."

"Ah?" Shizuru smiled, understanding the suggestion. "Then let us hope he considers me worthy of an application for a loan."

Suou nodded and began to step a little further away from the others. Shizuru followed her.

"A quick word," the Himemiya said, as they stopped beside an open window.

The two tall women moved closer together, bestowing open smiles upon each other at the same time to confuse anyone watching into thinking they were merely having a casual after-dinner chat.

"This is your first time to meet Masashi's senior legate too," the blue-eyed woman said.

"Yes, indeed."

She caught sight of him from the corner of an eye, talking to the Argus governor and Takeda. Masashi's senior legate was a man of noble family, one of those that had also recently suffered deficiencies in the purse-so many of the Famous Families were skirting penury!-but had suffered no deficiencies in the countenance. The Ushida were famous for producing good-looking men and women, and this one was a specimen, a rich brown beauty from russet hair to honeyed skin. He was quite chummy with Takeda too, Shizuru thought, from the way they slapped each other's shoulders.

Suou spoke. "And?"

A pause from Shizuru at this invitation to assess the man, whom she thought an abrasive and stuck-up xenophobe. She said, however, with some conciliation: "He seems an interesting one."

"He's a stuck-up, xenophobic ass," said Suou.

Shizuru's eyes danced.

"I'm worried about him."

"So am I," Shizuru admitted, grave again. They were talking very quietly now, their voices hardly more than breath. "No doubt the man knows his warfare. I can see that, and someone told me about his record earlier. He would command troops well."

Suou said the rest: "But wouldn't do the same for foreign auxiliaries, which brings up a problem with the Otomeian auxiliaries."

"He would be likely to antagonise them," Shizuru answered. "Cannot be let happen."

"I'll keep them apart," Suou promised, letting a touch of anxiety into her voice. "I'm angling Masashi into giving me leadership of the cavalry, since I have more experience with horse than most of the officers on his staff, and the Otomeians know me. I think he will give me that, but it's better to be sure. So, I wanted to ask if you could talk to Natsuki-san for me tonight about conferring with the other Otomeian barons to support my bid for the cavalry headship. I intend to follow up myself, of course, but I imagine it would be better if you were the one to ask her first."

Shizuru agreed readily.

"I've also been working on him about that idea he has about leaving the Eighth to garrison Argentum alone," Suou continued. "You know he's also getting rid of the rest of the cavalry, right?"

The former general of the expedition heaved a frustrated sigh, making it apparent she did not care at all for her successor's decisions.

"And keeping only the Lupine and archery divisions, so I hear," she grinned, her eyes remaining cold. "Interesting decision."

"He's saying the cataphracts eat too much," Suou answered. "I have to admit they do eat quite a lot, what with those hulking beasts they have for horses-not to mention riders!-but I'm irked to lose them. They have so much stun power! Aside from the Lupine division, those units have the greatest shock effect on the Mentulae."

"If that is his reason, he might as well dispense with the Lupine warriors and keep the light cavalry instead," Shizuru replied contemptuously. "Most of the Lupine troopers' horses are as enormous and costly to feed as the cataphracts."

"You know why he's keeping the Lupine unit."

"Yes," Shizuru said flatly. "I do know why."

They smirked humourlessly at each other.

"I shall talk to Natsuki," said Shizuru. "Please talk to him about his unwise arrangements."

"Yes, but it's hard. He's surprisingly mulish."

Shizuru nodded, not finding it as surprising. "Nonetheless, please keep trying."

"I will do my best." The other Himean tossed a lightning glance at the man himself, who had approached Shizuru's bodyguard. "You had better fetch her now."

Shizuru, who had noticed him the moment he headed for the Otomeian, actually shrugged. Suou was astonished.

"Only if you are finished," was all the crimson-eyed woman said.

Suou stared at her, almost-grey eyes wide.

"You're not concerned about that?" she asked, hardly able to believe her friend's nonchalance.

"I do not imagine he is too comfortable," Shizuru answered, looking out the window to watch the spires of smoke from houses, ghostly fingers reaching up into the dark vault of the sky. "There is a reason I left Natsuki with Nao-han, anyway."

Suou hid a grin behind one hand, for Takeda was turning a purple glare to the primipilus at that very second, shooting a mortified look at Shizuru's girl before that.

Of course, she thought. Nao would despise him.

"So I see," she agreed. "Although I still thought you'd be concerned that he's within Natsuki-san's immediate vicinity."

"It had to happen some time, much though I do not like it," Shizuru replied, finally turning away from the window to give Natsuki a beckoning nod. "After all, I am leaving tomorrow. She is not."

Suou nodded to that.

"But I'll be on hand to watch over her, as promised," she stated. "Any last instructions?"

"No, I believe I have already about exhausted you from them." She tilted her head. "Unless you have changed your mind about my request to read to her from time to time?"

"And disappoint her by being unable to read at a glance? No thank you, I would rather not be compared to you and found wanting!"

They were smiling when Natsuki arrived.

"I'm sorry for taking up her time, Natsuki-san," Suou said, addressing the girl pleasantly. She concealed her smirk effectively as her eyes brushed over the Otomeian's fashion for tonight, specifically the way she had chosen-or been made, Suou amended-to wear her mane. The crow-black hair was pulled up, swept severely away from her face in a bun held up with golden pleats.

Suou understood and divined the purposes in an instant, for this point was actually one of warfare and she had a natural touch there. Aggressive action. The upswept style revealed the foreigner's beauty in one definitive shock, removing any mundane artifice or softening effect the hair might have had on the young goddess's face. And what a face it was, thought Suou, who had never seen the foreigner's visage so exposed before. Exquisite in structure, almost Himean except for the delicate straight nose. Lovely too the black-haired, ice-skinned and green-eyed colouring. Those eyes were too green! Oh yes, the girl was unearthly. Shizuru's Natsuki would be beautiful to old age, it was sure. And would continue to disturb many a man's and a woman's sleep.

Shizuru obviously knew this, and had probably made the Otomeian appear so to make sure every person who had not seen her yet would-while she was still conveniently around to remind them at the same time to whom that beautiful creature belonged. If any of the guests happened to miss her proprietary actions, he would be hard-pressed to miss her mark: on the upper part of the girl's neck and near the bottom of an ear was an outline of perfect teeth. It had provoked a giggle between Chie and Suou, seated next to each other at dinner, when the former remarked quietly that it reminded her of the markers of the pomerium, Hime's sacred boundary.

"He did not bother you overmuch, I hope?" she enquired playfully, wresting her eyes away from the scarlet of Shizuru's bite.

Natsuki shook her head, seeming tickled by something too. She explained it briefly: "The primipilus."

The two blondes facing her grinned.

"Tongue-lashed him, did she?" Suou guessed, stealing a peek. "And still going at it! Gods, she would have made such a senator."

"She would bring down the House with her invectives," agreed Shizuru, mouth quivering uncontrollably. "Tell me what she said to him, later, Natsuki. No doubt this one shall get it from Yuuki-han herself."

"It's an art, the way Nao does it."

"She said to teach me," Natsuki said unexpectedly.

Shizuru and Suou stared at her.

"What?" Shizuru said, uncertain she had heard aright. "She said... she would teach you? Invectives?"

Natsuki nodded.

Suou broke the short silence that followed, as Shizuru was still dumbstruck by the idea.

"Like, for instance?" she ventured, hugely entertained by the proposition. "May we hear one?"

The girl drew herself up splendidly, nearly preening under their attention-she rather liked the Himemiya too, though not in the way she liked her lover-and thus further stupefying Shizuru.

" Cunnus," she said demurely.

Suou tacked her lower lip with her teeth; the other Himean did not have the presence of mind for that, for her mouth actually hung open. And there was the main character in this farce, still looking grand for having delivered. Oh, better than a play! If only she could laugh! And to where had Nao disappeared, for she had been standing only a few metres away earlier?

"Brilliantly done," Suou praised, the words only a little choked. And because she could be cruel in mischief, because she really was dying to let loose a gale of laughter, she asked: "Are there any more?"

The Otomeian pursed her lips and frowned in thought before looking up, smiling as sweetly as a Vestal. She opened her mouth.

" Ver- "

Shizuru hurled out a pathetically feeble cough.

"Excuse me," she said shakily, throwing an accusatory glare at her friend, who was obviously trying to push down a cackle. "That was impressive, Natsuki, but I have just realised it is so late. I am afraid we really should go now."

"Oh." Natsuki was unfazed. "Mm."

"What a pity I can't hear more. It really was very good," Suou told her, ignoring Shizuru's dry look. "Well, I suppose, in the future."

It was Shizuru who spoke, her voice caustic: "Suou."

"I'll call Sugiura-san over and tell her you two shall be taking your leave," Suou interrupted, her flight response initiated by Shizuru's increasingly baleful glance. "See you in the morning, Shizuru-san."

Shizuru exhaled heavily, giving her a wry smile. The other patrician turned to leave. She stopped halfway, however, and smiled in a friendly way at Natsuki.

"Oh, Natsuki-san," she called back. "You look lovely this evening, by the way."

While she went off, Shizuru turned to look at her companion, who returned the look with a smile in her eyes. Shizuru took a moment to touch the join of the Otomeian's dress at the shoulders, pleased by the cloth's softness. The dress revealed a generous amount of skin too, even softer than it, and enough to see the enormous black pearl nestled between white breasts.

Shizuru nodded in satisfaction; she had been the one to dress her.

"Well, Scamp," she began, with a languishing sigh. "What have you been learning?"

The scamp answered with superb delicacy.

"In-veck-tive," pronounced Natsuki.

"Or more properly in this case, curses, " Shizuru retorted. She was tempted to approach her primipilus-currently with some other legates at the far corner of the room-and give the reprobate a good talking-to for coaching her girl in what was undoubtedly a moment of naughtiness. She knew very well that Nao had done it primarily for her reaction. "You know they are curses or vulgarities, yes? Do you know what they mean?"

Natsuki was puzzled by her queries, but answered yes, of course she did. She had asked the primipilus, had she not?

" Cunnus, " she said with great authority, "is from the female parts of, um, sex."

Shizuru, who had winced discreetly at the repetition of the oath passing from the girl's lips, asked her if she knew what the other word-the one she had been about to say before interruption-meant too.

" Verpa ?" Natsuki answered innocently, unaware of Shizuru's savage bite on her tongue. "A scabby dog with a bald head."

There came a great suspended moment where Shizuru debated the merits of knocking her own head on the wall and crumpling to the floor in laughter. Before she could decide to do either thing, up came the governor to say goodnight. The goodbye, the woman said, would have to come in the morning.

She also asked if Shizuru was feeling well, given the odd look on the younger Himean's face.

"I believe I must have overindulged a little during dinner," Shizuru said smoothly.

The governor stared at her in disbelief.

"Hard to believe, since you ate so little!" the woman cried. "The two of you did. Well, I won't take umbrage for that, since I know it's probably just the excitement of the past few days. Just take care of yourself. Bad to be ill right before a sea crossing. It's hard on the Himean bones!"

They parted and left the room after a few more goodbyes to the others.

"She is right, though," Shizuru said as they walked away and to their room, which the governor had promised to retain for Natsuki's exclusive use for so long as she would be in Argus-as Shizuru had arranged. "You ate so little, Natsuki. Again. This has been going on for... I think the past week. Even more than usual."

"You too."

"The wine was good though," she said, relinquishing the point to move to another. "Did you like it?"

Natsuki allowed that it had been good wine: the servers had mixed a fine white wine in special spring water for her-again, as Shizuru had arranged. The Himean had come up with the idea recently that Natsuki might indeed prefer whites, since they were lighter. It had not really occurred to her before because, like every other Himean, she tended to think only in terms of reds.

"She opened some of the best amphorae in her cellars for the occasion," she said, before speeding straight to their earlier topic. "Let us return to what we were talking about before Midori-han arrived. Where did you come up with that definition of, um, verpa?"

Natsuki shrugged. "Primipilus."

Shizuru winced again.

"I am sorry," she said. "But she misled you."

"Eh?" Natsuki stopped walking, furrowing her brows. "What?"

"That is not what it means and she knows it," Shizuru clarified, stopping too, but only to urge the other to keep moving. The young woman did so, but with a stamp of the foot that rather tested Shizuru's control on her amusement.

"She lied?" the Otomeian cried, impetuous and angry. "She lied to me?"

Shizuru nodded, surprised when the girl pivoted-with an obvious intent to return to the room they had just left-but she managed to turn her neatly back towards their quarters. She held the girl's hand as the latter fumed. She also explained that the primipilus had probably only done it for a jest, being famous for doing such things even to her friends.

"But why?" Natsuki said, two little red spots on her cheeks. "And what does it mean, this word? Really?"

Shizuru sighed again. And told her.

The little red spots expanded to cover the rest of the girl's face.

"No," she whispered, incredulous. "Really? Shizuru?"

"Yes, I am afraid so."

"Grr!"

"It is all right, I am sure it was meant as a friendly joke-and one primarily aimed at me, in fact," Shizuru said soothingly. "Still, you see now, I hope, that these are rather bad words. Not very fitting for you, meum mel, so you should not be saying them . "

Natsuki was still nettled with Nao's trickery, however, and rounded on her in a flash.

"Why?" she demanded. "I can say! I curse too!"

Shizuru smiled helplessly, knowing the girl was not really angry with her. Besides, she guessed that Natsuki was a little affected by the wine, light as hers had been. Having been forced by the circumstances to maintain an appearance of involvement in the gathering, she had chosen to do as Shizuru had done, which was to drink more than eat. And, although what the girl had imbibed was hardly enough to warm a regular drinker, she was a terrific lightweight when it came to liquor.

"Do you?" was all she answered.

"What?" Natsuki demanded again. "I what?"

"Curse. In your native tongue."

"Yes!"

"Beyond these words, I mean?" Shizuru continued, proceeding to recite some Otomeian words the girl had taught her by her own urging. These were words she had noticed Natsuki muttering often when she was angry or irritated, and they stood for "idiot", "stupid", "incompetent", "damn", and "worthless". Very light, as far as curses could go, and none of them the equal in salt of the Himean cunnus . As indeed the girl seemed to realise, deflating rapidly as Shizuru enumerated her favourite oaths to her face.

"Well?" Shizuru asked, once the list was done. "Do you use any more beyond these?"

The red was standing out more angrily on Natsuki's face now, although her voice was small when she answered.

"No."

"Are any of these as bad as the ones Nao-han just taught you?"

The Otomeian was still sulking, but shook her head awkwardly.

"But I can say if I want!" she insisted, though both of them could hear the unwillingness as she spoke it. "I can say buh-bad things! If I want..."

She trailed off, and Shizuru, who could not bear to see her embarrassed like this, stopped to pull her into a fierce hug.

"Of course you can!" she agreed strongly, raining kisses on the young woman's face even though they were outside, not yet in their room. "I am only saying that you do not need to. But you can. You can say anything you want."

Natsuki grumbled quietly under the attention, finally subsiding into appeased silence when Shizuru's lips turned to her ear.

"You can say anything you want, if you truly want to," Shizuru reiterated in a whisper, letting her eyes drop to the schist-tiled floor as she felt Natsuki's tension slacken. She kissed her again, telling her they should go to their room for a bath.

"It may help with the irritation... as well as the weariness," she said tenderly. "I am tired, and I know you are too. I am sorry we had to go to a late dinner party instead of just staying in and resting. I am sorry too that Nao-han did that to you, but I am sure she did it not out of any ill nature-as I said, she treats her friends similarly. I shall talk to her in the morning, but I know she did not do it to hurt you. Please do not bear her any ill will for it, Natsuki."

Natsuki disengaged herself gently and looked up, clearly expecting something more. Shizuru gave it.

"And I am sorry I tried to tell you what you could or could not say," she said quietly, knowing nevertheless that it was really her triumph: Natsuki might have the option of saying "bad things" if she truly wanted, but the way her face had looked at learning that Shizuru did not like it was as good as a guarantee that she would not. Shizuru did not pause to think on whether this subtle calculation made her guilty. The desire to keep Natsuki free lived also with a desire to impose upon her some authority. This day, of all days, she needed to know she exerted upon Natsuki a fraction of authority.

When they reached their room, both braziers and lamps had already been lit, and the bath in the room adjacent already filled with hot water. Shizuru had beckoned one of the slaves to her towards the close of the dinner they had just left, in order to order these things prepared and ready upon their return.

They went to bathe first of all, as was their wont, where she cheerfully remarked that perhaps she now had an opportunity to wash out the other's mouth until it was clean. Natsuki predictably scowled-and splashed water into her face.

"And if you do," the Otomeian added. "Wash yours too."

"Mine is unsoiled."

"You say bad things."

"I?" Shizuru was amused. "I never curse like that."

"Bad things. I never said cursing, Shizuru," was the withering retort.

Badinage that continued until they were done and returning to the bedroom, both wrapped in warm robes with linen towels. By that time, the older woman was talking to Natsuki about the other guests' faces during dinner. She laughed about it.

"You knocked them flat," she said gleefully, like a naughty child. "Even Midori-han, who always takes great pains to tell me that she would lure you away from me did she think you inclined to following her. Yet even she was staggered to silence when you walked in."

Natsuki said nothing, merely hiding her face behind her wet hair, which she dried with some linen. She sat on the bed, and Shizuru sat at their table, resting her chin on the knuckles of one hand.

"Mind you, even I was perishing for want of you," she noted truthfully, before eyeing her lover hungrily and muttering, mostly to herself: "Dear, dear, you shouldn't be allowed."

One green eye showed between threads of dark.

"I did it," the low voice whispered. "What you want."

"Indeed you did," Shizuru replied brightly, thinking of how she had convinced Natsuki into displaying the bite-mark on her neck. "Thank you again for that. I am sorry it was such a selfish request, darling. I shall make it up to you, I promise."

The other woman shook her head; the green eye was hidden again.

"For you," she told Shizuru shortly. "All right."

"I thank you," Shizuru smiled. "Come closer to the brazier, Natsuki, so your hair dries. Would you like me to comb it?"

Natsuki settled on a stool before her, the two of them enjoying the warmth and the other's presence.

"One bad thing about what I asked you to do tonight," the older woman sighed while drawing the comb through black locks. "They shall hate me for having you all to myself."

Natsuki murmured.

"Oh yes they shall-who would not resent me after having seen you like that?" Shizuru flattered her with a giggle. "Nothing new in that, so it does not alarm me. You know I get more than my fair share of hate among my fellows anyway. Even when I was in Hime."

Suddenly, the comb moving in Natsuki's hair stopped. When enough of a pause had gone on to make her think, she looked over her shoulder and to the older woman.

Shizuru met her eyes with wonder.

"I cannot believe I am going back tomorrow," she said baldly, as though this thing she had known all the time were a surprise that had crept up and ambushed her. "The days go so fast!"

Natsuki sucked in a breath, turning on the stool to face her properly. They looked at each other, both marvelling at how swiftly their time was drawing short.

"Oh god."

It was Shizuru who spoke, eager to disperse the fatalism that had settled upon them.

"Oh god," she repeated, shifting one leg over the other. She put a hand on Natsuki's knee. "Look at how strange we Himeans are, meum mel : our homes are actually the places where we have more enemies than elsewhere. Or is that normal, I wonder. There are so many of them back home who dislike me, you know. And all because the fools would like to imagine themselves my peers when they are not!"

Natsuki smiled at her lover's remark, diverted by the ego she knew well enough to assure her it produced that remark from no less than the truth. What counted as bald arrogance for others could not be for Shizuru, because she did not deceive herself about her own grandeur. Of course, the Otomeian allowed wisely, this could not be so easily attributed to modesty. Rather, it could just as easily be because Shizuru did not need to deceive herself: to be superlative in everything made self-deception redundant.

Natsuki felt at liberty to tease her.

"Because you are too smart?" she said, flashing beautiful teeth at the amused woman. "And too beautiful, I think the governor said?"

Shizuru put her head on one side and smiled.

"Do not forget 'too young'," she added unselfconsciously, poking Natsuki's cheek. "Older than you though I may be, I am terribly young among them, and they think me still wet behind the ears."

Natsuki found this a little confusing. She had always seen Shizuru as grown-up, not precisely ancient but ageless, and the perfect image of early adulthood. She had difficulty assigning the description "terribly young" to someone she had always thought beyond being immature.

"Really?" she asked.

"Really." Shizuru smiled. "I am a cub too."

"Lion's cub."

"And the snake's."

"And you climb up the politics-a mountain goat," Natsuki said, erupting into a fit of her throaty, delicious laughter. "Add all together-chaire, chimaira ! So they are afraid: there is not in them a Bellerophon!"

Shizuru took this sprinkle of sal Atticum with pleasure.

"Oh, you are so smart," she said sincerely, which brought on more laughter.

"I am," Natsuki agreed, after she had receded to a chuckle. "Very smart."

"And so modest."

"Not as modest as you," the girl countered slyly. "But if you say, then I wonder. You are a cub. Then, they are how old?"

"My fellows in the Senate?"

"Yes." Then, realising how better to phrase it, she elucidated: "I mean, what age do your people become part of the Senate? There is an age?"

Shizuru nodded. "Yes, actually. The age of entry is at thirty, though some enter at twenty-seven."

Natsuki was staggered. She wondered now how old her lover's legates were. So assured had Shizuru seemed among them, so established and confident, that it had never occurred to her that they were so much older in years.

"The Corona Graminea permitted me to enter Senate at the age I won it," the Himean reminded. "One of our laws states that that crown grants automatic membership into the senatorial body to its winner."

Natsuki was frowning. "You were nineteen. When you entered your Senate."

"Yes. I told you this before."

"But I did not understand," Natsuki continued to frown. "Now I see a little why they hate you."

Shizuru smiled. "Just a little? How old were you when you became captain of the Lupine unit?"

"Seventeen," she was told.

"Nearly the same age I went into battle for the first time! We were both barely more than children. Did you not experience resentment for that too, meum mel, from the older ones who perhaps felt themselves more entitled to the position?"

The Otomeian smiled apologetically.

"Yes, a little," she admitted. "But not very much. Sorry, Shizuru. I do not understand it all because I am not-um-it is that I am not Himean. For me, it is not only that I worked to become captain. I worked hard, yes. But also... I have a birthright to it."

Shizuru nodded, seeing where she was going. "And you think the same should apply to me too?"

"Yes... or part of me thinks this way," Natsuki said. "You are descended from gods-you have the highest birth. I think you have the right too. But this-this is not how your people think. You are not people of the kings and queens anymore. So I see only a little why they hate you." She paused to frown. "I will try to understand better."

The Himean grinned, falling more in love with her than ever.

"Even a little is enough, since I know it can be difficult," she assured the young woman. "And the mere knowledge that you do not understand it all is more wisdom than most will ever have in their lifetimes."

Natsuki was shy from the praise, cheeks alight.

"I shall be so lonely without you," Shizuru suddenly confessed. "It shall go hard for me not to be able to talk to you."

The ducking head snapped up.

"There was something I forgot to ask, the last time we spoke," the Himean went on, holding the other woman's eyes as they faced each other. "A request."

Natsuki enquired what it was.

"When I am gone..." She grinned suddenly. "Shall you write to me, perhaps?"

The younger woman smiled too, but without showing her teeth.

"Write?" she asked.

"Yes." She noted the hesitation. "Is there an impediment to that?"

"If I write it will be quick," Natsuki replied cautiously. "I cannot write so much because the letters... the mail will take long. Maybe you will get only a few before you come back."

"I care not," Shizuru answered. "Let them take long, so long as they arrive. I would like-perhaps I need-to know that you shall be writing to me. Everyday, if you can. Or every other day. If it is not too much to ask, I would actually prefer the letters to be late rather than rarefied."

Natsuki continued to be coy. "I am not... so good a writer, maybe."

"I am sure now that you are being overly modest. Even were you not, I would treasure each word from you. Letters from you cannot but be treasured." She winked at the other woman. "Et cedro digna locuti. Write in your scholarly Greek, for we both know it is excellent.

Or write in Himean, as you talk. I would prefer a letter, in fact, that speaks exactly as you always speak to me. But the decision is up to you."

"What will I say?"

"Anything you want. What happened to you that day. How you felt when you woke, and when you went to bed. How Shizuki is faring. What food you had to eat." She cast her a sharp look. "If anyone has been bothering you, and who."

Natsuki peeked up without lifting her chin.

"If... you will, too?" she asked. "To me?"

Shizuru answered without hesitation. "Regularly."

"Then..." Natsuki made her decision. "Yes."

"How often shall you write?"

"Very often, as you like," she said big-heartedly.

"Thank you." Shizuru kissed her. "You are so good to me."

"I am."

Shizuru arched an eyebrow, reflecting the other woman's smirk.

"Although you are a terrible brat," she said affectionately. "Now that we have settled that, I shall ask you if there is anything in particular you would like to do tonight."

Natsuki demurred, saying it was not her choice this evening, as indeed Shizuru was the one going away, implying she should be the one so indulged.

"My desires for tonight are simple," the Himean answered with a smile. "I would like to make love to you and talk: simply, to enjoy your company. Are you sure there is nothing you would like to do? You know that I would not refuse you."

Again the other denied it. Shizuru thought for a moment.

"Would you like me to play the lyre later, perhaps?"

And Natsuki, who loved music best of all the arts, betrayed that she had been hoping for the offer all this time, her face held tight but unable to conceal an eager radiance. Shizuru was pleased, for that was yet another way she could return the pleasure Natsuki gave her.

"I shall play something for you later," she promised her, beckoning with a finger. "But now I would like to see you, more than anything else. This is the last night I shall spend with you for some months. I must see you, meum mel. Undress for me, please."

Natsuki raised a recalcitrant eyebrow, but eventually did as she asked, not proof to Shizuru's pleading look. After a few moments, Shizuru asked her to turn around. She wanted an image of that faint-scarred back in her memory too.

"You shall be careful, Natsuki?" she asked seriously. "I would not like more of these on you when I get back. You stay away from danger." And under her breath: "I wonder if I really cannot convince you to wear a full cuirass."

"If a fight comes?"

"Then try not to be as recklessly daring as you usually are." Natsuki twitched, which she took as a dissent. "Oh, any fool with half an eye can see you are brave, Natsuki! I still think of Argentum sometimes- and my blood thrills. You were magnificent!"

Natsuki blushed. She had been magnificent, and she knew that. That had been the day she led the reserve cavalry from the forest to aid the swarmed Himeans, who had been deadlocked with the huge mass of Mentulae that had threatened to eat them alive. The magnificence Shizuru imputed to her actions was actually not even for that important act, which had been Shizuru's strategem from the start. Rather, it was for a specific manoeuvre Natsuki and Natsuki alone had authored: instead of steering all the troopers with her to the enemy flanks, Natsuki had actually detached two thousand of them from the rest to lead herself, her own Lupine division at the head. These two thousand she had led straight into the centre of the Mentulæan rear, every one of them shrieking like madmen.

Natsuki and her two thousand had taken the day: it was their savage rear assault that had taken the Mentulæ by surprise and cleaved their mass right down the middle, thus separating the enemy force into two manageable halves. After that, it had been easy work for the rest of the Himeans to surround each half and commence slaughter.

"You were the true heroine of that battle, not I," Shizuru told her. "Which is why everyone applauded you loudest of all during the awarding ceremony, when I was giving out the decorations. Oh, Natsuki... my sweet, beautiful, brave Natsuki. Were you Himean, we would have given you what I, among a very few others, have: the Grass Crown, the corona graminea. Instead, I had to settle for giving you a larger share of the booty when it was divided."

She decided to keep it to herself that she actually planned to give the girl another signal honour in lieu of the corona graminea. For what Natsuki had done during that battle, it would be reasonable to obtain for her a Himean citizenship instead. When she returned, she would be sure to do so with that surprise.

"Still, it was the corona you deserved," she proceeded. "Everyone knows how courageous you are, and these scars bear witness to it as well. In that light, you must also see that there is no pressing need to demonstrate it any more than you already have."

She put her hands on younger woman's sides.

"I am commander," Natsuki objected sternly. "Of my unit. I am to be the leader."

"You are commander of your regiment," Shizuru agreed, still intent on driving home the point because it was so important. "You are the leader. Doubly valuable, for you hold together the threads of all the others. A leader does not always need to go leaping first into battle, yes? There are times when the leader stays out of the battle entirely, in fact, in order to better survey the situation and call out the correct orders for the bugles to sound. What if something were to happen to you, who would do that then?"

"I have other... under-commanders."

"Who would be able to do your job as well as you do? I think not. It is precisely the reason they are the secondary or tertiary commanders while you are the chief." She lifted the long tail of blue-black hair to move over Natsuki's shoulder, leaving her view of the naked back unobstructed. "To remove the commander of a division is to behead it, remove the mind that governs the entire body. Many a battle has been lost because the commander was lost or rendered incapable for a few dire moments, when grave decisions needed to be made and the person best-equipped to make them unable to do so."

The young woman latched onto one of the supporting ideas all of a sudden, as was her wont.

"You think it is there?" she asked abruptly. "In the head? The part that thinks?"

"Hippocrates believes it is where the thinking apparatus resides, and I agree with him. Knock a man's leg and break it, but he will still be able to think and speak fairly reasonably if absolutely necessary. Knock him in the head and you shall find him unable to reason properly for his life."

A crackle of amusement from Natsuki. "Maybe because he goes asleep after you knock him."

Shizuru smiled. A brief interlude of silence ensued, wherein she merely studied the tapering column of Natsuki's back again .

Said the girl, "I will be careful."

"Good."

"You too."

"Of course."

Her hands were on the shoulders now, feeling the ropy muscles stretched over them like a bulwark of tiny ribs. She squeezed them before straying down, using her pointer fingers to track Natsuki's spinal canal. One hand left the path to hold Natsuki when she shied.

"Easy," Shizuru soothed, awed by the unremitting jolts her finger elicited just from stroking the channel of skin. "You really are such a colt."

She put both hands on two round cheeks, considering giving the girl yet another bite mark. The Otomeian whined.

"A little more," Shizuru haggled; she kissed the girl's behind, which shook. "Just let me see you a little more."

"Nn... me too."

"You too?" The older woman was puzzled and stopped her attentions. "What do you mean?"

Her human doll turned suddenly and draped herself across her lap, knees demurely together.

"I will see you too," she said, folding her arms to cover her chest.

"If you wish it. Stay up with me tonight?" Shizuru begged, stroking her skin. "I leave in the early morning, after all."

Natsuki's stare showed she had taken it for granted that she would stay awake. Shizuru nodded in acknowledgment and reached out to touch her leg, feeling the toughened sinews of one thigh before moving to a shin, which she used to pull up the lower half of the limb. She had intended to stop once it was horizontal, and would have stopped had she felt any jar to the upswing through which she took it, but she absentmindedly kept pulling since no resistance seemed to come her way. Before she realised it, Natsuki's leg was nearly parallel to their torsos. She froze, amazed.

"Ecastor!" Her stunned eyes met Natsuki's, placid and seemingly unaware of what had caused her to exclaim. One of the girl's arms had gone around her neck earlier for support, but she did not seem to be in any discomfort. "Does it not hurt, Natsuki?"

The younger woman looked surprised.

"No," she said.

"Really!"

"Mm."

Shizuru contemplated the angle of the leg once more before releasing a breath, shaking her head. She had known Natsuki was flexible, really, but not capable of this manner of contortion!

"Can you do this with your other leg?"

"Mm."

"My god. You could shame a Syrian dancer into suicide with that."

She took a moment to lower the leg slowly, and with reverence. She kissed it on the side first, however, since it was near her mouth then.

"You must have no joints to move your limbs so," she said. She grinned evilly, all of a sudden. "It gives me a few ideas."

She pushed her up and to the bed. She unfastened her own robe while following her down and straddling her at the waist. Staying there, she let Natsuki see her easily; she was not shy about her body, and physical revelations took less strength from her than they did from the Otomeian.

Who said, with flaring cheeks: "You are such... such a..."

"Such a?"

She groped for the words and breath at the same time. "A woman."

This caused Shizuru to laugh a little. "You make it sound a revelation. Oh dear... I hope that does not mean you thought yourself in a man's bed all this time."

Natsuki snatched her discarded robe from the side and balled it to throw at her. She seized a pillow next, not casting it from her hand but using it as a bat to pummel at the older woman.

"Peace!" Shizuru cried merrily, fending off the blows and stopping her with a kiss. She was quite happy to let the girl wrestle her down. "You are such a woman, too, Natsuki."

Such a woman, she thought, that there were times she forgot her own gratification, fully engaged by the sight of the jet-haired female spending. Natsuki in ecstasy loosed herself, displayed the hungry creature in her that was the equivalent of Shizuru's and that clawed into sight for the tearing instant of pleasure. Shizuru would still her own enjoyment then to just watch admiringly. She was always glad for the privilege.

"Mirabile visu," she said, awed when Natsuki finally finished, having ground to fulfilment against her hand. The young woman collapsed in a cascade of jet-black strands on her chest and slickness on her palm. "You come like a dream, or perhaps a vision. I can never get tired of seeing it."

The other woman panted but did not reply; Shizuru could feel her lover's flesh still sucking hard, the spasms not yet done. She disciplined her own desire and caressed Natsuki's back while waiting.

When the girl was finished, she tried to retract her hand. She was surprised when another caught it and kept it there.

She stared at Natsuki, who hid further in her chest, head growing even hotter.

"I see," Shizuru whispered. "I shall stay a little longer, shall I?"

A wordless mumble was her only answer. She smoothed the palm of her other hand on the young woman's back, feeling it trail a light film of sweat. There were a hundred minute tremors at the contact.

"I hope you are not felled yet, princess," she smiled later.

Natsuki stirred, peeked out one emerald eye.

"Resurgam," she whispered, driving Shizuru to shake with laughter.

"Ah, the indomitable," she chuckled, finally slipping her fingers out; Natsuki moaned. "Faced with the insatiable. I am still hungry."

Generosity truly was part of the young woman's nature, so the Otomeian attempted to rise on still-empty limbs, shaking from the effort. Shizuru stayed her, saying she could do it as well for the both of them.

She had reasons other than wanting to spare the young woman the exertion: she also wanted to see how it would be to do what had occurred to her earlier, which was to swing up that trim leg again to that impossible angle, the vision of it as exciting to her as the view of Natsuki's revealed cleft. Two little lips, delightfully pink, and eager to swell at her touch. How swiftly they plumped! This being part of what she liked best about loving Natsuki: the girl was succulent. Shizuru had never had other women, and so she knew not exactly how it was with them, but how many times had she heard a friend complaining of the lay, saying that the other was juiceless? Instinct told her she was right in thinking that complaint could never apply to Natsuki, who spilled over with the barest touch: as now when her bead was caught between Shizuru's forefinger and thumb, the little kernel of pleasure growing and bursting quick.

Shizuru slid up, now the one on top, and felt the slippery blend of them coming together in a flutter of her heart. Of course it would feel like that, she thought, keeping her lover acquiescent and immobile with the hand holding up the raised leg, shackling it near the calf. She set the rhythm, and her heart tried even harder to fly.

"Oh, you're wonderful!" she said appreciatively. "You are just... so juicy."

She received no answer save moans reflecting what she felt. She had not expected any more, knowing Natsuki was always rendered incoherent by pleasure. The only reason she made an effort to talk, herself, was that she knew the girl liked it-her walls always vibrated replies to Shizuru's words.

The rise and fall continued until her hand slipped away from Natsuki's leg, reaching down the edge of a hip until she was holding her rear, clutching it to pull her up and inexorably closer. The taut bow of Natsuki's body chose that moment to snap, spilling so much wet in climax that it caused her to come too, the sensation of that minor deluge from under her the trigger, a jet of erotic shock.

This time it was she who collapsed on the younger woman's breast, her body played into weariness, for she had chosen to prolong their pleasure by grinding down as long as she could. Natsuki received her with hands too gentle for their scars, still whispering her name. Shizuru heaved herself up.

She touched the girl's lips with her tongue, and Natsuki opened her mouth.

"I can hardly believe myself so favoured," she murmured through the kiss. "To think I am with the most beautiful woman in the world."

The other woman scoffed against her lips.

"You have not seen... all women. In the world," she said feebly.

"And I believe I shall not, even if you put them before me right now." Shizuru shifted to better lean against the pillows at her back, her gaze worshipping. "I could not see beyond you."

Natsuki averted her eyes, mumbling her embarrassment, which Shizuru ignored. She appreciated this about her young woman: Natsuki might blush under admiration, but she also blossomed under it. Protest though the Otomeian might at the compliments Shizuru hurled incessantly, the latter had come to see that the younger woman actually enjoyed them very much. Natsuki was like most girls in that she needed to be adored. The problem in it was that, whether from nature or experience, she was also unlike most girls in that her first instinct was distrust, which meant doubting any praise she was given. Not about her martial abilities, nor her intellect-of those she had never had self-doubts. No, what she doubted and had lacked for so long were adorations of a more personal kind. It related to a part of her that had ceased to grow for a while, lacking nourishment.

But Shizuru had been more than glad to tend to that.

" Meum mel, you both satisfy and make me thirst," she said after another spate of kisses, as they huddled together against the mound of cushions and fur. "I wish the dawn would not break. I wish I could stay here with you in endless night."

Natsuki hummed low, then suddenly cut through the looming sadness by delivering one of her wonderfully sensible remarks.

"The lamps will run out of oil fast," she said.

There was a short, stunned silence. And then Shizuru erupted.

"Seriously, Darling? Oh, you are beautiful!" she whooped. "Who else could say something like that? Fear not, Natsuki, for I shall buy you enough oil to last a hundred lamps for a century." She chuckled and pretended to cuff her on the cheek: in reality, it came nearer to a tap. "Disarming me in one shot! And I was being poetic only for you."

"Not for you too?" was the shrewd reply.

Shizuru grinned.

"Perhaps..." she breathed, running a hand over one of Natsuki's breasts. "Sometimes, I think you are too smart by half."

"A complaint?"

"On the contrary: I always appreciate intelligence. All the more when it is in the woman I adore."

"It must be," came the odd reply. At Shizuru's quizzing look, she twinkled and explained: "You cannot... cannot adore... one not intelligent, Shizuru. No?"

Shizuru gave her an appraising look, one eyebrow upraised in silent commentary.

"As I said," she finally answered. "Too smart by half."

Natsuki was rosy, but still managed a victorious laugh. Listening to it, Shizuru was struck again by how she really would miss her, and said so.

The Otomeian became subdued.

"What a pity you will not come with me," Shizuru said lightly, to bring back her smile. "Perhaps if you did, I could show you one of my summer villas." She thought of one favourite, perched on a cliff overlooking the sea and from where several islands could be seen floating in the distance, sometimes shrouded by mist. "The one I like best, my villa in Cumae, I believe you would as well."

"Tell?"

She settled herself better on the pillows, smiling down at the younger woman as she began a description.

"It is atop a very high cliff," she told her. "And affords a view of the great cape beside the dormant peak of Vesuvius." She saw the green eyes brighten at the name. "The sea is always very blue, chased with silver. The breeze is always cool, yet the water is warm year-round, because of the hot springs and many vents around the bay."

"Vesuvius."

"Which sleeps now, forever peaceful, its soft and slumbering breath fanning the warmth of the waters." She smoothed her hand over the curve of Natsuki's skull. "Many ports are nearby, and only a ride away are my vineyards in Campania, where I could take you for a walk to show you the grapes dangling from the vines, little clusters to be made into earthly ambrosia. We might play at picking some ourselves, and you could be my Diana..."

She stopped, realising she had returned again to her plans of what to do had Natsuki been coming along. It tasted painfully of disappointment, and she shut her eyes for an instant, trying to swallow the pungent regret in her mouth.

She said, "My villa smells of the sea and pine. You would fit there like you had always been part of it."

"I do not smell of the sea," the mountain-girl noted.

"But you smell of pine." She lifted Natsuki's hand for a kiss. "And right now you smell of me. I like this fragrance on you best."

Natsuki stole away her hand, seeking out Shizuru's and lacing their fingers. Now that she was holding her hand more closely, the latter felt with some surprise that Natsuki's hand was also cold and clammy.

It held her hand tighter than usual, too.

"Amo te," she blurted out, feeling heat suffuse her face even though she had already said it twice before. "I do mean that, Natsuki."

Natsuki nodded quietly, red-cheeked too. She whispered her reply, saying the same thing Shizuru had spoken. The way the words sounded in her husky voice made Shizuru's eyes flutter, and the Himean groaned, rushing to lay kisses all over her face.

"I shall want you so much when I go away," Shizuru said quietly when the girl kissed back. "I think I cannot live without this. Each night would be agony, now that I have the taste of it."

And to her wonder, the words she had meant to pay tribute to her lover instead seemed to cast her down, something in the young woman's eyes saddened-yet not surprised. Natsuki pulled inward and shrank. Shizuru was about to ask when the girl gave her the clue in a few cool, painfully detached words.

"Yes," the younger woman droned unenthusiastically, as though discussing a grim but necessary business. "I understand."

Shizuru froze, surprised by the strange tone in her lover's voice. She stared. It took only a moment.

"By Jupiter, no!" she cried, rearing up. One of the pillows fell to the floor. "That is not what I meant. Look at me." She turned the younger woman by the chin, spanning the planes of her jaw with tense fingers. "Did you actually think I meant that I would be taking others to my bed? Did you actually think that?"

The hurt that Natsuki had been trying to hide swam up in her eyes.

"Why not think it?" she uttered, striving not to betray herself by letting her voice tremble. Her stutter proved the traitor, however. "I- we know you can. I wih-will not stop y-"

"I wish you would!"

Natsuki was surprised: that much was obvious. It was also, unfortunately, perfectly natural.

"I told you I loved you," Shizuru reminded her, trying to make the Otomeian understand why she would not do what others would have. It was difficult: she herself knew that she was the one being unnatural now. Love was hardly sufficient reason to limit liaisons where most were concerned, and even less so an unofficial love. Nor were official loves so different: one could love one's wife or husband, yet also bed another. Natsuki had only been hard-nosed in trying to accept that misinterpretation from her. What had she said? I understand. Ye gods! To think she would be willing to put up with that, being told that! And again, why should she not? Natsuki was obviously wise enough to bend to what was routine, and what was ordinary.

But Shizuru could not stand the idea of Natsuki being given just the ordinary... nor of herself being ordinary. Her decision here was both an effect of her feelings for the girl and of her knowledge of the differences between her and most others, as well as her acceptance of those differences as part of what separated her from the dull horde. The famously proper, well-mannered Shizuru Fujino took particular pride in being unique, and perhaps even took pleasure in finding that uniqueness by being a deviate. So the normal way was to love one and sleep with many. So it would be considered bizarre to pledge and keep faith with a single person-even more abnormal in her case, a person who happened to be a foreigner. Well, then, what of it? What mattered it to her when she had never been normal?

"When I said it to you, I meant it in no uncertain terms," she told her, speaking slowly but with enough power in her voice to make Natsuki believe. "You know how I am. You know I am incapable of half-measures in these matters. I would never say such words if I thought myself capable of dividing myself enough to bestow half-love, or whatever jot of love is possible for a person to claim himself capable to mete out to more than one person. Do you not know that, Natsuki? How can you not know that?"

She darkened, tightened on the girl's jaw with her hand. Something had occurred to her now, something that rather displeased her: Natsuki's practicality stung! Why was it that the young woman was willing to compromise with the world where their relationship was concerned? Whereas she would have overturned the world had it been necessary, for the same relation! How could Natsuki be that detached, that coolly conceding, if she really loved her? Should the girl not have sulked? Should Natsuki not have asked her expressly not to entertain any other?

In her confusion, she quite forgot the pain she had seen earlier, banked in the hairline fissures of Natsuki's emerald eyes.

"How can you not know you have ruined me for all other women?" she whispered angrily.

Natsuki stared at her, amazed by this sudden offence. That was when Shizuru made a promise only a madwoman would have made, and which she knew she would keep, already fulfilling that requirement where this girl was concerned.

"I shall have no one but you," she uttered suddenly, shocking the girl who had taught herself not to expect anything from a life that had almost always been hard, and who now found that lifelong pessimism insufficient defence before a creature like Shizuru. "I shall touch no other, to the day I return-and shame to the one who does not believe it!"

Since that warning was obviously intended to dissuade her from any objection, Natsuki quieted. She knew that Shizuru in one of her moods was better treated with acquiescence where possible.

"Yes," she said, nodding slowly at her older lover. "Yes, Shizuru."

The red eyes burned fiercely for another instant before subsiding into quiet embers.

"Does this not please you?" she asked, hating herself for needing Natsuki to be jealous, and hating that Natsuki was seemingly not.

"Does it not matter at all to you if I take another into bed with me?"

"It matters," Natsuki said sharply.

And then she bit her lip, distraught over the swiftness of her answer.
Still, Shizuru felt much better.

"Thank the gods," the older woman said, sinking once more into the cushions. "I was afraid that... that it did not even matter."

Natsuki nodded, smiling uncertainly at her.

"I shall stand by that promise, meum mel," Shizuru reaffirmed. "I cannot even imagine touching another now. Who could compare to you?"

Natsuki smirked, entertained by the onset of more sweet-talk.
Shizuru was right in that she enjoyed such adulation more for having been so deprived of it: Natsuki could barely even remember her parents praising and cooing to her when she had been younger.

"I don't know," she said playfully. "Who?"

"Nemo. No one. If I could not have you, I think I would much rather romance my own hand," Shizuru said, eliciting a strangled giggle.

"Shizuru!" Natsuki gasped, looking both amused and scandalised.

"Well, do you not agree it is more worthy of that regard than another?" Shizuru asked mischievously, taking the opportunity to let the body part in discussion roam down Natsuki's stomach. "If you are not there, I mean. I like to think it not too unskilled in giving pleasure either."

Natsuki tried to scoff, but found it difficult: Shizuru's hand was already between her legs, and those fingers were forcing her to catch her breath.

She nodded and accepted the hunger.

"Not unskilled," she agreed, leaning in to copy what Shizuru's hand did as it worked its romance on her. She closed her eyes and focused on the pleasure, the give and take, unaware that Shizuru continued to watch her face. The older woman kept her eyes open until the wave they were riding crested and crashed, so intense it took both of them by surprise.

Shizuru giggled and praised her for her mimicry afterwards, saying she was brilliant.

"Here, as everywhere else," the older woman told her. "I do believe you are perfect. You shall always stand out from the crowd, Darling."

Natsuki smiled into the embrace. "You do. Stand out."

Shizuru accepted that with graceful courtesy, since there was no way to gainsay it. It did remind her that there was something she needed to ask, though, and which she had dreaded. Now was the time.

"And is there no one else who stands out from the crowd amongst us?" she said very gently, putting all her power into masking the anxiety behind her calm. "Is there no one you find so easy to see?"

A few lines appeared on the girl's forehead.

"Easy to see?" she repeated.

"Who catches your attention," Shizuru explained, still speaking with tightly-leashed deliberation. "Who stands above the crowd for you... perhaps like me?"

But that dark young woman just laughed.

"Who?" she asked. "You are a head above all the women, Shizuru. And men."

"Oh, that is not what I meant, Natsuki."

"I know what you mean."

The glint in the gem-like eyes arrested her protest, and she listened to Natsuki.

"I see nobody," the Otomeian restated.

It seemed for a moment that Natsuki wanted to say more, and indeed she did: that she could not even imagine touching anyone else after having had the sleek presence of Shizuru in her bed; that it had as much to do with who and what Shizuru was to her as with the individuality of Shizuru's body, the fragrance of the Himean's young skin, and the pleasing contrast of a soft and perfumed chest bearing down on her with a flat and muscular abdomen below it. Shizuru was beautiful enough to be called art, and Natsuki appreciated that.

She also wanted to say that she appreciated even more what Shizuru had become. She could think of no other capable of treating her the way the older woman could. The older woman was a hydra, communing with her in a dozen different ways, from lover one moment to guardian the next. A dozen heads representing a dozen facets, all rooted in one body, and looking upon her from different angles. What this hydra represented to her was best encompassed not in her own words, but rather in those of the blind poet, speaking through Andromache in her last exchange with Hector: having lost everything and everyone, it had been Hector who replaced all those vanished people for his wife, turning father and mother at once, brother and sister both, and friend and husband as well.

So was Shizuru to her, and so did Shizuru outstrip everyone else in her vision. Who else could treat her like an equal in one moment, and cosset her like a child in the next? Shizuru did these things with exquisite balance, knowing instinctively when to take this aspect or another. Not even Andromache could have been better served during her and Hector's time.

And yet Natsuki knew, too, that her lover was less Hector than Achilles: the hydra overlooking her was as powerfully vindictive as it was munificent. Natsuki was no fool, and certainly never fooled herself into thinking this hydra safe. She had been chilled before it wrapped itself about her, yes, and now she thanked it for its warmth, true. Even so, she knew that warmth came with a dozen jealous sets of teeth.

It was with the awareness of all these things that she had dismissed the idea without hesitation, the fear Shizuru seemed to have so fatuously. It was impossible to Natsuki that she could imagine anything better than this mythical being that loved her at once savagely and kindly, and which she would never have been able to imagine by herself in the first place, for her fantasies had always been lacking. She wanted to say all of that to assuage Shizuru.

But as her mouth was incapable of voicing such personal secrets, she said something else which would have to condense all these things into one sharp point.

"No one else can be... easy to see."

Shizuru measured the sincerity of the statement and found it pleasing.

"That is good," she decided.

But then she turned sulky in an instant.

"If you looked at anyone else I would kill them," she followed, soft as a shower of snow on the back of Natsuki's neck. "You know that, my dear Natsuki."

And because Natsuki was still thinking of the impossibility of Shizuru's being rivalled by anyone, she only took in the warning for a moment before displaying her cheek, the impertinence that often delighted Shizuru so much.

She grinned.

"Not me?" she asked. "You will not kill me?"

Some of the sulkiness vanished from Shizuru, who was genuinely surprised by the query.

"Oh, from your lips !" she said in disbelief. "I could never kill you, Natsuki. Not even if you turned to another, unforgivable as that would be. Not if you tried to fight me in battle. Not if you turned on me-"

"I will not turn on you."

Shizuru smiled at the quick oath: "I know."

"I would not-never-try to fight you in battle."

"I know that too." Shizuru looked sternly at her. "Just as I know I would never be able to think of killing you, Natsuki."

Natsuki nodded. "But you would kill someone? If I... I look?"

"Yes," she said honestly.

"Really kill them?" The soft smile on Natsuki's face was a contrast to the topic; she seemed to find it amusing. "But me you will not kill?"

"You I would not kill," Shizuru said again, before considering it with a small smile. "I might tie you up and thrash you for a bit, however."

Natsuki chuckled duskily.

"Will not," she declared.

"Do not be too sure, dear."

Natsuki shook her head.

"No, Shizuru," she said. "Not that."

She touched her on the cheek, and Shizuru felt the young woman's fingers shaking.

"I mean that... I will not look," Natsuki said softly, actually meeting her eyes. "At anyone else."

Shizuru put a hand over the shaking one and thought: Yet you are killing me .

"I promise, Shizuru." A gulp came, and then a panicked swallow; the little girl orphaned by all her kin, her first loves, suddenly surfaced. "It is true you will come back quickly?"

The question left her in a rush, like something she had not intended to say aloud, or to anybody. Shizuru saw that, and saw too that Natsuki was horrified by what had slipped out. She saw that Natsuki would try to take it back.

"I mea-"

"I shall be so quick you shall not even begin to truly miss me," Shizuru interjected, anxious to placate the fearful creature she had just seen living inside Natsuki: the real child she tried so often to call out in this warrior. How lonely it had seemed! She wished, more than ever, that she could take the girl with her. "But you shall miss me a little, perhaps. I know I would miss you terribly."

Her companion, still embarrassed by the slip, merely nodded. Shizuru stroked her bowed head. Looking around, her eye fell upon their table, where there were several dishes ready for them should they desire a snack. She excused herself and left Natsuki to huddle for warmth on the sheets.

"Let us have a little something to eat?" she invited, knowing they would both need it to get through what promised to be a weary night. "Try to eat just a little. I shall play a song for you afterwards."

She stalked over to the table and chose a dish bearing some cheeses and nuts. She brought it back to their bed with a cup and a jug of water.

It was Natsuki who took one of the hard cheeses and crumbled it, putting little morsels into Shizuru's mouth. She had taken well to this form of affection, Shizuru noted, and not only for its sentimental value. Shizuru knew that Natsuki also liked to do it because it was often successful in diverting her from thoughts of how little the latter was actually eating compared to her, crafty girl that the Otomeian could be.

"You shall remember the things I told you?" she asked, halting Natsuki's hand halfway to delivering yet another scrap of cheese. "And try to follow them if you can, please?"

The younger woman nodded, slipping the food between her lips.

"Trust Suou Himemiya," she recited absently, going through some of the items on the list. "Avoid being alone with another Himean officer."

No wine." She grinned suddenly and looked up from the platter of cheese and nuts. "Easy."

Shizuru smiled. "Oh? You forgot the most important thing in the list."

She paused for a second to think on it.

"Ah-don't look at another?" she tried.

"That's my smart girl," Shizuru affirmed, stroking some hair that had fallen over her face. "Do not look, do not touch."

Natsuki all but sniggered. She picked around the platter again, trying to decide what to feed Shizuru next, and came up with a chestnut. She held it up for inspection. "This?"

Shizuru smiled. "Yes."

She let Natsuki shell it, then give it to her. She halved it in her mouth, and proceeded to slip one of the pieces through Natsuki's lips in a kiss. But something in the contact of their lips and the light sweetness of the nut over their tongues undid a lock inside, and she suddenly felt all the bitterness again of having to leave this woman she had tasted and loved, of having to be parted against her will and so suddenly. She crushed the piece in her mouth quickly and swallowed, staring at the girl with such grief that Natsuki's breath caught.

Shizuru took the platter away and set it aside, drawing her up into a fierce hug.

"Shizuru?" her lover called haltingly, surprised by Shizuru's sudden passion. "Something... Something is wrong?"

"Yes."

"What?"

But Shizuru only shook her head. Seeing that she was in pain, her lover's hands went to her hair, petting her.

"It is all right, Shizuru," came the husky whisper. "Really. All right."

But it is not, Shizuru answered in her mind. It is not all right, Child.

Again Shizuru shook her head, unwilling to speak lest her voice crack. Natsuki understood and continued to pet her.

"Shizuru?" A press of the lips to her ear, then to her temple.
"Shizuru."

Shizuru listened to her calls, feelings lifting only a little at the way the Otomeian said her name. If she could say it like that, Shizuru thought, then surely it was true when she had reciprocated her love. She could take heart in that. Yet there was still the refusal, and the way Natsuki could still be so detached, to the point that she could act like this when Shizuru herself felt the chasm opening and the despair like a crush.

It was selfish of her-she knew that-but she wanted Natsuki to feel that crush as well, to be as bitter at their separation as she was, and to act more like a part of her were being torn away. It was not that she belittled the love the girl had already given her-ye gods, she had thrown thanks to all of heaven for it! But-this was a good part of why she was difficult to love, she knew-she who loved in such a passion that it was all-consuming needed to be loved the same way. She wanted Natsuki to want her so much that this imminent separation would be an incurable wound being opened, never to close until she had returned. The selfishness of love was ironically because it wanted to share: she wanted Natsuki to share the thunder of her emotions. She desired to have Natsuki feel what she was sure she was feeling now and would feel more later, a similar pain .

She longed, too, to feel Natsuki's tears drop on her shoulder in their final embrace-but she knew that would not happen.

All the same, Natsuki was not the only one who could be indomitable.

So be it, Shizuru swore to herself, lancing the sore with her steel. So be it, then. I shall accept that you do not love me like that yet, Natsuki.

She made the vow silently: But you will.

After a while, when she was sure she could speak again without being betrayed by her tone, she disengaged herself from the girl and smiled. There was no more anguish in it, and Natsuki smiled back once she saw that.

Shizuru got up wordlessly and went to fetch the lyre.

"Come to me, meum mel," she said upon return, positioning herself on one side of the bed. She beckoned her to sit a little closer, because she wanted to watch the eldritch flames that rose in the green eyes when Natsuki felt passion, when Natsuki was moved. She wanted so much to see Natsuki moved, and to be the one to move her. "I shall play for you now."

Natsuki crawled over dutifully.

"Shall I get a kiss for my pains first, perhaps?"

She got her kiss, and obtained a promise of another one after the song was over. Thus compensated, she began to warm up before playing the actual music.

Shizuru played a few bars, her hands gliding over the instrument with the expertise of one well-tutored. She was good with instruments and better than good with a lyre. She was good enough to ensure her vow would be sublimated in the notes, and even if Natsuki's ears might not fully translate the language, she knew she could play to the girl's heart.

So she began.

The Otomeian at her side, only a foot away, watched her fingers dance. The show being staged for her had her utterly rapt: she was watching her jealous hydra, her golden Achilles about to depart. Whatever Shizuru had thought about her attitude in the past few days, she had not been spared of the torment. What detachment the Himean had imagined in her was pure façade. Had Shizuru been a little less in love with her-a little less consumed by the ardour she felt for the Otomeian-she might have been able to see the crush which she sought, the one to equal her own pain. But that required a detachment neither woman could give, or not truly, so Shizuru failed to see. It was because Shizuru lacked that detachment with Natsuki that she had failed to see so many things all this time.

She had failed to see, for instance, that she had never needed to obsess over the girl's love. She had had it for so long, though Natsuki had not told her. It came hard to the Otomeian to tell things like that, and that was why she had tried to give Shizuru the clue first in her deeds, then presents, and then-finally, when pressed by a question-in words. She had been surprised when she communicated through the last, like a person shocked at not causing a calamity after invoking a forbidden name. She had not expected to be capable of speaking it, herself. Feats like that could shock her.

Shizuru had been right about that: she was really not a talker.

There were times when the Otomeian wished she were, however. She envied those who were masters of dialogue, who could talk as naturally as they could breathe. It was one of the things that had drawn her most strongly to the Himean, who elevated language into art and traced curlicues into the air with her lilt. To hear such speech, Natsuki had thought at first meeting, was a gift in itself. How amazed she had been, the first time she heard her talk! Perhaps some part of her had even wished to emulate it. Yet she had known that she could not, because to do so would be disloyalty to a legacy, one she had never shared. Neither her cousin, Nina, nor the man who had saved her when she was a child, Mino, knew of it. All the people who actually knew of it could not talk.

She was the only one of them still alive.

On that night her people were written out of existence, when the treacherous tribes of Mithrii massacred them in their homes, she had received her parents' final and ultimate bequest. On that night, Natsuki was given the last injunction ever to come from those who had made her: when their bodies and the bodies of their kin had been falling all around, it had come from her mother.

Do not speak, Natsuki, the queen had strained, shredded body draped atop the girl-who-was-no-longer-a-girl, a dying and dead weight on her. Do not speak, whatever you do.

Harder instructions could have been given: a promise of revenge, an oath of sacrifice. The one she received was simple and expedient to her own survival. Natsuki did as her mother asked. And after even her mother had expired- blood falling thick in her ear, the feel of it as it died on her skin ugly -when she alone had been alive out of all those bodies strewn across the ground- something or someone crushing her broken leg, she remembered, so little space and so hard to breathe! -after Mino and the Otomeians had found her under the pile and dragged her out from under them, she had continued to do it. Natsuki neither spoke, nor made a sound. The dying queen had ordered her, and Natsuki had always been faithful to an order.

Perhaps, really, she was faithful to it still.

She could not tell Shizuru about that, of course. Nor could she tell the older woman about her dreams, seeded with memories of her mother's words and the strangled panic afterwards, the legion sounds of chaos and frenzy all around her yet never actually breaking the cocoon spun by her mother's command: the hollow, empty-echoing chamber of her silence. It took many forms, many versions of the story, but it always ended with the same hush. Sometimes, Natsuki would wake from the dream with a gasp, testing to see if she truly could make a sound after all. She always found that she could, in reality and when awake. But in her dreams, no matter how much she opened her mouth, she was always mute.

... whatever you do.

There was no way she could tell Shizuru about that, she had long decided, no way of speaking of it to the older woman. It was true that the Himean had freed her to some extent, helped her discover the liberty of her own voice and speech. For that, she would be forever indebted. But she still knew she could never break free of the order from her mother, which, aside from her life, was the final inheritance that woman had given.

Do not speak, Natsuki.

She had heard the order a million times already in her dreams, and knew she would follow without a murmur, without a complaint of how it shackled her-because that would be to speak too, would it not? It was as though her mother had told her not to speak about the command as well. So she would not speak of it. She would never speak of it. Was not the pact sealed by life, and death, and blood? She understood the importance of that trifecta, knew the infinity that resided in their power.

She knew she would be bound by that contract forever.

So it was that Natsuki knew things. And so it was too that what most of what she knew she kept to herself, nestled safely in an iron mesh of privacy and quiet. All the words she never spoke were in that mesh; all the screams she had never given; all the thoughts she had ever known. Listening to Shizuru produce music-wordless sounds for an audience of soundless words-she found herself peering into her secret net, looking at the many things she had tucked away.

So many things she knew.

She knew, for instance, that if happened to change her mind at this moment, or even to the moment where the Himeans boarded the ship, the older woman would stay everything just to bring her. She knew that, if she did get on that ship, Shizuru would still return her to this land immediately if she ever asked. She knew Shizuru would never keep her against her volition. She knew Shizuru was kind.

She knew Shizuru was different.

Oh, she did know so many things. More than that, for Natsuki had the comprehension given to those who joined their stubbornness with a capacity for thinking: she understood . She understood that there were things she should do, and things she should not do. She understood she should walk away once that ship started to move, for example, because she knew Shizuru might see her eyes otherwise, and she had never been able to control the unruly things in her eyes. She should be cheerful this last night, because if she were too dismal Shizuru would be tempted to ask her again-even if Shizuru had promised not to, that day she confessed-and then she might be tempted to finally say yes. She understood she should not say yes.

She should remember that what differentiated Shizuru from other people was the equal in significance of what differentiated Shizuru's people from hers. She should not deceive herself into thinking others could see her like Shizuru did, if Shizuru truly saw her as she thought. She should understand where barriers were placed along lines, where the lines also held a separating gap. She should not trouble her lover by revealing that she understood these gaps' width, and was unhappy for it.

She should not be so arrogant as to expect Shizuru would truly return still wanting her, because that would be to ask for too much, and she wanted it too much. She should remain faithful to her promises to Shizuru, however, because only a cur makes a promise and breaks it just because of an uncertainty that it is still needed. She should remember all her resolutions, and the good reasons she had for them, whenever she felt tempted to give in to her own desires.

God, how she hated the selfishness of her desires.

Lacerated by shame, driven by loyalty, she would repeat her admonitions in the cocoon of silence, over and over: she should not toy with notions of overcoming a division so inherent it was from birth. She should not delude herself that it was possible to ignore the world. She should not destroy a dream just because she would like to embrace it close to her. She should not sail to that city she wanted to see, just across the water. She should remember whom she had sworn to protect and why.

She should not be a heel they could use against her Achilles.

Chapter 46

This arc shall be somewhat faster compared to the first, as may be indirectly suggested by the title. Please permit me here to thank everyone who has finished the first arc. To know that you thought so lengthy an arc worthy of your attention makes the writing well worth it.

---

Illustration (To access, remove the spaces after the full stops.)

ethnewinter. deviantart art/SNHC-153912811

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Auctoritas (L.) - A nigh-impossible term to translate, it meant a man's share of the public esteem, his reputation, his ability to influence events. Magistracies had inherent auctoritas, but even persons not in a magisterial office could have it. A simple way of differentiating 'auctoritas' from 'dignitas' is to understand that 'dignitas' was the more important concept to a Roman: after all, once a man dies, his 'auctoritas' goes with him; 'dignitas' lived forever.

2. Calends (L.) - Also K alends; the first of the three named days of a Roman (Himean) month, and the only fixed or unvarying one. The Calends is always on the first day of the month.

3. Campus Martius (L.) - A large area outside the city of Rome (Hime) where legions were bivouacked (the military cannot enter the city unless for a triumph).

4. Cedimus, an subitum luctando accendimus ignem?

Cedamus! (L.) - This is from Ovid's Amores I. Translated into English, it means: "Will I surrender or stir up the sudden flame by fighting it [Love]? I will surrender!" The reason for the surrender is made apparent in the next line of the poem (leve fit, quod bene fertur, onus ): "A burden becomes light when it is carried willingly."

5 . College - A group or body of men with something in common, e.g. the College of Augurs for the state augurs, or the College of the Tribunes of the Plebs for the elected tribunes of the plebs.

6 . Curia Hostilia (L.) - The Senate House or usual venue for meetings of the Senate.

7 . Curule - If used with the word "office", it means that the mentioned office has imperium (s.v.).

8 . Dignitas (L.) - Another nigh-impossible term to translate; 'dignitas' was the sum of a man's worth and right to honour due to his personal achievements. It touched not merely on his personal merit and pride as an individual but also involved the quality or augustness of his ancestors and family. To differentiate 'dignitas' from 'auctoritas', see the note for the latter, above.

9 . First Citizen - Adapted from the more Latin term of 'the First Man'. The First Man in Rome was said to be the one whose auctoritas (s.v.) and dignitas (s.v.) far outranked everyone else's. It was not an actual office to be occupied, nor a name won by an election, but a title granted by one's peers and even enemies: an acknowledgment of the undeniable fact that one was the most important and powerful citizen of Rome.

10 . Ides (L.) - The last of the three named days of a Roman (Himean) month. The days of the month were not named or given numbers, save for these three points. The Ides was considered a sacred day to the great god or Jupiter Optimus Maximus, and varied in placement depending on the length of the month. On long months or those reaching 31 days, it was set on the fifteenth. As the story is following the current calendar (with regards to month names and month lengths) instead of the Ancient Roman one, the Ides in this story shall be set at the fifteenth for the month of August, given that August currently has 31 days to its total and is thus a long month.

11 . Imperium (L.) - The degree of authority vested in a curule magistrate or a promagistrate. All curule offices and army commands held imperium.

12 . Inde ira et lacrimae (L.) - "Hence wrath and tears."

13 . Lictor (L.) - A Roman civil servant whose duties have been altered somewhat for this story. They retain their primary duty in the sense of serving magistrates with imperium (s.v.), however.

14 . October horse - A term originating from a practice held in the Ides (s.v.) of October, where the Romans picked the best war-horses of the year. Simply, an October horse is supposedly the best horse.

15 . Pedarii (L.) - The plural form of "pedarius", or something of a senatorial "backbencher". Pedarii are not allowed to speak during House or Senate meetings, and often did not hold/had not held any true office yet.

16 . Praetor - The rung on the Roman political ladder just below the top rung, which was "consul". The urban praetor or praetor urbanus is traditionally the chief of all the praetors, and has authority over the courts of Rome, which is why the urban praetor was the praetorian candidate who polled the most votes. To remind everyone, the reason Shizuru does not wish to be urban praetor, even with the honour attendant to the office, is that there is a limitation upon the urban praetor that states he cannot be out of the city for more than ten days at a time.

17 . Tace! (L.) - "Shut up!"

18 . Tribune of the Plebs - One of the most important offices in Ancient Rome, reserved exclusively for plebeians and purportedly existing in protection of plebeian rights; the prime lawmaking body of that time; the office bearing the power of the veto. If one was about to enter the Senate, the best way to make a name for oneself was to be a tribune of the plebs, since they garnered so much attention and had the opportunity to make a radical splash.

19 . Triumph (L.) - A victory parade or procession held by a Roman (Himean) general who was given the accolade of being called "imperator" by his troops on the field, after a great victory.

20 . Urban praetor - See note for "praetor".

21 . Vappa! (L.) - "Flat wine!" or, more properly, "Good for nothing!"

22 . Well of the Comitia - The standard venue where the tribunes of the plebs (s.v.) held their meetings, which were restricted to citizens of purely plebeian status (i.e. patricians were forbidden from attending such a meeting, and would often limit themselves to watching from the steps of the nearby Curia).

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

par ethnewinter

---

Shizuru's fabled luck was with her. Her transports managed to latch onto the tail of the North Winds, which only began to wane midway into her journey. Urged by those friendly breezes, her ships soon docked at one of the ports of eastern Fuuka. From there it was only a few more weeks' march to the Campus Martius. The other two legions, led by her senior legate overland, would take significantly more time than that: not only they were building a road as they went, but they were also tasked with razing coast villages or ports belonging to pirates or bandits. Owing to this expected disparity in arrival times, the legion travelling with the general was permitted to slacken its march from the normal rapid pace-though still not enough for anyone to call the progress relaxed. One of the first things a legionary learned when soldiering for Shizuru Fujino was that serving under the undefeatable had its price: Shizuru Fujino's was that, battle or no battle, she always flogged your feet.

Still, she did permit the legionaries some tranquil stopovers. The first was near a town south of the ports, by a lake fed by one of Fuuka's great rivers. Shizuru allowed the soldiers a spring holiday in the lake, for the weather was clement and a far cry from the cold they had just left. The second stopover was when she passed by a country villa belonging to one of her cousins. That this cousin-who actually spent most of her time in a villa far to the south of Fuuka-was in residence when she arrived was her doing, for she had written a letter weeks ago asking to be met. It was only because Shizuru was her favourite relative that the recipient of that letter even appeared.

They saw each other before the army, for Shizuru's cousin fetched her from the camp. Seeing the two together immediately persuaded the soldiers of the relation: the cousins had notable similarities. Tall and graceful with distinctly Himean lines, both were also distinct from the Himean standard due to unusual colouring. Shizuru's was due to her eyes and her cousin's, to unusually fair hair: hair so pale it lacked even the barest sheen of yellow, its gild not of gold but of steel. So strange colours did run in the family! As did good looks, thought the dazzled legionaries.

Those comparisons were purely physical. The rankers lived in a different world, where little was understood of the upper classes save that they better. Had an actual member of those better folk been asked about the two patricians, he might have given a deeper judgment on the two women. Shizuru and her cousin deserved more differentiation.

Beyond the beauty were other similarities, though. Both possessed formidable intellects, for instance. However, Shizuru's cousin did not exhibit it in ways that would have gained her the recognition she deserved. There was the same athleticism too that promised great exploits on the field, but Shizuru's cousin had neither the discipline nor the desire to prove herself in battle, as Shizuru had yearned to do ever since her youth. There was, perhaps, the most important difference between them: they did not share the same burning ambition. Shizuru had always consciously directed herself towards the perfection of her goals and herself, the achievement of everything that should be hers by both birthright and excellence. Her cousin, on the other hand, cared little for such exertions towards grandeur. She directed her efforts in pursuit of another, entirely different kind of opulence.

Shizuru was in a position to confirm this during her visit, being seated on a couch opposite as they conversed in the villa's atrium.

Still driven by the whip of pleasure, the home-bound general observed with regret, watching her cousin quiz a slave about the cellar while touching the slave's body in various unnecessary ways.

Not that the slave seemed to mind a bit, for she giggled and twisted her body in the awareness that her mistress's hugely attractive cousin was watching. Quite the eager temptress, thought a haughty Shizuru, who was not at all tempted.

The truth was that she was trying to withhold a slight grimace. It was not even so much for the slave's antics, but for her cousin. She knew her relative had always been a flirt, but not this much of a flirt before—specifically, not before that thing happened that turned her into this. A few years ago, Shizuru's cousin had experienced a tragic love affair that had nearly killed the all the light of her brilliance. It was this tragic affair that had driven her from the public sphere, into her voluptuary ways.

Oh, thought the younger woman, why did it seem as though all the love affairs in her family had an element of tragedy to them, especially for their generation? Was this to be their brand? It hurt to consider it, not just because of a fear for herself but because of the twinge she experienced whenever she saw how it had marked her relative: a woman who could have been an October horse working herself with an ass's whip.

"Stop looking at me that way, Shizuru."

Shizuru blinked, drawn out of her cogitations by the other's voice; the slave had disappeared.

"Ara?" she murmured.

A ring of laughter—at least it no longer rang completely hollow!

"Oh, good, that's it!" said the other woman, looking pleased. "I was beginning to wonder when I would hear that again."

Shizuru met the merry eyes with her own. Sharp hazel—no, not really hazel, she mused, watching the other pair sparkle changeably. Most people called her cousin's eyes hazel upon seeing them, but Shizuru thought the word inadequate. Her cousin's eyes were not actually amber, nor greenish-brown, nor truly green, but all and none of those things. They shifted colour erratically, as though seeking the most fitting shade for the occasion. There were times when they seemed the colour of translucent ferns, a sort of olive green tint; there were times too when they seemed the colour of a lion's eyes, a tawny warm hue. But even during the most definite of events, they always held a little ambiguity to them, as though they never could make up their mind what they should or wanted to be.

In line with what Mother said about us before, she mused. It had been a joke in their side of the family that all you needed to know of any of them was in their eyes. A true thing for Shizuru, her mother had once said, claiming that her blood-red orbs were indicative of a genius for war and a fiery, passionate will. In her cousin's case, it was applicable too: changeable eyes for a character that could be terrifically mercurial.

Suddenly she thought of something else. What could Tomoe's eyes mean? Now that other cousin-the one purportedly responsible for her unwilling election as praetor-had grey eyes: not clear grey but a strange, filmy shade, like smoke. Perhaps that was the explanation for that one. Smoke-coloured eyes for a smokescreen character.

"I told you to stop looking at me that way," spoke the person in front of her, grim all of a sudden. There was the mercurial personality! "Either you are dejected about something or you are deploring my 'dissipated' state. While I would hate you to be the former, neither would I relish the latter-you know I have had enough of that from our other admirably upright relatives."

Shizuru achieved a sigh.

"Nothing of the sort. Pardon me," she apologised. "But I was not aware of my expression."

A wicked laugh. "Does a thespian wear a mask without knowing it? Bald-faced lies today, Shizuru, and after so long!"

Shizuru denied it: "No, not at all. You know I would not lie to you. I never have."

"And if you have, how would we be sure I would know? But it's a moot point, since you have never needed to lie to me, so I rest assured you have not yet done so," the other woman replied. "Never mind. I'm glad to see you after so long, and we can talk about likely perfidies another time. I don't think I've even congratulated you yet for your recent achievements, Shizuru. I do now; is that scar an effect?"

The crimson-eyed woman put a finger to her left brow, feeling the neat and hairless line dividing it.

"Argentum," she said, and smiled.

"Lucky it is the eyebrow and not the eye. Interesting-it actually goes well with you," came the favourable assessment. "There are other changes too, I see, from living abroad. How did you like the North?"

Shizuru paused.

"I did," she eventually replied. "Like it, that is."

Her cousin nodded, subjecting her to a stare that peeled away the layers of inscrutability Shizuru had taken to piling on top of herself throughout the years. This cousin was one of the few who could do it; she was a master of piling on layers too.

"Really? About your sea-crossing, though," she said suddenly, face impassive. "Was it a hard journey, Shizuru?"

Yes, and it gets harder each day. "Oh, no. Why do you ask?"

"Because I tell you no lies either, and spare from you no concern," was the other's retort. "So excuse me if I observe that you look off, and not as pleased as I thought you would be at returning as the elected urban praetor and a triumphing general too."

A meaningful pause, accompanied by a glance that went from the barely concealed circles under the eyes to the hollows of the cheeks, which were deeper than usual.

"Are you really well?" the other asked again. "You look tired, Cousin."

Shizuru was astonished. She touched her face with one hand, as though to ensure it was there.

"Do I?" she asked wonderingly.

Her companion frowned.

"You should take care of yourself, Shizuru," she suggested, her stare already snapping. "Is something the matter? What is it?"

Shizuru met her look with suddenly weary eyes, shedding the mask she had been wearing for nearly a month of travelling. Normally, she would have chosen to deflect the query . Even coming from those who knew her best, Shizuru rarely answered questions that cut too deeply, too truthfully to the human core inside her shell. But the situation was not normal this time, and the core was too injured for her to keep tending to it by herself. Her cousin had been right in observing she was tired . She was tired... and she needed to talk to someone about it .

And that is not normal either, she told herself, distressed by the weakness in her spirit. She guessed it was another effect of her experiences in the North, or more specifically, an effect of her experiences with a particular person from the North. How could she have known it would change her this much? Certainly it was not that she repented of her time with the cause of this development, but she wondered if the development might not be a regression.

Should I be worried, she asked herself, that I can no longer exist so independently?

It was during the crossing that she had come to see the extent of alteration. The very first night spent on the ship and the first she had spent alone in a while, it had seemed to her that she was slipping into insanity. Oh, for the balm of sleep! It had refused to come. Only after two days had it visited, and only after a bout of indulgence that had frightened her steward enough for him to hesitate when called to serve yet another unwatered drink.

After that it became routine: two nights of tortured wakefulness punctuated by a night of inebriation only her steward witnessed, where she would nod off quietly and wake the next morning with a headache shrilling in her ears. It could not drown out the actual source of her sleeplessness, however: the words flooding her head and clamouring for a listener, an ear. Or was it the listener, rather, and those ears? Ah, but it had brought on more desperate words into her head to think of those ears-the small, pink-tinged, perfect little ears. She had used to kiss them so often, had she not? She had needed to drug herself with more wine whenever she thought of how she had whispered into them so casually. She needed wine not to obsess over the idea that she should have taken more time when she was doing it.

Insanity, when she could be reduced to a sot by the thought of perfect little ears.

The words kept stacking inside her during that time. Writing letters could only do so much, especially since she had known she could mail them only when they reached port. The solitude hit even harder because she had no one to provide aid as a buffer: there was none of those aboard her ship to whom she could speak, and nothing to do that could take her mind off the loss. The greatest diversion was to watch the sea, which she sometimes did, standing on the deck. There was still very little one could call interesting. She found the waters unvarying, and wildly lonely.

Those were weeks of forced inertia, with nothing to divert her but the routine chat with her soldiers, during which occasions she had to pretend to be merry. She had not felt merry. Nothing had been able to help with the memory that lingered in her sleep-deprived mind like an imprint: a willowy figure turning its back on her in perfect calm, each unwavering step opening in her a parcel of pain. It still hurt to think of how Natsuki had not even stayed on the docks of Argus to watch the ship leave the port. Rather, the young woman had waited only long enough for Shizuru to give the signal to the ship's captain, and then turned immediately to walk-that beautiful glide of a walk!-as though eager to put distance between them as soon as possible. To be sure, Shizuru did not forget what they said to each other, the exchanges they made right before the separation. Nevertheless, it was natural that to see the girl turn away so coolly should have left such an enduring hurt; it was natural that each casual step from Natsuki had seen her die and die and die...

"Forgive me, Shizuma," she said, trying to shake away the silhouette once again walking away but never disappearing. "I did not intend to trouble you too much with my problems when I came here."

Shizuma Hanazono shook her silvery head, eyeing her cousin with warm interest.

"No, I gather you did not," she said in her husky voice. "But you should be smart enough to know it's acceptable, all the same. We are family, Shizuru."

The other woman's lips curled a little at that, as though the younger woman had found something ironic in the statement. Shizuma waited for her to explain.

"It is good to hear that," Shizuru finally said, softly. "Especially when it is family that is chiefly responsible for my weariness, at the moment."

Shizuma's eyes widened, her strange steely lashes fluttering.

"Family?" she echoed in surprise. "Our kin may deprecate me, Shizuru, but they all worship you. You're the chief adornment to the tree whereas I'm a rotted branch. Hard to believe they would do something to prune you as they do me."

"Your rhetoric is still as beautiful as I remembered."

"And your propensity to change the subject as I remembered it. As I was saying, I don't believe they did something against you."

"Not intentionally against, no, I think not. But intentions are not punishable and actions are."

"Punishable!"

Shizuma's eyes were shifting wildly between colours now, outrageously protean in the light.

"Now I'm really interested," she said, shuffling up on her couch. "If this brings out that side of you, I am all agog to hear more. Shall you tell me about it, Shizuru? By god, I shall not forgive you if you come here and hint at it without telling me."

Shizuru exhaled slowly. "Certainly, I shall tell you. If for no other reason than to do so was a good part of what moved me to see you, Cousin."

Shizuma smiled happily and filled up both their chalices first, then settled back into her couch and looked avid.

"You have my full attention," she said. "Now make good use of it."

Thus invited, Shizuru spared no time in telling. She told everything, save that which she wanted most to discuss. It was not shame that motivated this but a feeling that the personal subject of Natsuki would be better broached after the external particulars were done. Hence, she talked only about the beginning of her appointment to the North, her work in that region, and the circumstances surrounding her replacement. Her cousin listened with complete interest, nodding and contributing remarks occasionally to make it clear she was engaged. Once Shizuru finished, she replaced the remarks with a glance of reproach.

"I see now that I have been grossly shortchanged in news," she said bitterly. "Oh, people have been writing to me. But you know how troublesome it is to try and see which letters are worth a damn, and which people worthy correspondents. I wish you had written to me earlier about all this."

She continued before Shizuru could offer the protest: "I remember! I know I said I wanted to be kept out of all this business and left alone to my own ways, but I can regret that, can't I? Especially when it's something like this, and something involving you. The complication of it!"

Shizuru smiled sadly.

"Certainly I would have told you earlier had I known you would be interested-or that matters would grow to such difficulty," she answered, finishing with a sigh. "How the sloth of communication encumbers us! Would it not be beautiful if, one day, people discovered some manner of delivering information that were instantaneous, like those mythical crystals the Eastern magi claim permit such exchange of knowledge?"

She received a sarcastic look for the fanciful digression. Masking her own surprise with a smile, she realised suddenly that she was speaking as though with Natsuki, whose tendency to divagate in conversation often drew out her own. Oh, how lastingly had she been altered indeed! And by a girl who had walked away from her so easily!

She picked up her chalice and took a long drink.

"I should hope you to be joking, Shizuru," her cousin was saying with dryness, ignorant of Shizuru's inner grief. "Even the Greeks do not impute such immediate exchange to the gods-else why come up with an Iris or a Hermes?-and you know what a ridiculous sense of imagination they have. Such magics do not exist, nor shall they ever exist. No, let's talk of something practical and closer to the earth... or the mud, in this case. Tomoe."

She said the name with caution, as though it were something she was afraid would stain her teeth.

"Vappa! A baser brat I never knew," she said. "Just as I never knew how you could stand her."

"Did you not say it earlier?" Shizuru said with light mockery. "We are family."

"Perhaps you are-I'd prefer to think myself no cousin of that creature," Shizuma answered. She peeked at Shizuru from under her fringe of silvery hair. "You know I never liked her."

"Yes, I know," Shizuru sighed tiredly. "And yes, before you say it, this may well be validation of that opinion."

"A pestilence on opinion. Her baseness is a fact." Shizuma scowled at nothing in particular, her aquiline nose pinching. "Even at childhood she would inveigle others into some meanness she wanted played, and had a wide streak of cruelty. Many's the time I've seen her kick away a newborn kitten." Her face darkened further, distaste maturing into patent repugnance. "Fascination with poisons is hardly the stuff of fidelity."

"Whereas a fascination with swords is?"

Shizuma, who had always been a deft hand with a sword, smirked: "Most definitely. Fidelity goes to the flashing!"

"And falsity to the festered?" Shizuru quipped. "Alas, you were right about Tomoe, Shizuma. But I swear I shall have vengeance upon her."

"So definite!" exclaimed the other woman, who knew Shizuru's normal policy of clemency with most things and with the family. "You plan to invalidate her nomination of you on the premise that she falsified your consent, correct?"

"Yes."

"Difficult. Unfortunately-oh so unfortunately!-she is family." She shrugged carelessly. "It's true we are not related to her by blood, but the familial link applies all the same, since her father married our aunt after her mother died. For all practical purposes, that pest is our cousin and part of the family."

Shizuma scowled and looked weary as she concluded it: "And to denounce family is a solecism to our society."

Shizuru looked even wearier than she did.

"I know that," she responded. "But what else am I to do, Shizuma? I have no intent of lying down under her treachery, else she may think I am a mat upon which she may wipe her feet. I must denounce her! Dignitas demands it."

"Can it not be arranged such that the culpability be thrown elsewhere?"

"I thought of that too," Shizuru replied. "Something to the effect that she received a falsified letter claiming to be from me and instructing her to submit my name for the last elections. That would put the blame nicely upon some other nefarious character."

The silver-haired woman nodded. "That would work. So what goes against it?"

"The fact that the fool apparently claimed I had left her with that instruction even before I left for my campaign, and left it to her orally, not by letter."

An irritated growl.

"That idiot!" Shizuma spat furiously. "Well, be it on her head. She is the one who has dug her own pit, and it's her own fault if that is where she shall be buried. You will have to denounce her for it, if you want to even stand a chance of getting out of that office. The only thing I can suggest to help with the shock it will give-and this is a suggestion that will truly ruin her, I have to say-is to stress an understanding of the situation that says she is the one who has ruined familial solidarity... collapsed it by her perfidy and connivance against you, that is. From beginning to end, she shall have to be a complete villain in the story."

Shizuru was smiling.

"Exactly as I intend to do it," she admitted gently. "That shall ensure, of course, that I am not the one branded with the slur of familial betrayal. Unfortunately, such a measure shall transfer an indelible mark to her-or bring about Tomoe's ruin, as you say."

"Don't tell me you still feel pity for that creature!"

"Oh, no. Not really." Shizuru shook her head in earnest. "I was merely thinking on how it would also cast a bit of a blot on at least one member of our family, even though it is likely all our relatives would dissociate from her afterwards. Thank the gods there is no blood link! Still, the familial implication irks me." She frowned a little, more in thought than real displeasure.

"That is a paltry consideration before the principal one, all the same. In fact, I have already set things in motion, and my allies even now should be tending to it."

"No appeal, then?"

Shizuru nodded, having thought hard about this ever since learning of the treachery from their cousin. Beyond her own preferences and plans demanding the extension of her stay in the north, there was the other and ultimate query: which would she prefer to see, the wounding of her dignitas, the part of it that was made up of her pride in herself, or the political death of Tomoe and Tomoe's credibility?

No question about it. Vale, Tomoe .

"No appeal," she said decidedly. "She has wronged and must pay for it. Rightful vengeance is due."

Shizuma stretched out her legs and wagged the feet playfully, looking very pleased. Shizuru watched her cousin, sparing a smile for the large and long feet common to both of them.

"I like this side of you best, you know, talking from punishment to vengeance," the white-blond told her. "To be fair, I do see why you should be vengeful. I would feel exactly the same." She stopped to think and qualified her words. "No, rather, would I? There might be something of a difference. I have always disliked her enormously, let us remember."

"Whereas I have not?" Shizuru said, raising an eyebrow archly.

"A difference in degree is a difference in kind. You did not dislike her enough to preclude suffering her before. I'm relieved that she has finally reached your saturation point!"

"That is because she has now steeped both my sleeves to the chest." Shizuru heaved out another deep sigh: it was amusing Shizuma terribly, since Shizuru had been doing it so often and it put to her mind the groans of a thespian playing to the crowd in a death scene. "The offence to dignitas aside, what she has done has also ensured my parting from something important to me."

Shizuma's response was to look at her curiously but not with ignorance. Even if the silver-haired patrician no longer spent her time in the city and had sworn off public life, there were still those who apprised her of events, as she had mentioned. To be sure, she found most of the missives dull and-in her own words-"drier than a desiccated whore", but there were still some chance gems she could find when she sifted through the dust.

She produced one of those dusted-off gems from her memory.

"The girl," she guessed. "Otomeian princess or something?"

Her cousin peeked above the rim of a goblet.

"So you are not as uninformed as you claim," Shizuru said in accusation.

Shizuma responded negatively.

"I know only that much," she said. "Some wrote asking me if it was true you were carrying out an affair with an Otomeian-a noble or a princess of some kind, as well as an officer in your army. How silly, asking me! How was I to know anything? I've been away from that sphere for so long everyone should be aware of it."

"I imagine both the familial and personal tie was the reason for the asking-not to mention your diverse links to many other women from Hime who could supply you with some fairly reliable gossip."

Shizuma smiled, looked terribly rakish.

"Fairly reliable, nothing! What would women from Hime know for sure about some liaison happening up north?" she countered with a low chuckle. "It tickled me, however. Even more now, since you have very nearly confirmed it. Or have you?"

A nod.

"I see." She paused. "I'm amazed."

It was Shizuru's turn to smile and look rakish as she said, "Are you really?"

"Yes. It's a surprise." The white-blond hair moved, alive as Shizuma shook her head. "After so long without showing any real interest in anyone beyond your ancestor, Mars; I was starting to think your only love was really the battlefield. Then this, finally, and at five-and-twenty years of age. 'Mazes me.'"

She took a sip of her wine, looking very calm for someone professing amazement.

"Very good-looking?" she followed, being a woman with exquisite taste in women.

Shizuru smiled and made to reply, but change her mind before speaking. She put a hand to her side instead, touching a cloth purse tied to her belt.

"I have a... cameo," she admitted guardedly. "A likeness."

Shizuma was amazed again: this time it actually showed.

"How is it that you do?" she enquired.

Shizuru kept her hand on the pouch, thumb stroking it.

"I wanted one," she said. "I had it made. It was simple."

"Unlike you," Shizuma accused, the words double-edged. "Holding a cameo? And on your person? What romanticism is this?" She sniggered suddenly, the sound faintly smothered as she tried to lower her grin into a smirk. "Did I not know better, cousin, I would say you were mad about this girl."

Shizuru's answer struck away her amusement.

"I am. But I like her as a friend, a person, too."

Then the wheaten-haired woman produced the item, a palm-sized oval of polished sardonyx, the face of a young woman showing white against a background of pearl-glossed umber and ivory. She had another portrait of the girl, an actual painting, but that one was tucked away with her things since it was large and not carried easily. Therefore it was the cameo she kept on hand, and showed to her cousin.

"This is she," she said, unable to resist a glance at it. "This is Natsuki."

Shizuma took it mutely. She looked at the clear lines, the fine huntress profile.

"She is beautiful," she said simply, knowing there could be no other word for it.

Shizuru beamed. Her cousin's next remark had her eyebrows arching.

"Leggy and slender, correct?"

"How did you know?" Shizuru asked.

The other woman rolled her eyes. "As though we did not use to compare the women we found attractive when we were younger. I know your taste."

Shizuru's lips twitched.

"But she is beautiful," Shizuma repeated, looking once again at the carved face.

"Yet that is merely a portrait. It does not capture her to the life."

"Then I am surprised you did not commission a better artist."

"It is not a criticism of the art or the artist," Shizuru clarified. "That is in fact an excellent portrait of her. But her beauty is not that which can be captured by an image, because images do not breathe..."

She paused, searching for a way to describe the enigma that was Natsuki.

"Beyond the beauty is the life," she said. "Her very life is part of what makes her so aesthetic. If words fall short of her, so should paints and portraits."

She smiled and took back the cameo: "Everything in the world falls short after her, I think."

Her cousin stared at her as though she had sprouted a second head.

"Will wonders never cease?" Shizuma's voice was carefully modulated. "You liked her very much, Shizuru?"

"I still do. She is likeable, you know, in many, sometimes peculiar ways." There was a thoughtful chew of the lip, which the hazel eyes noticed immediately. "She is quite singular, that child. She has the most unique habits and attitudes, like the way she often sat at my feet, or near them as I worked, to keep me company..."

She trailed off as something crossed her face like a lightning streak. She had become painfully conscious again and all too suddenly of the physical absence: the luxuriance of dark hair against her leg, the soft sweep of lashes by her knee.

Her fingers shot deep into the palms.

"The truth is," she uttered, finally driven past restraint, "I do miss her terribly!"

Shizuma's jaw dropped.

"Ecaster !" she exclaimed, for lack of anything else to say. Her cousin's response was even more Himean: Shizuru drained her goblet and refilled it.

"I know," was all she said, once the crisis had been dampened by liquor.

They looked at each other warily.

"This must be some sort of weird day," Shizuma proposed, shaking her head. "Things are going topsy-turvy. I cannot believe what I have just heard."

"Indeed?" Shizuru had recovered a little. "I wonder if that means you think me such a cold one then. I do miss people."

"But rarely enough to admit with such fervour as you did just now. Or with such a ring of truth."

Again the pain threatened to break over the tawny blonde's face. She was able to suppress it this time.

"It is true," she said colourlessly, her face blank instead of betraying the earlier flash of pain.

Shizuma nodded, disappointed.

"A princess, eh?" she said nonchalantly, eager to go a little deeper into this.

"Yes."

"Fitting. She likes you too, of course?" she asked.

Here was the test.

"She loves me," was Shizuru's grave assertion.

Up shot a silver eyebrow. "Hm!"

And then she asked, just because it could be true: "Not for your money, we hope?"

Shizuru flicked that away with distinct contempt.

"Impossible," she said quickly.

"Oh? What makes you so sure?" The white blonde suddenly laughed, and the sound was hard. "Ah, Shizuru, I hate to say it, but you shouldn't be so sure of women! Throw them a bauble first and they profess eternal love: deny them a bracelet later and they accuse you of waxing cold. Many a woman have I known who pretended to like me for reasons other than my money... and so, I predict, shall you, without offence to your more personal attractions."

The other woman was unfazed by the warning.

"I do not doubt that you have indeed known such women," she said. "I do not doubt that such women exist-as do similar men, for that matter. Nonetheless, I very much doubt that Natsuki is such a woman. Indeed, it seemed to embarrass her almost to the point of pain whenever I gave her the barest token of my affection. Natsuki has never even asked anything of me, which is more than I can say for myself with her."

Shizuma lifted an eyebrow, still sceptical about this "Natsuki".

"Even so," she uttered. "They say the best catch in the sea are the ones for which you do not cast a line directly. How can you be sure she is not chasing after your legacy?"

Shizuru sighed, dismissing that now with an even more sceptical look than the other had.

"As I said, impossible, given her character," she retorted. "But if you would like to have more concrete reasons, it is because she might be wary of legacy-chasers herself."

"Oh, so the princess does have access to the royal vaults, after all?"

"I am not sure if one could call them the royal vaults. Simply, I have every reason to believe she is fabulously rich, and without needing to touch my money. Perhaps it has nothing to do with the Otomeian Treasury, even."

She paused for a moment, trying to recall all of the myths about the missing Ortygian treasures and pared everything down to the barest, most realistic estimates. And even then...

"Why, that is so!" she cried, gasping at the thought of what she had never really considered before. "If what I suspect is true, she might even have a fortune to rival mine!"

Up shot two marble-hued eyebrows: "Hyperbole!"

"I swear it!"

Shizuru's mind was working again, trying to sort out all the stories about Natsuki's people. How many temples had they once despoiled, ages ago, when they had first begun their long trek from the coastline after leaving the original island whence they and the Otomeians came? Added to which were the treasures they had brought with them on their ships, mythical hoards of jewels and gold. And then there were the armies that had tried to infiltrate their forest home, all save that of the traitor Mithrii annihilated, all looted, all their armour and baggage and standards taken by those fierce extinct people.

"Yes," she determined, breath catching. "It might very well be so."

She threw a stern look at her cousin. "And this is not so well-known, Shizuma, so I would have you hold it that way. Let it be thought that the Ortygian treasures are gone. It is better for Natsuki."

Shizuma lifted an eyebrow at this display of protectiveness.

"Tell me more about her," she encouraged.

Shizuru subsided into the couch while acquiescing, staring up at the intricately frescoed ceiling of her cousin's atrium. As she expanded on the subject, the other woman began to realise just how much Shizuru liked the girl from the North, how deeply she felt for that foreigner. The curse of their family! Shizuru's obvious passion for her barbarian brought back echoes of Shizuma's own past all too quickly, of feelings she had spent the last years trying to forget.

The reminder had her feeling rather prickly.

"She is kind," Shizuru enthused, too pleased to finally be able to speak of her lover to notice the other patrician's discomfort. " Such a good person, Shizuma! Perhaps that is why animals like her, in fact. I have heard they are more cunning than people that way, capable of sensing those with meanness in them."

The silver-haired woman found a smile.

"Animals like her?" she repeated.

Shizuru smiled back, though more earnestly. "They do, and she likes them as well. I gave her a pet, by the way."

Her cousin started shifting about on the couch, trying to find a more comfy position.

"How sweet," she said blandly, still fussing over her seat. "A tidy lapdog to keep her company?"

"A feline."

"Still sweet. A nice little cat, then?"

Shizuru thought of her lover's pet. And then she remembered

Natsuki's defence of it, that day she had tried to talk the Otomeian into putting it on a leash.

"Yes," she said. "It was a nice little cat."

"Hmm."

"It was attracted to Natsuki from the beginning," she went on, steering the dialogue to her previous subject. "Most animals, I noticed, seemed to be. The same might be said of people. Certainly she does not invite familiarity, but to anyone with true discernment, or those who know her, she just exudes such... such warmth. A hidden but true flame-and this, a fact, not an amendment of my fancy."

Shizuma paused in her fidgets and suddenly looked terrifically entertained.

She said: "In sum, if I am to trust you on this, she is terribly good-looking, terribly intelligent and athletic, terribly rich, and probably terribly nice as well?"

"Yes."

"Would she also happen to be terribly fabricated?"

"Cousin!" Shizuru protested with a laugh, at which the other started chuckling. "You saw the cameo."

"Comeos can be invented-and that one looks more like some imagined goddess than a true character. Grant she's too good to be real, going from that flurry of panegyric you gave me! Far too good. Although... yes... There is that."

"That?"

"The fault in the otherwise perfect marble. She's not Himean." Shizuma shrugged, knowing full well that what she was about to say was provocative. "What a pity she's a foreigner-she's no use to a senator of Hime socially or politically, is she?"

"I should think she is much use to me!"

Shizuma was taken aback by the vehemence of the outburst, and straightened in her seat. The other woman was sitting up as well, looking highly offended.

"In the sense of being a potential bride for a marriage alliance, is what I meant," Shizuma explained.

Here she was surprised by her cousin again, for the sandy-haired woman replied petulantly. Shizuru, petulant? Ye immortal gods, she cried inwardly, this day is indeed topsy-turvy!

"She is a princess," was what Shizuru told her in that displeased tone, somehow making it clear that she was actually little interested in whatever political help her foreign girl could give her, despite her own words supposed to be in support of the contrary. "Princess by blood-rights. Of a powerful allied nation."

"Hmm, well," Shizuma intoned thoughtfully, her eyes never leaving her cousin's. "There's generally something to be had from such liaisons, I suppose."

Shizuru looked, she thought, like she was becoming even more irritated.

"Is she the next-in-line?" she followed in feigned recklessness.

"No, though she is in the line of succession as a formality," said Shizuru.

"That does add to her good qualities, then."

"Yes... quite."

"And she is rich."

Shizuru frowned, then tried not to frown: "Yes."

"Again something that goes in her favour."

The red-eyed woman nodded silently. Shizuma clapped her hands together.

"There you go, then: you're right. There is quite a bit to be had in the way of advantages with your young woman. She is young, you mentioned?"

"Why does that matter?"

"A young woman is more manageable, and a waif of a young woman even more so. How old is she?"

"Ni-twenty."

"Another good thing!" The white blonde peered at her cousin mischievously. "And all of these good things are not worth a tot or a tittle to you, are they?"

Shizuru's stare turned leaden as she recognised the trick.

"Damn you," she said, trying very hard not to smile; Shizuma was already grinning happily. "Why bait me?"

"Because it's enjoyable, and rarely successful," the other woman answered, before suddenly sobering. "But. You really are mad about her."

"Yes," Shizuru agreed. "I really am mad about her."

"Youth and love will have its way. Or so it is said. It cannot be helped." Shizuma began to turn so that she could lie on her back. "So long as your madness for her does not actually prompt you to do something representative of that state."

"Would it be representative of it if I procure for her a citizenship and use it to bind her to me?"

Shizuma's back had barely touched the couch: she shot up as though burned by it.

"Ecastor!" she exclaimed, looking with horror at her cousin-her truly mad cousin, it seemed. She swung both legs over the side of her couch with a smack and leaned forward, looking very much as though she were about to slap Shizuru in the face. "Are you having me on? You cannot!"

But Shizuru chuckled gamely.

"Oh, but I can," she said. "Chikane would assist me, too."

Starting a little at the mention of their friend, Shizuma opened her mouth for another protest before realising Shizuru might be right: Chikane just might allow her to get away with such madness. Or might it be otherwise? Ye gods, who knew what the outcome could be when the two conspired?

"Topsy-turvy!" she cried, drawing a curious look from her cousin. She frowned to dispel the moment and asked, stern once more: "Are you serious, Shizuru?"

"Yes."

"Then you have gone off your wits."

Her cousin seemed not at all offended.

"I can do it," she reaffirmed. "You shall see."

Shizuma shook her head passionately.

"No, no," she ground out. "Well, it may be that you can do it. But you should not-that is the crux of it! It could ruin you, Shizuru. Think!"

"I do, contrary to what you seem to be assuming of me. Would that you gave me more credit!"

The silver-haired woman glowered.

"Would that you did know how much credit I give you!" she shot back, eyes gleaming. "You know why I am against it, Shizuru, and it's for the selfsame credit questioned. We know it, cousin, and we knew it a long time ago, even when we were no more than kids-you matter! You are not just another politician, nor just another eccentric patrician, nor even just another Fujino, come to it. I am not saying this to saddle you, but you surely see from where I am coming. If your intended ruination of Tomoe is a social solecism, then this other thing is complete anathema! Especially to someone who is going to become the First Citizen of Hime."

Shizuru's face softened.

"I thank you for your belief in me," she said calmly. "But it is that which I invoke now, for I share the same belief in myself. Leave the matter be, for I have set my mind on it and not without some cost either, in the setting. My mind has weighed and the decision is made; it shall happen."

"Even if it drags down your star?"

"Would the moon drag down a star or complement it?"

Shizuma's brow creased again, but in puzzlement.

"Muddled metaphor," she noted confusedly, having expected something more appropriate from her cousin.

Shizuru chuckled.

"Not if you knew Natsuki," she told Shizuma, whose bewilderment only increased. "You should not worry. Aside from her more measurable qualities, she has that indefinable one that matters too, and greatly, Shizuma. In Argentum she saved me from certain skewering, when I could not see a nearby foe because of the bleeding that left this." The halved eyebrow was touched again, gingerly. "And that we won the battle so cheaply, with so few losses among our own, was chiefly due to her timely arrival with the cavalry. Oh, I told her what to do there, yes. But the action that reprieved us was hers to execute and finesse in the execution! Not only did she save me but also the army! Do you understand, Shizuma? She is lucky!"

Shizuma blinked at this. Being a Himean, she understood how Shizuru could feel bound to her foreigner because of such things and because of the favours of Fortune, whom all Himeans revered greatly.

"She saved you," she said interestedly.

"Yes, and more besides, as I said. All my 'great achievements' in the North, Cousin, were done with her at my side. Is that not noteworthy?" She smiled suddenly, remembering another thing.

"And she was born on the Ides of August, a day sacred to the great god, and a fifteenth. Fifteen is lucky."

"I know that," Shizuma sighed. Even if she was not an augur like her cousin, she knew that much because all Himeans did: fifteen was the lucky number since it was the fulcrum of the unlucky ones, thirteen and seventeen. "And I can see how you can feel tied to her because of that luck she has brought you, Shizuru, which saved even your life. I can see. But... oh, still!"

Shizuru grinned, knowing her cousin was beginning to tire. "Come, let it be for now. I do not wish to spend our reunion on a futile argument. I really shall do what I proposed, and you really shall not sway me otherwise."

Shizuma, busy killing the urge to grasp handfuls of her own hair, shook her head sluggishly.

"Unless..." she said eventually. "You yourself change your mind in the future."

"My affections are of a more adamant nature."

"Adamant yoke, then!"

But Shizuru closed her eyes calmly, knowing her cousin was now speaking more against love than the politics of it, being a woman who had once been burned by amour badly.

"Cedimus, an subitum luctando accendimus ignem?" she recited. "Cedamus!"

Her cousin scowled at the line, already reduced to massaging a temple.

"Some burdens do not get any lighter," she warned, remembering her own experience with Cupid's arrow: it was still stuck in her heart and spreading venom. "But really, Shizuru, quoting Ovid? Since when did you get so sentimental?"

"Call it what you will," the other woman replied steadfastly. "I care not. This is one burden that straps wings to my feet, if burden such wings may be."

Shizuma stared at her for a few seconds, torn between amusement and frustration.

"You have a very irritating sense of romance, Shizuru," she said ironically, after some time of contemplating the oddity that was turning out to be her dearest relative. "Don't use it on me."

She picked up her chalice and lifted it to her lips, but stopped before sipping.

"I'm susceptible, you see," she admitted.

Shizuru set her own chalice on the console table and folded in genuine laughter.

"Tace!" the other woman said, flinging up a hand as though to bat away a terrifically persistent insect: that was how Shizuma tended to see love these days, for all that it still exerted vestigial powers on her, the susceptible romantic. "Have it your way for now. I shall cease pestering you on your lover. Never say I did not warn you."

"And never say I did not contest the warning."

"Done! Let us be on to the clearer business."

"As you wish," Shizuru answered, still giggling.

"I do wish," Shizuma replied. "Quick, Shizuru, and answer me. Why are you here?"

That stopped the other's mirth.

"What do you mean?" she said, arching her golden brows. "I came to see you, Shizuma."

"To slip me into something related to all of this, I'll warrant. Why are you here?"

"Can I not be here simply out of a desire to see you?" she asked Shizuma slyly. "You paint me so wily, really."

Shizuma smirked: "I paint you fine. Take me for a fool?"

"Only a fool indeed would make such a bargain."

"How good to know you esteem me that much." The silver-haired woman sighed and asked again. "Why are you here, Shizuru? Why call so abruptly-and, as I remember from your letter, urgently-on me? You've long honoured my request to be left alone, and only ever called on me when already passing through near country, so this request to get together is a notable break. What is happening to your career is notable, certainly, as well as important. But you would never have made this request of me to meet you had you nothing in mind for the meeting that could relate somehow to what is happening to you politically. So I repeat the question. What do you want of me?"

The other woman suddenly grinned, which she took as the prelude to revelation.

"Well," Shizuru said. "I told you I shall be seeking to invalidate my election as urban praetor."

"Yes-something that radical is hard to forget, once mentioned."

"I shall do it such that I might be rendered just another praetor, without the germane restrictions upon me."

"Yes."

"And such that I may resume command of the North."

"Yes, I know, to make war with the Mentulae," Shizuma said, exasperated. "I was listening, Shizuru. Whereas you seem not to have heard my question, for you have yet to answer it!"

Shizuru laughed, looking more like herself because of it.

"My apologies," she said cheerfully. "The answer is that I want you to go to war with me. I need your help this time, Shizuma, and I need it badly. Would you please be my next senior legate, Cousin?"

---

At the same time that Shizuru was visiting her cousin late that April, the petition for her triumph was finally brought to the Senate's attention. It might actually have been discussed much earlier, as it was not even Shizuru who had written it but her friend and Hime's senior consul in residence, Chikane Himemiya. However, that was a truth that the senior consul and Shizuru kept between them. The public understanding was that the petition had been sent by the returning senator herself; it was known from her advance couriers that she was only a week's march from the city, expected by the Calends of May.

The junior consul Yukino Kikukawa was presiding over the meetings for April, and it was she who brought up the subject in the session, the senior consul having advised her of it just before the meeting. It was the last item on the agenda and the one with the least expectation of difficulty. Even Shizuru's staunchest critics had no desire to oppose her petition. Her battles in the North were universally known and agreed-though some agreed a little grudgingly-to be triumph-worthy.

Thus, there was no excitement at all upon the junior consul's introduction of the matter to the itinerary. The only drama expected was small and uncertain, given that its projected source might already have prepared: the expected drama was the chance to witness Haruka Armitage's reaction, since she was an avowed enemy of the petitioner and her own triumph had just been denied so bitterly.

"We now come to the request from the returning Shizuru Fujino," announced the junior consul, who was on the curule dais with the other imperium-owning magistrates. Before and below this dais was also the long bench where the year's tribunes of the plebs reposed, the president of their college in the middle of the seat. Usually, when a controversial or highly emotional issue was being introduced, the attention would be centred here, for the bench's occupants held the awesome power of the veto and were thus the greatest of aids or enemies. The present subject was unlikely to see debate, however, so no eye was turned their way.

"For having been hailed imperator on the field in the Battle of Argentum, she requests the House's permission to be granted a triumph upon return to the city," the junior consul was saying. "I would like to remind everyone that she was the authorised envoy of the Senate and People to prevent the possible encroachment of the Mentulae upon our territories and our allies' territories. I would also like to take this opportunity to remind the House that she is the urban praetor-elect, which means she shall be inaugurated into her elected office immediately after setting down her imperium and finishing the requested triumphal procession."

"About time, too," came a sarcastic drawl from Hikaru Senou-father of Aoi Senou, Chie Harada's lover-who had of late been speaking strenuously about the shameful absence of the urban praetor from the city. "She has been taking to the extreme the idea of 'fashionably late'!"

"Given that she has those other duties to assume," continued the junior consul, ignoring the interruption. "I would like to finish this matter summarily. It's in the city's best interests to have its urban praetor go to her office as soon as possible. It's also in Hime's best interests to see the proper honour go to those who have carried out brave deeds for its sake. I believe there's no more need to recount everything Shizuru Fujino has done, and of what she is worthy. Therefore I move that we vote on the petition directly, without any further debate. I shall see a vote on this immediately."

A few titters broke, for it was clear that the junior consul intended that no one impede the triumphal petition of her faction's arch-enemy, and was thus directing her prohibition of debate to her own allies. Oh, the delicious irony!

All eyes slid sideways, trying to peek at the only person who might have had the gall to create the impediment so expressly forbidden: the junior consul's dearest friend and mentor, Haruka Armitage. Whatever show they might have enjoyed there was never to be known, for something happened that upstaged that dramatic possibility. Right before the motion was carried, with everyone ripe and spoiling for a bit of entertainment to cap what had been a dull meeting, a cheerful voice suddenly usurped the lead role in the comedy.

"I interpose my veto."

Eyes went rolling. Five hundred senators found themselves sitting mute, robbed of breath, as they stared at the source of the startling interruption. A veto? For this ?!

A few moments passed where nothing sounded in the Curia Hostilis save for a suspended gasp of the collective.

The junior consul was first to recover and speak. As she was the one presiding over the meeting, this was only appropriate; as she had been the one interrupted, it was actually necessary. There was a slight pause when she opened her mouth, however, during which she hesitated over what to say. What had happened was so unexpected! A veto on her motion? Ludicrous! So ludicrous, in fact, that her first concern was not even for the defiance to her prohibition of debate, but rather for the person who had just defeated that prohibition so illogically. A veto on a motion to see through one of the most deserved triumphs in history? A veto on what should have been the most sensible, easiest motion since her inauguration into the consul's seat? Absurd, really!

Yukino Kikukawa was a logical person. Thus she did the most logical thing, in light of her reasoning.

She decided to ignore the absurdity.

"I repeat," she said, as though nothing had happened. "I shall see a vote on the matter promptly."

But the absurd proved capable of striking twice in the same place.

"And I repeat, I interpose my veto just as promptly," came the voice again from below the dais. "Belay your motion, Junior Consul. A tribune of the plebs has vetoed it."

The House blinked in stupefaction once more. And then started murmuring.

Yukino, who had blinked too, looked about with the stunned expression of a person walking into a wall where none had been thought to exist. What a thing to happen! The situation was horrible to her because she hated surprises, and this had come as a total surprise, not to mention an unfathomable. Try though she might, she could not see any logic in the veto barring her way to closing this topic. Now she wanted more than ever to close this meeting!

She had been hoping to finish the day's session as soon as possible because she had a headache. She had been squinting at the tiers earlier, and her eyes were weak, which she hated; they tired from only a few squints. How much she wanted to just let drop her eyelids, to squeeze them tight! But that would be deemed a weakness, especially with this unprecedented situation unfolding, so she had to settle for frowning. She hoped, at least, that the expression would help in her next task by lending her face some necessary gravity.

The loan turned out a little pinched, unfortunately.

"Urumi Himemiya-Kanzaki Nemura-san," she said, intoning the awesome name with the tenderness of one treating the mentally defective: she remembered well the reputation of the vetoing speaker, the many accusations of insanity despite or due to a frightful intelligence. Was it possible, then, that this genius had actually gone insane? Oh, Yukino thought, there were many precedents for such a thing! It was entirely possible and even likely. Why else would she have posed her veto so absurdly? And as someone supposedly one of Shizuru Fujino's allies? Rack her brain though she might, intelligent as she was, Yukino could see no reason for one on Fujino's side to prevent her triumph. This had to be lunacy-every other incredulous face in the House affirmed that it was lunacy.

"Did we hear you say you interpose your veto?" she asked finally. She asked it gently, however, and still with that tone that implied she believed she addressed someone mentally defective.

Urumi Himemiya-Kanzaki Nemura did not miss it.

"You heard me say I interpose my veto, Junior Consul," replied the president of the Tribunician College, whose face the consuls and all those on the curule dais could not see.

A pause. "Over the last motion?"

"Over the last motion, Junior Consul."

Again the emphasis on "junior", thought the junior consul, who was hard to bait.

She asked again, for the sake of certainty: "You interpose your veto over my motion to vote on granting Shizuru Fujino a triumph?"

The tribune of the plebs grinned, her differently-coloured eyes dancing.

"I interpose my veto over your motion to vote on granting Shizuru Fujino a triumph," she chanted joyfully, and ended: "Junior Consul."

This time there was no pause before the voices started buzzing. There was suddenly a legitimate worry that the president of the Tribunician College this year was a loony, or perhaps suffering from some abrupt ailment affecting her logic. It was common knowledge that she was an intellectual prodigy, which only worked to support the suspicions of insanity. Intellectuals were known to be unstable, constantly teetering on the precipice of reason and drawn to the abstract theoretical sea. Was there anything more abstracted from politics than that sea? Was there anything more alien to a politician than the purely intellectual theory?

Glances were directed to both her cousins-the Princeps Senatus and the senior consul-in search of the concern everyone expected to see. To everyone's surprise, however, the former merely looked intrigued; the latter looked serene.

That was when they realised that neither was surprised by what their cousin was doing.

Yukino was among those who peered at her consular colleague. Like the others, she received no answering glance, however, and felt the onus of handling the meeting crash upon her shoulders. Which were aching. She had caught on to what those who had chanced a peek at the Princeps or the senior consul had seen, which was that there was something going on beneath the apparent absurdity. The difficulty was that she could not figure out the nature of that something. What was Himemiya-Kanzaki Nemura planning?

Or was it something having Chikane Himemiya as its origin? Was it Kanzaki Princeps Senatus? Or even-and this caused a shiver-the returning Shizuru Fujino? There just had to be something, every instinct in her told her there was something.

So why could she not see it?

Feeling the dip of consternation, she glanced instinctively to the left of the tiers, where her friend Armitage was sitting. Her friend looked just as bemused as she, however. Desperate, she scanned through the rows to see her other friends' notions on this. Every face she met was puzzled, empty. No help to be had, then; she had to bring up her own steel.

She drew it.

"For what reason do you interpose your veto over the motion?" she finally said, and said it grimly: she should not humour this potential lunatic-cum-troublemaker with overdue acquiescence, else her own auctoritas suffer-and that would make Haruka angry. "We deserve to know, Tribune, because we can arrest you for obstructing the proceedings."

The House was shocked afresh, for the tribune's response was to burst into hilarity. Was that the first verification of lunacy?

"Forgive me, but we all know that is a near-impossibility," the chuckling tribune explained to the gawping senators. "I am an elected tribune of the plebs and my body is thus inviolate due to this office. Did you try to arrest me, I might claim that you were obstructing me in the rightful exercise of my duties and thus have you arrested. Would that not be funny?"

"Not if you don't spew a reason as the consul's just directed, Bratling!" roared the brassy voice of Armitage, who was finally provoked into speech. "It's you who's being obstructing!"

Urumi turned her head to look the other senator in the eye. As Haruka was to her left, it was her brown eye that Haruka could see.

"Obstructive," said Urumi. "You mean 'obstructive' . "

Up came Haruka, down toppled her seat, and away went a servant to get it.

"Lictors, arrest this tribune!" the enraged senator screamed, foaming at the mouth. "She's being obstruct *iii*ve !"

"Oh, don't let her goad you!" cried Sergay Wang, who was on the next stool.

"I said arrest her, Lictors!"

At which point the normally languid senior consul stood, yelled for the confused lictors to remain where they were, and stared down the members of the farce with cold fury. Taking advantage of the pause after her shout, she reminded the thoroughly fascinated House of the real subject they were discussing, and adjured everyone to dispense with the theatrics. It was noted that the admonition included even her cousin.

"Enough inanities and on with the issue, if issue there should be," she said fatally, once able to speak without raising her voice to a shout. "Any further intermissions had best be germane to the topic, else they be considered a true obstruction and reason to remove their speakers from this gathering."

She then nodded courteously to the fidgeting junior consul, and asked the woman to resume the meeting.

The junior consul took over again.

"No-no one shall arrest anybody," Yukino instructed uncertainly, a little flushed at Urumi's last retort and the recent display of her colleague's superior authority. To have quelled even Haruka, without even swearing! If only she could be a little more like that-or like Haruka, for that matter, who was naturally intimidating. Instead, she had to let someone else do it, even now when she was one of the two most powerful magistrates in Hime. Pathetic . It brought back echoes of what the other children had used to call her, when she was younger: Yukino the Mouse, Yukino the Timid.

Yukino the Weak.

It was those echoes that made her grit her teeth.

"We shall hear Nemura Himemiya-Kanzaki-san's reasons," she announced, speaking suddenly in a loud voice few had thought her capable of producing. "Of violence, there is no need. The same can be said for interruptions to this meeting, as expressed before me by my colleague."

And to her red-faced friend, very kindly: "Please, Armitage-san. Return to your seat."

After everything had been arranged more or less to her liking, she returned to the issue with more composure than before. She squinted-ye gods, how her eyes were aching!-at the menace still seated on the bench below the dais. A head of golden hair was all she could see.

"Himemiya-Kanzaki Nemura-san, are you ready to explain?" she demanded, voice growing steadier as she found her confidence. "I want no more dissimulation from you. Either explain, please, or retract the veto."

There was a suspenseful pause from the tribune for the extremely titillated House, for Urumi loved to be titillating.

"As directed, Junior Consul," she finally declared, rising to go to the centre of the floor. "I shall explain my veto or else retract it. I choose to explain it."

Yukino nodded sternly, looked the part of her office; inwardly, she heaved a sigh of pure relief.

Every member of Senate was awake now, and staring curiously at the young woman on the marbled floor. She took a moment to stare back piercingly. One of Urumi's eye tricks: it gave her the appearance of surveying the crowd while meeting each gaze individually, though that was surely impossible, especially now that senatorial attendance of the meetings was high. It was about this time that those senators and Himeans who preferred to live in the countryside returned to the city, eager to attend the games or ludi. Thus the senators present to hear Urumi were many... which was just the way she liked it to be.

"Members of the House, I vetoed the recent motion for a reason," she started, pitching her voice a little higher than usual so it would carry. "And I know, Fellow Senators! I know that seems an odd thing! I know that reason seems distant, almost imaginary. Truth be told, I myself would have thought the same, had I not the fortune to be apprised of something unknown to many. And had the further fortune, Fortune being favourable in its justice, to see to the sordid and malicious depths of it."

She started walking up and down, for her oratorical style was that of the peripatetic.

"The reason I interposed my veto, earlier, was to address an illegality," she announced, nodding at those who leaned forward. "Yes, you heard me correct, Good Colleagues. An illegality, and a grave one."

She raised a palm.

"To be sure, I do not mean that the illegality resides in Shizuru Fujino's petition to a triumph, nor even in her right to a triumph. For, do we not all agree that of that much is she worthy? Is there anyone here who would truly contest her merit? Judge, ye gods, the one who does it, for I tell you he does it out of envy!"

"What does that have to do with anything?" called a senator, one of the Traditionalists. "If the illegality is not in her petition, then why veto it?"

Urumi paused and inclined her head to the questioner.

"A fair query, fellow senators, and one I gladly answer," she responded. "I vetoed the petition-just and legal and deserved as it is-because I believe the illegality of which I speak should be addressed before it, not after it. One reason for this is that the illegality is related to the petitioner, Shizuru Fujino, although not of her perpetration; the results of our discussion may have some effects upon her, though I shall get to the details of that later. Another and even more significant reason is enshrined in the rules of conduct for this hallowed body, which demand that topics be addressed or discussed in the order that agrees with the Republic's priorities. The more urgent matter goes first, and after it goes the less urgent one. Does a man giving a gift to one of his children continue when a murderer is already leaping at him? Does he not pause first to fend off and eject the attacker from home and hearth, before continuing to pass the gift?"

"Oh, get to it!" cried Sergay, conscious of Haruka squirming again in her seat. "What's the illegality? To the point now, Tribune, and enough ornamental speech."

"Leave her be!" cried another senator, famed for his love of rhetoric. "We let you run on when you're the one rambling!"

"Enough interruptions, please," called the junior consul. Her voice was terribly fatigued, and thus thinned to a dryness that often took her much theatrical labour to achieve. "What is the point of all this, Tribune? What is this 'illegality' you keep mentioning and why is it grave?"

Urumi bowed, her left hand cuddling the folds of toga hanging over her shoulder.

"What is the illegality and why is it grave," she seemed to echo for a moment, looking pensive. "Well might that be asked by the junior consul! I shall tell you, Good Colleagues, about this illegality and how grave it can be!"

She paused, frowned, looked fierce without warning.

"I called this illegality a grave one," she repeated. "This for the way it has been carried out so barefacedly, in the most disgraceful manner. No doubt this shall shock you as it has shocked me, for the wrong of which I speak has been carried out in public! The villain has committed it in full view of us, like a murderer who does the deed at the gates of your house, and leaves the corpse on your street! What could be more obscene than that, I ask you? What could be more shameless? I can think of few things, Members of the House, that could outdo this blatant and brazen and bastard a wrongdoing!"

Now everyone was listening, for Urumi was a powerful speaker and could carry away most people on the sheer force of her rhetoric. Her voice had dipped after her last words, and now held a lethal timbre to it.

"Pardon me, my feelings reigned for a moment," she said quietly, but still audibly. "It is because I am angry. Those of you who know me know it is rare for me to get angry. What could have angered me today, you ask? Why, what else but this blatant crime? Even so, I wish that it were blatant only; would that the evil there would have been enough! The villain behind it, however, was not satisfied with that point alone. The villain had to cover the next point, which is that of achieving the brazen."

She snorted with disgust, waved a hand irritably.

"I know it must be hard for you to conceive how such a crime can be worsened," she allowed, a febrile glint in her eye that seemed to support her claim of anger. "But it can be, Fellow Senators. It can be. For the second thing that has provoked me so much in this illegality is the identity of the mastermind behind it. The thing that outrages me so deeply is the fact that the villain in this piece is among our ranks."

She caught the stir in her audience and nodded gravely, wagging her head like a hound eager for the kill.

"Let me repeat that: among our ranks . Among us is one who has sought to throw the curtain over our eyes whilst carrying out a crime-against Shizuru Fujino, to be specific. Thus does the crime go from bad to worse, its perpetrator brazen enough to turn on one of us even while under the concomitant expectations of being under our body's and class's membership. Conscienceless! Traitorous! But it does not stop there. As I hinted earlier, this is a crime of triple-weight: a crime that, having reached the worse, goes on to the worst!"

"I claim the superlative degree of evil because the harm it causes does not stop at one of us," she went on. "It does not stop at harming the esteemed Shizuru Fujino, but goes on to harm every other member of our great Republic. Every. Other. Member. The villain in this story has harmed you, Honoured Junior Consul-and you, honoured Haruka Armitage-and you, My Friend-and you-and even me. The villain has harmed every one of us, to the last man out there on the street! An ambitious villain we have here, don't you think?"

Urumi grinned sourly, managing the expression with consummate theatrical skill.

"What manner of person is this of whom we are talking? Would you like to know who it is? I can see you muttering-yes-you are shifting uneasily; you are right to do so-look about you now, in rightful anxiety; where could this villain be? Why, he could be sitting beside you now! But I do not endorse the spread of such suspicion among us, especially in such times when we need to be united against this traitor in our midst. I would rather point you the right way, Fellow Senators, so you can all know of whom to be wary. To do that, let me tell you a story."

She was still walking and halted now by the great brass doors of the Curia, from which vantage point all could see her face. There she stayed and finally told them the tale of this great wrongdoing.

"Last December we held the elections," she reminded. "And it was at that time our villain appeared. In the guise of an ally to one of our colleagues, this villain schemed and pretended to lodge a nomination on behalf of our colleague. Our villain misrepresented-ah, forgive me! Did I say 'misrepresented'? I meant 'falsified', rather! How unduly euphemistic of me!"

She shook her head, grinned wryly, seemed self-deprecating.

"You see how this affects me, Fellow Senators?" she asked with wide eyes, deviating for an instant in order to introduce another salient point to her speech. "So unbelievable is it that someone from within our ranks would turn on her fellow-her friend-her family, in fact-such is her evil! So unbelievable is it that I find myself unconsciously trying to lighten the portrayal of her misdeed. But this shall not do here. We cannot pretend that a hack is just a prod, or a crime a petty prank, when the victim is not just one of us but the Republic. It is bitter poison the Republic has been fed, and thus must be equally bitter our medicine."

She grinned abruptly, looking her most feral as she showed a row of gleaming white teeth.

"Getting back to what I was saying," she said. "Our villain falsified... fabricated... fibbed to your faces ! She claimed that her cousin was declaring candidature for the last elections, and convinced us of that lie deceitfully. How do I know it was done deceitfully? Because I have been exchanging communications with that cousin, as indeed have also some others in this same Senate, and I can tell you something with which they shall agree."

And just like that, Urumi was down on the floor again, her next words coming at ripping speed.

"I can tell you that Shizuru Fujino never wanted to run for praetor last year!" she declared in ringing tones. "And I can tell you that she never even knew of her nomination until the last moment, when it was too late! I can tell you that several honourable others in the House can verify this, as well as the woman herself once she returns! I can tell you that she viewed the news of her election with great humility, certainly, but also with great shame! For it was an election tainted by the corruption, the deceit, the unmitigated audacity of our villain, whom many of you have already guessed now to be her relative by marriage though not by blood-Tomoe Marguerite!"

A tumult broke among the tiers, particularly among the front ranks, as they wheeled about and craned their heads to see to the back and find the accused. The pedarii were less energetic. Most of them knew that the accused was not in attendance for the meeting-which was exactly why Urumi had chosen to stage her little show this particular day. Those who were friends or sympathetic to the accused, however, were already sending off their servants with a warning to the absent senator. Within half a turn of the glass, Tomoe Marguerite would receive the news of her denouncement.

And would understand, with incensed and psychotic fury, that she had been forsaken by her beloved cousin.

In the Curia, the junior consul was trying to be heard above the noise. It was her best friend who drowned out her words, however, as Haruka asked the question for which Urumi had been waiting.

"That still doesn't explain why you vetoed earlier, Tribune!" she shouted, reducing all other sounds to a background noise with her brassy voice. "So what if Shizuru Fujino was put up as a candidate without her consent in the last elections? They're over and she's elected! What does that have to do with her triumph and your veto?"

Urumi hid a grin, terrifically amused: the truth was that she had expected it to be one of the other, sharper arch-conservatives to point to this. After all, she had lit such a fire under the senatorial stools with her accusation that it was only natural for most to forget about the original topic, and latch onto the fresh scandal.

What single-mindedness you do have when it comes to her, Armitage, she told the woman silently, pretending to look severe. Is it that she's so formidable she forces you into sharpening, or that you loathe her so much your stubbornness starts to spill over into perspicacity?

"Well said, Haruka Armitage!" she responded, once the hubbub had lowered sufficiently after Haruka's yell. "Well asked, I say! I ask you now to suffer me a little longer, Fellow Senators, for I shall now answer Armitage-san's question and enter the true purpose of my veto. Members of the House, I pray you, calm and attend me!"

They listened, curious, wondering what more this wonder of an orator had to say. Who was that who said this would be a dull meeting, with no excitement?

"Let us go through her points logically," she said, ticking away on one hand. "What if Shizuru Fujino was indeed put up as a candidate without consent? They are over and she is elected. What has this to do with the triumph and my veto? Did I get them all? Good, that's clear!"

"Before I give my answers, permit me to note something quickly," she said suddenly, dropping her cheerful mien with impressive speed. "Everything I have had to say here has centred on an illegality. I think it therefore behoves us to pause for a moment and remind ourselves of our position and power, and our responsibilities. The Senate of Hime is not, strictly speaking, a lawmaking body, although it does recommend and approve of prospective laws to be referred to and passed by the Assemblies. Any prospective law we approve is subsequently passed. Whatever we recommend becomes enshrined into the body of laws, written and unwritten, that uphold our Republic. That makes it something that does not just apply to the present, but goes far into the future."

"Therefore the Senate's stamp of approval is a great thing, a thing that can be taken as a legitimisation of a prospective law, a policy, or a procedure, in and of itself. Our very decisions, while not strictly law-making, have the force of law nonetheless. That we permit becomes permissible legally. That we disapprove becomes disapproved legally."

She scowled as she said the next words: "That we ignore, however, is not just ignored legally. Often, when the Senate chooses to ignore a matter, it is understood simply as the Senate taking no action against it, and therefore allowing it. To let be a matter is generally the same as putting a stamp of approval upon it."

"Get to it!" cried a voice. "This is nothing new!"

Urumi pretended surprise and lifted both palms.

"Why, that's so, thank you for reminding me!" she answered. "It pleases me indeed to know that you do not consider this new knowledge since that means it is at the fore of your minds. That sets my mind at ease. Only with such an assurance do I feel comfortable answering the questions put forward by Armitage-san."

She clapped together her lifted hands, drawing a start from several senators as the sound echoed loudly.

"First, so what if Shizuru Fujino was put up as a candidate and elected without her consent, which she has indicated to me she shall not give even now? Why, obviously, the what is that this is an illegality. But let us be certain of something first. Is it really an illegality?"

"True, there is actually no law expressly forbidding it; it can actually be legalised by the Senate and the People. Nonetheless, it is clearly an 'illegality' because that can never happen! It can never be legitimised in any way by the Senate and the People, owing to the implications it carries with it and the fact that those implications are contrary to the basis of our entire system of justice. Thus are we agreed: it is indeed an illegality."

"Second, the elections are over and she has been elected. True, but we have questions arising out of the first point that qualify the conclusions drawn from this. Can a person lawfully ascend an office achieved through an illegality, particularly when said person is not yet bound by the terms of that office? Shizuru Fujino has yet to be inaugurated into the office of urban praetor, as mentioned earlier, which means she is not yet welded to it. This means there may yet be a question of whether she should or should not be welded to it."

"Third and finally, what has all this to do with the triumph and my veto? Simply this," she said. "Shizuru Fujino was the victim of illegality and treachery by being put up as an unwilling candidate. Shizuru Fujino was nonetheless chosen by the people as shown by her domination of the praetorian votes. Shizuru Fujino was not technically a legitimate candidate, but was given so overwhelming a portion of the vote that she was returned in the highest of the praetorian seats, that of the urban praetor. The two imperatives here are pulling: the acknowledgment of the grave illegality that let her election come into being, and the recognition of the election that proved that people vested her with their stamp of legitimacy by voting for her overwhelmingly. Ought we subordinate one to the other? Ought we value the depth of the illegality over the people's manifest will?"

"I say no!" she exclaimed, sweeping into her peroration. "I say we must balance the regard for justice-which is what protects the people-with the regard for the people's will-which is a great part of justice. Thus I vetoed the motion that would have seen Shizuru Fujino forced into returning to Hime prematurely, and compelled into an office that-though she deserves it by virtue of popular vote- she does not deserve by strict and consented legitimacy. I keep saying this, Fellow Senators, Esteemed Colleagues, because I would like to emphasise that we cannot subordinate one to the other! Ours is the task of advocates multiplied hundred-fold; we cannot pretend that the law and regard for the law outstrips the regard for the people it protects, but neither can we pretend that the people for whom the law exists are above it, else law be rendered futile!"

"Thus do we have only one choice, I believe. Thus must we now reconcile and balance the two imperatives in this issue with a single option! No doubt some of you see it already, but permit me to state that single option myself: we must grant Shizuru Fujino the status of praetor-elect while taking from her the more prestigious title of urban praetor-elect. That honoured office should more properly go to one of the other praetors-elect and someone more qualified in terms of legitimacy: not by popularity and trust among the people, perhaps, but by legitimacy! This recognises the illegality of her falsifying cousin's actions while also recognising the popular will!"

Shocked though the House was at this measure, further might Urumi have gone, and further might she have begun to turn them to the logic of her motion, had it not been for the long howl that erupted from Sergay Wang.

"No, never, over my dead body!" that worthy reared, proving himself very nearly the equal of Armitage when it came to brass lungs. "That is unconstitutional! Witness, Fellow Senators, the gall of this tribune to claim justice for such a thing! Justice is to pander to Shizuru Fujino, is it?! Over my dead body!"

While most people had truly been astonished by the apparent conclusion of Urumi's speech, Sergay had actually arrived at her purpose even before. Far from a political dunce, something had clicked in him during her systematic address of Armitage's points, from which he had begun to piece it all together: her incessant repetition of the word 'illegality'-the portrayal of Tomoe Marguerite's crime as a 'tainting' influence-the letters many of the senators had been receiving from the North that agitated for Shizuru Fujino's return as commander-in-chief. And then, the exact moment before Urumi's peroration, he had seen it.

"Shizuru Fujino, that ambitious creature, that ungrateful woman, put her up to it!" he was screaming, purple in the face from outrage.

"Think about those letters we've been receiving from the northern provinces-she's also the one who put them up to it! Fujino wants to resume her command in the North; she just wants to keep her army and use it to further her ambition! Look at the ambition of it! What a gall! What cheek! What you propose, tribune, is not justice! It is the gratification of a woman who has the audacity to turn away an elected office and then seek another as though it were equal to it!"

"Not precisely equal but in more measured value, if you were listening!" Urumi shot back, trying to get in a decent interruption before he could continue working up the other senators' feelings. He outscrambled her, however, and the buzz in the House started to grow louder and worsen.

"How dare you and how dare Shizuru Fujino!" he was now saying. "To be elected praetor and first of all the candidates is an honour reserved for the few! How dare she throw away such a gift, I ask you! How dare she cast it back to the voters' faces, I ask you that!"

"You ask with a curious lack of upward inflection, Wang-san!" Urumi noted wickedly, seeing they would never let her get another word in for this meeting. "Are you sure you are asking?"

Before Sergay could answer, Haruka did: "How dare you!"

Urumi swivelled to face the curule dais and held out both palms as though to say, You see what I mean?

"This is a travesty, Fellow Senators!" cried Sergay to the rest of the House, howling in a discordant duet with his seatmate. The other Traditionalists were up and shouting too, now. "This is a mockery of not only the Republic but an insult to all of us and all Himeans who voted! This spuriously-plebeian tribune of the plebs and Fujino have cheek to even think of it! Ye gods, they have hide!"

"Whereas he is obviously missing four inches of his," called out one of the Senate wits, unable to resist the chance to pun on Sergay's scar on the brow-about four inches of scraped-off skin-as well as impute a castrated state to him. As this was one of those insults that always brought on the fisticuffs during senate meetings, pandemonium broke when Sergay went at a run for his offender, with their friends going to assist in the brawling. However, some of the Traditionalists had not forgotten the wildly amused tribune of the plebs cackling on the Curia floor, and started to move in.

"Junior Consul."

Yukino started, so strange was it to hear a perfectly calm voice above the yelling and cursing and screeching of chairs. She turned to her consular colleague, the only one capable of speaking so coolly at such a moment.

"Junior Consul," said Chikane Himemiya, unruffled but already out of her seat. "Dismiss the meeting."

By the time Yukino had understood enough to bolt from her chair and do just that, screaming for everybody to leave, the tall woman had already descended from the curule dais and headed for her cousin, whom she steered past a throng of confused senatorial sheep. They passed some of the Traditionalists who were out for Urumi's blood, but went through those unmolested. While more than one of those senators might have happily seized the tribune of the plebs by the toga had she been alone, no one found the nerve to do it while the senior consul was with her and staring down all comers. Some of the pair's allies had also rushed to join them, and they all made it out of the Curia Hostilia safely, if a little raggedly.

"Interesting," said Chikane, looking back at the howling senators in pursuit, and seeing that the Princeps was nowhere in sight. "Naturally."

"Jupiter," panted Yuuichi Tate, who had been practically dragged by his wife to aid them. "Jupiter. That had them foaming."

"Yes, it did," Chikane answered him calmly.

He pulled at his hair stupidly, gasping: "I didn't think it would have them foaming!"

Chikane threw him an amused look just as his wife dragged him again and further away from the Curia.

"Don't lose your nerve now, Yuuichi!" the redheaded senator admonished excitedly, before realising she had no idea where they were headed. She turned to face the group, which was swelling quickly as their other friends ran up to join them. The Forum was filling with people eager to know the source of this chaos from the Curia, and this meant they were also surrounded by cheering bystanders ignorant of what was happening but thrilled by the ruckus.

"Where to now?" Mai Tokiha demanded, addressing Chikane and her cousin.

It was the latter who answered.

"To the Well of the Comitia and swiftly!" gasped Urumi, still holding on to Chikane's arm as though it were a spar in a wildly heaving sea. "It's begun." Out came a gale of breathless laughter. "Oh, finally it's begun!"

Chapter 47

A sincere thank you to the (polite) reviewers and writers of messages. It must be said, however, that one is slightly taken aback by the degree of presumption in a few-only a few-of the things waiting in one's inbox, on occasion; were it not for the majority still observant of good form, one would wonder if those odd exceptions are to be taken as the quality of intellectual courtesy these days. All the same, I tender here a mild request: if there are those who do so find fault with the story, then please do me the good turn of arguing for your criticism in politely reasonable terms instead of crossing the line into the unwarranted and impertinent; I shall be quite pleased to debate the merits of the suggestion/critique rationally and without taking umbrage. Very few things gall so much as ungraceful impudence, and the cup is very nearly full; I am willing to continue this story, but not at the cost of having to suffer more grief than the petty amusement is worth.

And I am most sorry it has taken so long. To say one has not been well for the past weeks is an understatement.

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Adamas (L.) - "Diamond"
2. Amanuensis (L.) - One who takes down the words of another.
3. Aquila (L.) - "Eagle"
4. Armiger armentalis (L.) - Literally "armour-bearer of the herd". This pun translates far better if the reader is familiar with Latin. For those who are not: armiger is the noun for "armour-bearer", while armentalis is an adjective generally related to cattle (thus, 'of the herd' means 'of the cattle herd'). Both have a similarity to Haruka's last name, Armitage, which is what holds together the jest.

Shizuru's use of the word armiger relegates Haruka to a lower position than Haruka claims for herself: Haruka is a self-professed pillar of the conservatives in this story, and would be more likely to metaphorically describe herself as a "soldier [or general] for tradition" than one who merely accompanies such soldiers and carries their armour. Adding the adjective armentalis deepens the jibe because it reduces the conservative senators (for whom Haruka acts as armiger) to cattle: domestic, supposedly harmless, herbivorous animals. Admittedly, oxen could be viewed as dangerous by the Ancient Romans, but only when the ox had a reputation for goring, in which case hay was tied around its horn/s as a marker. Cattle kept in a herd or with the group, however, were generally understood to be safe.

Considering this, Shizuru intimates from her line that the Traditionalists who are viewed by many as dangerous are in truth merely cattle in the placid herd, and thus devoid of true danger. Moreover, as they have no bloodlust-being armentalis -there is thus no need for them to have arms or armour-and thus no need for an armiger. Shizuru's words destroy Haruka Armitage several times over.

5. Calends (L.) - Also Kalends, the first of the three named days of a Roman/ Himean month, and the only fixed or unvarying one. The Calends is always on the first day of the month.

6. Campus Martius - The area outside the city of Rome/Hime where legions were trained and parked.

7. Catulus (L.) - "Cub"

8. Centuriate Assembly - (L., comitia centuriata) One of the Roman/Himean assemblies, it organised the People in their classes (the Centuries) and held meetings outside of the pomerium (s.v.). Typically, because of its nature, the only classes whose votes really counted would be the First and sometimes the Second. Members of the lower classes were rarely called upon to vote. Note that the classes were arranged by economic principle, or through a means test.

9. Classes - See preceding note, for Centuriate Assembly.

10. Equites (L.) - Members of the Ordo Equester , called "the knights" as opposed to "the senators". Those of knight rank were usually as well-born as those of senatorial rank, but the difference was that they chose not a political career but a commercial one. Recall that there are restrictions on senatorial businesses, which is the reason the knights are generally the richer of the two ranks. One may consider them the equivalents of the modern "business sector" of the community, with the senators being the "government or political sector", for a simplified but convenient categorisation.
11. Forum - The area of Rome/Hime where most of the government structures were, including the Curia, where Senate met.
12. Knights - See note above, for Equites.
13. Pomerium (L.) - The sacrosanct boundary encircling the city of Rome/Hime, which could not be crossed by soldiers or generals for the duration of their service in a military mission or capacity.
14. The Eighteen - The original eighteen centuries of the Ordo Equester (see note above for Equites ), meaning the original eighteen divisions within that group in its early days of existence. As time passed, more divisions were added to the Ordo Equester to accommodate the expansion of the knight class, but these eighteen centuries were kept untouched and intact. Hence, the Eighteen were perhaps the most influential knights of all.
15. Tirocinium fori (L.) - a term of apprenticeship at the Roman/Himean legal courts that was taken by budding politicians.
16. Tribune of the plebs - Elected official of the Plebeian Assembly, holding the power of both legislation and (more importantly) the sacrosanct veto, which may be applied to anything except the decisions of a Dictator.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

par ethnewinter

---

Shizuru put the Fourteenth in the Campus Martius on the Calends of May, but did not choose to stay there herself. She opted for hiring one of the villas nearby instead. There were many such manors just outside the pomerium : houses to let for foreign sovereigns unable to cross the boundary into the city of Hime. As her arrival coincided with the waxing of public interest-and for certain people, outrage-over the issue her friends were pressing on her behalf, this fairly unusual move led many to infer that she was deathly serious: the returning general appeared so determined to get her desires that she was actually setting in for a cosy wait in her rented villa.

Not that Shizuru only waited. She girded herself for a battle she would have to fight from outside of the city, the barrier permitting her to keep her legions also barring her from the centre of action. It was a spring battle, when rural citizens began to flow into the city in anticipation of the coming games. From populace to plain, everything about the time bespoke a waking stretch from the winter sleep, and thus heralded a perfect start for Shizuru's plans.

More people were out and eager for entertainment, and many looked for it in Forum-watching. It was something to use to her advantage, which she did through the agency of Chikane Himemiya's cousin. The formerly-patrician tribune of the plebs was by then speaking to the crowds every other day, eager to win greater support for their position. As her tongue was golden, her face lovely, and her manner delightfully naughty, Urumi Nemura Himemiya-Kanzaki generally won the support she wanted.

She was also the first ally to greet Shizuru's arrival. Having been speaking from the rostra yet again when news of the older woman's onset came, she had decided it would be a nice touch to wave a jaunty farewell to the audience, inform them she was going to see the returned general, and run off with the titillated crowd hot on her heels, every one of them cheering for her and the one she called "the woman of the hour". All of this she related afterwards to the woman (of the hour), who was genuinely amused to be met by so sunny a representative. When the senior consul went to visit Shizuru too, her first query was how her friend had found Urumi. The reply, given with wide eyes and an equally wide smile, was "With amazement!"

The seal of approval being set upon that alliance, the next order of business for Shizuru was then to secure the support of that part of society so important to politics, even if it was officially separate from it: the mercantile First Class of Hime.

"Which is very easily done," she purred to her best friend, who visited her often. A feline smile came upon Shizuru's face, accentuated by the newly-sharpened planes of her cheeks. "The Ordo Equester is easy to persuade if you have a proper knowledge of the way their minds work-and here I mean their accounting! I know the Traditionalists are often mystified by their purposes, but that is only because they fail to appreciate the true value of business to Hime. We politicians might handle the Forum and army, but all of these are animated by the lifeblood called money."

"Which gravitates to its like," Chikane smiled. "It is also fortunate that you have such a record of being most profitable for them, Shizuru. The knights know you to be a sure winner, not to mention a generous one unlikely to hog the new avenues for herself. Your past campaign was marked by an expansion of our territories, and hence, of business. "

Shizuru lifted an eyebrow playfully. "I seem to recall someone asking me if it was wise to be so constantly audacious in my exploits when I extended Hime's territory relentlessly."

The older woman laughed.

"I was only concerned about how it would set the ultraconservatives on guard, early on," she said. "Allow that I was justified in being concerned about that much. All the same, it is not something you could have hoped to avoid for too long, I suppose... given the way you are."

Shizuru let her eyebrow do the talking again. Chikane ignored it.

"I do not deny it has worked out to your advantage now, come to the knights," she said to the younger patrician. "As with most things, it has been a trade-off. And that, too, is in concord with the economic principle."

"I have already begun whetting their appetites for Obsidian's lands," she told Chikane, for whom the news was no surprise. "I say nothing direct, of course."

"Ah, directness is unnecessary," said the woman known for her courteousness—really just another form of being indirect. "The Ordo Equester can tell where the wind is blowing from a scrap of cloth."

Shizuru's eyes danced. "Which figure of speech is a sterling example of directness."

"Quite."

"The senators should be catching on soon—if they have not already," Shizuru went on. "Has anyone approached you yet?"

"No, although I expect that to happen presently."

"Prepare for a howl, Chika-chan," Shizuru chanted softly, actually finding pleasure in the image of her old foes raving from shock; Armitage's blister-red face was at the forefront of her imaginings. "Pre-emptively defensive war though it shall be that we intend to wage, the conservatives shall not swallow the apparent semantics. Pure and unadulterated greed, is what they shall say."

The dark-haired woman did not even alter her relaxed drape over the couch, only looked aloof and decorative as ever.

"There are nuances," she answered.

"Our Traditionalist friends are old to be learning nuances."

"They are old to be learning anything," Hime's senior consul drawled, the lazy shape of her eyes turning hunter-like as she narrowed them—a familial characteristic that brought to Shizuru's mind her former legate. "It is not usual for Hime to sanction an apparently aggressive war, I know. Even so, the situation in the North is not usual either. As for greed... one cannot deny the prospect of winning such a campaign would enrich the State Treasury beautifully. Is it to be considered greedy to want to fill the coffers of Hime and expand its influence, even while preserving it and its allies from future peril?"

Shizuru nodded and got up from her own stretch, reaching towards the table to refill her chalice. Chikane watched her discreetly, eyes lingering on the fine pendant- Is that chalcedony? -around her neck. It was new, she thought, since her first time to see it was upon Shizuru's return. The younger woman also wore it now every time they met, and fondled it occasionally as they talked.

"The promise of economic concessions in the newly-annexed lands shall take care of the knights very nicely. As for the rest of it..." She blinked at Shizuru's hands, which were filling the younger woman's goblet with wine. Another unwatered cup? "Where is Shizuma, incidentally?"

Shizuru finally stopped pouring the deep red fluid. She put down the brass jug with a tinny sound on the polished surface of her tabletop.

"Probably doing something very bad with someone who should not be doing it."

Chikane laughed; she had meant to ask about the progress of their silver-haired friend's politicking on their behalf, but she took up the aside with good will.

"Oh, that Shizuma," she said with affection. "It reminds me: did she even tell you what a stir she created when she entered the Senate meeting that first day?"

Shizuru said no.

"But there was no need. I can imagine it," she went on to say. "No doubt they understood the relevance of her presence to my purposes, but only later. The chief shock would have been administered entirely on her own. Seeing her suddenly attend a House session must have been a sensation."

"Especially among the senators wedded to women."

"Especially among them!"

They smiled, even though one of them was a senator wedded to a woman, and the other was a senator whose heart had already wedded itself to a woman.

"She did mention visiting you two days ago, however," Shizuru added.

"Yes, she did. She told me then that you asked her to become your next senior legate."

"You mean she complained about it?"

An unhurried smile, so typical of Chikane: "Oh, I have no doubt she shall agree to your request."

Shizuru's eyes danced.

"Of course she shall," she told the older woman. "But not without meeting her quota of grouse first."

"That is our Shizuma." Chikane sighed as she mused. "I wonder, though, if you have any intention of making her play amanuensis for you."

The incredulity was plain on Shizuru's face.

"Shizuma, be bothered take down another's words?" she asked with feigned shock. "I am well aware she is no Chie Harada, Chikane. I shall by my own diarist from now on. The literary exercise should be enjoyable as I intend to experiment by writing my dispatches in a looser, commentary style. Not exactly new, I know, but never actually done as well as it could be. All those who have tried it before were not exactly literati, which disadvantage compelled them to use that style out of a deficiency rather than a strength. Whereas I intend to exploit its possibilities. It should make my dispatches unusual enough to further catch attention."

"Unusual indeed. Of anyone else, I would have advised against it. For you, however, I deem it a wise decision."

Chikane folded her hands loosely above her belly and leaned further against the bolsters on her couch. Shizuru remained sitting up, one hand occupied by her goblet. A goblet already half-empty again, though just recently refilled. Should she be bothered, Chikane wondered, that her friend was drinking more swiftly than usual? It could not out of dryness since spring weather was clement, not sweltering. This had happened during their other recent meetings as well, though never to the point of sprouting suspicion of dipsomania: Shizuru's faculties were consistently unimpaired, and she always stopped a goblet short of the line. This consciousness of the limit reassured Chikane to some extent. Even so, she could not pretend that there was not that oddly thirsty look in the other woman's eyes, a look that never seemed to go away these days, no matter how much of the beverage Shizuru imbibed.

"I also applaud the shrewd choice of Shizuma as senior legate," she said then, easily separating her inner preoccupation with her outer one. "Many shall take it as a sign that you still do succumb to nepotism-which shall be good in the sense that it demonstrates you yet abide by our social laws on familial loyalty. To be sure, however, many shall also think that the choice shall be undeserved in terms of skill, given the reputation Shizuma currently possesses."

"A philanderer and a politically indifferent patrician only in Senate by virtue of her ancestry, rank, and wealth." Shizuru stated the opinion without uncertainty. She also drained, then put down her goblet. "As though half of the senators were not in their places by only the same virtues, and theirs of lower value than hers! All the same, I would still say Shizuma is a wager well worth my money, Chikane-especially in terms of skill."

"Double your money on that wager," Chikane supported. "Shizuma might be a dark horse, but many dark horses make excellent odds for a smart gambler."

"Said the woman who never gambles," teased Shizuru, who was not entirely averse to gambling.

The older woman tried to suppress her smile. "'Tis true she is a great womaniser. 'Tis true as well that she is politically indifferent, most of the time. However, indifference does not equate to a lack of skill. And womanising can prove useful if managed correctly."

Up went the corners of Shizuru's lips.

"Said one of the most notoriously faithful wives of our time," she teased again. "You had best not hear Hime-chan hear you say that, Chikane."

The dark-haired woman finally surrendered to the smile trying to copy that of her friend.

"My wife is not the jealous type," she said. "And she shall never have cause to be."

A berating glance. "You should have brought her with you today."

"I promise to do so next time." Her gaze went to the silver platter between them, on which were spread some lightly-spiced honey biscuits her wife had made: they were Shizuru's favourites. "She wanted to see you as well, Shizuru, but I thought it wiser not to bring her today since I intended to talk business... and also expected that crush you had outside earlier. Am I wrong or does it seem to grow by the day instead of declining?"

She was speaking of Shizuru's clients and supporters, many of whom presented themselves at the young woman's temporary residence each morning. Because she had been away, and also because she was currently the most talked-about person in the city, it was to be expected that a while would pass before the hordes trying to dance attendance on her would reduce into numbers more manageable. In fact, given the way matters were going in the Forum, it was to be expected that the numbers should even swell for a while.

What truly compounded Shizuru's problem, however, was that a good portion of those numbers had little to do with politics.

It rooted from her recent love affair. When word first leaked about her liaison with a foreign noblewoman, the first tremors had happened amongst those who felt the earthshaking wrack of envy. Oh, the outrage that someone had finally pulled Shizuru Fujino into it! The injustice that it was a foreigner! These poor indignant women, so long desirous of romancing and being romanced by Shizuru, were greener than the spring foliage at the insult. Yet they also saw that the event marked a positive development in a way: it meant that the field had been opened. The courteously aloof Shizuru Fujino was no longer unreachable, and she was fair game.

That this was the optimistic conclusion was due to public inability to believe a crucial part of the rumour. As they could not credit that a Fujino would truly soil the hem of her toga on a barbarian-in the sense of devoting herself to one-they interpreted the affair as nothing more than a fling from a bored patrician whose sexual sensibilities had finally awakened. Such awakenings were unplanned, and prone to arise with great urgency of demand. Pardonable that it had settled for that foreign girl then, if there had been no better possibility nearby; it was said the foreign girl was a rare beauty, anyway.

That being said, who could disbelieve the idea that in the city of Hime, where beauties of a more elevated Himean aesthetic existed, Shizuru Fujino would find every option much better than that foreign consolation she had been bedding? Further, which one of these aspiring Himean beauties did not imagine with many a sigh the possibility of snagging Shizuru Fujino in the definite sense? Not that any of them would dare ask her for marriage, of course. One did not ask for a Fujino's hand: to declare oneself good enough for a Fujino in such a way was very nearly hubris in the social understanding, unless you happened to have equally magnificent lineage-which could apply to only a few others in the city.

No, one prayed for the good luck to have a Fujino offer instead. Before anything like that could happen, of course, one would first need the good luck to catch a Fujino's eye. And who knew where and when such a thing could happen? Why, it could happen during a simple dinner! Or even just a passing chat.

Thus a good lot of the women in the city were trying to snag an appointment with Shizuru for one tedious reason or another. As such forwardness was different from the distance most of these women had maintained before, the recipient of the invitations had to admit to surprise. Still pining after the foreigner she had left in the North, she was much disinclined to accepting such social invitations; however, she could not turn all of them away because there were also callers whose connections or influence were sufficient to merit her friendly tolerance of their advances.

While many another person might have enjoyed-and even taken advantage-of such exercises, the same could not be said of Shizuru.

It took its toll on her to have to expend precious effort on suffering such coquettes, politically useful or not. It was true that the pre-Natsuki Shizuru might have found such exercises amusing and sometimes enjoyable, but this was the post-Natsuki Shizuru... and she only found it troublesome, sometimes even worthy of nausea.

"Yes, I am being assailed," she said, flicking a lock of hair away from a surprisingly chilly eye. "Still, it pleases me that the identities of my more serious visitors show my influence among the First Class remains strong."

"Which shall prove useful soon, " said Chikane. "Their votes matter the most for our purposes. Even the less serious ones have a vote, in which case they also matter."

"I know that," Shizuru said, lifting an eyebrow. "I only wish we could take the legislation to the assemblies already. I want to be off soon."

Chikane looked at her friend.

"Eventually it shall happen," she said, sorry that she had to deliver so cooling an answer. "But not yet. Not so very soon, I fear."

Down fell white lids over red eyes, even redder for the tiny blood-cracks that had broken from fatigue. Viewed at a distance, the pinkish tint worked with her irises to make a slightly dangerous look when she opened her eyes. Chikane continued to study her-as she had found herself doing every visit, since Shizuru's return from the North.

"I know," she said to the younger woman, and very naturally. "I do not enjoy the wait so much either."

Shizuru found a smile.

"Yet you are the more patient of us, Chikane," she admitted, as the impatient part of her added: And you need not worry about time spent away from the woman you love. She shifted one leg for comfort suddenly, wicking away the envious thought with annoyance at herself. "It cannot be helped, I know. To our advantage, the interim can be used to cultivate the lesser knights and senators: they do tend to be overlooked sometimes."

A suddenly pleased flash, very swift and somewhat cunning.

"As you were about to bring it up earlier," she told Chikane, "Shizuma has been having quite a success among the other backbenchers. The lovely thing about my cousin, as you hinted earlier, is that she can be frightfully compelling by virtue of simple charisma."

"And simple money."

Shizuru smiled. Chikane was on point, as always.

"Is it not nice that so many of our peers are constantly in debt for one thing or another?" Shizuru asked the older woman with a touch of mischief. "And that we happen to be outrageously rich and ready to help?"

Up went a crow-black eyebrow; Chikane cleared her throat.

"You are outrageously rich," Hime's senior consul alleged. "I am only very rich."

Shizuru began to laugh. The sound lifted some of the foreboding from her friend, who had been worried about her for a while now. It was not even a mere question of what was bothering Shizuma, which would be Shizuru's doldrums-although that was bad enough by itself, Chikane thought. Rather, it was something she could neither fully understand nor properly explain. The best way to put it was almost a reduction, in her opinion, and reductions generally were an injustice. Still, there it was, and with no better way to put it: Shizuru had changed!

"Such a difference!" this changed Shizuru was saying.

"There are nuances between 'outrageous' and 'very'."

Shizuru's brows drew together.

"To the tune of what-a mere thousand sesterces?" she asked sardonically. "I believe in nuances as well as you do, Old Friend, and yet this pushes the boundaries to mere nitpicking." A sly look. "Besides, do you really know which of us is wealthier, that you say such a thing?"

"Truly? No. Do you?"

"No." She read the playfulness in her friend's blue eyes and answered it. "How could I when you keep your holdings so secret?"

"I do not keep them secret. I simply find no need to talk about them. You are much the same."

"Indeed? Yet mine are better known, I should think."

"The mines in the Spains, yes," Chikane retorted. "But there are other nests on which the little birds do not chirp. For instance, the properties in the south are not so very well known, are they, 'Old Friend'?"

The younger woman's grin had her looking like a girl again.

"Why do we not talk about Macedonia?" she shot back, knowing the Himemiya had large holdings there. "I hear, I hear about Macedonia."

"Interesting what you hear! I hear some say you are the richest person in Hime."

"I am not in Hime right now, am I?" Shizuru's eyes narrowed suddenly, focused on empty space. "Yes, I hear some do say that. Curious, is it not? I own I am among the top four or five, certainly, but the richest? Who really knows?"

"I understand what you mean," her friend answered. "Yet they do like to mention your name when it comes to guessing the top of the list, for some reason."

"I have been thinking about that," Shizuru told her. "I believe it is bruited about so much because of my previous campaign and the wealth I brought back from Africa then. High-profile fortunes seen attached to me. Everyone sees the wealth during the triumphal procession, and thinks it goes to the general, who must then be fabulously wealthy. One of those faulty public perceptions... "

Chikane's eyes were laughing at her: "A faulty public perception, hm?"

"Oh, do not tease me," Shizuru said. "You understand what I mean. It is faulty in that most of the wealth from those battles did not go to me, and you know it."

"Yes, of course," said Chikane, who loved her friend's generosity to the soldiers and the State.

"I cannot help it if the public perception is faulty in that I am actually vastly richer than most of them think."

Chikane succumbed to a giggle, nodding wholeheartedly as Shizuru posted an addendum: "The same goes for you."

"Perhaps it is because never really talk about our money," Chikane explained. "They never have a real sense of how much there is. I have been thinking about this as well, Shizuru, and it seems to me that the reason we and some others equally affluent do not talk about our money is that we are at ease with it. That is to say, those who are born into wealth rarely feel the need to trumpet how much of it they have to everyone else, unlike those who began in financial straits and only later acquired their fortunes. To the latter, you see, those fortunes are an achievement."

Her companion nodded: "Yes, I see."

Shizuru sighed suddenly and looked rueful.

"The trouble with us is that we were born into too much," she said with faint wryness. "How many times have we heard our foes speak angrily of our birth-as though we had chosen it? A similar envy must occur for our wealth as well."

"A good number of them are also significantly wealthy," Chikane reminded. "Added to this is the fact that they outnumber us. Although, granted, quantity does not always mean quality." She paused and looked up at her friend. "Incidentally, Shizuru, I bought a few more tribunes of the plebs just recently. Granted, it seems unnecessary when you think that it is Urumi who is pushing for our interests there, and we both know Urumi is equal to all nine of her colleagues twice over. All the same, one thought it prudent to get in before the Traditionalists could think of buying more than the three they already have."

"One smoothes the path as much as possible."

"Precisely."

The absurdly long lashes fluttered, swept over deep blue irises: Chikane Himemiya smirked and looked devastating. Anyone else watching would have caught their breath, but Shizuru was too aware of her own capacity for devastation, and also had no breath to catch, being that she was holding it until she could again see her Natsuki-also devastating!

"Even had they thought of purchasing some of those pebbles to scatter before us, it would have been likely to fail," Chikane said with lofty dismissal. "I doubt the rest of the tribunes of the plebs this year would be so quick to accept handouts from the conservatives, lest they be trodden underfoot."

"Why so?"

"Think on last year's tribunes of the plebs, and the ones of the year before that."

No need for her to say more: Shizuru's face lit up within a second.

"Ah!" the younger woman said, with dawning enjoyment. "I see. The tribunes of the plebs for the last two years have been shockingly shockless compared to usual. Boredom is our ally, then."

"Very much so," Chikane agreed. "We all saw it for ourselves in Urumi's first speech from the rostra. The shiver among the conservatives! It was plain as day that both tribunes and people were spoiling for a thrill, and thus likely to indulge Urumi in whatever she did. Anything related to you collects people in groups immediately anywhere, as your presence seems to ensure that Forum fur shall fly again."

A stream of amusement rushed from her mouth.

"My dear Shizuru," she said through the laughter, "Hime loves you!"

Shizuru smiled and showed her teeth were as good as ever.

"I do love it back," she said. "Although I cannot say the same for arrogant prudes like the Traditionalists, who conspire to keep things as boring and ineffectual as possible. How have you been dealing with them, Chikane?"

"If you mean how I am managing with a Traditionalist for a consular colleague, quite well, actually," Chikane responded. "Yukino Kikukawa is not as blinkered as her allies: she can tell a horse from an ass."

"Because she inspects it from the proper end, I suppose. If you do as most of her allies and look at either animal from the rear, all you see is ass."

They laughed.

"She is manageable," Chikane restated afterwards. "Although there are still times when she gets cowed by the rest of her pack, poor woman. One meeting went nowhere because she allowed Harukasan to have a say during the session-and we all know how well that one practices the filibuster. Scarcely an hour went past before nearly all of the senators were out of the doors, eager to be home. I was among them."

"Ah, so Kikukawa-han was presiding over that meeting, then? On what did our filibustering friend rattle, by the way?"

"I quote, 'the bastardliness' of your letters lobby."

Air spilled from Shizuru's lips before she could bring up her hand.

"Bastardliness?" she asked Chikane, shoulders shaking.

Said the other mildly, "We believe she meant 'dastardliness'. It did help to keep us in our seats a little longer, at the very least."

"It is funny."

"It is that."

The red-eyed woman shook her head in pitying amusement before going on: "Letters lobby. Is that what they are calling it?"

"Wang-san claims to have coined it," the older woman replied, with enough dreariness of tone to suggest she thought any fool could have coined such a simple term anyway.

"Add Shizuma's recent appearance: we have letters, lobbies, and libertines!" Shizuru purred deep in her throat. "Yes, it trips nicely off the tongue."

Chikane smiled indulgently: "He missed the last one, I fear."

"He does tend to miss some things," Shizuru sneered, aware of that senator's increasingly acidic remarks about her in his speeches. She baited: "When shall I see the House again, I wonder?"

"I thought Urumi told you when she last visited. I am arranging for a meeting to be held outside the pomerium in a week's time."

The wine-coloured eyes twinkled. "There is something that shall find opposition!"

"Quite," Chikane replied unconcernedly. "The Traditionalists are against it, of course, since some of them do understand just how dangerous it would be to let you have your say before the rest of the House. While the number of times you have made use of your privilege to speak during sessions are few enough to be counted, they were all memorable-and people still remember your reputation from your tirocinium fori, besides. Anyone would be wary of you as a speaker."

Another dangerous flash: "Among other things."

"Among other things," Chikane allowed, unfazed. She tilted her head to one side gently and back with exquisite leisure. "Still, wariness is hardly as strong as curiosity when it comes to human nature. I submit even some of the Traditionalists are curious about what you have to say, which means I am confident of persuading the Senate to have some sessions where you may participate."

She tipped her head at her friend and added: "Wearing your corona graminea, of course."

A smile from Shizuru: "Of course."

And then she asked, "Where shall it be held, however?"

"Ah yes, you would not know it yet, would you?" Chikane shifted up and propped herself up on one elbow as she faced the other woman, an idea forming in her brain to wick away the melancholy she could still sense roiling in the latter. "Come to think of it, I believe we might see it now. Does not this villa have a good view of the western side of the Pincian Hill?"

Shizuru nodded. "I believe so."

"Then we can see it. Would you like to walk with me?" Chikane's body moved and she swept to her feet, towering over Shizuru until the latter stood as well. While both were among the tallest women of Hime, the younger patrician still outdid Chikane by a few inches; Shizuru was abnormally long for their people. "If you would permit me a selfishness, I wish very much to stretch my feet. It is a very pleasant day, too, and we waste it by cooping ourselves up and being stationary."

The young woman walking beside her smiled and agreed. They continued conversing in a lighter vein as they walked on, and Chikane voiced admiration for the house as they strode down a gorgeously red-marbled hallway.

"You chose a lovely mansion to hire," the senior consul remarked, her blue eyes roaming the architecture. "It suits you perfectly."

Her friend chuckled quietly: "It suits me?"

"So many of these deep reds," came the answer, along with a hand indicating the elaborately-tiled floor. "Purples and bluish blacks."

"You sound as though you are describing a bad contusion."

They laughed.

"I was thinking of rich, dark colours," Chikane told her. "Elegant would be the word." She turned her head to the side and smiled at Shizuru. "Purple is your favourite colour. One cannot possibly say it is inelegant."

"But I distinctly recall Haruka-han telling me it was, because it was the colour of royalty."

Chikane's thin brows suddenly took on a sharp slant, the deep eyes under them going narrow. Shizuru looked, then decided not to look: it reminded her so much of her haughty lover, that darkly supercilious expression. How strange that in some ways Chikane could be so like Her!

"And are not her eyes purple?" said the older woman, her eyes turning very nearly purple too. "When did she say that, Shizuru? Was it when we were younger, perhaps?"

"When I first met her, in fact." A puff of air through the nose, more amused than annoyed. "I must say that was the first time anyone had ever berated me for simply professing the colour I liked best. She lectured me that such a choice could imply a person's natural bent, and that she distrusted all people who chose purple as their favourite colour."

"It is not so much 'all people' but 'all patricians', is it?" Chikane retorted. "Which reminds me, purple eyes or not, I seem to recall her favourite hue is green."

The laugh spewed from Shizuru before she could stop it. Chikane's wit had been one of the things that first attracted her to the other woman, when they had been younger.

"Our Traditionalist friends are the ones growing less elegant with time," continued the older woman. "No doubt you have heard about their latest ploy, Shizuru, where they actually tried to use one of their tame tribunes of the plebs to veto Urumi's veto."

Shizuru smiled humourlessly. "A metaveto, one might call it."

"One prefers to call it 'crude', actually."

"I shall not argue with that."

"Urumi handled it swiftly." Chikane sighed with apparent approval of her cousin's doings, although it might also have been simply from the pleasure of the spring wind that was wafting in from the windows. The air was fresh and fragrant, and she turned her face to it. "There is, of course, the other howl coming from the Traditionalist pawns. It came up just yesterday."

Shizuru immediately showed she had more than a few sources inside the city: "I am supposedly intending to blackmail Senate into what I want by using my yet-to-be-disbanded army as a threat."

The blue-eyed woman hummed.

"As Haruka Armitage-lover of green, whatever that implies-put it, the right thing to do would have been to bring them back but disband them as soon as you came upon Fuukan soil," she quoted with the faintest touch of asperity. "Even before you reached the Campus Martius."

"In which case she is right," Shizuru admitted. "Had I wanted to avoid such allegations of threatening the Senate, disbanding them would have been the right thing to do. But would it have been the smart one?" She wiggled her tawny gold brows. "Even setting aside the consideration of a triumph yet to be approved, surely this is standard when it comes to the game. Or do they actually believe me ready to storm Hime with the Fourteenth?"

Chikane stifled a grin as she flexed her hands, which were the same as Shizuru's: very white, very long, and surprisingly rough of palm. Despite her refined looks, Chikane too had her share of martial experience.

"Did they actually believe that, every one of them would have run off to Egypt or Africa by now," the dark-haired woman told her friend. "Deny though they may many of your virtues, Shizuru, not even the thickest of them can do the same of your military prowess. Our Armitagian bull herself would not be confident going to general against you."

There was a sly gleam to the red eyes.

"Did that situation actually arise, it would not be the armiger armentalis they would send to face me," Shizuru replied gently. "But an aquila ."

Unrestrained laughter from Chikane, her usual cool thawing from the jest.

"Come now," she said afterwards. "Our friendship is too long and well-known for that."

Shizuru was smiling: "At any rate, everyone knows eagles catch snakes better."

"That would only apply if you were truly a snake," Chikane retorted, looking at her friend's tallness and hunger, things that had nothing to do with her body. Really so changed! Or was it simply that the younger woman had become even more of herself during the past months?

"However, Shizuru, you are part-feline. No... I doubt they would feel reassured in tasking me with generaling against you in such an unlikely event, even should it materialise now as I am senior consul. Nor would I accept such an order."

Yet Shizuru wondered what the outcome would be if Chikane did lead an army against her. Presuming equal resources, she thought, who would win ? Who would win? She thought she would, for she had the greater ambition and drive, and a far greater passion for her own triumphs, as she was beginning to see. But Chikane Himemiya had her own drive, and it seemed to Shizuru sometimes that what people perceived as her obsessions, she also perceived within Chikane as commitments. She would be wary of fighting Chikane if she thought the older woman had committed herself wholeheartedly to her defeat, because she thought Chikane Himemiya's greatest strength was that, having committed herself to a purpose or an idea, Chikane would carry out that commitment to the death... or even into the realm of the immortal. And with such an opponent, who could be certain of being the victor?

You must be, a low voice berated from within her. No matter the opponent, you must win.

She felt a smile pull the edges of her lips at that. The voice persisted.

I knew you were strong. So you always win.

"Well, I can see that The Eighteen and the rest of the knights do not believe those spurious claims about my intentions in having a legion outside the city," she told her raven-haired friend, still feeling the dull edges of mingled warmth and pain from the relived memory.

"Otherwise, they would have come to see me in more of a panic than they did just this morning. But what of the people?"

Chikane shook her handsome head.

"Oh, no fear on that account," she answered equably. "Besides, most of them listen to Urumi, and Urumi is an assiduous speaker on your behalf."

"For which I thank her." She took a deep breath as they reached a terrace and came out into the open air, saw a peach-coloured sky; the sun would sink in about two hours. "I missed this sky."

Her friend had stopped too. "You seem surprised, Shizuru."

"Perhaps," Shizuru said. "The sky never really blushes like this in the North."

"Is it because of the clouds?"

"I think so." A corner of her mouth twitched. "It matters not. My sky blushed there everyday."

She received a glance from Chikane, who then returned to an earlier matter.

"Do you see that one over there?" the raven-haired one asked, pointing to another villa of a moderate distance from their vantage point. Shizuru identified it immediately.

"That new villa? It belongs to the Ogasawara, I believe." She squinted against the light. "So it is finished? I did not know it was."

"It was, last month. Now then, see you that smaller structure attached to it?"

"Yes. A theatre?"

"A basilica. It shall serve very well for our purposes."

"Ah." Shizuru scrutinised the edifice as well as she could from the distance. "And they shall lend it to us?"

"I already talked to Uncle," Chikane told her; her family had blood-ties with the Ogasawara. "He said yes."

"Lovely," Shizuru sighed. She remembered something. "Sachiko sent me a letter, come to think of it. She indicated she might call upon me soon."

There was the barest trace of amusement in Chikane's face at that news. "I suppose she shall not go unaccompanied."

Neither Shizuru's face nor her body moved, and yet the atmosphere changed. Chikane waited coolly, no stranger to these shifts of mood.

"I must mention something," the younger woman said.

"Yes?"

"My other cousin has been trying to get an appointment with me."

"Aaah." Chikane released her breath in a lingering exhalation. " That cousin."

"I refused, naturally."

Chikane asked how many times this had happened.

"She sent two letters thus far. I have refused twice. I shall continue to do so." Shizuru stalked over to a balustrade and leaned her hips against it, the light behind her. She was facing her friend. "First of all, I would sooner strangle her than see her on amiable terms at the moment. Second and more importantly, we must keep up appearances. It would not do for me to be seen entertaining a supposed betrayer, an enemy."

"Yes, that is so."

Chikane smiled warmly all of a sudden, the white of her skin luminous against her hair's black. There were shades of Her there again, thought a secretly aching Shizuru, who was fighting wildly against the urge to grimace. Oh, to touch that black hair! Not this black hair, which would smell different-Chikane always smelled faintly of roses-but the one that smelled of forest and snow, the one that smelled as though made for her, smelled perfect...

"You ease my mind enormously, Shizuru. I confess I was wondering all this time how to ask about it."

Few things took a Himemiya off-guard, but Shizuru's candid answer did.

"Not to ask about the foreigner with whom I have been living?"

The briefest hiatus of sound ensued. It was the first stretch of tension they had ever experienced with each other since Shizuru's return, and it was the first time the topic had been mentioned between them. Only true politicians would be so good at evasion, thought Chikane, who was guilty of having avoided the subject consciously, out of a feeling that it would be better broached by her friend. Who had not done so for so long that the older woman had been beginning to wonder if she should be the first to bring it up after all. Until this.

"Is that where I seemed to want to go?" she asked finally.

Shizuru's eyes smirked, though not her lips. "Do you know that you answer questions with questions when you wish to avoid possible discourtesy?"

"Oh dear. Do I really?"

One beautiful face looked into another, and sapphire-blue eyes said, But you just did it too.

Shizuru was the one to end the stare. "You withheld yourself admirably. Most others have already been trying to fish something out of me about it, especially as opposition against us is hardening and I hear this topic is beginning to be bandied about more strongly by my detractors."

There was a brief pause before the reply: "I am not the only one who withheld, Shizuru. Is it possible you consider it of a nature warranting your detractors' intentions?"

"No, but that would not prevent them from trying to make out a horse as an ass." Shizuru unexpectedly produced a smile. "I think everyone shall soon hear something to the effect that my mind has been turned by consorting with a foreigner, and that her barbarian manner has influenced my way of thinking."

Chikane actually laughed.

"Only those who do not know you at all could believe such absurdity," she stated positively. "There is no one alive who has ever been able to influence your way of thinking."

But Shizuru's eyes darkened at that.

"Ah, now," she said with a feeble smile. "Who knows? There is always a first time."

The other woman's eyes opened a little more widely.

"Dear me," she said calmly, in what would have been better said as a gasp. "That serious?"

Shizuru winked at her: "What, has Suou-chan not been writing to you?"

"I have some news of her from my sister, yes, but not so very much," Chikane replied, before dipping her chin a little and commencing a subtle probe. "Even so, what I gathered from her missives was that my expectation should be for her to be accompanying you upon your return, and so I fear my first understanding was that I would be able to form an opinion for myself."

Shizuru's face was awesomely inexpressive; that told Chikane that both heart and pride were still hurting at the absence. Nothing relaxed about the lack of expression on that face!

"No, she preferred to stay and wait for my return," Shizuru told her, further betrayed by a nearly indiscernible emphasis on the latter part of the statement. "I permitted it."

"You left her in Suou's charge, Shizuru?"

"Yes." A worried look, quite unexpected. "I hope they are doing well. She can be... well... difficult, sometimes. She is a touch moody, you see. Suou-chan might not know what to do for certain occasions."

The dark-haired woman shook her head.

"I do not know if this can be credible, since I am her sister and thus not sufficiently impartial, but I am willing to vouch for Suou's reliability, even in the face of the unfamiliar," she assured the blonde. "I believe her one of the few persons on whom one may constantly rely to be equal to any situation."

Shizuru voiced agreement softly, saying that she knew that, knew she was being silly. Chikane turned and brushed complacently at her tunic at that moment, diverted by some near-invisible speck of dust that had alighted there. Her next words to the younger patrician thus had every appearance of being entirely casual-which they were.

"You must rest assured, Shizuru," she said, still brushing away the speck. "You know, Suou has a tendency to be more understated perhaps, but there are times when my sister reminds me very much of you."

Startled, Shizuru stared at her friend. What a remark! Now what in the world could have possessed Chikane to say a thing like that? She would have to find the older woman was already on to their previous topic before she could ask.

"Would it now be presumptuous to ask that you tell me about her?"

Shizuru shook her head slowly. The preceding comment that had startled her was filed away with care, to be dissected later.

"I really was expecting that you would," she confessed, looking fairly bashful for once. "So one might say I have been waiting for it all this time."

"Then I am sorry," the black-haired woman said. "I can only hope that the possibility of that expectation did not give you too much anxiety."

"Not at all."

But Chikane seemed perturbed: "As I thought... perhaps I truly should keep my curiosity to myself, after all?"

Shizuru seemed surprised by the suggestion.

"No," she said. "Were there anyone here that I would prefer to speak to about this matter, it would be you." She delayed the next words just enough to silently curse the faint heat on her cheeks. "I did intend to speak to you about her, for reasons I hope I need not pronounce."

"I understand."

"Thank you."

Having said that, however, Shizuru promptly clicked her mouth shut and produced an excellent imitation of a Praxiteles Venus-if Praxiteles would ever sculpt the goddess of love with a look of muffled persecution on her face. In defence of the senior consul's subsequent reaction to this sight, it must be said that she would have been patient to rest quietly in appreciation of this display for hours had the player been anyone else. As it was Shizuru Fujino doing it, however, Chikane lasted but a few moments before she had to lift a hand in a weak effort to silence the laughter.

"Cruel!" Shizuru cried, heat prickling on her cheeks. She tried to force it away by smiling. "Do not laugh."

Chikane ceased immediately and managed to look contrite.

"I am sorry," she said, before going on to admit something she had held back until now. "But the first time I met Shizuma in the city, she actually warned me to prepare myself for you 'spouting endless elegies' about your lover. Every since you returned, however, I have found it to be quite the opposite. One doubts this is what your cousin meant when she talked about you spouting. Fifteen days of it, Shizuru!"

Shizuru's smile was rueful, knowing the number was correct since she had been keeping count as well.

"Shizuma truly said that?" she asked.

"Yes."

"I should kill her," she said, prompting both of them into more laughter.

"And lose your next senior legate?" she asked, knowing Shizuru was having even more trouble speaking with her on this because they were such close friends. "At the very least, this tells me something: if the very thought of her makes your tongue cleave to your palate, she is indeed someone of interest. So would you be so kind as to tell me about her, even if only a little?" Chikane asked once more.

A nod from the younger woman, whose eyes were a very deep red.

"It would be best to dispense with the origins first," Shizuru began, recovering both confidence and tongue. She drew a soft but long breath. "I expect you know the essentials?"

"I should say so." Chikane ran through them swiftly to have the other woman verify her data and then went on to ask a query. "Suou said she was younger, but we never managed to discuss her precise age. May I know how young in years?"

Shizuru told her.

"Hmm. Shizuma said she was a child," Chikane replied.

"Is that what my cousin said? She must have taken the term from me."

"You call her a child?"

"Yes... on occasion."

In her mind, she added: Also a girl. Girl, child, woman. Brat too, sometimes. Mine, all of them, and each one a wonder.

"I see." The raven-haired woman blinked slowly, thinking. "Child indeed, I suppose, by relativity. Younger than I expected, though perfectly acceptable."

Shizuru took up one of the notions: "Than you expected, Chikane?"

Chikane turned a look of apology her way.

"I must admit I did you an injustice, My Dear," the older woman said, a golden gleam of humour in her eyes. "You see, I did not think you to have the patience for children, even though you are excellent at feigning possession of it on occasion."

Shizuru laughed at the light joke, actually a truth.

"Not at all, since you are right," she answered the grinning Chikane. "I rarely do find in myself the patience necessary for dealing with them, so I resort to pretending it. But there are children, and then, there are children."

The older woman tilted her head. "All the same, I truly thought that, come time for you to actually take up with someone, you would choose someone older instead of the other way. Thus I confess there is something in this that surprises me, Shizuru."

In afterthought, she went on to ask: "Or is it that she is of a character that does not go well with the word 'child', for all that you call her that?"

"Both," Shizuru answered. "She is singular in that sense, since one can easily say of her that she bears herself with a dignity far beyond her years without consciously affecting it. But she also has an innocence that can only be found in the youngest of children, an unsullied curiosity about many things in life. Natsuki is quite the paradox."

"Natsuki." Chikane reproduced it perfectly, without any jar of the syllables on her tongue, and Shizuru very nearly said it too in a fit of irrational possessiveness. "I thought, when I first learned it, that it was an interesting name."

"In their language, it means 'summer child'."

"So we return to the matter of a child and children," Chikane said cheerfully. "And how did she merit the name, this paradoxical summer child?"

Shizuru explained it was due to the date of birth, going on to a query: "I presume Suou has described her in the letters?"

Chikane answered that she had.

"A very beautiful young woman, she wrote." She allowed the tiniest hint of mischief to lift her lips. "And I do recall she mentioned something about our hair being the same shade and quality."

Shizuru smiled, remembering that she had used to compliment Chikane often on her hair when they had been younger; she had been telling the truth when she told Natsuki she had always loved black hair.

"I had thought most of the Northern people to be fair," Chikane went on.

"Most of them are fair of mane," Shizuru agreed. "One supposes it is an effect of their proper home, which tends always to the cold, being of the mountains."

"And peoples that live in such climes, we have noticed before, are fair. Your summer child would stand out even more, black hair and green eyes all."

The fair-haired woman eyed her almost suspiciously, remembering having said something of the sort to Natsuki, herself.

"Her eyes?" she said, a fresh ache going through her at the thought of them. "You know of her eyes?"

"Suou said they were an 'uncommonly perfect green'," Chikane revealed. "I confess myself uncertain as to how precisely I should imagine that. Uncommonly perfect?"

Shizuru explained it to her with so much enthusiasm and detail that Chikane thought she would be unable to get the image of "uncommonly perfect green eyes" out of her head for a while.

"There is something else I find queer," she went on to say. "Perhaps you shall explain. She described her as 'mute-though-not-really'. For the sake of certainty, exactly what do those words signify?"

Shizuru smiled.

"Not a talker," came her answer.

"Ah!" Chikane's teeth appeared in a flash. "I suspected so; still, it was hard to imagine. That is even more unusual, you see. How did you find it, being with someone of that mettle?"

"Surprisingly enjoyable," the younger woman confessed. "As she once put it, we were fortunate because I like to speak and she likes to listen."

Chikane swallowed a chuckle.

"She has a slight speech impediment," Shizuru admitted after, hand going again to the gem necklace depending from her neck. "You know of that?"

"No, not yet. Pray enlarge on it."

"Natsuki stutters. But, as with most stutters, I believe it is initiated only by certain situations. She only ever suffered from it under certain stresses, or when interacting in a personal instead of official situation. The stutter never surfaced when she was speaking as an officer, or in relation to her duties. Quite an earnest young woman, as you see."

"May I infer that she stuttered with you?"

"Oh yes," Shizuru said with a bit of guilty enjoyment. "To be fair, my girl can actually speak well. She can explain something if you request it of her, or tell a tale should you demand the diversion. But in and of herself, she is not one to readily offer speech to another. Those few occasions where she is required to speak, she delivers her words with such terseness and cold courtesy that most perceive her as grim sort of person, and do so a trifle unjustly."

"An unfortunate judgment, then," Chikane replied, trying very hard not to grin at Shizuru's jealous manner of referring to the foreigner. 'My girl', indeed!

"Yes, although..." Shizuru smiled helplessly. "She truly can be quite grim, Chikane. I do not deny she has a tendency to be sombre. Nor do I deny she is close-mouthed about what she thinks." She paused. "They called her the Sphinx. And Natsuki does keep her secrets."

"A guarded young woman?"

"Very, " agreed the other guarded young woman. "It is her circumstances that make Natsuki so, I believe. It is not a malevolent kind of secrecy." She suddenly grinned. "At least that means she is not the kind to gossip when idle."

Chikane smiled too: "In that much, un-Himean, eh?"

Her friend laughed.

"Too true," she said jokily. "She would rather talk about the last book she read than rumour. I believe, even, that she might have thought gossiping beneath her."

"Yes, I gather she is a noble?"

"Oh, very much so."

Chikane studied her friend's twinkling eyes for a moment before guessing: "She has pride, hm?"

The blonde laughed, sounding almost carefree.

"In mass!" she answered, seeming very pleased by that fact. "Her dignity is tender, and I fear I can better say this because I have pricked it on more than one occasion..." She pretended to duck her head in shame as Chikane sent her a teasing look of reproach. "But her gentleness is also very forgiving, and her anger easily mended in the face of sincere regret. She is a true innocent, my Natsuki."

"I daresay I am liking her better and better," said the woman who was herself married to one she considered a true innocent. She moved her head to shake a few raven locks from her face. The gesture reminded Shizuru of Natsuki again, and how Natsuki would have done that with a wilder toss of the head, younger colt that she was.

"Suou told me you like her very much," Chikane was saying. "She does not seem to have exaggerated."

"I do like her very much," Shizuru replied.

"I see," said Chikane.

"And I love her."

Again, from Chikane: "I see."

"I want her to stay-to be with me from now on."

Chikane asked the critical question: " In Hime ?"

"Anywhere. Everywhere."

"I see."

"Do you really?"

A fresh silence went by while Chikane pondered the question.

"I do not-or not completely, I suppose," she admitted. "That is a complex question, Shizuru. If I may hazard a description of my understanding, however, it seems to me that you want this person very much."

Shizuru's eyes were not their usual cheerful selves; Chikane saw her friend as she knew her to truly be: a person born entirely of flame and fire.

"Not want, Chikane, not just want," said the young woman seriously. "Need. I need her."

Chikane blinked at her leisure: "Very strong."

"It is."

The senior consul of the city looked away for a moment, seeming pensive. She was thinking of her own experience, and how strongly she felt for her wife-and thinking, too, of how that experience and that wife were nonetheless an insufficient basis for comparison with this matter of Shizuru's.

"For some odd reason, Shizuru, I always imagined you would be fervent in matters of the heart," she said then, shining eyes on the fountain she could see in the garden below them. "Was I right, then?"

Her friend smiled.

"Who knows?" Shizuru replied.

The other woman finally looked again at her, face pleasant in its curiosity: "Do you think of her often?"

Shizuru was not fully aware of it, but the wretchedness that washed over her countenance provided sufficient answer to that. Even so, she replied in a voice that she wished could have not trembled.

"Do I think of her!" she said in a whisper. "Do I think of her."

Better to ask how I can not think of her, she thought gloomily while staring almost resentfully at her friend, heart wrenching as she permitted her mind to focus for an instant on the subject she refused to let occupy her consciousness completely for fear it would drive her mad. It slipped into her head every hour, insinuating itself with every face she saw and mocking the other face out by virtue of being so infinitely preferable. Thought carried over into the senses. She would visit the garden and see the leaves, see them mocked by green eyes, too-green eyes; sip wine and be taunted by the taste-not Her mouth, Her mouth was when food was eaten-but rather the sweet-acid taste from between Her thighs. Smell it too, almost, and sometimes feel the soft, blind warmth of inside...

"I think of her," she said curtly, and looked away to face the wind while it raked her hair, wishing guiltily that they had brought the wine when they came here. She continued the answer in her head while wishing that: I think of her now and her foreign preference for drinking milk, and how she marvelled at the amount of wine I drank. I think of that time she pummelled my shoulder when she was thirsty and could not drink because I kept making her laugh. She pushed my cup when I was the one drinking, after that, because she wanted to get even. It splashed on my dress. I think of her face and the panic in it before I threw the rest of the cup's wine on her and laughed. She knew it was all right then. She picked up the jug and splashed all of it on me. I think of how it dyed my dress.

The soft spring air was rocky in her throat.

It dyed her dress too.

As these thoughts ran through her head, Chikane had been watching the panorama of emotion: not on Shizuru's face, which the younger woman had been careful to keep still, but on her hands, her fingers.

They were closed so tightly the knuckles had gone white.

"I see," was what Chikane finally said.

They stared at each other. Shizuru spoke.

"I'm mad, am I not?" she said jokingly, cheeks smarting from the blood rushing to them. "Perhaps you think I have gone mad?"

The other's face was crossed by a light frown.

"Have I given you any indication of thinking so?" Chikane asked mildly. "I have not said anything of the kind."

Shizuru smiled-with some sadness, the other woman thought.

"No, Chikane?" she said.

"No."

The younger woman said nothing, so Chikane took it upon herself to say a little more.

"Even if I had indicated such a contrary opinion-which I have not, mind you," she told her friend. "It has no bearing on your like for her, I should think. Or so I hope, since I have always thought you the kind of person who likes others purely on her own terms, and not out of concession to some common fad or opinion. If you like her, that is your affair, and what I think has nothing to do with it. Nor would I presume to discuss the possible ramifications of your relationship with her as regards your career, for I believe you know them well enough yourself. I would not patronise you by lecturing you on them."

The younger woman nodded slowly, accepting the warm admonition in silence.

"And besides, who am I to speak?" Chikane added in good humour. "It would not be right of me to judge your choice of woman a mad one, especially when my own was considered nearly enough to land me a verdict of lunacy."

She was glad to see the smile return to Shizuru's face.

"Conceded," the fair-haired woman said. "But I did hope to learn of your opinion, all the same, Chikane... not only since you are my friend but since you have gone through something similar to this, before, as you said so yourself."

"In some measure, Shizuru. We must confess, unfortunately, that there are certain nuances present in your situation that were absent from mine."

The younger woman's face lost its smile, hardened again into a mask of expressionless set.

"I note it well," Shizuru said, before suddenly saying: "I would like to obtain the citizenship for her."

"Oh, that," was all Hime's senior consul stated blandly.

"Understandable. It might help."

The crimson eyes peered at her. "Ahh. Suou-chan has told you."

A nod.

"Has she also told you that my girl deserves it?"

' My girl' again-what jealousy! "Yes."

Shizuru's face was cooler than marble; Chikane answered the next and unspoken query.

"I foresee no difficulty there," she told her waiting friend. "Although I believe it would be wiser to permit our plans to develop further before that. Once we achieve our aims, it should be simple for you to grant her the citizenship yourself, in recognition of her contributions to the Himean-Mentulaean War. Would that not be preferable?"

"That would be if I am given a full proconsular imperium in that campaign," Shizuru replied without aversion, lifting a finger to her chin and tapping thoughtfully there. "And, furthermore, named the governor of the to-be-annexed Mentulaean empire. I should have sufficient latitude and authority to make whatever dispositions and agreements I see fit pertinent to the people and the area, and have the certainty that my actions shall be ratified either by a law from the outset or by a law at the conclusion. I do not want any fiascos of the conservatives coming at my directives afterwards and invalidating them once I my term is done."

A sharp glance from under her brows.

"The Centuriate may do for the law freeing me from being the urban praetor, but I also want it-or the Assembly of the People, though I shall prefer the Centuriate Assembly-to give me the command of the campaign. Nothing less shall do."

Clever Shizuru! Chikane saw at once that the younger woman had stipulated such a thing because a decision made by either Assembly to give someone command for a campaign was nigh-irrevocable: it would have the force of law and be written into the tablets, unorthodox thought it would be. The only way to overturn it-and thus replace the commander specified-was to hold another vote for that in the same assembly. And both assemblies were not prone to invalidating their previous decisions.

"Of course," she answered. "So it is decided?"

"Yes."

They nodded in unison, and the gestures were suitably formal. Both women appreciated in full what had just been said, and understood just how grave it was, beyond the question of granting a citizenship to Shizuru's foreigner. Perhaps precisely due to the import of these decisions, and the denseness of the pause that import permitted their conversation, Chikane suddenly felt a hyperilluminated instant where something came into pinpoint focus. She turned dark eyes to her friend, who met the stare so evenly she very nearly faltered.

As she was herself, however, she did not actually falter.

"Shizuru, I must know something. Thus I ask leave to take a possible liberty."

"I give it."

"Thank you," Chikane said. "I thought, earlier, that you wanted the citizenship for your lover to give her cachet enough to live with you as a concubine. A shockingly uncommon development, I hope you shall admit."

"I admit it."

"And yet I look at your face now," the black-haired woman

continued, her eyes made of iron. "And I compare it to Shizuma's, when she was telling me about your passion for... Natsuki-san. I think, too, of Suou's last letter. Although both warn me of a shockingly uncommon idea cherished by you, I sense from all I have, somehow, that what I suggested is not yet that idea."

Shizuru said nothing this time, content to nod.

"Therefore I shall ask this now, and ask you to pardon me if I overstep. Are you thinking of-" Chikane paused, still too awed by the idea to voice it so simply, even if she had been turning it over in her head. "Forgive me. Are you doing this because you are considering marriage to her?"

Again Shizuru's cheeks smarted; she made no attempt to cover them, preferring to focus her strength on keeping her expression stony. Futile anyway to think one could reverse blood's flow!

She answered truthfully, "I do not know."

Chikane persisted: "Permit me to put it another way. Can you imagine yourself being married to her?"

"Easily."

Another blinding point of focus: Chikane saw, for the briefest moment, that even Shizuru was surprised by her answer. Nonetheless, the younger woman recovered quickly enough to ask something lightly.

" Now shall you say I am mad?"

Chikane shook her head, going over myriad things to say and rejecting some, considering a few, modifying others. All in two seconds, after which she produced the answer she felt most politic for the situation.

"I prefer to say, rather, that I hope you achieve what you want, as a friend," she said, careful to add just the correct amount of concern. "And that, as a friend, I also hope what you want turns out to be good for you. I wish you well always, Shizuru."

The younger woman seemed to study her fondly, a strange light in red eyes. And then, abruptly, Shizuru was grinning.

"Always mindful of graces," she murmured, causing Chikane to laugh softly.

"And yet I do mean all that I said," Chikane answered with delicacy, already occupied with working out numerous sums and figures of probability and chance: statistics concerning what Shizuru had just told her and how that might affect their schemes. "At any rate, we shall see. It changes some things, but... but I shall trust you with your decisions, Shizuru, for so long as you also trust me enough to ask for help should you ever need it."

Shizuru regarded the other woman fondly, feeling even more affection for her than she already had.

"You must be the first person to know of this without attempting to lecture me on the perils," she said with light wonder. "Or the first not to bother warning me of the possibility that she might be after my money."

"As though you would not be aware of such a thing, were it so."

"I have heard it said that lovers can be blind to such matters," Shizuru retorted with a grin. "Why, you did not even ask if she loves me."

She noted that Chikane was amazed by the remark.

"I did not think it necessary," Chikane said.

A short laugh: "That means either that you believe too much in me, or that you believe too much in the blind assurance of lovers."

"Do I? I wonder. I am only thinking of what I know of you and what I know of her." Chikane smiled a shut-eyed smile. "Suou said that the child watched over you every second of each day for nearly half a year."

"That was her duty," Shizuru pointed out.

"And does the duty nullify the heart behind the act?"

Shizuru said nothing, a fine crease talking for her on her brow.

"I do not see how she could have watched over you so closely, and for so long," Chikane explained. "And not done that."

That statement hurt her. It must have been a deep hurt, Chikane thought, if even her blood-eyed friend could not conceal it. One could not even say as an excuse that Shizuru was currently weakened. Hardly, Chikane decided, dismissing the other's tiredness as immaterial to the subject of such weakness. Shizuru was the opposite, if anything!

This too was part of the change in her.

This new Shizuru was something Chikane truly found fascinating, enough to merit a renewed consideration ever since her return. What was it about her? Somehow more human-the haggardness and loss of weight might be to blame-yet more compelling than before. Perhaps it was because she had acquired a tragedy quite new to her, Chikane suspected, noting idly the greater length of the curls over Shizuru's brow, the fetching leonine tousle of them as though she now had a habit of clutching her hair in her hands. What an image! Not something she might have imagined Shizuru doing before, but something she could actually picture now, even if she had never seen it. And she was reminded too of Shizuru's cousin, the silver-haired Shizuma, who bore something of the same tempestuous drama.

She supposed she should have expected this, in a way: the women of Shizuru's family showed a marked tendency to turn romantic late in their lives. Or was it that their lives turned them romantic?

Yet I do not think the same can be said here, she allowed, gauging her friend more deeply even as they continued talking. She lacks their fatalism. It was a queer drama Shizuru had, because Chikane could not see in it the same sense of defeat from the others. It was true that Shizuru had always been hard-harder even than either of her parents, who were great people, and thus very hard ones. Even so, Chikane could not help but suspect Shizuru had grown even harder than that. And, she believed, so much hungrier.

A faint worry whispered a thought about the meeting she was planning. Would it really be wise to let the other senators see Shizuru now, give them an opportunity to sense how much harder and hungrier she was? If any of them caught on-and some of them would, for not all of them were completely blind-the hackles would go up. They were wary enough of Shizuru as it was, and it would be easy to compound that wariness by giving them a glimpse of the Fujino threat growing bigger. Chikane had no doubt it was doing that. What if they too saw it?

Neither here nor there, she decided. Shizuru had long been headed down this path. Besides, if Shizuru truly was as hard as she thought, then opposition would not matter to the purpose. That was a good word too, come to think of it: purpose. She sensed in Shizuru the awakening of a terrible purpose.

She has always had determination, she said to herself. Her ambition has always been complete. Yet it seems to me, somehow, that this ambition has been doubled. It is not that I was wrong in thinking it complete then, for I am convinced it truly was what I thought it to be. It is rather that she has done the impossible with it: grown it, increased, expanded beyond the perimeter. It is not a vainglorious expansion; she has always been hungry for victory, a hungry sort of winner, and even now shall continue to be. But now I think she sees winning as both inevitable and devoid of alternative. Beyond margins of error and limits. Her mother would have said, "Is that not like my daughter, truly?"

Chikane wondered if she approved of this. Her mind-a cerebral, aloof mind-could not form full agreement: determined as she also was in her own ventures' successes, Chikane nonetheless could not discard the minutiae of chance that computed those unlikely probabilities of failure. It was hard for her logic to approve of this development in her friend, which she suspected made Shizuru impervious to those tiny fault-lines she might see, disdainful of such negative possibilities. Of course, the part of her not so bound to the mathematic appreciated the addition of an entirely incomputable factor: the maturation of that hard, ravenous will in Shizuru that she could feel. A will that would not so much discard the obstacles in its way as it would crush them entirely, unheeding of repercussions so long as the repercussions did not affect its grand scheme. Ah, but it was so hard to factor in such a thing! From where had it come, anyway? What was it that had happened-what manner of thing had to happen-to generate as inhuman a will as this?

It continued to bother her even when she left Shizuru to herself, even to the time she reached her home. It would bother her for a good while, deep into the future. There were few things she did not understand, and it was an uncomfortable feeling not to understand something so important about someone she loved, as she truly loved her friend. So the subject continued to gnaw at her.

That the reason evaded Chikane was not due to the limits of Chikane's reason, but rather due to the limits of her experience: specifically, that with the person she wished most to gratify, or the woman she loved. Being of the same temperament as Shizuru in the sense that she tied her own ideals inextricably to the expectations of this person as a centre, Chikane was unable to fathom the inhuman intensification of Shizuru's aims because her wife had not given her the force she needed to develop the same thing.

Chikane's wife, although she looked up to Chikane as she would a god, was nonetheless unfamiliar with the hopes of the gods: she did not comprehend the full scope of aspiration among their society's upper class. Himeko Himemiya had been born into a world so far below Chikane's it partook of little-to-no sensibilities of politics and power, which meant Himeko could not appreciate the totality of what Chikane could truly be as a politician-or as a patrician-or as an example. She had no expectations of Chikane beyond an abstract belief of excellence... which Chikane fulfilled very well without true exertion.

But Shizuru's Natsuki was different. Shizuru's Natsuki, while a foreigner, was a foreigner born into politics and orphaned by it; a mover of her world in her own right; a creature who also lived amidst the tectonics of warfare and wealth. If Shizuru had not grasped fully from the outset of their acquaintance exactly how influential her young woman was, she had done so by the time of their separation, where myriad observations had led her to deduce the range of Natsuki's political strength and the significance of the girl's position as the Otomeian king's first retainer-what they had so loosely translated as bodyguard, to the (perhaps intentional?) detriment of her understanding. Slipped into a position to observe and monitor the Himean from the beginning, Natsuki had also been slipped into a position where Shizuru could watch her back, and from that common watch had both gained a healthy sense of each other's significance.

Thus the common base that had made it possible for them to speak on the things they had. While one could not belittle the contribution Natsuki's intellect made to her understanding of Shizuru's many speeches to her, neither could one discredit that she understood them better because of her familiarity with that common denominator that determined most of Shizuru's perceptions and thoughts: the elevated viewpoint of those riding the crests of power.

Natsuki, unlike Chikane's Himeko, understood these things. She appreciated Shizuru in a way Chikane's wife could not appreciate Chikane, and made it plain to Shizuru that her appreciation was thus: Shizuru was excellent, not just as a person, but also as a political creature. Tied as this appreciation was to a ferocious, powerfully obsessive love, Shizuru could not but take heed of it. Ambitious as the Himean already was, she suddenly had a second ambition fuelling her personality, which was to gratify the passionate belief in her of a woman who saw a blinding expanse of success in her destiny. To disappoint herself was insufferable; to disappoint Natsuki, catastrophic.

Thus it was that she who might have made allowances for herself before, even with her own perfect conviction of superiority, became resolved to never make allowances ever again.

" I knew you were strong," the girl told her, holding her cheek. "So you always win."

She knew her cheeks were burning. "You really do like to think thus of me, do you not? It seems to me this is not the first time for you to say it."

" Shizuru."

" Why is that, Darling?"

" Because... it pleases me."

" What does?"

" That you should win. That you-you have what you deserve."

Shizuru laughed at that: "What do you think I deserve, Natsuki?"

The girl's reply stopped her laughter.

" Everything."

It was a few moments later when she was able to give an answer.

" If it pleases you," she told her. "Then... then I shall always win."

---

Suou Himemiya looked up at the sound of someone walking into her office and checked the spread of her smile upon seeing the visitor's disgruntled face. She motioned to the client's chair on the other side of her desk and waited for the person to be seated.

"You returned earlier than I expected, Nina-san," she said.

"Something went wrong with your errand?"

The Otomeian's taut face pulled tighter.

"She knew," she said through clenched teeth, which Suou took to mean She found out.

Nodding at Nina, she put her hands atop the desk, looking singularly serene for someone whose plan had been foiled.

"Ah well. I suppose it cannot be helped."

The girl opposite her glared back with some displeasure, angry at the way the Himean seemed so accepting of disappointment. If she had expected it, then why had she chosen Nina to do this at all, of all people possible? Why not one of those spy-folks they had among the Himeans, those who had used to report to Erstin's mistress, the primipilus centurion Nao Yuuki?

But that was a silly idea, she supposed: seeing what she did now, she realised the woman had been accounting for the possibility of discovery from the very beginning-and if the woman had used one of those spies instead of Nina, she probably knew as well as Nina did that there was every possibility the spy might not return with the relative bodily preservation that Nina had.

After all, Natsuki was not very forgiving when it came to her privacy.

It was a troublesome errand that had to do with it. When the Himean had approached her with the task of watching Natsuki, Nina had quailed. To follow Natsuki, to creep about and watch the whereabouts of her cousin from the shadows? What an odious thing to do! Leave it to a Himean to think of doing such a thing to a princess of the blood. No Otomeian would have conceived of it, especially not to Natsuki of the Ortygians, who had been heir immediate of her dead people, and was even now acknowledged royal by the people who had adopted her. No Otomeian would think of it-even less one who was born Ortygian and also Natsuki's cousin twice-removed.

Even if you say that, a wicked little voice suddenly whispered, you did agree to it eventually.

As she was not a young woman afflicted by the bitter guilt that lived inside her cousin, Nina's first reaction to this thought was to brood first on the wrongful way in which she had been persuaded. Himeans were so good at it! Wily, with their strangely frank smiles, and candour-coloured ways of talking. Look at this woman, Suou Himemiya. Beautiful, in that long-nosed Himean way, and so easygoing in manner. So very like the Otomeians to look at, even if the shape of her features was different. Oh, and the woman made sure to get all the use she could out of that! Nina had seen her working her charm amongst the other Otomeian barons, winning them over to her authority as head of the auxiliary troopers. Not that Nina disapproved of that entirely-especially when compared to someone as disagreeable as the chief legate of the new general-but, really, it was so deuced sly!

And now this new piece of slyness, this spying on Natsuki. Well, to be perfectly honest, she would never have agreed to it had she just been forced. No, simply: she had agreed because there was still a point in the fair-haired Himean's persuasion, which touched on a concern for Natsuki's present welfare. It was a point even Nina had to allow was most convincing.

Nina's cousin was terribly unwell.

In the month since Shizuru Fujino's departure, Natsuki had suffered a startling a change, significant enough to merit recurrent discussion among the other Otomeians. The month that had so reduced Shizuru Fujino had in her case ravaged, leaving Natsuki with the bone-sketched look of an ascetic. When it had first begun to manifest, people had first shrugged, said it was the usual thing after what had happened. Natsuki would be sure to get over it. But when the prediction failed and the Otomeian's state even worsened-then the serious worries began.

Aside from the Himean to whom she had been charged, her subalterns and fellow officers were most concerned, for they saw the change in her keenly. It was not even that the captain of the Lupine Division started letting her duties go slack; indeed, she threw herself into her responsibilities with more dedication. Coupled as this was, however, by an increasing tendency to avoid her meals, and a popularly held suspicion of doing the same to her slumber, the effect was to shear off what little fat might have been present in an already lean frame, as well as remove what few tendencies she had before for conviviality. More silent and skeletal than ever, she put off all those with the courage to enquire about her health with an increasingly effective, sunken-eyed glare.

The woman to whose care she had been transferred-although the official line held that the relation was the other way around-was naturally the first to note the deterioration of her health. Her first thought was similar to most others' in that she considered it natural, although she did add a rider that Shizuru was certainly going through the same. When she noticed the alarming rate at which more angles were appearing on Natsuki's face, however, she began to wonder if Shizuru really was going through the same. The girl's decline was so fast! Suou had never seen anyone lose weight so swiftly, nor indeed seen them keep losing it while staying on their feet. What to do about that?

She might perhaps have known how better to help had she known what was in Natsuki's head, for the latter's decline was so much more marked because of the difference between what she and Shizuru believed: Shizuru only felt the anxiety of a temporary division; Natsuki felt anxiety that the division was permanent. As she had experienced abandonment before, and one that was also-in her eyes-in great part of her doing, this possibility of a second incident struck the girl with almost-crippling anguish. Natural therefore that Natsuki would suffer so keenly, and with such silence.

Suou still did her best. Despairing of keeping the girl in good health, she took for a while to imposing food upon the Otomeian, ordering her to finish everything laden on her plate. But the problem with this was that it not only irritated that prideful young woman, but also made Suou guilty whenever she saw the agony on Natsuki's face while struggling with the meal. This approach was abandoned quickly, especially after the discovery that such episodes often led to Natsuki retching in secret afterwards, as though the Otomeian truly could not hang on to her gorge. Horrified, Suou summoned the army physicians to check if the girl had some sort of inflammation of the stomach. All the physicians could do was to prescribe infusions of milk with heavily sweetened wine and beaten raw egg, and tell Suou what she already knew: it was more malaise than malady. And the only medicine was leagues away, all the way back in Fuuka and struggling with the Senate! What a predicament!

The Himean had recently come into some intelligence that explained part of why the predicament did not seem to be getting any better. Apparently, during the times Natsuki left her for mealtimes and breaks, that dark young woman had not actually been eating with the people she claimed to be her messmates. Rather, reports had come to Suou's ear about the girl vanishing, going to gods-knew-where to do gods-knew-what. Apprised of this deception, head hurting from her worries about the girl she was chaperoning, Suou finally went to ask the Otomeian's cousin to spy on her, in an effort to know exactly what the girl was doing and where she was doing it. Thus had Nina's assignment come about.

"What happened?" Suou asked her. "Does she know who asked you to follow her?"

A white shade rose in the area around Nina's lips.

"I did not tell her," she said aggressively.

Suou noted the pause and understood then that Natsuki did know. Yet she also felt that Nina was telling the truth, which meant Natsuki herself had probably guessed who it was.

"Tell me what you can, at least," she said. "Where was she headed?"

But Nina was suffering from some belated regrets: "I should never have spied on my kin."

Suou smiled.

"We've been over this," she answered the girl. "Would you deny that her actions of late have been of concern? Or that she wouldn't have answered had you asked her? I collect some people did ask her and got a harsh glare for their pains-and that you are one of them."

Nina frowned, careful to keep her voice as low as Suou's.

"You would spy on your own kin?" she asked provocatively.

"I would," Suou answered. "But only if I were given no other assurance of their safety and said safety were of my concern. As it generally is for kin. I think it's part of the compact of true kinship to give latitude for a possible overstep on-I stress this strongly-on their behalf and for their benefit, as well as an openness to understanding the goodwill behind it. See, I have no intention to be arrogant, but I do believe your cousin is wise enough a person to understand this."

"She was angry," Nina retorted testily.

Although the girl said that, she was dwelling more on her own anger at the moment, for she had just experienced a galling situation: she had just been chagrined by Natsuki. The older girl had actually given her a painful lesson on the difference between their skills by doubling back upon her and surprising her in an attack that left Nina flat, albeit not really bruised. After which Natsuki had cautioned her not to do it again and to "practise the feet".

Noisy as a callow hound, Natsuki had pronounced critically. You hurt my ears.

When she had retorted, burning with hurt pride, that she had been able to evade her notice long enough to make it out of the city, Natsuki had sighed and given her yet another dampening reply: Would I censure my cousin before the common? You think so little of me?

Flushing with renewed embarrassment, Nina stared grouchily at her present companion.

"She is angry," was said again, as though to give Suou warning.

"Of course she is angry," Suou replied, unfazed. "But neither your cousin's understanding nor her sympathy is thwarted by her pride. Else I would have mistaken my understanding of her. Have I?"

Nina seemed to pause, looked uncertain. The Himean struck.

"I shall take care of Natsuki-san, as the intention was from the start. Give your report now," she said firmly, in a voice that carried profound authority. It worked: Nina finally unbent to tell what she could.

At least this one is more malleable, her Himean auditor thought, while listening. Ah, but the cousin! Now, that one was a little more complicated. Too secretive, too prideful-and now too depressed by half! Suou winced at the thought of having to face Shizuru once she returned and presenting to her a Natsuki this shrivelled in weight. Shizuru would not thank her for that. Certainly the prescription of the army physicians seemed to work-if working meant keeping her well enough to be able to do her vanishing act-but could not return the girl to her former state. Oh, thought Suou, groaning inwardly at the walking problem that accompanied her these days, Shizuru really would not thank her!

She remembered what her red-stared friend had instructed.

"She shall want for nothing," Shizuru had specified. "I wish you to ensure she shall want for nothing."

"Of course," Suou had replied. "That much was understood."

But Shizuru had more to say on that: "You understand too that this covers much territory."

Very nearly ominous, Suou smiled, turning over the words in her head. It was all very well for Shizuru to say those things, of course, but what was Suou to do when the greatest part of that "territory" was Shizuru herself, and she was away?

Saddled by so impossible a pledge, limited by so gloomy a charge, it would have been perfectly understandable for Suou to succumb to either consternation or a shrugging acceptance that there was no more to be done. However, this patrician did neither. She had experienced greater pressures, after all, and weathered them all her life: she was the younger sister of Chikane Himemiya, and that was, in a sense, a tragedy by itself.

Unless you happened to be like her.

Well-regarded as she generally was, Suou was someone also generally underestimated. She was the younger of the Himemiya sisters, and thus often mistakenly seen as the lesser of them. It was telling that many still referred to them as Himemiya Major and Himemiya Minor, which nomenclature bore overtones beyond superiority in age. Suou had never borne her sister ill will for this, nor even suffered envy, as she was a very fair-minded young lady and grudged not something to one who rightly deserved it. Furthermore, she was of much the same imperturbable ilk as Chikane, although with a variation. Possessed of the same cool, she was also possessed of a ruthlessness for the result that possibly outstripped her sister's and found a closer equal in Shizuru Fujino's. While her intelligence was not the equal of either woman's when it came to grasping a high abstraction, she was nonetheless their equal when it came to the practical stratagem. She was also a person with less of the dramatic centrality both her sister and Shizuru carried, having in its place the prosaic sensibility better held by those in critical spectatorship. Thus having an acuity that presented her with the most common-sense perception, and a smaller number of romantically-cherished scruples over means when it came to achieving an end, Suou decided quickly on her course of action over the ailing Natsuki.

Suou Himemiya started to lie.

Halfway into the second week of Shizuru's absence, she began to discreetly procure objects, arranging matters such that Natsuki would believe her when she said the objects had been purchased at Shizuru's behest. All manner of trifles and presents were purchased, from the sweetest dried plums and grapes to books by the bucket. As Shizuru had actually been so obliging as to leave a list of the things she knew Natsuki to like best, Suou had no difficulty picking which ones to buy and present to the girl as gifts Shizuru had ordered ahead of time and arranged to have delivered over a certain period—a sort of regular surprise that would keep the girl thinking of her during her absence. As this was very like Shizuru in Natsuki's eyes, and as the person orchestrating this deception was as cool a liar as could be, the girl accepted the gifts without doubting them once.

Although Suou did suspect that part of this was because the girl did not want to doubt either.

She had written to Shizuru about this already, and wondered if the other woman would be displeased with the liberty she had taken. She doubted it. If for such a purpose, Shizuru would not mind if she lied. Or, even if Shizuru did mind, she would have to think twice. For Suou's scheme worked as well as intended, her charge evincing moments of rare good spirit whenever a new present arrived. And she ate and kept down the edibles! For that alone, Suou felt her deception justified. She put that in her letter too.

Of all the things she procured for her charge, she wrote, what she found most curious were the toys and puzzles, childish whims Shizuru had made a point of informing her Natsuki enjoyed. The girl had taken them cheerfully when they arrived, true, but had not done more than look at the things. It was not until a few days past that Suou had finally discovered what Shizuru had failed to add—if Shizuru had known it, that is—which was that Natsuki did not like the toys as much as she liked to use them with another. Had Shizuru ever realised it? For, Suou reflected, Shizuru had probably immediately invited the girl to play after giving her such things, and might not have even had the chance to see how much more important the act of communal play was as compared to the tools that facilitated it. Of course the girl had always had toys! It was just that she must have never had playmates.

In effect, aside from lying, Suou Himemiya found that she also had to play with toys like a child. The art of chaperonage could be quite a fascinating exercise, her letter said.

At least it keeps me on my toes, I suppose, she ruminated, pushing the new bucket of scrolls beside her with one foot, and closer to her desk. Her Otomeian conspirator had left, and she was already thinking on the fruitlessness of Nina's attempt. Even if the report the trooper had given was delivered in fair confidence, Suou had quickly divined that Natsuki had known someone to be following her from the outset, and had thus been taking her cousin on a merry ride.

Perhaps it would have been better to go with one of their spies, after all? No, very stupid. Shizuru's girl was a vastly suspicious young woman who never let down her guard, and should it transpire that the spy made a tiny mistake, she would catch on to it-and very likely break their bones before a word could be said. It was clear the dark one had a dark temper as well.

I wonder if Shizuru-san ever realised what a wild creature she caught for herself, she mused, eyes screwing up to the ceiling. Her old friend's cub was turning out to be quite undomesticated, deceiving her about having meals with her fellows when she was actually running off somewhere. Had Shizuru ever seen this wildness in her young woman? Or was Natsuki always docile with her, cuddly and thrumming as Suou remembered from seeing them together instead of the wary creature she was with everyone else?

Oh well-who could really tell? Suou shrugged, knowing it did not much matter while Shizuru was away. She had to deal with the fallout and make sure the cub did not bite the hand currently trying to feed it. And, come to think of it, she considered that this failed attempt at tailing the cub might actually be an advantage.

She surfaced from her considerations in time to greet a new visitor entering. Her next words were whispered under her breath.

"That was fast."

This time, Suou nodded to her clerks to leave the room. Once they had left, she beckoned the Otomeian captain not to the same seat her cousin had occupied earlier, but to one of the couches nearby. A queer honour for a foreigner, perhaps, but this foreigner was loved by her friend, and one she had grown fond of, besides.

She perched herself on the other couch and met stormy green eyes without unease, studying the stately bones that defied even the ravages of Natsuki's ailment. Was that where the blood told? Interesting to see such nobility of form on one so wasted, her mind wandered, before focusing on the situation at hand.

"Natsuki-san," she started, with her gentlest voice. "What is it?"

The Otomeian's face pinched even more as she opened her mouth to respond: the result was a look both famished and disgusted.

"What!" she said in a husky tone of disapprobation. "You ask what."

Suou said nothing, wise enough to let her fume first.

"You ask," Natsuki drawled on, indignation collaborating with bloodshot eyes to add a feverish quality to her effect. "You ask Nina. What!"

Suou nodded, not bothering to stage a denial. She did not want the Otomeian to become any more displeased with her than she was already and she knew the young woman enough by now to know any attempt at denial would be read as an insult.

"My apologies," she said while bowing her head lightly. "I am sorry if my decision angered you."

She looked up at the slow hiss of air from her auditor's nostrils.

"I hope you can forgive me," Suou said swiftly, sending her most self-deferential smile to her auditor. "Please allow me a moment to explain. While I regret having resorted to such a tactic, I would like you to know that I only did it because I have been tasked to ensure your safety... which is to say that I did it with every good intention. I was so worried, you see, that I did not know what else to do. You had been vanishing so often, and without a trace, that I believed I had cause to fear. If something happened to you, I don't know how I could even face her again."

Her smile widened a little upon the change this reference to Shizuru brought upon the other's countenance; it was something she had expected.

"I must remind you too that I had good reason to be concerned-you never told me of these disappearances," Suou plodded on, striking while the girl still looked willing to listen. "I distinctly recall, Natsuki-san, that you told me you would be eating with your fellows. It turns out you have not been doing so, and thus I had reason to be concerned."

That reminder snagged. Natsuki scowled again, looking as though she would leap from her seat any second.

"Hrrh!" she hissed through bared teeth, even more displeased because it was Suou who had done it, and Suou was someone she actually liked. She reverted to Greek all of a sudden, her accent as sharp as it was cold: "Even so! You had me followed. Followed. By my cousin!"

She rasped a heavy breath, her wasted frame shuddering from agitation.

"You wrong me!" she cried in vexation.

Suou gave an answer in Greek as well, eager to placate her because she did not like the way the anger sat so heavily upon the girl. What if the foreigner passed out or had a stroke?

"I did not intend it, but I see that I have," she confessed. "You are right. It was wrong of me."

A furious nod.

"Pray hear me first, however, and try to understand. You see, I am not like her, Natsuki-san," the Himean continued in her softest voice. "Shizuru-san's delicacy is still above mine when it comes to these things, and I am afraid I did not know what else to do or how to treat you properly. Perhaps I panicked and worried too much. I handled that badly, I see now. I am sorry for that, and that you have to make do with someone so much less subtle in comparison..."

She lowered her eyes as though in shame, deciding her explanation would go better with such an act. After a moment's pause, she looked up.

"It goes hard with you, no doubt, to have to make do with so poor an alternative as you have in me. Nonetheless, I shall endeavour to get better at this. Only, I ask that you try and have patience when I make such mistakes. I truly meant it only because I was worried about you. Even so, I see now that I was wrong."

Precisely as Suou had known would happen, the girl before her seemed to calm down after the speech. Not for nothing had Suou been studying the girl extensively; one of the things she had quickly learned was that, although she had a dark temper, the Otomeian was actually a very nice person all the same. Tender of heart, with a disposition that yielded to heartfelt appeals, Natsuki was unable to prevent herself from softening at Suou's sally.

"Yes, I... I see this." The young woman paused, looked torn between maintaining her indignation and giving in to her sympathy. She coughed, and again her thin body shuddered. "Just..."

Suou put on her most contrite smile.

"I was only thinking," Natsuki managed weakly. "Alone."

Suou nodded and waited to see if she would continue. A few moments more and Natsuki did not disappoint her.

"You see too, sometimes," the girl said. "I need that."

Her lips then pushed up into that tiny flag of pain Suou had learned to associate with her, that unpremeditated pout Shizuru must have found so distracting. Or had Shizuru seen it? After all, the reason Natsuki made that flashing expression so often these days was because of Shizuru's absence.

"Thinking alone, I mean," Natsuki finished, returning to Suou's native language. "Do you see?"

Suou nodded.

"Of course," she told her. "I should have thought of that."

Natsuki looked away.

"Do you go on rides during those times you are missing, perhaps?" Suou guessed, recalling her own sister's old habits.

The green eyes slid her way. Yes.

"I see. I really should have thought of that. Stupid of me."

She allowed a moment to pass, to indicate to the girl that she understood the gravity of the topic.

"I really am sorry for what I did," she said afterwards. "And I shall atone in any way you wish, of course. But if I may ask-and I ask this in all courtesy-would it be possible that you tell me where you are going, first, when you leave? I promise not to infringe on your time alone, nor betray that trust any other way, but it would ease my mind remarkably if I knew where you were. Besides, it also makes it easier for me to reach you should there be an emergency."

Natsuki saw the good sense of this and flushed.

"I... yes," she replied stiffly. "I will tell next time."

"Thank you."

"Mm."

A brief silence ensued, which Natsuki spent with her fingers picking at a corner of her seat. The patrician watched her furtively, amused by the fidgety gesture.

"If that is settled, may I bring up something else?" she eventually asked with feigned timidity. "It is something for you. From Shizuru-san."

How quickly that sent away the glaze from her eyes! Suou noted it, as she always did.

"I am afraid it is not yet a letter, however," she said, turning away to fetch the bucket next to her desk and so managing to avoid the slight wilting she knew would appear in the green; she hated having to see it. "All the same, I imagine she thought it would keep you occupied before her latest letter reached you."

She returned and handed it over, letting the girl take out a scroll and begin perusing it. She watched her serenely during this examination. This part of her duties she liked, because Shizuru's girl was exceedingly watchable. There was a strange pleasure in watching a creature as exotic as this, and also a more common pleasure that had to do with the gratification of one's aesthetic senses. A beautiful woman herself, Suou liked to be surrounded by others who were also beautiful. Part of this was because she had a great love of beauty and another part of it was that she distrusted those who lacked self-esteem-and most of those who lacked beauty tended to lack self-esteem. Suou distrusted such people because she thought they could and usually would sell you for a pittance. Of course, she thought, beauty was not always the decisive factor. It was simply the most obvious one.

"Catullus!" her subject uttered huskily. She glanced at Suou and repeated it. "Catullus."

"Poetry this time, I see," Suou answered with nonchalance.

A sociable nod was bestowed: "You like?"

"That's difficult to answer. I should say that I do not dislike it, I think," Suou admitted. "I am more of a history-reader. Some poetry bores me, unfortunately."

The green eyes shone for an instant.

"Ovid bores?" Natsuki said.

"Hmph!" Suou sniffed with good humour. "I said some, Natsuki-san. Some. Ovid is never part of some. "

"And Catullus?"

"No. You know he is too good for that." A pretend-frown. "Or do you think me so devoid of literary sensibility you actually believe I wouldn't appreciate him? Unkind of you, Natsuki-san."

The black-haired foreigner seemed very much as though she would smirk. A change came over her face before she could do so.

"Shi-"

She stopped there. Suou's eyes were very pale, very light upon her. Little though Suou knew it, one of the reasons the girl bore her gaze so well was that her eyes reminded Natsuki of Mino's eyes, the first eyes the girl had seen when she was freed from that prison of corpses years ago.

"Shizuru?" the Himean supplied.

Natsuki visibly chewed on the inside of a sunken cheek.

"She... likes him. I know," she said, her voice as fragile as she looked: she looked as though she might fall apart at any instant. "Catullus."

"Is not the name part of the gift, though?" the other woman said playfully, to lighten her mood. "Isn't that like Shizuru-san, to send you a gift with a pun?"

Natsuki's eyes fell on the scroll. She could still hear Shizuru's voice in her ear, calling her catulus, soothing her when she awoke gasping from her dreams in the night.

"Yes," she agreed quietly, not lightening at all. "Like her."

Suou pressed on, wanting to see the sparkle she had seen earlier. She much preferred the girl when she was witty and glowing. It was a pleasure to be with her when she was like that.

"I'm certain she has already sent a letter," she assured the Otomeian confidently. "But the passes may be difficult for the couriers. It should take about a month."

The girl nodded and looked up for an instant. Suou finally read what was in those large, sad eyes.

"She will write to you," she said firmly, permitting a frown to come to her face. "Do not doubt that, Natsuki-san. I never do."

Gratitude now-sparkling gratitude in the green. So pleased was the patrician to see it that she quite forgot herself and smoothed the girl's hair with one hand. She caught herself at the confused surprise on Natsuki's face, however.

"Just wait for it," she said, backing away with no trace of her inner awkwardness. Should she not have done that? Then again, why should she even be troubled for having done it? She decided to shrug it off and essayed a smile. Still, it nagged. This was not the first time she had felt this urge or the awkwardness over it, was it?

An inward frown as an idea came to her: was Shizuru's covetousness over this person so strong that it threatened even now, with a sea in between it and them?

"Anyway, you seem a little tired, Natsuki-san-"

"Natsuki."

Suou stopped, turned back.

"Pardon me," she said. "What?"

Her companion's face was so red Suou almost reached over to test her temperature.

"Natsuki," said the Otomeian, glancing up shyly. "It is fine."

"Oh." This time, she almost tested her own temperature. "I see. Thank you."

She swept away, faintly irked that she too should blush. Why was it that when someone blushed in that sort of situation, you did too?

When safely at the doorway, she announced: "I'm going to send for someone to make your infusion."

The Otomeian sighed at her proposition. Natsuki did not bother lodging a protest, however, knowing Suou could not be dissuaded from having her drink the prescription whenever the Himean got the idea in her head. Besides, if the girl had to tell the truth, the milk-and-egg-based concoction was not at all bad. It was also one of the few things she could keep down in her rebellious stomach, so she could not complain overmuch when it was what kept her from outright hunger; she really was not vomiting her food on purpose.

She tracked the Himean's movements to the door, listening to the woman giving the order.

"Soo-oh," she called gently afterwards, not adding the honorific because Suou had ordered her to drop it from the very beginning; it was part of what had motivated her to ask the Himean to do the same with her name just now. "Suou, there is something."

Suou finished giving instructions to a slave outside the doorway and turned to go back into the room.

"What is it?" she asked, taking a seat again. When Natsuki answered without hesitation, she understood that the subject was strictly for business.

"The new supplier-no, that is-the new praefectus?"

"Yes, praefectus fabrum," Suou helped. "You mean the one who handles the procuring of materials and supplies for the army?"

The silky-haired head nodded: "A problem."

"With Makito-san?" Suou asked, registering little surprise on her face. She pulled back one leg and put forward the other, unconsciously assuming the classic pose of Himean magistrates. "What is it? Speak freely with me, so that I can address it. Trust that I will."

A very quick, very tiny smile raised Natsuki's lips.

"I do," she said.

Suou smiled back, quite touched by that expression of faith from one so generally suspicious of everyone else. Again she felt the urge to extend a hand and pat that dark hair she knew now to be very fine. She did not do it.

"Please tell me," she said, shifting easily into Greek as an invitation for the girl to do the same.

Listening to the young woman outline her concerns about the subpar quality of provisions being provided her troopers and stables, she marvelled once more about the change such a topic could cause in the other's features. She seemed so strong. Suou knew Shizuru's girl was that, truly, but she had also seen how much frailty could reside in the same soul. She had seen it for herself, learning the extent of the Otomeian's stutter when it came to things that were personal and that had to do, for instance, with Shizuru. She had seen it that day she discovered her bent double as she retched all the contents of her stomach, going on even when it was empty and her expulsion was reduced to a greenish trickle.

She had seen it that night she had chanced a glimpse into the window of Natsuki's bedroom, and seen her curled up in bed, head bowed and hands wringing.

Queer how frail she actually is, she thought, understanding now precisely what drove her old friend to clucking like a hen whenever the foreigner was involved. What was that Shizuru called her? Not ice, she had said. Not ice, but adamas. Only now did Suou comprehend what the other woman had meant.

Adamas was tough. It was the hardest substance ever discovered. It was rare and thus, precious. Its great virtue was in its purity. Yet the same purity and hardness, that which gave it strength, made it brittle.

Adamas did not scratch easily... but it was very easy to break.

A knock on their door intruded on her thoughts, as well as on Natsuki's speech. Both women looked up as Suou called the interrupter's entry.

"Suou-ku-ah! Natsuki-san."

The man who had replaced their general bowed stiffly, his dark skin not yet dark enough to hide the colour on his cheeks. Suou smiled at him, whereas the Otomeian with her looked away.

"I, uh, I hope you received the flowers," he said laboriously, his eyes hungry as he roamed them over the dark-haired woman's form; she kept her own eyes studiously on her feet. As this was no departure from how she usually acted around him, Takeda was not cast down by it. He believed her reserve was only to be expected of such a young lady, and thus read what might have been better considered contumely as modesty instead.

The young lady got to her feet and faced him, bowing her head with her back straight. He flushed once again and bade her be seated, trying to compose himself enough to remember why he had come here. As his gaze refused to part from Natsuki, however, and the desire that had been driving him mad for so long was being stoked by her nearness, he had to struggle with himself for a few seconds. The only other person in the room, Suou, merely watched him and held a tiny grin.

She was wondering what Takeda Masashi would say if he knew the girl had given away his flowers to her, along with every other gift he had sent in the past few weeks.

"Aah-Suou-kun!" the man said, seeming to recall exactly what his errand had been. "Right. I came to see you."

Suou grinned at him: "And you see me."

He plodded on, still very much aware of the Otomeian's presence.

"I want you to pack up the troopers," he said. Perceiving the twitch of a black-haired head, he unconsciously strengthened his voice, speaking deep from his chest. "We're moving to Argentum."

Suou regarded him with genuine surprise, a fine crease appearing on her forehead.

"Oh?" she said. "I thought we were going to stay here in Argus? What happened to that?"

"Things have changed." He coughed, stare flickering as he kept darting his eyes toward the girl on the other couch. "We just got an invitation. Diplomatic, of course, beautifully worded-came with a very nice gift," he said with excitement, thinking of that impressive sculpture he had left in his office. Solid gold! Beautiful! It would make such a nice offering to one of the state temples when he returned. And such a good mark on his record-along with the peace contract he was undoubtedly about to get.

"Anyway, get ready to go as soon as possible," he continued brightly. "We can get there and wrap this up without another bit of trouble then. They're already there."

"A moment, please," Suou cut in, her eyes glacial. "You are not making much sense, Takeda-san. Who sent this invitation? Who is already there?"

"The embassy from the Mentulae."

Chapter 48

INDE IRA. Incidentally, if a term does not appear in the provided list but is in the chapter's text, it means it is either a place/location (such as a minor street) that demands no further understanding, or a term that has been used so many times in the story that it should by now be familiar (e.g. dignitas, consul, tribune of the plebs, etc.). Owing to the content of this chapter, however, I would most respectfully remind you of a point relating to the culture on which this world is based: to an Ancient Roman senator, dignitas was everything .

Finally, thank you for those very sweet persons who sent messages after the last chapter-and all worded with such handsome and winning courtesy. I regret that I cannot answer most of the messages this very moment, as I am rushing off to a flight for business, but I promise to do so once I am able to write responses. I thank you in advance here, however, and shall communicate a more personal gratitude later on.

---

Illustration: For Ch. 46

(Remove all spaces after the full stops, replace X's with W's, and replace YYY with COM.)

XXX. deviantart. YYY/ethnewinter/art/Cameo-164117023

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Censor - The most senior of the Roman magistracies, although not one that owned imperium. Two censors were elected to serve in tandem for five years, some of their duties being the regulation of senatorial membership, the execution of a general census, the application of means tests, and-this being why Shizuru refers to them below-the giving of state contracts for public works and buildings. Note that only consulars (s.v.) could stand as censors.

2. Consular - One who has served as a consul at least once in the past.

3. Curia (L.) - The meeting place of Senate, the full name being Curia Hostilis ; like most of the locations below, it can be found on a map of Ancient Rome.

4. Fasces (L.) - See note for Lictor .

5. Forum - The centre of Rome's political happenings, having in it most of the major government buildings; on a map, it is typically labelled "Forum Romanum", and lies between the Capitoline and the Palatine.

6. Hemiolia - A boat of the bireme type, although swifter and smaller than the average bireme.

7. "Interventor, illicitator, idiota!" (L.) - "Interrupter, sham bidder, idiot!" The second word, illicitator, describes false bidders at an auction; it must be taken as a metaphor in the exclamation. For "Tace ", see note below.

8. Knights - Members of the Ordo Equester , called "the knights" or "equestrians/equites" as opposed to "the senators". Those of knight rank were usually as well-born as those of senatorial rank, but the difference was that they chose not a political career but a commercial one. Recall that there are restrictions on senatorial businesses, which is the reason the knights are generally the richer of the two ranks. One may consider them the equivalents of the modern "business sector" of the community, with the senators being the "government or political sector", for a simplified but convenient categorisation.

9. Lictor - A public servant I have chosen to eschew almost entirely for this story, the lictor was originally assigned to imperium-owning magistrates as a type of escort. The number of lictors depended on the degree of imperium or authority the official held. The lictors also held bunches of birch rods tied together by red leather straps, and these were rods were called fasces , symbols of imperium. In the case of the consuls, whichever consul was officiating over meetings of Senate for the month (they alternated in this duty by month) held the fascēs through his lictors.

10. "Mea vita" (L.) - Extremely affectionate endearment in Latin: "my life".

11. "Meum mel" (L.) - Another endearment in Latin: "my honey".

12. New Man - N ovus homo / homo novus ; socially, ancestrally, and politically speaking, a parvenu. These were generally looked down upon, as antecedents were very important in highly-stratified Rome.

13. Pomerium (L.) - The sacrosanct boundary encircling the city of Rome, which could not be crossed by soldiers or generals for the duration of their service in a military mission or capacity.

14. Princeps (L.) - Also Princeps Senatus ; the Leader of the House in the Roman Senate.

15. Quaestor (L.) - A fiscal officer. Distributed at various levels of the Roman state.

16. "Tace!" (L.) - "Shut up!" or "Be quiet!"

17. Tarpeian Rock - The traditional location for executing Roman traitors. They were either thrown from or made to jump from this overhang, which may have been above some serrated crags. One says "may have" because the precise appearance and situation of the Tarpeian Rock is yet contested amongst historians... although there is universal agreement that no records exist showing survivors of the drop.

18. Triumphator - One who holds a triumph or victory procession after battle

19. "Vehementer errabas, novus homo; vehementer errabas." (L.) - "You were making a huge mistake, parvenu; you were making a huge mistake." The vocative interrupter of the diacope (novus homo) was highly scornful and belittling to a Roman politician, especially if he truly was a novus homo. Think of it in the sense of being called a "Johnny-come-lately", only with magnified insult. For more on the novus homo, see the note above for New Man .

20. Via sacra (L.)- "via"being "street", this is thus Sacra (or Sacred) Street. On a map of the Roman Republic, this appears as a road from the Forum to the Capitol.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde Ira et Lacrimae

par ethnewinter

---

Shizuma Hanazono did not much care for the profession to which her class belonged. There was little lure for her in the weights attendant, the exchange for the privileges enjoyed by those in a political capacity. Nor did the privileges themselves beckon: the possibility of increasing her wealth did not attract, for she was neither avaricious nor remotely impoverished. The enticements of glory and fame mattered not because she already had them, though in an admittedly infamous condition. As for power, it was to be had in victories, and Shizuma had many of these already, in her own infamous way. In fact, she loved having many of these. It was perhaps one of the few pleasures she shared with her cousin: Shizuma also loved to win her wars, whether they involved the crushing of an enemy, or the taking of a woman's virtue.

It was not uncommon, when she considered it, that the two went hand in hand.

Not of late, however; and that was unfortunate. Shizuma had not had the pleasure of that blend yet in this new war, one that she was perhaps even more determined to win than others past. Not to gratify her own taste for success! It actually soured her tongue faintly that she should have been manoeuvred into returning to the stiff ivory chairs of the Curia for this fight, but-preferences be damned-this was one war that just had to be won. Most of her other wars had been less urgent than this because they had demanded nothing of herself, whereas this one required such a gift. This war was special because it was personal.

Unfortunately, Shizuma also worried that too much of this new war was personal. Her concern here had to do with the woman who had requested her involvement: Shizuru Fujino, dearest cousin and friend. Who was, Shizuma very much feared, turning out to be a woman after her own heart. Given the tattered state of that organ somehow limping along in her chest, Shizuma knew there was very little good to be found in such similitude. Few knew as well as she did the perils of the heart, and how easily they could lay low even the mightiest. All she had to do was remember her own experience, for it was what had taught Shizuma that to invest all your life in one thing was a risk that rarely saw returns, and would likely take a part of you with it when it collapsed and vanished forever. Obsessive dependence was as embarrassing as it was enfeebling, and a grave error to be corrected early.

Yet such errors seem an affliction carried by the line, Shizuma often reflected coldly, having as she did her own share of detachment. Can something be corrected when it is carried in the blood? After all, she knew there was in their familial history a tendency for mania or despair. Other clans were renowned for traits as eccentricity, cupidity, intractability, and the like; the Hanazono line, which Shizuma's cousin shared through the maternal side, was known for its tempestuousness. A family that produced beauties, it had also produced through its record a startling number of obsessives with varying objects of compulsion. Some had been artists, others had been practical lunatics, yet more military men, and a few-the worst indeed-had been lovers. Whatever it was driving each, it seemed to drive them very close to an edge, one Shizuma had seen for herself and feared. How could she possibly permit her cousin to go riding off that cliff? And yet, what could she do that could help stave off a fall other than give warning?

Much good that would do, she told herself, knowing that small precaution was not something that could assist. Shizuru Fujino could not be warned of her peril because people in love could never be warned, and Shizuma understood that her cousin was truly in love, in the most obsessive and manic of ways. With a foreigner too, of all people! That much, at least, defied all of Shizuma's understanding. It was such a parody; a woman who aimed for the title of First Citizen could not risk being firmly under another's spell, as Shizuma's cousin seemed very much to be. Right before she reached the top, the chasm would open at her feet. And that would be a shame, as much for her as for Shizuma. There were self-turned considerations as well in Shizuma's motivation, and they were tinged with private guilt.

This was because of the significant contribution her cousin's attitude had to Shizuma's own carte blanche with her infamous doings: Shizuru had always been the opposite, having sufficient will and capacity to meet both their families' ambitions. As such, she was the one who pulled all the poundage and pulled it well, suffered not the crick in the neck Shizuma had felt when placed under the same yoke. Shizuma's cousin was the one born to enhance their families' dignitas even further, the perfect horse to drag their chariot first and far ahead. It was only because of her that Shizuma felt no remorse in abandoning the same race, littering yoke and standards in her wake. Why worry or be hampered by guilt? The Red-eyed Conqueror could meet ennoble their families enough for both their sakes, which was what she had been poised to do before this trouble transpired.

What if this trouble proved too great a hurdle or too crippling a saddle upon her? What if the reason for Shizuru's determination in this latest project was not so much her ambition but her passion? To put in motion a plan as difficult as the one she had made with Chikane was fine... provided it was done in search of glory and the enhancement of dignitas, because it was understandable to brave the greatest difficulties for something like that. But to do it for something so irrational as love, so unreasonable as a woman-! It had to cause a shiver.

It was frightening because it would create the first true fault in someone who had previously been without weakness. If discovered, it could be the fatal chink in Shizuru Fujino's armour, which was already bearing too much weight to suffer such a defect. This was what caused Shizuma to shudder when she thought of her cousin, whose shoulders bore part of a burden that should have been hers instead. Not that Shizuru had ever complained or given her rebuke for the abjuration: and this was all the more reason to feel guilty.

When she asked me for help, there was really only one answer, she mused with resignation. They would yet see the outcome of the dent in the armour, but what little assistance the one wearing said armour had requested was not about to be denied. Her cousin had asked her to be a senior legate, and that was not so bad. Her cousin had also asked her to return to Senate and politics, and that was probably the worst part. But it was still not so bad that Shizuma could conveniently forget that she had never asked her cousin to take on her responsibilities, which Shizuru had done anyway.

So Shizuma could become a senior legate, which might even prove enjoyable, and a senator again, which might not be so enjoyable but was not impossible either. There were things one was always willing to suffer, she thought wryly, for those whom one loved... and for those to whom one owed that much.

A voice intruded upon her meditations, the owner's hand having been pinching her for a while but to less effect. She rolled onto her back and faced the person.

"I'm afraid you're beginning to bore of me," the woman next to her said. "What's so interesting it has you straying when I'm here?"

A lift of the whitish brows was all she gained, instead of the desired flattery.

"A curious term to use," Shizuma replied in heavy suggestion. "Straying."

The other woman did not seem at all put out and even smirked.

"Yes," she said. "I know. I've just permitted the most famous rake in the Republic to have me, and in my wife's bed as she is away."

She giggled, putting up a finger to stroke Shizuma's arm voluptuously.

"I've been very bad."

Shizuma read the triumph in her eyes and sat up, away from the finger.

"The House meets today," she said, rising to her feet. "I must attend."

Her companion turned to one side and watched her dress, unashamedly ogling Shizuma's naked body. Shizuma had been right in identifying the tone in her voice as triumphant, for the woman was already dying to call together her friends and disclose whom she had just bedded. They would be horrified, be completely scandalised... and be eaten up by envy!

"Pity you must," she breathed, staring at Shizuma's fantastic beauty. No wonder so many women yielded to her despite her reputation: she was just incredible, a white creature from crown to base, and lean of body despite her supposed lifestyle's excesses. And that hair! She would be a bald beauty were it not for the silver that seemed to gleam amidst the whiteness, endowing brows and mane with a grey-glint tint. Even the hair between her legs was like this! Easy to mistake her for a statue if she stilled and veiled her eyes, for it was those irises that gave the lie to the marmoreal effect. They were always flashing endlessly, as though they could find no peace. Against the grisaille of Shizuma Hanazono's colouring, those eyes were violent spots, sharp fragments of some broken and green-gold prism.

"You're so beautiful," she sighed again, revelling in the thought of their earlier activities. "Like some goddess."

Shizuma shot an amused glance her way: "Thank you, but there is no need to say that."

"Why not?"

"I suppose because it sounds ridiculous to me."

"Anyone else would be happy to hear it. How strange you are!"

"Oh, yes." The rest of the words were muffled as Shizuma found her tunic and pulled it over her head. "I am that."

The other woman flopped over in bed and propped herself up on crooked elbows. She looked singularly pleased with herself for a second, and then said, "Well, you won't see my wife at the meeting today, being that she's all the way off in one of those ghastly provinces to the east. Why we can't leave those horrid places to their ways, I never will understand. It's for the sake of settling a few savages that I my wife leaves me?"

"You miss her then."

"Miss her! Not so much-she's dull, you know." A high, nervous giggle. "Although I can't wait for her to come back!"

"To what end, if you don't miss her so much?"

"So I can tell her that while she was away doing some useless thing, I was having the time of my life."

Shizuma stopped what she was doing, her belt hanging from her hand, and turned to stare at the sole occupant of the bed.

"You would tell your wife of this?" she asked, surprised. "This we have done?"

"Why not?" the other retorted, twisting her body on the sheets. "Do you mind?"

"Not really. However, I harbour no grudge against her. It seems wiser to spare her feelings."

"Spare her! She spares me a lot, all right. She spares me all the great parties, and all the fun things..."

"Do you mean the restrictions you talked about earlier?" the standing woman asked. "I confess they are strict, but still sensible. Why would you want to go to such parties as those your friends give, anyway? Those are wild circles, really."

"You should talk: you've gone!"

"Yes, and even been disgusted a few occasions," Shizuma retorted. "I'm not married. Those gatherings are full of actors and whatnot, and not fitting for attendance by a properly married Himean lady-especially if she goes to them absent acceptable attendants and her wife for escort."

That sensible contention earned her a resentful look: "Well, I don't want those 'acceptable attendants' she left with me. As you know, I have to send away that steward spy of hers just so we can meet. Bastard! What am I, a child to be watched by a nanny?"

A hum from Shizuma.

"And how can I have her escort me when she's the one always going overseas?"

"She has her duties," Shizuma told the younger woman. "She is one of the quaestors for the eastern provinces, and is in one of the most important positions abroad. The conventions are what dictate that she cannot bring you. You should yet be pleased that she gains such title for herself, and thus stands well to enhance the glory of the house the two of you are establishing."

But the other scoffed, obviously dismissing such things as unimportant. Shizuma felt oddly as though she were listening to a mockery of herself being lectured by someone else, someone wearing her garb and stepping in her shoes. As ironies were very much to her taste, it tickled instead of bothered her immensely.

"I didn't get married for this!" her companion said, still grouching. "Where's the fun? She never even takes me to any of the good parties-just the strict and boring dinners full of straight-laced old corpses too stiff to realise they should be falling into the funeral pyre already. And she makes me act just as strict and boring as they are!"

Shizuma smiled and returned to her belt, wise enough to recognise that very little could be said to disabuse self-centred and immature young women of their peeves once they began to cherish them. But she could understand why the wife had placed so many restrictions on this one! This one was a parcel of juvenile trouble waiting to happen, wrapped up in a pretty skin.

"Is not the usual recourse to divorce when marriage so displeases you?" she asked, with just enough aloofness to prevent the other from interpreting that as a proposal.

"I can't."

"Why not."

"She won't let me."

" Why not? "

There was a rather unladylike snort: "She says she's in love with me."

Shizuma paused and took a breath, but chose to say nothing.

"Anyway!" The half-squealed word caught her off-guard, and she jumped. "There's something I've been dying to ask you all this time! Everyone's probably asked you about it already, but-oh, I need to do it."

"What?"

"You see... I've been hearing the most scandalous things about your cousin." A drop of the voice to a stealthy whisper, although only the two of them were in the room. "Is it really true, Shizuma? Is she really wild for some savage from the northlands?"

Shizuma's body stiffened and she turned to the inquisitive blue eyes.

"Where did you hear that?" she said harshly.

The other answered unperturbed, too eaten by curiosity to note the warnings in the older woman's stance.

"Oh, everyone's talking about it, and I'm not one to be late with news, you know!" she giggled, raising her voice again. "Word claims your cousin was so besotted she made as much of her as one would a wife! Is it true? How positively depraved of her!"

She rolled over yet again, apparently thrilled by what she viewed as a positive depravity.

"I even heard from Ayako yesterday that Nakanichi-san-do you know her? Oh, what am I saying? Of course you do! She's absolutely famous for her exploits, that whore -though she is quite ravishing. Terrible eater of men and women, howev-"

"What about Nakanichi-san?" Shizuma prompted crisply, her patience rapidly thinning.

"Well, I was about to get there!" came the retort, accompanied by an incensed flapping of eyelashes. "Ayako claims that she encountered Nakanichi-san somewhere on the Pincian Hill just recently, and that Nakanichi-san was absolutely spitting curses. Ayako claims the woman was puce with fury." She shivered with delight. "Oh, how I wish I could have seen it! She must have looked a fright: gods know she places too much rouge on her face already."

Shizuma folded her arms and glared at her companion sternly. "Do cease meandering like a drunk and get to it. If one of Hime's most famous tarts decides to throw a fit somewhere on the Pincian, how does it concern my cousin?"

Her paramour's eyes gleamed.

"Because she was coming from your cousin's villa there," she said exultantly. "Nakanichi-san's always had it for your cousin, you know, and presented herself that day at your cousin's place for what she calls a 'convivial visit'. We all know what that really means, don't we? Still, there she was, flouncing out in a trice almost as soon as she'd got in-which means, Ayako says, that there was none of the getting in she wanted, really! Isn't Ayako witty? Anyway, she says Nakanichi-san claims to have said something about your cousin's foreigner and your cousin got angry for no reason. Nakanichi-san says she only called her a 'savage', though how that could be reason enough for your cousin to have been inflamed, I don't see- anyway, she said something and your cousin said something back, then sent her running out of the house with a flea in one ear!"

She kicked her legs in laughter, roaring gleefully: "It's shocking, of course, and no one would trust Nakanichi-san with their husbands, but the woman isn't known for telling lies either. If that's so, Shizuma, your cousin must really have been bewitched by that foreigner."

She froze suddenly and turned Shizuma's way, her long-lashed eyes wide.

"Oh, say, that foreigner wouldn't happen to be one of those horrid priestesses they have abroad?" she asked, practically salivating at the notion. Why had no one thought of it before? It was brilliant! But the person looming above her merely narrowed eyes at her brilliant idea.

"What you have there is the greatest pile of nonsense I have yet to hear," the woman with silver-gilt hair sneered. "And you add yet more to it. Priestesses and being bewitched! You and your friends should start finding better things to do than gossip, if all you produce for your talk is that sort of idiocy."

"Oho!" A titillated gasp, a smothered giggle. "Why are you so angry?"

Shizuma returned silently to her dressing. She bent over to find her shoes as the woman in bed continued to talk.

"Come, Shizuma, tell me already! You wouldn't be mad if I'd not been right! Am I right? Maybe I'm right!"

"Left by the train of thought, more like," Shizuma muttered to herself. She was beginning to feel pestered, trapped yet again. It always happened during her affairs, although not often this early.

Oh, she thought, what am I doing here, with this silly young woman? Was this really to be her lot, never able to like the women she loved in bed once she was out of it? No, no, better not to think of that. Not while she was still here. Better to focus on dressing, so she could finally leave.

"Nakanichi-san never thought your cousin could get mad either, so there must be something to it. Now there's you too. Shizuma, it is true!"

"Rubbish!" the harassed woman snapped irritably. "You know nothing."

"You wouldn't be so angry if it weren't true. I think I am right!"

Shizuma had finished putting on her footwear. She turned to glower at the young lady in bed.

"What you think is nothing too," she said, her face flinty. "No doubt your wife understands this, which is why she's wise enough to inflict on you those rules you hate. You should count yourself lucky you have her love yet, for most wise women do not generally spare time for those of less intellectual ilk. Unless it's for charity."

She paused to smile into the woman's flabbergasted face, and bent to pat her on the cheek.

"You see, you do not think very well, My Dear, so I would advise you to save your efforts for something at which you are better." A disdainful twitch of the mouth. "I suppose that disqualifies bedding as well, doesn't it?"

Four pillows and countless shrilled imprecations thrown at her later, Shizuma was finally out of the house and shaking her head. That one had been very silly indeed, with little to show beyond a lovely face, and far too giggly once she got talking. A dalliance that had been enjoyable for the short romp, she decided, but was not meant to be renewed. Unfortunately, the short romp had not been as short as Shizuma fancied, for a swift enquiry revealed that the House session was not so far off, and she had yet to change to proper senatorial attire. Making up her mind quickly, she decided to forgo a stop by her abode to remedy that. Today's meeting was not in the Curia, but rather outside the pomerium, which meant she still had a way to go; the location presented a solution to her problem, anyway.

As her last conquest lived in the Carinae, she was able to take the Via Sacra directly past the flower markets, her path taking her through the Forum. She ran into more than a few fellow senators on the way, all of them headed for the same destination, and she talked to some of them. Not all of these were pleasant talks, nor born of courtesy. Smile though they might for the benefit of those watching, politicians were nonetheless capable of whispering loathing to each other in public, speaking in guttural tones to avoid edifying eavesdropping ears. Merely another part of politics Shizuma found troublesome, for she was not much given to bestowing smiles on people she truly detested while exchanging words with them: unlike her cousin, who did it with a venomously serpentine delicacy.

"Highly unorthodox," said one more senator to meet Shizuma's path, the two of them trudging the cobblestones stiffly together, for they were from opposite political camps. "To hold a meeting outside the pomerium. It's no mystery for whom the senior consul did it, of course. The shamelessness of it! Everyone knows why she pushed so strongly for the motion."

Shizuma hummed noncommittally, busying herself with leering at some pretty girls nearby. Better to look at them than this old toad's face, she thought, barely holding back her lip from curling at the presence by her side. Why spare the trouble of walking beside her merely to trade insults, anyway? Some people had far too much time on their hands, and no wise activities on which to spend it.

"Who'd have thought it? A Himemiya licking a Fujino's boots?" the man continued provocatively. "It's a disgrace! If she'd not pause at that much, your cousin would have us all doing the same."

Again a careless hum as Shizuma remained focused on the girls. One of them returned her smile and was promptly dragged away by her companions, the act complete with many a scared glance Shizuma's way and murmurs in the ear of the girl who had returned the gesture. The eschewed womaniser chuckled, knowing full well her reputation was preceding her yet again. This amusement, however, was cut short by one more rally from the man at her side. He had been trying to inflame her all this time, yet had succeeded only in being goaded by her conspicuous neglect. How dare she ignore him!

"Nothing to say then!" he spat, hating her more with each second she failed to retaliate. "Well, at least one of you has family loyalty, it appears. One wonders what she offered to draw you back. No doubt the promise of a lusty cun-"

Shizuma's head whipped his way like a lash.

"Who said it was her doing that drew me back?" she asked with a sneer, her face pale and haloed by her silvery hair. "I came for my own reasons and entertainment. In fact, I came for the games."

"And why," the other drawled, looking as superior as his inferior height could permit next to the unusually tall woman, "did you not come for the games last year, then?"

She looked down at him through the length of her nose and produced a very nasty grin.

"Because you were not married last year, Old Lad," she whispered. "That little inducement was not yet present, and no games to entertain me!"

Whereupon she stalked away, pausing only to savour the image of the man's burning face. More desirous now to arrive at her destination, she paused at the corner of the Forum where the streets of the Argentarius and the Argiletum adjoined it. A boy was there, hovering in front of some honey- and tart-sellers. He was one of those enterprising little men who carried with them a jug of water and some towels while frequenting like areas, ready for those who might seek to wash after sampling the sticky goods of the nearby shops.

Shizuma called out impatiently, mood still soured by her last encounter.

"Here, Lad!" she said, with a jerk of her head. "Fetch me a gig and you'll find some coin in your hands. Quickly now!"

Off he went, and to good purpose: he soon returned with a small gig for hire. Shizuma tossed a coin in his hands for the service and ascended the conveyance, giving the driver the address of her cousin's villa in the Pincian. With many an obeisance to his haughty-looking customer, the man snapped the reins and set away, marvelling at the strangeness of having silver-gilt hair while you were still so young. Or maybe it was true what they said, that the rich had their own worries to turn their hair grey quick? He continued to ponder the matter to the time he deposited his client at the destination, an imposing villa on the Pincian Hill. She paid him and was quickly shown in by the house servants, led to the villa's loggia after enquiring for her relative.

She found that her cousin was not alone: the senior consul was sitting with her.

"Where is your toga?" Shizuma's cousin asked after they had kissed each other. "I trust you have not forgotten there is a meeting?"

"Would that I had, Shizuru-if this one would let me off for such excuse," Shizuma retorted, moving on to kiss their other companion, who grinned. "As for the toga, I thought to borrow one."

"Have your servants been slow to do the washing?" her cousin teased.

Shizuma flopped tiredly into an empty couch.

"I don't come from home," she explained.

The other women regarded her with amusement.

"Very well," said the lady of the villa, snapping her fingers. The crisp sound produced her steward, who appeared with two ready slaves. Shizuru spoke to the man.

"Hermias, please find my cousin a suitable toga." And turning to Shizuma: "You would not prefer a fresh tunic too?"

"Yes, thank you."

"Would you give Hermias the instruction, perhaps, as to what you prefer? He may bring out whatever is suitable and you may choose from it."

"I leave it to him," Shizuma said, with a glance of acknowledgment for the servant waiting. "You may choose which ones you think suit me, Man. Only have a care that it is something dark," she specified, aware that her colouring looked best against dark hues. "I expect you'll not displease."

Hermias nodded, his faun-like face shining; he had not actually needed to be told to choose such shades for her. Shizuru's steward had impeccable taste in many things, which was why it was a relief to him that his mistress had the same, as he had been quick to note the first time they met. While she had not been truly "dressed-up" on that occasion, what simple clothing she wore had spoken very strongly of a sense of style. For one thing, she had forsaken that shapeless mass of fabric Himeans called a tunic- tunic, nothing! - and had worn instead the Attic one. How wonderful to find a Himean, he had thought then, who understood the attraction to a properly nipped and tucked tunic, one that outlined the form instead of hanging like a sack from it. And how much more wonderful, he thought now, to help dress Himeans so beautiful of form they made even a sack look like a decent bit of drapery. For the fashionable Greek was quite dazzled by his own good fortune in waiting upon such an assemblage as the current one, the sight of which would have also dazzled the rest of masculine Hime and sent the feminine half of it swooning: three of the most celebrated beauties of the city before him and one of them entrusting her attire to his taste. Ah, service could truly be a treat!

"Domina," he said with feeling, and invoked the name again for the other two ladies. His bow was most deferential to his mistress, as was proper. A snap of his fingers sent the slaves behind him forward, pouring wine into a fresh goblet for Shizuma. "I will be back presently."

"He'd better," said Shizuma when the Greek had exited. She accepted the cup held out by one of the slaves, her other hand tugging at the neck of her tunic. "This thing reeks of attar of roses. I do not want to smell it on me another moment."

A glance from her cousin. "The woman or the scent?"

"Both," she smiled equably, and waggled her feet at the slave who had served her wine; the woman began to unlace her sandals, the other running to fetch a towel and a water-basin.

"It escapes me," she declared, "why some women think it sensual to slather themselves and everything around them with the latest scent they've found in some shop. A dab is quite enough, and subtlety far more sensual than being overdone."

"It may be since they believe themselves to be in a passion," said Chikane, remembering her own relative's words on the subject. "And passion is generally overdone."

"I shall gladly concede that point, then," Shizuma smiled, batting her lashes in a purportedly outrageous fashion; her affections for Chikane were entirely platonic, but she was not above attempting to flap the unflappable woman for fun. "Especially as it has been spoken by the woman of my dreams."

"You have many women in your dreams," was the cool response, drawing laughter from Shizuma and her cousin.

The slave washing her feet finished and Shizuma swung both legs onto the other end of her couch and waved a dismissal to her cousin's servants. They vanished obediently through the archway.

"While on the subject of women," she began, once superfluous ears were absent. "I have a fancy to be introduced to the wife of Noboru. Have either of you her acquaintance?"

Two pairs of eyes regarded her curiously, neither ignorant of the implication.

"Which Noboru?" Shizuru asked. "Of the redheaded branch or the blonde?"

"Redheaded."

"I know her," said the senior consul, while Shizuma's cousin looked away. She had always had difficulty keeping an interest in who was married to whom, and also had an enhanced tendency to wander in attention of late; not even Shizuma's misdemeanours could hold her for long these days, so given was she to her private melancholies.

Said the woman still facing Shizuma, "One wonders why you would have designs to cultivate such company."

The hazel eyes flashed gold: "Pray jump not to conclusions, Chikane."

"I say nothing to indicate such an act, yet feel assured of landing on the mark were it so."

Shizuma suddenly looked dark as she recalled the reason for this new idea.

"Small matter to me if you do," she retorted. "I met Noboru earlier, on my way to this place."

"Ah." Chikane was quick. "A response, then?"

The other woman clapped jokingly.

"You do touch the mark," she quipped, before sending her raven-haired friend a challenging look. "Would you deflect my aim, Archer?"

Chikane shook her head, her beautiful eyes closing. Shizuma regarded the woman silently, envying the superb discipline that managed to imbue serenity to every inch-serenity Shizuma despaired of knowing.

"To what purpose?" Hime's senior consul said. "I shall make the introduction if you require it, of course. It is not my concern."

Shizuma lifted her brows: "My gratitude is yours then."

"I hope I still have it after the event."

"Oh no." Shizuma grimaced, sat up on her couch. She stared down her friend, who was obviously trying not to laugh even from behind shut eyes. "No. Please . Tell me she's not a hag."

The blue eyes were revealed, as was the hilarity in them.

"She is not a hag," Chikane said tonelessly.

"Juno save me." Shizuma heaved a sigh, made a disgusted sound. "Then tell me at least that she passes for human, damn you."

They laughed.

"Rather, let us simply say she may not be your type," Chikane disclosed gently. "Your sense of the aesthetic, I feel, is not exactly at par with that which she displays. In any case, is this 'response' so necessary, Shizuma?"

"I should say so!" Shizuma growled deep in her throat, her husky voice expressing the feeling to advantage. "Well, we'll see... though, preferably, we'll see not the hag. Our 'sense of the aesthetic' would be much oppressed."

"I did not say she was a hag."

"Little assurance, coming from you," the very fair woman replied sardonically, knowing Chikane Himemiya was nigh-incapable of saying the insult of even the most gruesome harpy. "Noboru is pretty long in the tooth. I recall he was married years before to another woman, and then remained a widow after her death before he married this new one. Has he a daughter from the previous spouse?"

"Yes."

Shizuma read the twinkle returned to her friend's eyes and smiled.

"The opposition this time?" she enquired.

"That it is unsporting to ransack a nursery."

Shizuma laughed again, and shook her head at Chikane.

"That young? Gods forbid I should ever be branded a cradle-snatcher," she winced, taking another sip of her wine. "This business grows more difficult, it seems. Why can all wives not be like Himeko-chan?"

"I am not certain I like that question."

"I am certain you do not, in fact."

Chikane only smiled, evincing no discomfort even at the implication of being cuckolded by a woman famous for embarrassing many among their circles. Truly the unflappable, thought the mildly amused philanderer, who had absolutely no seriousness in what she had just insinuated.

"Oh well, I suppose I shall have to think of something else then," she shrugged with a faint pout. "Or let it sit for now-there's always something delicious in that particular postponement." She sipped from her cup and grimaced, which facial expression could not be due to the wine: her cousin's vintages were always first-rate. "Who knows? The child of a hag could turn out to be a nymph. Other freaks of nature have been produced."

"Or we might offer you a more immediate alternative than that gambling wait," Chikane proposed, wondering exactly what the man had said to irk her friend so deeply. "Noboru is among our opponents, so it should not prove entirely counter to interests. Have you a thought on it, Shizuru?"

But no sound came from that quarter, prompting her and Shizuma to turn that way. They found the third member of the company still stretched out on her couch, contemplating a grey-winged bird perched on one of the plant-boxes.

It was Shizuma who called the woman a second time.

"Shizuru."

There was still no acknowledgment. Shizuma and Chikane exchanged a look.

"Shizuru Fujino!"

Finally the red eyes faced them.

"Yes?" said their owner, surprised by the full-named address. "What?"

"How do you feel?" demanded her cousin.

"I feel fine," Shizuru answered, perplexed. "Why do you ask?"

The other woman frowned, her white brows rising.

"Because we've just had to call you thrice on account of you being too busy mooning over that fowl to take heed," she said, pointing to the bird that had flapped down to the loggia's mosaic floor. "Fond of poultry now, are we?"

Shizuru smiled and assumed an expression of charming self-deprecation.

"Well," she said, genuinely bemused. "I did not notice I was 'moonning over' it."

Another frown from her cousin, who was seeing several worries take shape.

"Honestly," the woman sighed, with an upward roll of the eyes to the still-smiling Chikane. "She grows odder each day, and I despair of her mental state." And then, recalling her earlier thoughts on the subject, said with secret irony: "Pray the intellectual deterioration is not a familial tendency."

"Else she follow you down the path?"

"How very droll you are, Himemiya. I'm positively choked with laughter."

"Forgive me," Chikane giggled, receiving the full brunt of her friend's most sarcastic glare. "More wine, then, to clear the passages?"

"Or smother yours, at least." The white blonde held out her cup and permitted the other woman to refill it. Her eyes flicked to her cousin as the deed was accomplished, and she smirked. "See, she already travels on the path once more."

Shizuru faced her company laughingly, having merely turned to glance at the fowl one last time.

"I do not," she stated, shamming an offended tone. "Why am I being bombarded by your accusations today?"

"Apologies!" Shizuma retorted, looking vastly dubious. "But you seemed to wander again. Is it wrong to worry that my relative should be lost?"

"I was merely thinking," Shizuru countered. "Is that so unusual for me?"

"It depends," was the glib answer. "On what you were thinking."

Nothing but the usual, she replied in her mind, knowing it would little please her cousin did she say it. Nothing but the usual northward thought.

She had been thinking of only one thing each time they had called her, and that was something that happened in Argus, with a pigeon that looked like the one flapping about her loggia. She had been thinking of a black-haired girl bursting into her office and startling her with a chin that could be held no higher and the same height in the colour of her cheeks and, strangest of all, a dead bird high in her hand.

Shizuru remembered she had been able to say only one thing, under those circumstances.

"Ara."

That was what I said, she recalled. And yet it had served to make her happier, oddly enough. For the intruder-a very welcome one-had actually nodded at the utterance and laughed, striding until she stopped only a metre away from Shizuru's desk. And indicated the dead bird she was holding. The peculiarity of that scene! Shizuru remembered her bafflement so well that the event might have occurred only a day previous, or might be occurring at the very moment, as she thought of it.

"Shizuru," she could almost hear her lover breathing, harsh and animated. " Shizuru! Look!"

Up went the bird. Shizuru looked at it.

After some moments of no reaction save puzzlement from the elder woman, the Otomeian finally burst out impatiently: "You see?"

Aware that she was being deemed slow at that moment, Shizuru moved her attention with comical sluggishness from the fowl to the other's face.

"See... er... a pigeon?" she ventured, clearing her throat. "I see a pigeon, Natsuki?"

Natsuki nodded, yet another triumphant flush rippling over her visage.

"Yes," she said, and very grandly. "You see. A pigeon ."

I see no further than it, thought Shizuru, tempted to ask the young woman if she had gone out of her mind. As she supposed there was a good reason for this interesting display and interrogation, however, she decided to humour Natsuki for the moment and attempt to play along-as indeed she did with everything Natsuki decided to do.

She leaned forward in her chair, mimicking the girl's excitement.

"Ah yes, quite so, my dear! Well, now, this pigeon is... is..."

And had to stop there. She had suddenly realised that she had no idea what the young woman expected her to say, nor what said young woman found in the dead bird that was so engaging. What was it about this pigeon? Or was that it, perhaps? Could it possibly be about this particular pigeon?

"It is certainly..." she started, hoping her guess would be correct. "It is quite a splendid pigeon, Natsuki!"

She said the words with as much enthusiasm as she could muster for the carcass in her lover's hand, which was not very much, but still notable in terms of sheer clueless endeavour. For all the effort it cost, however, all she gained was a flurry of merriment.

"Shizuru!" Natsuki squeaked, voice gone feeble in mirth. "A splendid pigeon? How silly!"

Dumbfounded silence from the other end. Shizuru stared, hardly able to believe what was happening. Her Natsuki, laughing at her expense? And without her intention?

"How can-how-" The sentence was broken off for another hiccupping giggle. "How is it splendid, Shizuru?"

Shizuru merely sat there uncomfortably, feeling quite the fool as her lover went into another peal of laughter. Ye gods, she told herself, just as she remembered to compress her parted lips. Again she makes me feel an absolute idiot.

She shot a leaden glare for the fowl she had just praised, slightly irritated that she should be so diminished in dignity before Natsuki, of all people. As she did not want to blame her girl-she never wanted to blame her girl-the blame had to be rested instead on that accursed, un-splendid pigeon, whatever was so remarkable about it.

"No, Shizuru, no," the young woman was speaking to her, cooing Shizuru's name in the way she did when no other ears were present. She waved the dead bird once more and explained the mystery: "Shizuki. She caught the pigeon."

"Ah!" the Himean exclaimed, finally grasping it. "Now I see. Shizuki? Really?"

The girl pinked again with happiness: "She did!"

"She caught it just now?"

"Mm-hm."

Shizuru smiled, amused by the young woman preening as though she had been the one to make the catch herself. Oh the silly girl, not to explain it to her earlier! But so rarely did she show her happiness, and so special was the opportunity to share in it, that Shizuru decided to ignore the earlier discomfort and leapt instead at the chance to participate in the glee.

She clapped both her hands on the desk, grinning widely enough to split her face.

"How marvellous of Shizuki!" she said indulgently. "She must be quite the huntress."

"It was flying," Natsuki informed, the pride of the accomplishment turning her majestic. "It was flying, Shizuru. She caught it, very swiftly and without trouble."

She waved the fowl again and thus shifted from The Royal back to being Shizuru's Girl: "Such a good hunter!"

Shizuru's smile softened. She lifted a hand to beckon her nearer and make her sit on the desk. The girl acquiesced in three of her soundless bounds, bending afterwards to put lips to her general's brow. The contact was gentle and lingering, her lips silky-clean.

"And where is our good hunter now?" the older woman sighed, melting at the gesture.

"Eating. I gave her reward."

"My, my."

Another tender kiss, very soft and warm, followed by yet another.

Said the Otomeian, "Shizuki deserves it."

"That she does." Shizuru's eyes went to the bird in the girl's hand, quite forgiving its earlier fault because of what she now received. If one such casualty earned her this, she would be quite willing to purchase a hundred more pigeons to be massacred by Shizuki. "Such achievements must be... mm, rewarded."

"Mmh."

Another kiss came, her rapt face receiving it. What a pleasure this woman is when she is glad, thought Shizuru, relinquishing all thought of the work she had been doing. One of her hands was on the Otomeian's waist by the time something else occurred to her, something that begged pause from these caresses. She would have liked to ignore it, and yet, she felt it was something better answered as soon as possible. So she squeezed the other's knee.

"Natsuki?"

Only a hum: Natsuki was busy nuzzling into her hair.

"Where did you catch the pigeon?" Shizuru asked, mouth turning down when the nuzzling stopped.

"Not me," came the helpful correction. "Shizuki."

Shizuru blinked.

"Why yes, yes, of course it was Shizuki," she said with great solicitude. "But where, Natsuki?"

"Near the markets," was the answer.

She repeated it: "Near the markets."

"Yes."

"So the pigeon probably belongs to someone near the markets."

"Hm."

"Oh dear." She loosed a rueful giggle. "Natsuki, do you really think it wise to let Shizuki, ah, take her prey from someone else's coop?"

A minor crisis appeared on the pretty face at this conflict, a frown skittering across it.

"But it flew out," Natsuki contended. "On the road, Shizuru."

Shizuru said nothing, merely looking up at her with faint regret.

"She caught it," the young woman persisted.

"I know, Darling, I know. But, well, the propriety of it still nags. It may have been unwise, you see."

A heartbroken look; it seized Shizuru's chest immediately.

"Now, meum mel, " the Himean coaxed, actually wincing. She loved her so much that to have to dampen even the simplest of her joys was painful, and felt like cutting away several fingers. "Please understand, mea vita. "

"But Shizuru," the girl gasped, still torturing her with that face; Shizuru found it necessary to look away. "It was-it was-it was a very fine catch!"

"Indeed, but Darling..."

"It was!"

Shizuru wavered, then made the mistake of looking up.

"Of course," she said weakly, vanquished. "It must have been."

But the girl was sulky already, and pouted away.

"It was a fine catch," she reiterated.

Shizuru agreed: "It was a fine catch."

"And I paid for the bird after," came the sullen mutter, to Shizuru's astonishment.

"Well, why did you not say so earlier?" the Himean cried passionately, not even bothering to conceal relief. The younger woman merely frowned, however, and even clicked her tongue in disappointment.

"Shi-zu-ru!" she said, the call communicating grave reproach. " Not important."

She shook the limp fowl again, showing it to the older woman with the look of a frustrated schoolmaster, and then said angrily as would such schoolmaster to the class idiot: "Shizuki caught the pigeon!"

Shizuru strove to restrain her cackle to a snigger as she recalled that, remembering quite well how Natsuki's line had reduced her to a quivering mass of jelly. As it was threatening to do now, over a month after it had happened. Oh, her Natsuki! There was a young woman capable of destroying her in more ways than one.

"Are you going to say too that you did not notice you were chuckling at the road?"

She surfaced from her thoughts with surprise, hooked out of them by the low remark.

"What?" she asked, turning to one side and finding Chikane's beautiful face peering shrewdly at her from the side. "No! Was I really?"

The other woman's eyes twinkled.

"Passably delivered. I believe it," she said in evaluation of Shizuru's reply.

"As well you should! It is true that I did not notice."

"It is well I told you, then, before Shizuma did," Chikane said, still leaning slightly towards her; they were walking the path now to the venue of the Senate meeting, their other companion occupied by a conversation with a couple of other senators they had met on the way. "She might accuse you yet again of turning into a madwoman once she saw you regarding the cobbles with such overweening affection."

Shizuru laughed.

"And I without a leg upon which to stand, I suppose," she said, thinking on her friend's description of her latest act. She made a face, looked nonetheless tickled. "I must have looked a well-satisfied road surveyor just now. Shall we say 'well done' to the censors?"

"If you intend to be sarcastic, yes: the current pair of censors is shockingly dilatory, you know." Chikane tucked away a lock of black hair, the rest of her mane tamed by a ribbon. It was tied close to the scalp and tightly- as Natsuki does it too, thought Shizuru-because Chikane's hair was also very straight and fine. "I understand how the mind might wander, however. It is said that spring is the time of memories."

Shizuru smiled back. "Now why would they say that?"

"Because of the wind, I think," the senior consul answered solemnly. "Because of the smell, the aroma of new flowers in the air. Does not a scent like this invoke a woman better than any portrait?" She sighed sentimentally. "There are things borne on such winds that stir the heart more than the mind."

"My god, Chikane."

"What is it?"

Shizuru still looked stunned, although there was a faint smile tugging at her mouth. She explained: "I understand what you said better than I might have before, yet... whenever you said things like this after you found your wife, I used to laugh at you in secret."

"Oh, that," Chikane nodded calmly. "Yes, I know."

Her friend looked her way: "Are you laughing at me now?"

"Only in secret."

Shizuru grimaced.

"Does love make all of us such fools of the comedy?" she asked rhetorically. Chikane's answer was suitably rhetoric as well: a proverb.

"To love and be wise," quoted the older woman. "Is scarce granted even to a god."

"Full of popular sayings these days."

"And laughter too, but in secret."

An elbow dug Hime's senior consul in the ribs, the blow softened by the folds of her toga.

"Yet more indication of the onset of lunacy," Chikane chuckled, rubbing her side where the friendly nudge had hit. "Gratuitous violence. Let us pray you do not turn out in large company with this trait later, Shizuru, for general safety."

"One doubts the prayers needed," was her companion's mischievous answer, right before she went to greet a crowd of admirers. "Whatever the violence later, I have a strong feeling it shall be well-incurred!"

She spoke in jest at the time, and little knew how applicable her statement would become to her, especially. In going to the meeting Chikane had arranged for her sake-and thus to be held outside the pomerium-Shizuru's only expectation was to be quizzed and opposed as she presented her case, which was by then the talk of every political mouth in Hime. Everyone had heard of the incredible motion put forward by the woman known to be her ally, which was that Shizuru Fujino should be granted praetor-elect status while shifting the title and responsibilities of urban praetor-elect-the position into which she had been truly voted-to another. Everyone had heard, too, of her break with her allegedly infatuated cousin, who had been the one to put up what she claimed was an unauthorised candidature in order to have her returning to Hime. That the aforementioned cousin should have recently tucked tail and scampered off to one or other of the Greek cities only added to the situation's shocking lustre. This matter had all the elements of a good play, from comedy to drama, from conspiracy to betrayal. A perfect amalgam and, to Himeans, irresistible! Thus, no matter what everyone had already heard, everyone wanted to hear more.

The queries abounded, the most common being: why would anyone want to exchange the lofty seat of urban praetor for another that was lower? And why had the betraying cousin sailed off without even offering defence against the accusations, as would have been-at least in public eyes-so much better? For to leave the arena so furtively was as good as an admission of guilt, and that strengthened Shizuru Fujino's case, to the consternation of her foes. It was also the equivalent of attending a much-anticipated boxing match and being cheated of enjoyment by one participant's unexpected surrender, to the consternation of the Forum-watchers. All of which meant that Tomoe Marguerite was not thanked by either people or politicians at the moment, one of whom she had robbed of a good show, and the other of a good argument. Both parties wondered, and both parties screeched loudly: What a rotten thing to do!

The answer to Tomoe's action was actually quite simple, albeit private. Tomoe Marguerite left because she had no other option and because the love she also hated-past family, present foe-had dictated her choices. It was there in the curt, concise letter Shizuru Fujino had sent to her.

Quit Hime, the terse dispatch read. Absent yourself else you see me institute legal proceedings against you for your presumptions. Do not think me reluctant, for merciful hesitation is not given to the abominable. You have made of me, one who thought to call you family, a victim of your selfishness. You sent me letters explaining your reasons, which I have received and read. Let this be my reply then. I ask not for your assistance in anything, for what you have thought to call assistance has been more of an impediment. I ask not for your sentiments, which you label in letters as love, yet present as something baser in fact. I ask not even for your apologies, so do not tender them. You lost the privilege of having me take heed when you lied in my name and betrayed my trust, and all for yourself, devoid consideration of my plight. I ask you now for only one thing, and that is to leave. This warning you have because you were once a member of the family. I consider you not so any longer.

Disowned by her beloved and spurned by her clan, disgraced before both friends and peers, Tomoe Marguerite saw the choice clear. She quit the land of her birth and boarded a ship headed for Greece. If her cousin-or, rather, former cousin -thought Tomoe did so with a broken heart, she was quite mistaken: for the break between them had fissured not Tomoe's heart but something else, something that released a creature that had actually laughed hysterically at Shizuru's dismissive message before subsiding into an awful muttering that had sent shivers through the household servants. It was this creature that got on the ship and sailed off without a single backward glance at Fuuka, giggling, smiling, eyes rolling in a particularly malevolent fashion.

Had Shizuru Fujino known what it was her letter had birthed and how it would develop, she would have slain it at that very second. But at the time she received the news of Tomoe Marguerite's departure, she merely nodded and ticked it off her list of things to be cleaned up. Hence, in that moment, she did not spare the woman another thought, as opposed to those who still talked of the woman and what the woman had done. The question of Tomoe was no longer salient to Shizuru's scene.

The more salient question for everybody, especially that day Shizuru walked with her cousin and friend to the Ogasawara basilica, was actually the other: why did Shizuru Fujino desire to forsake her prestigious position and take on a downgraded version of it? Among the less politically-interested, all that was thought was the eccentricity of the old patrician nobles. Yet many others understood it could not sufficiently explain this issue. Of course Shizuru Fujino was from among the oldest of the patrician families, and the noblest; of course she had to be among the most eccentric of them; nonetheless, she was also a very cunning woman known to have more than her fair share of political deviousness, which meant whatever she did generally had a not-so-eccentric reason.

So the guesses had flown about from the beginning. Some of them were informed, some merely intelligent, and some outright shots in the dark. Those who were closer to the subject and had better sources naturally touched more closely. As time passed too and more information came to circulate, there were more of these accurate guessers.

The first person to express his explanation of Shizuru Fujino's case publicly had been her fellow senator, Sergay Wang, during the explosive House meeting sparked by Urumi Nemura Himemiya-Kanzaki. His allegation then had been that the proposition was due to Shizuru's desire to resume the command in the Northern territories, and thus extend her term of generalship over that mission's army. All for furthering ambitions, of course, which sounded very logical to those listening. The letters on her behalf, which yet continued to pour in from those territories, also supported the thesis. As such, this reason was generally accepted by the upper and more intelligent echelons as the much-talked about motive.

Even so, this acceptance was something faintly abstruse. While many grasped the ambitious possibilities of having an army, they did not grasp the concrete objectives of it. Their understanding of Shizuru Fujino's aims was something hypothetical in the main, or as a practical measure viewed through the blurring lens of a general theory. That this was so became clear when the first whispers of heavy knight participation in Shizuru's cause appeared, and with them a concrete objective: Shizuru Fujino was contemplating invasion-a gasp for this-of the Mentulaeen Empire bordering the north provinces.

The first reaction to the word on the street was disbelief, followed by a ghastly recognition that the word was likely. As it imbued substance to the understanding of Shizuru's peers, the effect was opposite from that among the knights, who quite naturally approved of it and did so for at least one of the same reasons the senators objected. The Mentulaean Empire was rich! If Shizuru Fujino were to tame it, there would be significant gains to the purses of those involved, which meant it would be easy for her to get knightly support and funding. Unfortunately, it also meant she would profit from it, not merely in gold but in glory-for not even her foes doubted that Shizuru Fujino at the head of an army could tame anything (not that they would say that aloud).

It was fair to predict that her Forum popularity and her share of dignitas, already great things, would rise astronomically if her plan went unhindered. No human being enjoys seeing another profit so much, however: and so it was a foregone conclusion that those who were not her enemies already became so upon learning of her intent. As the senior consul put it to Shizuru in one of their private asides before the start of that meeting, "Suddenly everyone's favourite colour is green; I notice all wear a shade of it."

Hence that day's Senate session was ripe for outbreak, a seething pot of elements ready to leap into flame. Heavily attended by both senators and populace, the meeting was facilitated by the venue's proprietors, who had spent the past week creating barricades and fences around the area. These were augmented by the many lictors the senior consul had stationed in strategic places. It was to avoid certain enterprising pedestrians from straying from the main path and the basilica-in search of something to pilfer from the private villa and grounds that adjoined said meeting-place. It was to be a public meeting, and this meant those curious enough to listen could do so from outside the edifice.

Chikane was in the chair, May being a month where it was the senior consul's turn to preside and hold the fascēs. She disposed of the preliminary rituals swiftly. Once the omens had been consulted, the prayers and sacrifice finished, the House settled down to discuss the more banal matters, eager to get to today's main event. Everyone knew what was coming, or so was the belief. Yet what everyone was about to see was a little more than that for which everyone had bargained.

"Reverend Founders of Hime, August Members of this House," said the senior consul, once the lesser matters had been concluded. Her voice was gentle, although all could hear it: the Ogasawara basilica had excellent acoustics. "We have settled all issues concerning us save one, and I invite you now to direct your attentions to it. This is the issue that occupies us most strongly today, that of Shizuru Fujino's position and how to deal with it."

There was a buzz, the sound of a distant swarm approaching. The senior consul continued, and the swarm paused to listen.

"That we hold a meeting outside the pomerium and in this basilica is due to that issue," she said. "Thus far we have heard endless debates on the subject, yet have reached no agreement. There are those who feel this is because we have yet to hear the voice of the most important person in this case, who has been prevented from touching our ears by several unfortunate circumstances-"

"Of their own doing!" Sergay Wang whispered savagely to his seatmate, who was as usual his Traditionalist fellow, Armitage. "Himemiya has gall to even call it unfortunate, when it's been more unfortunate for us than them."

Haruka Armitage only grunted, busy saving her breath for her rival. How long it had been since last they laid eyes on each other! She looked fixedly at the woman, who was sitting right of the tiers and was flanked by a very rare attendee-although her family did own the venue, so it was to be expected-Sachiko Ogasawara, and on the other side by Mai Tokiha, who herself sat behind the Princes. A cluster of august and stellar personages, yet Haruka Armitage's purple eyes saw only that hated being, whom many ventured was looking rather paler of late and somewhat thin.

"That this meeting is held in here is to remedy that deficiency," the senior consul was saying. "We cannot be blamed for having postponed any true decisions on the matter, I believe, precisely because we have yet to glean all information pertinent to it. The House cannot be expected to carry a division in a vacuum."

Chikane ran her blue eyes over the senators, noting the tension on all faces. Or rather, almost all faces-for she could see her silver-haired friend sitting amidst the pedarii, the senatorial backbenchers, and already making eyes at someone. The awful flirt!

She held back a grin at what she had just seen. When she spoke again, her voice was still impressively formal.

"We would be informed, Fellow Senators, and informed by the best person to do it. I wish all to profit from this event, else it be wasted, so I would request that any objections or questions be held until this person has concluded her speech. We are not fell beasts to hamper our own understanding so unthinkingly, nor fell persons to hamper the understanding of others so meanly. Let us conduct ourselves with propriety and grace, for this is a meeting being recorded verbatim. I have instructed the scribes to take everything down to the last utterance, and have also brought three more scribes than normal to ensure the integrity of the records."

She swept a hand towards the scribes in their corner.

"Furthermore, please remember that the People observe from outside the doors, which are open because I believe that this should be a public meeting, being a subject that touches on the status of an elected official," she reminded them, with a flourishing bow to the doors that was applauded by those members of the populace standing there. "Let us show them an example of the demeanour to be expected and emulated from their betters, of the elegance that distinguishes the venerable class that governs them. Let us not disappoint such elevated expectations, Fellow Senators, and rather enrich their experience of it. Now that this has all been cleared, let us move on. I invite the senator Shizuru Fujino to speak and further improve our reason as to the motion she seeks... if she is ready."

Oh Chikane, thought Shizuru, smiling at her friend's last-second quip. You know I am ready. I have been ready for this the day I arrived, bearing my army behind me. I have been ready for so long it feels I have been waiting for a decade. "If she is ready" indeed!

She made to rise, a chaplet of grass runners conspicuous upon her golden hair. The corona graminea, the greatest of all awards in the military. She had chosen to wear it because to do so augmented her distinction-Shizuru was a creature who loved distinction-it being a thing no one else in the present Senate had ever won, and for some, never even seen. Furthermore, it gave her the status and priority privileges of a consular, which was only one of its special entitlements. Most eyes were upon that plain little circlet of green on her head as she stood. A rustling sigh went through the people at the doors who could see, the heads of those farther away craning as they tried to catch a glimpse.

This was when the event happened that led to the conflagration, a catalyst so similar to one previous that it seemed more joke at the time, or ghastly parody.

"I veto Shizuru Fujino's right to a speech!" blared one of the tribunes of the plebs, suddenly leaping to his feet. "I veto her right to address this hallowed gathering! I veto the senior consul's yielding to her the floor!"

Angry mutters exploded. The vetoed woman was silent but stayed up, one of her eyebrows slowly climbing at this twist. The bemused expression on her face was similar to that on most of the faces in the meeting, with the exception of the smug faces of some Traditionalist senators, and the amused expressions on a few others.

"Oh, sit down and shut up!" said the voice of the Plebeian Tribune's president, Urumi Himemiya-Kanzaki Nemura. She was one of those who looked amused, in stark contrast to the rage in most of her fellow tribunes' faces: most of them looked ready to throttle the man standing to the conservative end of the tribunician bench. "This sort of surprise is only enjoyable once, you know, when it's still original. Column right out of my book!"

The man who had leapt up ignored her and bounced forward, his toga flapping about him.

"This is a Senate meeting! This is a sacred gathering that is supposed to be held to discuss matters for the benefit of the People and Hime!" he roared, sweeping his way to the middle of the floor. "Yet here we are, in atypical circumstances, just for the sake of one woman who would seek to be treated atypically! I, Katsu Hitagi, am ashamed!"

He turned to the doors, bowing frenziedly to the people clustered there.

"I am ashamed that you should see this, People of Hime! And as for you, My Fellow Senators, how can we call this a sacred gathering? It's been profaned by such selfishness! To let the woman who is the root of it speak is to profane it even further!"

There was now a wave of troubled speech going through the tiers, as well as a more discordant sound from the crowd outside the building. Katsu Hitagi listened to it with approval and glanced at his benefactors, the Traditionalists who had paid him for this. They were beaming at him, apparently in satisfaction, although he did notice that one looked disappointed when he turned to the tiers at the right. Katsu Hitagi did the same and saw what it was that took the edge off that one's pleasure: it had been planned that he would raise his voice only when Shizuru Fujino had risen, in order to leave her standing awkwardly once he interrupted. Instead of looking ill at ease, however, the woman had shifted her weight to one leg and now stood smirking at him, her chaplet of grass still perfectly in place, her poise every inch as dignified as her name. Her eyes too were smiling, seeming to view him with as much remote amusement as would a goddess an ant trying to move one of her feet.

What a terrible woman, he thought, aversion rising in time with the first warning prickles. He had never met her, and only knew her from remote observation before, in the Forum. Oh, she was already something to see then! But that did not compare to what he saw now. What sort of creature could stand there looking as though she were the victor when it was obvious she was the one losing? What assailed person could stand there so coolly, like a triumphator walking over the spoils of the already vanquished?

Truly a patrician through and through, he thought, and one who had never had to fight over qualms of ancestors or the lack of them. She was so self-assured, so proudly beautiful. So easy to hate!

He heaved a breath, ready for the next sally, but the voice of the senior consul got there before him.

"There are times, Fellow Members of the House," she declared calmly still, but at her most freezing, "when I am tempted to believe all my words fall on deaf ears! It seems I have given my earlier injunctions in vain. Katsu Hitagi-san, we understand very well why you do this-do we not all see your masters grinning?-yet I for one question the wisdom of your act as well as its respectability. This meeting was arranged chiefly for the purpose of giving Shizuru Fujino a hearing, and every senator of this House was aware of it. By agreeing to this arrangement as well as attending, they have also given their tacit permission to said hearing. You are the one maligning the meeting, and I would have you control your antics."

"You would have a tribune of the plebs obstructed from rightfully exercising his duty!" Katsu howled, at which point the senior consul's cousin threw up her hands behind him.

"Nearly a direct quote!" Urumi was laughing. "Go on, threaten her with arrest, say it!"

"Oh, be quiet, you defector, you charlatan!" Katsu spat angrily, truly annoyed by his college's president. "I should have you thrown from the Tarpeian Rock for your profanity of the Plebeian Tribune! See how they malign our sacred gatherings and groups, Fellow Senators, People of Hime! A patrician president of a plebeian college and two other patricians pulling the Senate at their will and whims! See how they would have our Republic spiralling beyond control!"

"I see nothing spiralling save your speech, Hitagi-san," said the senior consul, sounding if not looking angry. Her expression spoke less of anger than it did disgust, of which feeling her eyes spoke volumes. "Recall the rules of conduct, if you please!"

But Katsu was speaking in full-throated yells, and the clamour was ever-rising all around them. He pointed to Chikane, then to Shizuru, always shouting.

"There speaks our senior consul, whose forelock is tugged by her friend! And standing there is the friend herself, Fellow Senators! Smiling as though she cared not a whit for what is happening-and why not? She cares not a whit for us, for our institutions, for Hime! All she cares about is herself!"

He trumpeted his next words, as fierce and indignant as one injured on the deepest level.

"I have proof of it, for I present my veto to you with compelling evidence that she does not deserve to be heard. Hear my reason and the evidence first, Fellow Senators! Hear one who esteems our ways, instead of one who would trample upon them!"

Off went Urumi into another bout of laughter, while Chikane shook her head wearily and exchanged a look with her best friend. As Kanzaki Princeps Senatus got to his feet, trying to call for order, Shizuru asked Chikane the question silently. Heaving a heroic sigh, the senior consul made an imperceptible flicker of her eyes in reply.

Shizuru opened her mouth and spoke.

"The accused professes curiosity!" she called, using the vocal trick taught to her by an actor-friend: it permitted her to project her voice enough to be heard without having to shrill it to a higher pitch. "What is this new complaint, Katsu Hitagi-san? Shall you produce, or cover with more exclamations of stunning ambiguity?"

So long! thought Haruka Armitage, unable to tear her shining eyes from the woman she loathed. It had been so long since any of them had heard that voice, the curiously lilting, enormously aristocratic speech that distinguished Shizuru Fujino from so many. It was almost a shock to hear it again and feel the odd menace it could inspire when it wanted: a bristling unease at the confidently laughing undertone it sometimes held underneath. It seemed most others were thinking the same, for there was a pause immediately after her challenge, as though they were still marvelling at the thought that its speaker really was returned to them.

Even Katsu Hitagi quieted, though only for a second.

"You speak of ambiguity," he eventually said, rearing up again. "You, of all people! Oh the disgrace! Oh the irony!"

"Oh the drama!" groaned Shizuru's cousin from the back, setting off a low snigger amongst the pedarii.

"That Shizuru Fujino should complain of ambiguity is a joke!" Katsu yelled, not having heard this interruption; his speech was getting in stride, and he had little time for asides. "For let me tell you, Fellow Senators, that this woman has been working on her own ambiguities just recently. Truly have I saved you by preventing you from being forced to sully your ears by listening to her lies!"

"Should we vote the arrogant little peacock the title of Saviour of the Republic?" quipped a senator towards the middle tiers, herself opposed to Shizuru Fujino's proposition yet extremely annoyed by the man currently blocking it.

"Hush yourself and listen, you wrinkly old relic!" hissed a senator near her.

Katsu was still talking, and the object of his recriminations still smirked as she listened to him.

"This woman demands far too much for herself!" he cried, tapping into the resentment many held against the enemy. "She demands to be treated specially, above all of us! See the things she tries to wrangle out of our hands! First, this unusual Senate meeting! Then that arrogant measure she has put to us by her agent, that other destroyer of our customs, that plebeian Nemura who is really a patrician Himemiya-Kanzaki! What will she ask next, we have to wonder? What else will her outrageous and unjustified sense of entitlement try to take?"

It was going down well, yes, if those increasing nods were any indication. Good, good! Just a little more, Katsu thought jubilantly, and they would be willing to swallow everything he had to offer them.

"Now, the answers to those questions we already know, don't we?" he said offhandedly. "We know what Shizuru Fujino wants! We know she just wants to get her hands on one of Hime's armies again, to use and order at her whim. We know she just wants to use it for her ambitions, as said by many others before me. What we don't know is if she'll be using it for more unnecessary war-making with a now-peaceable nation, one that even sent us an embassy recently to sue for peace, or maybe-who knows, just maybe!-she could be intending to use that army for something like coercing back into her bed that barbarian she's been diddling-"

Even as a few chuckles rang out at this, Shizuru's smirk disappeared, as did the smiles from some other lips. The speech had suddenly taken a very dangerous turn.

"That would be ridiculous, but it's not so far off a possibility with this woman, isn't it? I don't think anyone would be willing to scamper under the sheets with someone this wicked-this corruptly entitled!- unless it took the threat of an army, even if that person was just an ignorant barbarian without a jot of civilised thinking," Katsu Hitagi grinned, playing harder to those chuckles he had just elicited. He was ignorant of the peril he was entering and enjoying himself mightily, along with a few others whose hate of Shizuru outweighed their sense of civility. This tack was not even really unforeseen, as the titbit about Shizuru Fujino taking up so publicly with a foreigner had been, as her cousin feared, the first true crack Shizuru's opponents had ever found in the woman. So Katsu Hitagi the tame tribune of the conservatives would use that crack-let it be noted that he was the first to do it in public!-and would work in the knife until it reached skin.

"Yes, this famous patrician, this supposed scion who should be upholding all our Himean virtues, has been bumping headboards with a savage. We've all heard about it! And if that savage had any wits, she'd have run off at first meeting!" he continued. "But we all know Shizuru Fujino's ways, don't we? She wants to have everything! If she wouldn't respect us, Fellow Senators... if she'd wrangle all the things I mentioned earlier from us, oh Senators of Hime... how could a low savage possibly escape her taint?"

As Katsu spoke, the woman he was impugning listened to him, her fabled red eyes blinking gently. She was wondering why her hearing seemed to come and go. Katsu Hitagi's words, clear enough to the rest of the House, sounded strange in her ears: sometimes close and sometimes distant, sometimes trailing off with contempt. Yet she could see him gesticulating, his mouth opening wide, and knew he had never stopped talking.

"-let Shizuru Fujino paddle her fingers inside her anyway-"

Her head hurt. There was a searing pain, very white and bright, behind her eyes. The corona on her head felt heavy suddenly, and she itched to remove it. She could hear some people sniggering, along with Katsu Hitagi. What was it he was saying of Natsuki? And what was the matter with her heart, which was pounding?

Why, what is this, she wondered while staring blindly forward, hardly able to see from the light behind her eyes. The man posturing below her was saying such odd things. About Natsuki, her Natsuki. She had expected it to come up sooner or later, but not like this. He was saying such things! How could anyone say such things of her Natsuki, she thought dully. What did he-what did all of them, those idle rumour-mongers on the street, that fool of a woman who had visited her recently, this idiotic man in the pay of the Traditionalists-what did they know of her for them to say it?

How could they say anything cruel of someone like that, her mind asked sorrowfully. Did they know, for instance, how quick Natsuki was to stroke her head whenever it hurt, how gently the girl held it to her chest to take away the worries? Did they know that Natsuki hummed songs to her when they were abed late, as one would to nudge a drained child into sleep? What did they know of the girl who did that, the one who had once passed an entire evening sitting up on a couch because Shizuru had fallen asleep on her lap, and she had been loath to move for comfort else it mean the sacrifice of Shizuru's slumber? What did they know of these many kindnesses, really?

Natsuki, she groaned to herself, so pained by the insults she felt very nearly close to tears. Natsuki! My sweet girl, whom I have never heard speak unjustly of anyone, nor seen act meanly even to those who deserve it. They say this of one of the noblest people I know. My Natsuki!

And the man was still talking. What was he saying this time? She had to listen. It was hard, what with the pounding in her ears. Ah, there. He was still going on about it. About Natsuki, her beautiful and innocent girl, calling her a barbarian, calling her a savage...

"-but aside from being seduced by a foreign whore, there is more proof of her moral degeneracy!" Katsu exclaimed, ignorant of the monster's heads rising near him. "I've come upon information that further gives light to her character, and to the most important reason we should not have to entertain the whims of someone like her. Voracity, fellow senators! Greediness! Rapacious traits that do not belong on a true Himean of truly noble family!"

"We were talking about what we knew of her," he went on. "We've known for a while that Shizuru Fujino is hungry for blood-which depraved hunger is probably the reason she succeeds so often in war-but what we've not known is that she's also hungry for money! And to have that hunger when you're already known to be so wealthy, to be so mean with coin that you actually cheat the Treasury of booty is nothing less than a disgrace."

He was conscious of the scepticism that had risen in his audience at this allegation. Focusing on fighting it, he lost sight of what would have been a healthy deterrence for him: Shizuru Fujino's murderous face, her lips pulled back over her teeth in a strangely vicious grin. Shizuru's right-hand neighbour, Sachiko Ogasawara, and the senior consul were first to notice it: the former was already trying to quietly talk Shizuru into sitting again when Katsu dealt out the rest of his accusations.

"It's unbelievable, or so I thought too!" he told the House, whose favour was beginning to turn away from him, to the dismay of his masters. Yet this was something many of them had expected, Katsu included. Katsu understood only part of the reason it did so, which was that Shizuru Fujino had never been associated with corrupt practices, especially because she was so well-known to be wealthy that corrupt practices seemed unnecessary. That he failed to understand the rest of it was because Katsu Hitagi was of the breed known as the New Men. Devoid of the august lineage possessed by those such as Shizuru, Katsu Hitagi's kind possessed in its place a great deal of ambition married to antipathy of those blessed with what he lacked-and, coming naturally with the antipathy to such beings, the unwillingness to be sympathetic to them.

This lack of sympathy would prove his undoing.

"I thought it was unbelievable because we all know she's so rich! But there are people among us who don't know satisfaction with their lot, and if there's ever been one, it would be this woman! Don't we all see how ravenous her ambitions are? How her selfish hunger never seems to stop? Why should it stop at that, and not extend to a selfish hunger for hoarding? Why shouldn't it translate to a stinginess with her own money that would see her spending public moneys in the interests of her selfish betterment? After all, why spend your own money when you can spend that of the state? This sort of devious business sense is what we should expect of those rich not only from inheritance, but from being in trade !"

That was another ambiguous thing to say, thought the now-livid senior consul, even if she knew it did find its mark among many ears: precisely because it was ambiguous. As a senator had limited commercial activities available to him according to the laws, he was generally expected to be relatively poor compared to the mercantile knights of the upper classes. To participate in trade was not only unlawful but detestable amongst the senators, and-if the one doing it happened to be successful-was also envy-inducing.

In trade! It was a damning assertion, since nothing was specified and everything insinuated. No matter that most of the senators were themselves 'in trade', although most of these were in permissible trades for a senator, as provided by law; to say "he is in trade" was nonetheless an implication... and when the person being implicated was one as enviable, as rich, as famously good with numbers as Shizuru Fujino, many would be willing to convince themselves it insinuated the most deplorable things. As though all of them were not aware how irreproachable are her sources of money! Self-deception was always most powerful when there was a burning will to do it.

There was a curious thing happening in the House. While it was true that several of the hungrier wolves were leaning heavily towards Katsu Hitagi's speech, there also seemed to be a growing dissatisfaction amongst the tiers: specifically, amongst the members of the older and noble families. Even those known not to be Fujino partisans seemed to be growling, and the man on the floor could sense it, but not understand. He redoubled his efforts, still shouting.

"I give you proof of her corruption, Fellow Senators! Think of what I have said after this, and remember her ambition and arrogance, if you still do not believe me! Shizuru Fujino did the booty tally for her latest victories even before the officials of the Treasury arrived in Argus," he cried, well into his speech and revelling in the undivided attention given him. "And after doing those booty tallies, she chose to distribute the wealth immediately in a shady exercise! What an opportunity that was! I shall exhibit to you later the figures for that booty. Mark my words: you will see the booty from the Northern countries much smaller than it ought to be. This woman talked just now of ambiguity when she actually practised it after her campaign, doctoring the booty accounts without the fair eyes of the Treasury to see how she turned them into ambiguous estimates that fattened her gluttonous purse. This was what allowed her to give-ask her soldiers about this-a bonus to the legionaries at the expense of the State, using public moneys to bribe into her loyalty the public army! She gave away at our expense a bonus to be credited to her unfairly, a carrot she garnished from-

" TACE! "

The roar, uttered at the volume of a thunderclap, made everyone jump in his seat. And there, for the rest of that incredible meeting, would everyone stay.

" TACE, INTERVENTOR, ILLICITATOR, IDIOTA! " said the woman none had thought capable of yelling, and especially not at such a pitch. She was still standing where she had been all this time, her face white save for two red spots burning on her cheeks, and the crown of grass on her head still in place. The man she had just addressed froze on the floor of precious white marble, seeming suddenly to wish he could sink right through it. The shock going through him, as through everyone else in and out of the building! Shizuru Fujino in a rage, and actually showing it?

"You will shut up, you dismal, insignificant maggot," the woman said, her voice lowering swiftly as it found itself in silence. Everyone present was too robbed of breath to even gasp, including those sitting beside her. Not that the angry woman noticed any of them: Shizuru's temper was too far gone for her to care. Neither a glimpse of her cousin's stupefied expression nor a look at the slack-jawed face of the Princeps would have mattered-nothing beyond her wrath, the red-hot fury none of these people had ever seen.

"What pathetic recourse is this?" she was asking, her voice so hissing it was nearly a whisper. "To try to defame me with such outright lies, such pitiful fictions that not even your mother-whom I pity for having had to bear such as you!-would believe? Did you think this would actually be credited by anyone who can manage the most elementary thinking? Did you cherish any hope of it? Aaah! Vehementer errabas, novus homo; vehementer errabas. One wonders what made you think you could get away with it. What was it that persuaded you to try? Were you even thinking?"

Here she actually paused to contemplate him, looking even more disgusted than her best friend had earlier. Everyone else, however, both inside and outside the basilica, contemplated the surprise that was she. Only a handful of them were old enough to have been in Senate during the time of her grandfather, and could thus draw the atavism: for that other Fujino had put on the same grand facade of imperturbability only to display later a spewing fumarole of a temper too. So the Fujino fury had skipped a generation! Even for those who thought this, however-even for them this eruption was something else! Who could have known it, they wondered. Who would ever have thought that the silver tongue on this latest product of the family was actually a blade edged with steel?

Down on the floor, the object of her acrid glare twitched, his face suffering a minor contraction. Alone of all the people present he was not thinking anything, for his wits had left from the moment he heard that first thunderous "Tace" and seen the face of the woman saying it. All he could do was stare into those red holes leading into the abyss, too fascinated and afraid to escape. His sides felt wet: sweat was rolling down from his armpits. The man himself did not realise it.

The silence seemed to go on for so long. No one in or out of the basilica had the nerve to break it. That was until Katsu Hitagi opened his mouth reflexively for air, suddenly finding he had a burning dearth of it. But the woman staring at him took that as an indication that he intended to speak, and snapped out yet another scathing directive.

" Shut up, damn you, else I cauterise that festering sore of a mouth on your face! I told you not to speak!"

Katsu's breath whistled in despite his efforts to stifle it, unbelievably loud in the quiet around them. He gulped the air heavily, face ashen, and looked as though he would collapse.

"I said you should not speak, Little Man," Shizuru said more softly, her attitude as mutable and dangerously elastic as a snake's. "You have spoken quite enough, I think. Whereas I have yet to speak my piece. Ever since I returned here, in fact, I have not been allowed to speak my piece! You-and your masters, whom I am now addressing-have enjoyed your turns at my expense, speaking calumny after calumny upon my name, yet never once calling me to reply in public. And now that I am indeed called, you place before me this... this... sad creature for a hindrance, pre-empting me before I could say anything. Oh, it was well-played, Fellow Senators. Well-played. For, had I been given the chance to answer your accusations, you would have found yourselves entirely undone, would you not? After all, hardly any of you would have been expected to answer any of my arguments with more than the inane gabbling you so often employ in place of actual logic!"

She shook her head, lips pulled up into a small and humourless smile as she held the tiers with her gaze, which had now left the shaking grey man on the floor.

"It was a well-played game, I admit, but all games wear out eventually," she told them grimly. "And this particular game is done. I am the one who has been given the floor by the officiating consul, and the one who deserves to speak ahead of that maggot who has thus far been blabbering. That I speak now is no imposition on my part, for I take no privileges above what has been granted to me formally. Therefore, you shall- you shall, Members of this House!-kindly listen to what I have to say about these latest accusations, and without trying to claim again that I am demanding more than is my due. Do not imagine you can interrupt me, please, for I give you solemn warning: I shall string up the next person to try it, whether by the lictors or by my own hand! I have been given the floor, and that means I have the right to speak!"

She looked briefly towards the curule platform, and glanced at Chikane. Her old friend's fair countenance was very white and intense. The slightest nod of acknowledgment; and then Shizuru looked away.

"I shall preface my remarks by saying that I have long suffered the insults of our profession," she began fairly gently, for she was pleased by the continuing silence. She was the Orator now, her carriage perfect, her voice modulated to convey an aloof authority. "As indeed have nearly all of you. We, many of us, have had to suffer the particular thievery that exists in our class. For there are thieves among us, Members of this House, and they thief as much as their counterparts in the lower classes. Nay -they thief even more! For whereas the robbers of the lower classes do not wilfully attempt to rob a person of his dignitas-that most precious and elevated thing-the robbers in our midst do so. And for that, shame on you thieves here, who should know you are. In the event you thieves are not familiar with your own identity, however, then permit me to assist in introducing you to it."

Her voice was rising.

"You are not honourable protectors of our institutions and bodies. You are not saviours of the Senate. You are not guardians of the way things should be. Rather, what you are is this: you are cankers on the face of our dearest Republic-you are stool that has been stepped upon by its feet-you are fleas off the meanest cur to lick muck off the streets-you are the lowest of the low-vomit from Hime's belly-thieving whelps got off a malformed and brainless bitch!"

At any other time this glorious string of invectives would have had over half of the senators applauding wildly, but the amazement was still so strong in the basilica that only one person moved: the indefatigable president of the tribunes of the plebs grinned where she sat, her head jerking up and down passionately, her hands clapping. Shizuru looked at the woman and bowed gravely, one of her own hands rising afterwards to cuddle the folds of toga over her left shoulder.

Even with that relaxed gesture, she drew a flinch from the petrified Katsu Hitagi. She had turned to him again, and again he was fixed by the abyss.

"I know you so well, you thieves, because I have had some of you attempting to steal from me," she said scornfully, her voice softening so much it seemed like a caress. "I have had some of you attempting to steal my glory, whether in credit for some public work or for some military achievement. I have even had some of you attempting to steal my money, which act, base as it is, is yet something I can condone. After all, we all know I can weather one or two filching hands, can I not? Oh, I admit it, Fellow Senators. I am wealthy. You all know I am wealthy. I did not gain that wealth through those grandiose schemes you whisper about me-all my finances and sources of money are aboveboard and perfectly unimpeachable, Katsu Hitagi-but it does not change the fact that my coffers are indeed grand. I am so wealthy-take note of this, Katsu Hitagi-that the very prospect of more wealth does not in the least matter to me. I am so wealthy, my dearest, wormiest Katsu Hitagi, that I am confident I could quintuple whatever amount they paid you to do this, and without feeling the lightest mockery of a sting."

Katsu's skin had gone the colour of the marble beneath him.

"Being so favoured by Fortune, it is a given that I am used to the sort of thievery I described," the woman went on, face suddenly darkening as the anger worked again on it. "But what I have no intent of getting used to, Fellow Senators, is the particular thievery the thieves amongst us have done to me! You-you thieves-have transgressed the last boundary, for you have actually attempted to steal the one thing that I guard with perfect jealousy, as should every self-respecting Himean of every class. You have attempted to steal what should never be stolen, pilfer the thing that is most precious, rob me of nothing less than my dignitas! You tried-to steal-MY DIGNITAS!"

The last was very nearly a scream, and would have been a scream had it been said more shrilly. As it rang so deep and strong, however, it came again as a roar. A ripple of shivers broke out at it, for there was something in Shizuru's voice when she had yelled that indicated she was still holding back the most of her anger. And if this visible fury was only a foretaste, then the whole furore must be awesome indeed.

The House cowered, shaken as soundly as a mouse facing a big and indignant cat.

"You have attempted to lay your filthy hands on it," the big cat was snarling, hungry eyes no longer on Katsu but now touching on all of them. "You have tried to besmirch it on the pretext of my supposed avarice. Avarice, Fellow Senators? Avarice from me ? Have I ever given you cause to think me so greedy? Have I, even, any reason to be? You know my wealth, you know I could buy half of you given the necessity, and with change to spare-so cheap are some of the personages that stride through our hallowed halls! You know this, so why do you persist in saying such things of me when you know all reason militates against it? How desperate are you to oppose a reasonable measure I seek reasonably that you degenerate into this manner of unthinking stupidity?"

"I ask you further, why must you touch my dignitas, into the bargain? My dignitas is the only thing belonging to myself that I seek to enrich, the most sacred thing I own. Seek to steal my silver and gold if you must, but never seek to steal my dignitas. For the one who would do the second is worse! That man is a fool! He robs me of that which does not enrich him! He gains nothing but the emptiness of spite and yet makes me the poorer too! I wonder, Fellow Senators, I truly wonder. Did you ever think I would take this sort of impoverishment sitting down?"

"I warn you now to cease it," she said haughtily, lowering the heat to a sizzle. "Cease producing these trumped-up accusations of embezzlement and corruption, as well as whatever ridiculous figures you have that supposedly prove that I have cheated the Treasury. That bonus Katsu Hitagi mentioned earlier was from my own moneys, and had nothing to do with the public's! I absorb all added costs of all my campaigns myself, as any of you would know if you have ever worked with me. Look at the actual ledgers, hire accountants who can actually do arithmetic, and pray get your facts right! And as for my rumoured liaison with that young woman you are all so fond of discussing, cease to speak of it in these sacred halls! Liaisons are nothing new and nothing to do with the public. What bearing does it have on my career if I did have an affair during my campaign? All. Generals. Do. And before you even get the idea to deny it, I caution you to restrain yourselves since I see more than two dozen examples in the lot of you. Would you like me to name them, details included?"

The threat was met with a perceptible gulp from at least two dozen throats. Those eyes told people the Fujino was not given to bluffing.

"Wonderful-I trust everything is clear," she said mock-cheerfully, suddenly lapsing into a smile of awful sweetness. "Cease your shoddy attempts at besmirching me else you find yourselves on the receiving end of what you have never experienced yet, Fellow Senators. Cease or you shall see the full brunt of my fury. And that is something you do not want! Remember this, Members of this House! To defend my dignitas, I am willing to destroy every last one of you!"

She sat down. There was full silence afterwards, the only sound in the hall being the slight shuffle of her feet as she assumed the classic pose on the ivory chair, right foot forward, left foot back. Then, when she had ceased to move and no sound was heard save the oppressed breaths of several hundred senators recovering from the greatest shock of their careers, the silence was broken by another soft shuffle.

It was the senior consul sitting forward, her face icy rather than tranquil and blue eyes showing the faintest trace of the same astonishment everyone was feeling. Afterwards, it would be remembered that even she, the unflappable Chikane Himemiya, had needed to clear her throat before she could speak.

"I thank Shizuru Fujino for clarifying certain murky points of late," she intoned, mouth slowly inching upwards as her excellent mind accommodated itself in lightning-fast processes to today's unexpected events. Her smoothly drawling and coldly authoritative voice, coming so soon after the slithering heat of Shizuru's, served to cement the senators further in their seats. "I personally thank her as well... for reminding the House about the parameters of common decency, even in such an often-indecent arena as politics. Even here, fellow senators, be you reminded that there are still limits to calumny. Be you reminded too that there are limits to our topics of discussion, for we are not a common market or rumour-mill that we should engage in bringing up anything and everything happening on god's good earth."

She produced one of her slow blinks before fixing the lot with a severe gaze. The House was transfixed, forced to listen with the submission of nerves already stretched past their limits. Even the formidable Armitage was silent, her mouth compressed in a tight and white line. Chikane understood why this was so, of course, and chose to take advantage of it. Was she to be blamed if the mice were still too dumbstruck by the lion to object to the talons?

"I move, henceforth, to strike all the aforementioned accusations against Shizuru Fujino from the agenda," she told them. "As well do I move to dismiss all further accusations of the kind if they are presented without the benefit of formal evidence admissible in a proper court. Further, I forbid from now on the discussion of matters more proper to the gossip gangs of the streets than this sacred body... in particular, that of supposed foreign liaisons of Himean officers abroad or otherwise, the same having little to no bearing on public governance or our rightful concerns. The first two reflect on the soundness of our logic; the third, on the soundness of our collective dignity. Have I any objections?"

As she predicted, none objected.

"Then let the records show that not a single person spoke against the orders and all were in agreement as to the unsoundness of all accusations," she dictated loudly, knowing the scribes taking the records of the meeting would set down her words to the letter. It was twisting the truth a little on her part to say that 'all were in agreement' since they were actually just too shocked to say otherwise, but she knew no one was as yet brave enough to complain about it. History was written not only by the victorious but by the canny.

"Owing to the untimely interruption provided by the tribune of the plebs, Katsu Hitagi, we are running far late of schedule. The sun shall set soon, Fellow Senators, and you know the restrictions upon us. We must end this meeting."

Some senators looked up in surprise, not having noticed the darkened surroundings. It seemed they had been dazzled earlier by a light inside the basilica, one that had come very close to burning them.

"We shall have to adjourn for today, unfortunately, and reschedule this session. Is there anyone who has something to say before we do so?"

Chikane was a little surprised when her prediction this time was incorrect. She had thought no one would have the strength yet to stand up, but stand up someone did. And it was none other than her own cousin and tribune-of-the-plebs, Urumi.

The two of them eyed each other for a second, weighing, measuring. After which she tilted her head to give the younger woman the right to speak. She was curious to see what her cousin would do, having absolutely no idea for once.

Urumi thanked her and turned an absolutely straight face to the rows, as though she had not just been grinning wolfishly earlier.

"As President of the Plebeian Tribune and a member of this hallowed body," she said with rare seriousness, "I give you my apologies. I am embarrassed by today's shabby happenings. All of us on this bench are embarrassed by it. What you-Good and Honourable Senators-and you-Good and Honourable Citizens listening from the doors-have witnessed is so far against the good and the honourable that I can only weep at the thought of its origin. It hurts me and my colleagues that you should have witnessed this disgrace being perpetuated by one of our college."

"Further," she said, "it hurts the People that this should have been committed in such a place and such a meeting, for this session has been taken down verbatim by the scribes, who are thus honour-bound to enter in our records the disgraceful words we have heard. Consider that, Fellow Senators! The disgrace of which we speak shall soil future people's memories of us and the tribunes of the plebs forever! The perpetrator of this disgrace-the traitor, for all that he called me that earlier-the deviant who has spat upon the duties of his office-should have his own threats carried out on him and rightly be thrown off the Tarpeian Rock himself! Yet the age of such punishments is no longer here, and so we must look to other avenues of remedying dishonour... and it must be a remedy that speaks, as much to the Himeans of the future as those of today, of a true sensibility and esteem for justice amongst us in this building today."

She turned slowly where she stood, so as to go from facing the right to the left of the tiers. As this was something she had practiced before in front of the mirror, the turn was perfect, executed at just the right speed to permit her to keep her grace as well as her dignity.

"The remedy I propose now as a tribune of the plebs, and as their leader," she declared. "That I propose it to you here and now is for two things: first, to show the urgency with which I believe we must address it, else it be allowed to soil the Plebeian Tribune any further; and second, to show you the esteem I give this best and wisest of all bodies, the Himean Senate. I can and will take this motion to the Plebs later, Fellow Senators, and will ask the Plebs to vote on it themselves. But I would prefer to ask you first, as it concerns one of us . I pause to repeat that, as it is of such import: it concerns one of us . A concept of collegueship that the man we are sentencing seems not to have understood, but which we can impress upon him now by collectively deciding his fate. My proposition, as the President of the Tribunes of the Plebs, is that Katsu Hitagi be ejected from our college and thus stripped of his status as a tribune of that college. This, for his unseemly conduct and the crime of bald slander, which has dishonoured not only himself but his family, his office, and the other members of this sacred body. For such a disgrace, let his name be struck off the list of the Plebeian Tribune's College, that it not so mar the body politic forever with its ignominy."

Chikane was barely able to suppress a smile, while the stunned House came alive again. A few courageous souls attempted to protest on behalf of the to-be-sentenced man, who had somehow slunk back to his place on the tribunician bench and was gasping. Urumi bowed gravely to him and, just as gravely, returned to sit in the middle of the same bench.

"You cannot do that!" said one of Katsu's senator friends, rising indignantly from his seat. "There's no such law saying you can do that to a tribune of the plebs! There's nothing!"

"There isn't a law saying we can't, either!" snapped an old consular two rows ahead of him. This man was a member of the conservative faction, and thus actually against Shizuru and her allies, but he had been sorely disgusted by Katsu Hitagi's conduct. "Others have been legislated out of higher office for less than this! Be quiet, you pedarius, you backbencher without the right to speak! I have the right and I say strip the position from that arrogant bumpkin!"

"This is injustice!" howled one of the arch-conservatives. "There is no precedent for it!"

"There's no precedent!" echoed another of Katsu's mates.

Another senator's voice rang: "Be quiet and let your betters deal with it, Idiot! Your friend is a presumptuous, substanceless cunnus who's sullied the office he occupies. The young Himemiya-Kanzaki is in the right of it!"

Crushed by shock piling on shock, Katsu Hitagi looked about himself stupidly, unable to see even the faces of his friends arguing on his behalf. Nor could he feel the hand of the other conservative tribune next to him, who was touching his arm with worry. Even some of the other conservatives, he thought, even some of those on the other side. Even they were against him! And there were the fierce violet eyes of Armitage, which glared at him. What had he done to deserve all of this? Why was it?

When Katsu Hitagi framed his speech, he had forgotten something very important-or perhaps, given his origins, never even had the chance to realise this something. It was this that was now blazing out from the obscurity before him. Had he recalled or attended to it earlier, he might even have won the House over to his side, softened all these now-stony ears. It was this unwisely-ignored thing that had turned even Shizuru's foes against him: the high pride of the Famous Families.

When Katsu accused Shizuru Fujino of stealing, he had broken not only her proverbial camel's back but that of the other proud members of the old clans. It was bad enough for his accusation that Shizuru Fujino was so wealthy she did not conceivably need to steal; it was even worse that he was the one to speak it, a New Man of obscure origins, someone the haughtier senators viewed as a virtual country peasant. Who was this novus homo, that he thought he could produce that trumped-up allegation against a woman of the Fujino pedigree? Who was this dismal, insignificant maggot-to use the woman's words-to presume that he could bring such a foul charge against his betters?

Not one of them and not a true Himean, this presumptuous country bumpkin... as compared to Shizuru Fujino, who was one of them despite everything. Much though some of these very people did not like Shizuru, they were nevertheless conscious enough of her and their ancestral superiority to boil over with indignation at this homo novus Hitagi.

Beyond this too was a deeper indignation, less widespread among the ranks yet far stronger as an obstacle to Hitagi's case. It was an indignation felt only by the noblest, most august, and most patrician of the senators present. So strong was it that even some of those who did not feel it could understand it, which understanding was still enough to have them disbelieving Katsu Hitagi from the moment he accused Shizuru of stealing booty from the Treasury. Inconceivable, was their verdict, and not even because of the Fujino wealth. After all, other wealthy people stole constantly, did they not? No, what made Katsu Hitagi's claim so inconceivable was the terrible pride exclusive to the most ancient patrician families, of which Shizuru Fujino's was one of the most terrible and most ancient. So terrible was this pride that it made you sense in its holders a wherewithal, an ineffable quality that made you feel as though they-these descendants of the original ruling blue-bloods-were capable of nearly everything. And indeed, to take Shizuru Fujino alone as an example, it was not inconceivable, looking into her eyes, to imagine her killing, raping, destroying and daring nearly everything.

But not once could you possibly imagine that she would steal the way he said she did.

The terrible pride a Fujino carried would not permit her to stoop to such an act, nor anything of the same demeaning ilk. That pride permitted much, certainly, but also made impossible many things. Not a single one of those who understood this could credit for an instant the allegations that she-a Fujino and Hanazono both, a product of an extremely patrician family married to another extremely patrician family-could ever bend her stiffly aristocratic knees to go rummaging in the filth. A Fujino, to do something as mean as stealing from the public purse that way? Pure and unadulterated rubbish! Easier to imagine her breaking her own neck before she would do it, a neck as stiff and unaccustomed to bending as her knees.

The upshot of all this was that it was easier for the senators to direct their jolted energies upon the man who had committed the unpardonable offence of overstepping his place, and who had probably been put up to it by some of the more idiotic conservatives who had not understood that his pawn would be overstepping his place. Without the most Himean of securities, Katsu Hitagi had failed to understand how swiftly the higher ranks had closed against him once he uttered that unreasonable slander against one of them.

"We shall have a division on this, as there seems to be dissent," the senior consul said loudly, trying to stop the chaos with the Princeps. Both of them were on their feet again. "Mark the words of the President of the Tribune College, Senators, that she can and shall bring this motion to the Plebs if you choose to defer it. Better we decide on it ourselves now and have the Plebs simply ratify our decision afterwards. Otherwise, we would be leaving the decision exclusively to them."

A threat veiled in fur: the senators were none too keen on losing more power to the Plebeian Tribune, especially when it already decided so many things in government through its officials' lawmaking and vetoing abilities. If the Senate made the decision instead, it would be seen as having controlled the matter and its choice would likely be ratified by the Plebs.

"Let us waste no more time!" Chikane followed. "All those in agreement that Katsu Hitagi-san should be expelled from his position, pass to my right. All those in dissent, pass to my left."

Even the choice of positions was calculated. Most senators had a superstitious dislike of passing to the unlucky side, the left. Even without that deft little twist, however, it was obvious from the outset what Katsu Hitagi's fate would be. The final hack to the man's political neck came when Haruka Armitage, staunch conservative and pillar of the Traditionalists, got up and marched stonily to the right.

The motion was passed by a crushing majority, only eight people standing for dissent. The senior consul noted it for the scribes and nodded.

"It has been decided," she announced. "Katsu Hitagi is forthwith stripped of his office and ejected from the Tribune of the Plebs, upon a wide majority decision of the Senate and, be it noted, unanimous decision of his fellow tribunes-of-the-plebs. The reason for his expulsion is that he has disgraced not only himself, his family, his office, and this sacred body... but also, I add, the Plebs he was supposed to have been representing in their interests."

She turned suddenly to face the doors, her voice carrying clearly in the air.

"People of Hime, Honoured and Fellow Citizens, what you have seen today is not what I would have had you see!" she said, holding out one hand as if reaching for theirs. Her face was shining and, in the half-light, was very beautiful.

"You have had to put up with the mock posturing of a man who claimed to represent you, yet ended representing only the selfishness and jealousy of a few shameless individuals. That we do this now is for you, and not against you. Do not all of your other tribunes of the plebs vote to do it? Is not your friend, the woman you trusted to vote as the president of your college, the one who proposed it? We would have your welfare protected, People of Hime, our beloved fellow citizens! We would have your representatives an adornment, truly gracious heroes worthy of bearing your approval! We do not take away one of your true tribunes of the plebs, but rather strike away one who did not act in keeping with his office and was thus unworthy of being called a tribune of the plebs. That we do this now is not just for us but for you, for the good of the Whole People, for the good of our Republic! May it never again be disgraced! May you never again be disgraced!"

Dazzled by so much beauty and graceful speech, hearts still racing from having witnessed the wrath of one of their heroes, the people outside the doors yielded to the senior consul, throwing up a cheer so loud it fetched up to several villas away. Thus did Chikane Himemiya destroy any possibility of a riot being incited by their opponents that day, and close a meeting that ended without its true purpose having been resolved or even debated. Exhausted from the earthquake they had just experienced, dying to talk about it once safely in their homes, People and Senate went home as meekly and tractably as a herd of sheep.

The woman who had shaken all of them insisted on returning to her hired villa alone, refusing all offers of company. Her heart was still stinging for the insults: both to her and to the girl whose letter she carried. The scroll was in the sinus of her toga, and had arrived just recently. She must have unrolled and reread it at least thirty times since its arrival, even though she could revisit its contents easily without looking: yet it was something else, she thought, to feel in her hand the paper those beloved hands had touched, to trace the clean letters those beloved fingers had wrought upon the sheet. The work of her wonderful girl, whom that cretin had apostrophised so unthinkingly.

In her was the painful awareness that had been responsible for the loss of temper earlier, the thing that had made her feel so impotent she had vented so dreadfully: Natsuki being insulted, Natsuki's name being subjected to indignities. Not even less painful that it was by word, because word was exactly what Shizuru had always feared when it came to sheltering Natsuki. It was hard to stop words, nearly impossible to shield from them. And yet, how pathetic of her if she could not even shelter the one she loved from those petty but vital things! How pathetic if she could not stop such harm from reaching Natsuki!

Mea vita, she cried, forgive me for that! Never again would she let it happen, never again would anyone come close to it. Shizuru swore it on her own head and the names of her ancestors, knowing for certain now that there was nothing she valued as much as that young woman she had left behind, nothing save perhaps for her dignitas. Even that seemed now indivisible from Natsuki, part of it constituted by everything she felt and wanted to do for the girl. To protect her dignitas meant to also protect Natsuki's, which meant no one could touch either of them again.

She would annihilate the next one to make the attempt.

Who put him up to it, she wondered, going through the possibilities. Nothing certain for now, yet nothing more certain than that she would find out eventually. It had not been Haruka Armitage, she thought, because that old foe had appeared just as surprised and almost as angry in the meeting. Whichever of her allies had done it, Armitage had probably not known. It was to be expected since she was not the sort of woman to stoop to such a thing, nor the sort to use a New Man to do it. So which one was it?

I shall find you, she vowed. I shall find out which one of them you are and crush you as I would crush an insect with my heel. Katsu Hitagi insulted me and mine, and now he has been finished and shamed forever, but he was acting only by your direction-and when I find you, gods damn you, you shall wish your own direction had been to run away from me.

So did she brood as she walked back, the slave carrying her ivory chair cringing mutely as he followed. Never had he seen his mistress so furious, nor indeed so frightening. He liked her very much, as did every one of her servants, and also had a good slave's healthy fear of his mistress... but he had never thought to be breathless with that fear. What he had just seen had brought him close to wetting himself, only his other fear that such a loss of control would displease her stopping him from that indignity.

Even so, that secondary fear would not have been able to stop him from voiding both bladder and bowels had his mistress only been aware of something that would have significantly altered her furore that day: the amount of paper crumpled in the writing of that letter she prized so much and carried; the obsessive revision that had gone into the making and remaking of it; the finger-cramping discipline of lettering with hands not used to the task, and clumsy besides from the nerveless feeling induced by the first week of that ailment of which Shizuru yet knew nothing.

It was a letter that had seen its writer shiver with nervousness over its respectability, hands aching so much from the effort of writing everything to her exacting satisfaction that, by the fifth rewrite of it, the girl had been obliged to tighten the linen wrapped around them. It was as well for Shizuru's slave and the former tribune of the plebs, Katsu Hitagi, that Shizuru knew not of these pains, else she would have strangled the latter then and there for his offences to her Natsuki.

Upon returning to the villa, she sent away both the slave and her welcoming steward, going instead to slam the door to her study. It was there that she flung her toga against a wall and unrolled the scroll in her hand, her own fingers trembling.

Greetings, Shizuru.

I write as you asked, and at the proper time. It is one week now that you have been gone, and that is when I promised to do it. I send this at daybreak and hope it finds you swiftly.

I write apologies first. This is not so good a letter, I think. I do not write letters, and I do not know what or how to write in them. You know I am not so good with words. It is difficult too when I cannot see your face, so it becomes difficult to begin. I remember only what you said to write, so I try to follow what you ask. I follow too all the other things that you asked, so you know that I keep my word, even if I am not so good in writing it. That just now was not very bad, no? I try sometimes the rhetoric, but I am really better in Greek. You will let me write next time in Greek?

I write in our room. It is strange here now that I am alone. It is so big. This is not complaint. It is a good room still. You also forgot something in it. I found, the day you sailed, one of your helmets. It is the one with the big red plume on top and the many dark serpents stretching to the front. I told your friend Suou Himemiya and she said I should keep it for you. It is safe with me so you will not worry. I keep it polished, and the inside smelling nice. I know you like everything to be clean.

Thank you for the flowers that first day. The room also smelled nice, and it was less big.

I write now about today, as promised. Nothing is interesting about today save for the shark. Today, they brought a shark to the docks. Suou-she says I should call her Suou and it is all right, if it is all right with you too?-brought me to see, as I had never seen a shark before. I know what they are, as I have read and heard of them. But I did not imagine it would look like that. It is so that I thought it would be larger. You hear of them from sailors' mouths, and you are led to think of a monster large as a hemiola. But the smallness of it was only a small point to me, because the rest of it was all point anyway. It was all teeth, and when I touched it, its skin had teeth too. You have ever touched a shark? If so, you understand what I write. If not, I can boast of a feat you have yet to do. You are not impressed? I know what you will say: it is a fishy feat. There. I say it before you can, too.

The new commander made a speech today while watching the drilling. I am not as good at the rhetoric as you are, but it seemed to me a bad speech, very long and circular. Suou agreed with me, so I at least have one who stands witness. I know this because I asked her for that word-circular. I forgot it, and worried you would laugh if I wrote round-round.

I know you are laughing. Stop it, Shizuru.

There are things here you would not find so merry. There are many changes I find strange. The half of the Seventh still in Argentum has been ordered to come to Argus, and my people placed there are to be dismissed. This is a smaller army. The new commander explained, too, in a staff meeting, why it should be smaller. The reasons sound not sensible to me. His intent is to be sparing with many things, as you said, and they are things that deserve not the economy. You said to me before that he is not lacking money. Yet he acts like a poor man, or a rich man pretending to be poor in his own palace, with his own staff. Only a fool does this, so I cannot agree with him. He is a very clumsy man, and so foolish a commander. He is so much beneath you.

I never call him General. He is not my General.

It is often that I worry much about your army, because it is still your army. You have good men, but the one who leads them now does not compare. I am glad to have Suou Himemiya as our legate, to be in charge of my people and your cavalry. But I also worry that her position is not higher. I think her most able of all your legates, and most able of all the new legates. Is it not that she should be the one to make the greatest decisions with the commander, as the senior legate? I worry much that the fool has with him a fool too in that position, and wastes one more able. I do not know if I am right in saying this. Some of your ways are unknown to me, so you will forgive me if I am wrong. It is only opinion.

I do not know what else I should write. Suou said that she will write to you of the news, so I do not need to write those here. If you write me a letter I will know better what to say next. So I will wait until you can send me a reply. I know you have much work, so it is all right that I wait. I pray every day for you, and make offerings to many gods. I remember you said before that to do this is evidence I am pragmatic, and laughed a little. But I think it is better to be safe and have you safe. I ask all the gods I know that you are well, as I believe this.

Shizuki is well too but I think she looks for you.

That is all I can say now. And before you think it, I do not forget. You asked, last we spoke, that I write two things when I finish. I write them here not only because you ask, but also because they are true: I think of you and I love you. I love you very much, Shizuru.

Chapter 49

Gratitude to the readers and reviewers. Yesterday I reread chapter 45 for reference. As the usual reread, it yielded the typical crop of typographical errors... and also the discovery that one wrote Perseus in a line where it should have been Bellerophon, then proceeded to repeat the misattribution like a fool. (Sigh.) My apologies: I truly did not realise it at the time. The only reason of which I can think for the gaffe is that it was the overlap of Pegasus that made me interchange heroes so inately, although it remains a fault as I should have seen that earlier and rectified it. Again, please pardon me.

---

Illustration:

An attempt to atone for the relative dearth of Shizuru-Natsuki interaction:

ethnewinter. deviantart art/HTSUAF-1-of-3-169077951

(please remove the spaces after the full stops)

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Ala (s.) , alae (pl.) - A cavalry unit; the estimates on the number of horsemen per ala differ, but for this story, the number shall be set at five hundred. The Lupine division, for instance, has approximately 700 horsemen, and is thus just a little shy of being an ala and a half.

2 . Asclepiad - Something that may be familiar to the literature students, the asclepiad is a line in lyric verse and has two sub-classes: the Lesser Asclepiad, with 12 syllables and a caesura; and the Greater Asclepiad, which takes a choriambus both preceded and followed by diaresis.

3 . Calends - Also K alends; the first of the three named days of a Roman/ Himean month, and the only fixed or unvarying one. The Calends is always on the first day of the month.

4 . Campus Martius - T he area outside the city of Rome/Hime where legions were trained and parked.

5 . Capite censi (L.) - The Head Count ; socially the lowest of all Romans, they did not even deserve a rung on the class ladder. The poorest class was technically the Fifth Class, but these were still a notch above the capite censi , who were classless, property-less, vote-less, yet also the most numerous in Ancient Rome.

6 . Cassandra - Prophetess from Greek myth who was doomed to always know the disasters about to happen, yet never have a single word believed once she prophesied them.

7 . Comitium (s.), comitia (pl.) - Assembly; a gathering called together for the purpose of discussing or settling political or state matters.

8 . Contubernalis - The Ancient Roman equivalent of a military cadet. These were nobles or members of the Famous Families, so they were often kept out of the battle and seconded to staff work for the general's office.

9 . Domus Publica - T he state house in which the head of the State religion and the Vestal Virgins (see note below) lived.

10 . " Ecastor!" - An exclamation permissible in high company, and a reference to Castor (of the heavenly twins, Castor and Pollux/ Polydeuces). It was used by women, the equivalent for men being "Edepol!"

11 . The Eighteen - The most influential knights, these were the original eighteen centuries of the Ordo Equester (see Equites ), meaning the original eighteen divisions within that group in its early days of existence. As time passed, more divisions were added to the Ordo Equester to accommodate the expansion of the knight class, but these eighteen centuries were kept untouched and intact.

12 . Equites - Members of the Roman Ordo Equester , called "the knights" as opposed to "the senators". Those of knight rank were usually as well-born as those of senatorial rank, but the difference was that they chose not a political career but a commercial one. Recall that there are restrictions on senatorial businesses, which is the reason the knights are generally the richer of the two ranks. One may consider them the equivalents of the modern "business sector" of the community, with the senators being the "government or political sector", for a simplified but convenient categorisation.

13 . Glyconic - Like the asclepiad (s.v.), another line in lyric verse, this time having 8 syllables.

14 . Head Count - See note for capite censi.

15 . Ilium - Troy, of Homer's Iliad and the famous Trojan Horse.

16 . Infra dignitatem - A Latin phrase still being used in Modern English: "beneath one's dignity".

17 . Knights - See note above, for Equites.

18 . Mos maiorum (L.) - The established custom, tradition; the way things had always been done and "should" always be done, according to the arch-conservatives or the "Traditionalists"

19 . New Man - novus homo / homo novus ; socially, ancestrally, and politically speaking, a parvenu. These were generally looked down upon, as antecedents were very important in highly-stratified Rome.

20 . Plebs - The Plebeians; while 'plebeian' referred to all Roman citizens who were not patrician, the sense in which Plebs is used here is more specific to politics. It meant those members of the plebeians who were actively attending and/or influencing meetings of the Plebs, like the Comitia (see note above) called by the tribunes of the plebs.

21 . Pomerium - The sacrosanct boundary encircling the city of Rome, which could not be crossed by generals for the duration of their service in a military mission or capacity.

22 . Subura - One of Rome's poorer districts, known for its squalor and population density.

23 . Urban praetor - Head of the praetors and the city's courts, he dealt with all civil litigation within Rome.

24 . Vestal - A Iso Vestal Virgins , priestesses dedicated to the protection of the sacred flame of the hearth of the goddess Vesta; they were expected to remain chaste for the duration of their service.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

par ethnewinter

---

The sessions held outside the pomerium went well into the month of June and the next, with both camps speaking indefatigably-if a little more cautiously, on the part of those opposing Shizuru-for or against the controversial motion. Public interest by this time had peaked for two reasons: first, because of the now-famous events of the first session in the Ogasawara villa; and second, because of the start of campaigning season for the coming elections. As provided by the incumbent consuls at the beginning of their term, the officials for next year would be voted in around mid-October. Thus most of the candidates for those elections began the heavy vote-gathering around June.

Vote-gathering comprised a range of activities going from public works all the way to bribery. High public visibility was necessary; a flurry of speechifying candidates was going about the city at all times, talking to any crowd willing to listen. These speechifying candidates made much of whatever topic was currently seizing the city, for they used their speeches on these topics to clarify on which side of the political fence they stood. That June, Shizuru Fujino's issue happened to be one of the topics most used, as it was such an excellent base for distinguishing political polarisation, aside from being a subject guaranteed to tempt people's ears. There were dangers to this temptation, however: those fervently against Shizuru soon learned not to make their speeches within hearing of a rowdy-looking mob of Head Count composition. As demonstrated by several violent but thankfully bloodless occasions, the Head Count stood more or less on the Fujino side of things.

It was said that this sentiment among the lower levels could not be out of any intelligent political opinion or understanding. Even without the scorn with which such statements were oft issued, this was generally true. Even those myriad followers of Shizuru Fujino's ally, Urumi Himemiya-Kanzaki, were not enough to account for the widespread lowly support given her. Indeed, not even those Urumi-followers were all truly aware of all the complexities of the Fujino controversy: against the sheer multitude of people living in Hime, Comitia -goers were still a mere drop in the slop-bucket, especially where the poor were concerned. The humble folk did not actually pay much attention to politics, having plenty of their own worries and controversies to occupy them.

Even so, for some arcane reason that continued to defy her foes' understanding, they seemed to pay attention when it was Shizuru Fujino involved in the politics-and also seemed to assume that, whatever was going on, it was Shizuru Fujino on the right side of things. Which assumption helped make life very difficult for those bent on opposing that side of things, as they already had enough worries among their peers without having public sentiment against them too.

"We're in trouble," Sergay Wang said bluntly to his allies, who had gathered for a strategic meeting in his home. Only those with the greatest clout had been asked to come, which meant the Wang atrium held the leaders of the arch-conservative faction that night, distributed two-each to a nicely plush couch.

"We're struggling," he restated. "We need to decide on a rational strategy to stop her from seeking that motion once and for all. There are more turning to her side every day among the neutrals in Senate. Public opinion is one thing-the People are fickle, we know that-but having the other senators swing against us is a more serious matter."

"Like that prick, Yasuri!" spat Jin Akagi, who was on the couch opposite. "Did you hear him yesterday? He turned right around and said perhaps it wouldn't be so bad if we gave her what she wanted!"

"That's exactly what I mean," Sergay cut in, before Akagi could either work up one of his huffs, or influence the others into working up theirs. He wanted to proceed through this meeting calmly. "You can't say Yasuri's ever been sympathetic to Fujino or any of her allies, but even he has started to consider giving in. We need to face facts, and the fact is that a lot of people are getting worn down. This needs to stop! If it goes on, any vote in the House will see the division going Fujino and Himemiya's way, so much I can promise."

"What do you propose, then?" demanded Haruka Armitage. She shared a couch with her boon companion, the junior consul. "If you can see a solution, say it. And if anyone even suggests something like what Nakao did, I'll strangle him!"

Her red-cheeked face turned redder, virtually mottling.

"Using a New Man to do it," she said through her teeth. "How could he? The man's got no sense."

"Yes, it was a foolish thing to do," the host agreed, willing to be sidetracked by this particular topic. He ignored the flush that rose to Akagi's face, knowing the other man had been a party to that ill-advised scheme to discredit their enemy using the now-discredited Katsu Hitagi. Oh, if only they had told him about it before they put the plan in motion! He might have fixed things to actually work to their advantage. They should have informed at least him or Haruka, anyway, that they had been planning such a move. He always wondered why some of them insisted on acting solo, thus sparing themselves the combined wisdom and resources they would have had with the assistance of the group. He wondered that even more these days as this was a time when he believed they needed all the resources they could put together; the current enemy was proving enormously difficult.

"Mind, I think it would've worked if it'd been someone else," he admitted. "Someone with actual ancestors, of course, and the necessary balls. But there it is: our current tribunes of the plebs are especially weak. What a year for it! At least our bets for next year are better, or so they seem to be."

"They should be," drawled Hikaru Senou, who on had his usual facial expression: a superior look of distaste that some had likened to the grimace a man pulled when you shoved something nasty under his nose. Hikaru now turned that look to Sergay, and spoke in the nasal voice that matched his countenance: "I'm backing one of them, you know."

"Yes, so I heard. He's your client, is he?"

"Quite so."

But Haruka was still fuming over Nakao, who had not been invited to this meeting for the reason that so infuriated her that very moment. Not that they thought he would show had he been invited, either: he had been keeping to his home of late, in a black depression over the outcome of his pawn's failure.

"Why did he do it?" she demanded of the company, which turned her way. "There's no love lost between me and Fujino, but I could strangle Nakao! We've had trouble only since. Most of this that you're complaining about, Sergay, happened after that session. It sent our support sliding down the hill!"

There was an uncomfortable pause after this truthful assessment.

"It's to be expected, to be honest," Sergay said ruefully, his wide shoulders slumping just a little. "Fujino's... speech was impressive, you know. Hitagi gave her all the openings she needed. Even the bit about that foreign lover of hers was well-put: she threw it back in our faces with a vengeance! It really is too bad, since it could have been such good material. She made Hitagi-and by association, our side-look petty."

He shook his head tiredly.

"I detest the woman, but even I have to admit she was formidable... which is probably the reason it was only Nakao who could've got such a fool scheme as that in his head. His hate for her is so deep it robs him of his other senses sometimes. He'd never see anything in her as even remotely admirable. We all know there's bad blood between them."

" That was pretty long ago," someone replied.

"Yes, but it was the sort of thing to be remembered," he said, easily recalling the event that had started Yuzuru Nakao's vendetta against Shizuru Fujino: a non-violent mutiny that had seen an entire army rejecting him and preferring her, who had merely been a subordinate. "It cost Nakao a great deal of dignitas ."

"But using a New Man still isn't the sort of thing I had expected of him. I like Fujino no more than you do, but the fact remains she's still one of us! Having that upstart of all people accuse her of that sort of thieving hit the limit for the old-guard patriciate, you know, and that was something I'd have expected Nakao to think of, since he's a patrician as well."

"Though not as old-guard," sniffed Hikaru Senou.

"Well! Still, d'you think he's going senile?"

"Maybe, but who knows?" Sergay sighed and frowned. "I think we're straying from the point."

He raked a hand through his sandy-yellow hair.

"Look, as I was saying, I do have a solution. It would actually work so much better if we had a good tribune of the plebs to do it for us, in truth," he told them. "The way it is now, we'll all just have to pull a good share of the weight."

"What is it? Out with it already, Man!" Akagi said, eager to leave the topic of Nakao's failure.

"Delay the vote," Sergay replied. "If we can keep delaying a division on the motion, Fujino will see her term of office end without having ever been inaugurated into it, and see the issue come to nothing. I was actually leaning the other way before pushing the House into an early division on it before her camp started getting its stride, I mean- but the debacle at Ogasawara's villa changed that. Would that I'd pushed for it earlier! We've already gone into the latter part of the year. If we can just delay it long enough to the end, the motion will be moot."

"There's half of the year to go yet," spoke up the junior consul. "That seems like a lot of time."

"A mere few months-it'll fly by," Sergay rebutted. "All we need to do is have our tribunes of the plebs veto when needed, with us supporting them by giving blocking speeches to Fujino and her allies. We will actually depend on you heavily for this, Yukino."

He nodded to the woman who looked like a tiny mouse perched next to the dauntingly bright-coloured Haruka Armitage. For a moment he pictured how she looked when she was on the curule platform with her consular colleague, then felt malicious for doing so.

"If you can offset Himemiya, it would be a great help," he told her, hiding the irritation he was feeling: weak tribunes of the plebs and an unimpressive consul at a time when the enemy had one so stellar-or should it be lunar, given that one's atmosphere?-she need only sit beside you to make you look pitiful. What a year indeed for the conservatives! "Worse comes to worst, you might even have to cut some sessions short when you're the officiating consul, in case they suddenly raise the issue of a division and we're unable to block them. That shouldn't be too hard, given your position."

No one heard the woman's sigh of despair. She was thinking of her fellow consul, who was not someone so easily "offset". Not too hard indeed! For a moment the retort that Sergay should do it himself hovered, but she bit it back and listened to him.

"This is just about the only thing I can think of that could work right now. It will work-it has to! This is the only logical recourse to us at this point. After all, we can't even intimidate that cousin of Himemiya's into retracting her veto on Fujino's triumph, nor can we intimidate her into pulling back the damned motion."

"There's one I'd love to get my hands on!" Akagi suddenly burst out, jerking so convulsively he splashed some of his wine on the couch and on his annoyed couch-mate too. "Stirring up trouble with the Plebs-do you know she talks to them nearly every day? She spends more time wooing voters than the actual candidates! I piss on Nemura!"

That provoked a timid reply from the quietest and most uncomfortable member of the gathering. Kazuya Kurauchi's discomfort was due to his awareness that his presence was mere formality, since even he was painfully conscious of his own shortcomings. He knew he had neither the touch nor the mind for his political heritage, and was only suffered by the current group because of his name and his august, fanatically arch-conservative family history.

That family history still demanded that he contribute his mite, though, which he did now.

"It's actually Himemiya-Kanzaki again, Akagi-san," he reminded the older man punctiliously. "Not Nemura."

In this Kazuya was actually correct. That this was again the proper name for that notorious patrician-turned-plebeian was since the plebeian who had consented to adopt her-her childhood friend, Tomoko Nemura-had finished the rites that legally released Urumi from her authority. Although this meant Urumi no longer needed to use Nemura for her last name, it could not change back her status to patrician. Thus, Urumi Himemiya-Kanzaki was essentially establishing a new family of her own, a branch from the famous families Himemiya and Kanzaki, albeit a plebeian one.

All of which Akagi knew very well, but did not really care about.

"Nemura or not, I still piss on her!" he snapped at the younger man, goaded. "I piss, I piss, I piss!"

He received a glare from the immensely haughty-looking man to his right: "We've better things to do than talk about latrine activities, Akagi."

"Why not talk about them, Senou, given how deep in shit we already are?"

"Oh, stop bickering, the two of you!" Sergay cried, exasperated. "We're here to talk about how to beat Fujino. If that's clear, let's hear the opinions on what I just proposed. What do you think of my plan?"

"Sensible," Haruka said.

"I agree," said Senou. "I say we adopt Wang's plan for now."

The rest also voiced agreement.

"So it's decided," Sergay said, heaving a sigh of immense satisfaction. "We use delaying tactics to prevent them ever seeing a division... at least, until we're sure that we have more support for our side than they do on theirs. In the meantime, we can keep working on the problem and swinging more people our way."

"If by 'people' you mean senators and senior equites," Haruka said through her teeth. "The actual People look to be more on her side, even more the Plebs. Idiots! How they fail to see her for what she is, I'll never understand."

A lift of her clenched hands, to be shaken in the air.

"Why is it," she cried, "that she's so wretched popular?"

It was a good question. Why was Shizuru Fujino so wretched popular? Far beyond all the others who were also famous, in fact, which was why Haruka Armitage had felt the need to append the ironic adjective wretched. It was a question very few members of their class could answer, because the answer required a perceptual depth not normal to them. Or, more simply, it required a willingness to talk to those of far lower station in order to find the answer. But what member of the First or Second Class would ever credit a response given by someone so far beneath theirs? Or would even spare time to ask such lowly beings a question?

Better they would have, because most of the lowly beings actually knew the correct answer. Yes, they loved all those who were great and beautiful and worthy of admiration... but that was a fickle love, and not the kind they held for Shizuru Fujino. She had all the traits every Himean admired in his superiors and officials, to be sure, but the adoration they gave her was still special. It was because, of all the great and powerful people who had ever swept around the streets of Hime nodding and smiling their way, only Shizuru really talked to them.

There were others who took the time to smile and exchange pleasantries, it was admitted, but almost never so warmly and never to every class including the capite censi. Whereas Shizuru talked to even the capite censi. Furthermore, she showed unusual interest in their situations, often remembering them by face or even sometimes by name. How strange was that? A patrician of the patricians, remembering capite censi names! Names that would never matter to a politician because they had no electoral worth, could not even count as a vote to move her into office. Why would any patrician give time of day to a member of a group so low it was classless, talk to them as though they mattered? What politician would speak with them without any apparent demagoguery of purpose, right there on the street and on their level instead of from the elevation of a rostrum? Oh, it was definitely a weird quirk to do such things-and a wildly flattering one too. What could possibly have engendered it in Shizuru Fujino?

Perhaps it was her upbringing, some people suggested. Her parents had been of the unusual type who considered slaves and everyone below their station worthy nonetheless of personhood. Unlike their fellows, they sent them away from the rooms for private situations. Not because the slaves offended them. Rather, because they understood that even slaves had thoughts and ideas, had feelings and reactions they could not always control. Shizuru had been reared to think the same, which was why she never treated slaves as mere house furnishings. People of lower station could think. They could feel and even love. And Shizuru, ever a creature out to charm the world, had always liked to inspire love.

Those who knew her better also thought, it is not merely in the upbringing. That alone could not have explained why Shizuru was loved not just by her household servants but also by the populace. The answer to this was in Shizuru's character itself, and her boundless thirst for knowledge.

From the time she had been taught that even lesser people could think and feel, Shizuru had been seized by the question of what they thought and felt. Human like us, her father used to say, yet not like us. So from the precocious child she had been to the woman she became, she continued to take an interest in them as she wanted to understand the differences among humans, all the time learning that she cared less about those differences than about that which made them human.

Those who had known her since infancy knew the trouble this interest had given her parents. She earned many a scolding for herself and her servant girl as a child because, after lessons at the pedagogue's, she would detour on the way home and run off to some part of the city or out of it. Not that they were truly troublemaking adventures, her parents would always learn: she was simply a naturally curious creature, as interested in the doings of the Vestals within the Domus Publica as she was in the filthy squabbles of the Subura. At first there was a genuine worry when the Fujino learned their only daughter passed through even that pit, but it was soon solved by striking a deal that she would take a capable bodyguard with her to such places—at least, until she came of age.

The compromise was necessary because, no matter the prevention, the Fujino found they truly could not stop their child from going where she wanted. If they assigned a stricter servant to watch over her, she charmed him into giving in to what she desired. If they threw a hurdle her way, she would devise a way to leap it. The wretched child was too wilful and too wily! Many another parent advised them to turn to a good spanking, or perhaps to imprisonment in her room for some days, but the Fujino were philosophically progressive and disliked such crude remedies. They had taught her to be free in mingling with those lesser, said her father ruefully to those advisors; therefore, they now had to live with a daughter who had learned the lesson well.

The only other provision they made in the compromise was that, upon returning from her detours, Shizuru would have to recount to either of them something that indicated she had truly profited by the adventure. If it passed that she failed to produce anything during these reports, she would have to cease visiting the place where she had found nothing at all worth knowing.

Thus Shizuru as a child came to know things her peers had no opportunity to learn. She learned to speak the commoner's cant perfectly within a month of her adventures, which knowledge she later used among her soldiers as a grown woman, pleasantly surprising them. She learned a dozen other argots and tongues, some of which would boggle many foreign rulers and enemies in the future, when she would use their own languages to either intimidate or negotiate terms of their surrender. She also learned how best to deal with people of diverse backgrounds and status, as she had to overcome the brand of being an intruder during her excursions.

This last was perhaps the most difficult, although still something she overcame with typical smoothness. Most people liked her from the first meeting, as she had a natural charm that loosened the most grudging of tongues. It helped that she was breathtakingly good-looking. Her smile was sufficient to thaw the most frigid, and she smiled often. Even her dignity was friendly, a relaxed air that somehow managed to avoid the cooling puff of high-handedness.

This last was another crucial trait in understanding her. All the rest who gave the populace attention always seemed just a tad aloof, as if subtly but constantly aware of the difference in their stations. Shizuru never gave that impression: precisely because she had no need for it. A Fujino born of a Hanazono was so high up the ladder that she need never fear the indignity of any association and could afford to be humble because nothing could ever make her situation humble.

There were few others whose lineages permitted the same possibilities, but most of them were too in love with their aristocracies to act as Shizuru did. Her dearest friend, another top-of-the-tree patrician, might have been closer than these others if not for a limiting temperament: Chikane Himemiya, while bearing much the same philosophical humanity Shizuru carried, was nonetheless a far more reserved person by nature and intensely private. Chikane's sympathy for others was sincere and, Shizuru suspected, actually the greater between the two of them; the degree to which she permitted that innate warmth to seep through her shell, however, was lacking.

So it was Shizuru the people adored and believed to always be right because of it. They had known her for so long that they believed she was theirs, a sort of special heroine, a living mythology that belonged more to them than to the elites who were her peers. Was it not she who had once lobbied so strongly to give them grain so cheap it was practically free? Was she not the one who had given those magnificent week-long games years back, in honour of her ancestors and the deaths of her parents? Was she not the beloved of Fortuna, who continued to give her reason for added celebrations by showering her with victories? And-most importantly to the long-time residents of the city-was she not the girl who had once and still passed among them, always willing to entertain questions from the curious and having her own questions in return, always to be put forth with easy friendliness?

All very real things to them and worthy measures of her value, as they neither knew nor cared about the disapproval these same things had gained for her amongst her peers. Those who did know only thought her peers were the typical stiff snobs, people who treated their darling Fujino very shabbily indeed. Well, what would the snobs know, anyway? These were people terrified of even sticking a toe in the Subura!

Shizuru was aware of these sentiments, as well as the other sentiments for or against her. She soon had more cause to be glad for the people's support. In the latter part of June, she got Natsuki's answer to her first letter, which she had sent when she and the Fourteenth docked at the ports of Fuuka after their sea-passage. This second letter was delightfully longer than the first, and thus afforded Shizuru a great deal of anticipatory pleasure when she handled it. Yet the pleasure faded once she unrolled the paper: the Otomeian had composed the reply on the very day she received Shizuru's first missive, not sleeping just to finish because, she said,

I must write this tonight and send it tomorrow. The Mentulae request a diplomatic meeting for a treaty and we are to march at dawn to Argentum for it.

Shizuru's breath snagged that very instant. After which her eyes raced through the paper with lightning speed, reading at the pace only she could manage, and which was one of the reasons she was called a prodigy. Thus she found out about the invitation from the Mentulae and Takeda's acceptance of it, as well as his resolve to meet them at Argentum. Shizuru could barely believe he intended to humour them by meeting there, and with only the number of soldiers Natsuki specified. Five cohorts and the Lupine division? Oh, what an ill-advised plan, not to mention a weak show of over-acquiescence to an arrogant king! Pray nothing harmful came of it!

She went through the letter she had intended to savour with her heart racing, teeth rounding on her lower lip. The scroll was dated about a month old, which only worsened the storm she could see brewing. What was happening over there? What had already happened? Would the Mentulae have dared it? Would they actually have the gall and ready manpower at this time?

She disciplined herself into considering the matter coolly and found she had difficulty crediting it as a likelihood-more likely they had begun to set up an operation in Argentum with shades of Ilium for the future-but then she would waver and remind herself that what was not a likelihood could nevertheless be a possibility.

On the other hand, it was still difficult to believe any nation could have the daring to launch an offensive against Hime itself, especially if that nation had been recently paddled over Hime's knee. But all this aside, she would scream inwardly, what was actually happening? If only she had had the time to finish setting up the intelligence network she had been making when she was still in the field! Good as she was at guesswork, Shizuru knew there was nothing like an actual verified piece of information.

So which was it, she wondered. Trap for you, Takeda, or Treaty? Perhaps both, with one coming before the other: she could easily imagine the Mentulaean embassy in Argentum as an intelligence mission, aimed at scouting enemy forces before a possible attack in the future. They would attack eventually-perhaps soon, perhaps only after some years-but inevitably, eventually. The Mentulae were not peaceful neighbours, so much was clear. A sooner attack would most likely be in late summer, giving the Mentulae sufficient time to muster all their forces this spring: two months would be enough for that. Unlikely they could launch anything worth considering just yet. Or was it that unlikely?

The General in her screamed out the various things she would do had she still been the Northern army's commander-demand to be met at a different place, for instance, and take more than a mere five cohorts if she wanted to march-but all those thoughts were impotent. Was that idiot of a substitute taking every possible precaution on this march, thinking of every single care? She had thought him militarily capable enough to at least do some of the things she had in mind, but perhaps she had overestimated him there? The thought was enough to drive anyone crazy! She surfaced from that first reading in a welter of sweat, her skin cold and her lover's words swimming before her eyes.

Shizuru, I am very worried.

Remembering that line made her hair rise. She who had never spent too much time on prayer before-because she believed the gods favoured people who spent less time on prayer than on action-would from then on spend her nights praying to the arcane powers over the various aspects of mortal life. She did not waste her time merely pleading with them: to do that was Greek. Shizuru was Himean, and Himeans approached everything, including religion, with supreme legalism.

She made contracts with her gods, promising all manner of honour and offering if they only kept her army safe and-most importantly-sheltered from harm her Natsuki. Donations were sent to various temples, focusing on those most relevant to the aim: half a million to your temple, Salus, you who can ensure her health; half a million to you, Bona Dea, protector of all women; half a million, Juno Moneta, giver of timely warnings in extremity; half a million, Jupiter Optimus Maximus, embodiment of all forces and divinities; and so on.

The largest donation went to the temple of Venus Victrix, Shizuru's ancestress. To her did the worried woman pray hardest, invoking the power of their blood-link and the pertinence of her worries to the goddess's province: for Venus Victrix was the ruler of the life force in victory, the goddess of love conquering. Venus the Victorious, I shall give you all honours you find pleasing: only let not my love come to harm or defeat!

She agonised over the legionaries and her friends in the North, of course, but it was the girl she loved who caused the most hurt. If any fighting did happen, what would happen to Natsuki? Who was a brilliant warrior and leader, yes, but also too dangerously brave for Shizuru's comfort. Oh, no, better not to go down that track! Better to think of the capable double-agent she had left, the one who was also looking over the girl. Better to recall, too, the power sheathed in that wonderful body she missed each night.

Her Natsuki was strong. Her Natsuki was smart and skilled, and would be fine. But every time Shizuru tried to convince herself of this, the letter she had received along with the girl's would be the one to revisit. It was the missive from her double-agent, who had detailed much the same worries and news as had Natsuki... but with an added problem the Otomeian had not mentioned.

There are more problems here than you can shake a stick at, so to speak. I've already written about the ones concerning the army and Masashi, and I have no doubt you're already shaking that oh-so-long stick of yours, not least because of my little joke here. But for this next one, you might want to put down that stick for a second, because it has to do with Natsuki.

Let me say first that your girl is faithful. I do not think there can be any more doubt that she truly loves you, for what I see gives every appearance of confirming it. But the confirmation might be coming at a price that is a touch too steep for comfort, and that is the next-or rather, last-problem I have to write. See, your Natsuki is not well.

Before your imagination plunges into the pits, Shizuru-san, rest assured it is not actually life-threatening, the physicians assure me. Of course, if she keeps going on like this, they admit there may then be space to despair-for, as it is, your girl seems bent on relinquishing all the space she herself occupies! She has become quite reduced, enough to merit commentary from nearly everyone. As this reduction happened only after you left and there is naught else I can find to serve as reason for it, I think I can say with certainty that your absence is the cause. But I'm rushing to the conclusion, and you must forgive me; I should start from the symptom rather than the diagnosis.

We noted it first from her eating habits. Or should I say lack of them, rather? She can barely eat. She neither looks forward to taking in food, nor seems capable of retaining all she does admit. Most solids are vomited within an hour of ingestion, often earlier. Liquids seem to be fine, but-if we believe in our Attic friends-not even the gods subsist on liquids alone, do they? It was only natural that, after a few weeks of this, your girl's weight dropped drastically. I shall not describe it to you because I am sure you can imagine it for yourself, so unsettling is it. She has always been thin, after all. Remember as cause for optimism, however: not life-threatening.

I summoned the physicians, both from the army and the city. They said only what I expected, which I think is both cause for relief as well as consternation: she is suffering from an acute malaise of the spirit, which influences adversely, among other things, her digestive processes. The physicians claim that such black humours, when guarded as jealously as does your Natsuki, create a constant unease of the belly, similar to the anxiety that makes one incapable of eating or ignorant of hunger during dire or extremely grievous moments. They said a great many other things, but I am afraid that I was not much impressed by the rest of the babble, finding the one I have just stated as the only worthy note. To put things in brief, your girl is simply too depressed to eat properly.

The physicians made recommendations, and all seemed sensible to me: save for one fool who wanted to make some class of poultice or gloop to put on her chest, so as to draw out any "noxious poisons" through the skin. The trouble with physicians-unless they are our good, trusty army ones-is that you have to take what they say with a healthy dose of suspicion: they are as likely to kill you with their cures as to heal you, depending on the practitioner. When that particular man suggested the business with a poultice, I was irked: you know as well as I do that his proposition was sheer claptrap. Barring the unlikelihood of her suffering from such toxins, what poultice has ever successfully drawn out toxin through the skin? I am sure you shall excuse me for having chucked both that quack and his recommendation out the door. Besides, I did not think you would like the thought of anyone putting anything on her bare chest-which prospect our girl did not view with anticipation either, I noticed. She looked ready to pull a dagger on him.

The other, far more reasonable practitioners prescribed much the same things: chopped fruit and also very small but regular helpings of whatever light stews or broths are available, the solids in them kept to a bare minimum. All liquids should be warmed if possible to avoid upsetting the stomach's balance. Fish or fowl is preferred to meats like pork and beef. It's quite like feeding a chick, although no chick every looked as haughty as yours does when being given its sustenance. I'm afraid I actually have to pull rank on her sometimes to make her eat, although I try to do it very nicely. No doubt she would be far more tractable were you here to order it, but then again, that's a non sequitur: were you here, no doubt either that she wouldn't be like this. So perhaps you could just write a tidy little line in your next letter to her about eating properly? It should help, I think.

According to recommendation, I also have her drinking a blend of thickly-honeyed milk with raw egg and a bit of wine, apparently to fortify her spirits. While I do believe she needs all the fortification of spirit she can get, I am uncertain the concoction actually serves the stated purpose-unless, perhaps, I were to make her drink enough of it to be intoxicated. Rather, it is simply added nutrition, and as she seems not to dislike the taste of it, then it is as well I should keep her drinking the blend. Be assured I mete it out carefully, so as not to put her in the undesirable spirit-saturation aforementioned. It even took a bit of persuasion to make her drink it at all... for which difficulty I fear the culpability must now be laid at your feet. See, I didn't know you told her to stay away from wine. I understand perfectly, just so you know, but perhaps if you were to write something on that as well, she would look a little less guilty when she drinks it? The drink does its good, I assure you, and there are days when it seems she can be prevailed upon to take nothing else.

I truly wish it were this alone, for I know this is quite enough bad news already. But there is more. She does not sleep. How do I know that? Oh, it shows; trust me.

Ah, no! thought Shizuru when she reached that section, her already darkened imagination running mad with images of a ravaged-looking Natsuki. Her poor girl was going through nearly all the same things she was, it seemed. Difficulty eating-although the way Suou described it sounded far worse than her own case-difficulty sleeping, difficulty living again... all of which was far more difficulty than she could genuinely stand to have her girl undergo. It was true she had felt a splash of vindication in finding out about it, because it told her what it told her friend: that Natsuki loved her indubitably. Even so, the strength of that vindication enhanced her guilt afterwards, when she managed to read through the rest.

She fervently hoped Suou was only being literary in describing the girl's state. It sounded so bad! When she read about the concoction of wine and milk, she felt even more horrid for having drunk herself into a stupor for so many evenings, using wine as a conduit to the realms of slumber when she had forbidden the same prospective conduit to Natsuki. Who seemed to be so bent on following Shizuru's parting edicts that she had nearly refused a prescription intended to preserve her own well-being. Poor Natsuki! How wretched was she that Suou would skimp further description, saying imagination could handle it? It must be wretched indeed, if Suou would leave such a thing to a lover's paranoid imaginings.

How then could she complain when Suou recounted her deceptions of Natsuki? At the very least, they seemed to serve the purpose fairly, and also provided good reminders of Shizuru's love. Shizuru was actually annoyed by the scheme at first, but realised later that the feeling was more directed to herself than to her friend. Why had she not thought of arranging gifts herself? Granted, she had arranged for their room to be filled with flowers the first night she went away, but that was it. Her heart cried out that she should have done properly what Suou had done through deceit.

Not that Suou had felt all that sorry for said deceit, however: the other patrician had insisted very strongly on the justice of her actions, explaining that they were done not merely for Shizuru's sake.

See, I like your girl terribly, even more now that I've had the opportunity to see more of her. She's so very nice, Shizuru-san, almost surprisingly so. Do you know I caught her moping to herself the other day and found it was because several of her men were- and I quote this directly-"too young to be kept away so long without battle to keep busy"? This, from the girl who happens to be younger than every last one of her subordinates! I taxed her with it: it transpires she was talking about those of her troopers who had just recently married. Some were expecting their first babies at home, it appears.

I understood the concern and said that if there were only a few of these, I would be willing to give them a short leave. As it happens, they were all too touched by their leader's thoughtfulness to actually take advantage of her bid, and opted for simply sending packages from Argus to their families. I understand she distributed her full share of the booty among her men after our battles, by the way. I'd have thought that was you teaching her how to politick were it not that I learned she's always done it. Seems you're not the only one with a knack for building a fanatical following.

Now then, that was quite a lengthy side-story. But all I wanted to say is that your girl has a very likeable character that appeals greatly to me, and that, aside from being her current chaperone, I genuinely wish to be her friend. That having been said, I repeat that I did what I did as much for her sake as for yours. I hope you can agree with me that the false gifts from you were necessary lies, in the interests of getting her just a touch closer to being healthy. She needs so much to get closer to being healthy, Shizuru-san! If you agree with me, then please mention something about the Catullus books in your next letter to her-do you know she actually knows to identify asclepiad and glyconic? Ye gods!-and ask her how she liked them. No doubt she shall subject you to the dissertation she actually gave me!

I am exhausted and my hand is just about cramping. This letter has been newsy enough, I think, for it is beginning to look as though I should divide it into separate volumes. I shall stop here, and hope to have an hour or so of sleep before rising. We march to Argentum on the morrow, and I wonder if sleep is actually possible given my worries. Would that the man who led our march were worth only even half of you! But if that were the case, we probably wouldn't even be marching at an invitation from the enemy-or not with only five cohorts and about an ala of cavalry, at least. Still, I suppose there are ways to get through this, and I also suppose I just might be indulging in unnecessary worries... but I fear what could happen if they prove validated, as I keep telling Masashi. Playing Cassandra was never one of my aspirations.

I promise to do what I can to protect both your girl and your army, so please try to conclude quickly that Forum war you're still fighting. We need you here, little though I like having to add to your many worries in saying it. I am truly sorry to have to trouble you with so much and so quickly. But there is nothing else to be done save to admit the trouble's necessity. We need you very badly.

Which had Shizuru jumping to her feet and calling for Hermias in the middle of the evening. With the aid of her capable steward, several letters were soon carried to various locations, the most important being those to the senior consul of Hime; to Sosius, her banker who was also one of most senior among The Eighteen ; and to the two legates responsible for building the new highway connecting Argus to Fuuka, finished a day before the Calends of July.

The arrangement in those letters was to permit her to send out the Ninth and the Eleventh legions again, even if they had only just put in at the Campus Martius. Under the legate Shouhei Nagayama's care-Chie Harada had returned to the Senate-those legions would march back up the same highway they had recently built, under pretext of addressing a security threat in Upper Fuuka by bandit tribes living nearby. As the ruse was supported by allegations and sudden complaints from several of the most powerful equites ( courtesy of Shizuru's banker and other knightly confederates) as well as by the edict of the senior consul herself, there was little for the Senate to do but carp and groan belatedly after learning what Shizuru had done.

The truth, however, was that several of them were slightly relieved. The more legions Shizuru Fujino had on hand, the more nervous some of the more timid senators became. To these mice, having a disgruntled Shizuru Fujino outside the city walls was like living next-door to some mythical beast biding its time: if prodded enough-and gods knew how the Traditionalists were prodding it!-it just might come roaring through the door. Had it not roared in their faces only recently?

Only after both legions had marched away again was the mythical beast able to sit back and rumble a breath. There! Those fifty thousand soldiers could be a faster help if ever Suou's worries came to anything. While another of the legates who had returned with her to Hime, Taro, had ventured that any offensive made by the Mentulae at this point might actually help with their aim, she disagreed sorely. When he pressed the point, arguing that such an outright attack from them would push the Senate into a faster decision now that they had a sense of her aims, she disagreed even more sorely.

Gathering her patience to explain, she told him that she had been hoping to beat them to first move from the beginning because of simple logistics. The greatest advantage the Mentulae had was in their numbers. If she could attack them before they started mustering their scattered armies properly, she could take on each fraction of that enormous whole one-by-one, instead of having to contend with a unified enemy. Shizuru knew this to be an enemy so massive she should more often think in terms of legions rather than cohorts for her strategic units, which idea her replacement was at that very instant spiting.

That was truly one of the reasons she preferred to steal a march on the Mentulae. But far more important, which she did not bother explaining to Taro, was the worry of unnecessary casualties. Those were good soldiers she had left with Masashi! And good auxiliaries. And a good girl, a wonderful girl, one she could not have thought to exist but in dreams. That dream-girl was very worried. Her blood ran cold whenever she thought of that, knowing the seriousness with which her girl spoke everything, and the seriousness of any situation that permitted the girl to actually speak of worries. It made her uneasy each time she thought of that second letter from Natsuki. Yet she could not stop rereading it.

There was a faint concern too at what was obviously a burgeoning like between the girl and her new chaperone, but Shizuru's anxieties over their well-being were too great and prevented her from imagining anything unhealthy. Besides, she would tell herself, it was well that Natsuki and Suou should get along: they had to depend on each other in an extremity. And Natsuki needed friends more than ever, when it seemed she was so lonely. Her Natsuki was once again lonely. Ah, poor child! Why was it that fate conspired to have her lonely so often? Of course she should have her friends.

Provided she does not love them more than me, the green-eyed monster in her heart would condition, hissing. Provided that when she calls them by their name, so familiarly, her voice does not love their names the way it loves mine.

But then she would remember the part of the letter where Natsuki had admitted to missing her, and the monster would subside with a purr. Natsuki loved and missed her... and going from Suou's letter, not even the presence of a new friend could substitute. Would that there had been a less painful way to ascertain it, of course! Still, it hardened her determination to get what she wanted, and quickly. There was a girl and an army that missed her sorely.

So when the Traditionalist and current junior consul, Yukino Kikukawa, came to see her and put forth the concession the arch-conservative faction was proposing, the answer was clear to Shizuru from the outset.

"We can give you a plebiscite," Yukino said, as the two of them talked over a drink in Shizuru's study. "It will allow you to run for praetor again in the next elections, unopposed by us. Your candidature will be uncontested, so much can we promise."

Shizuru nodded.

"You will be returned as urban praetor again, most likely," the junior consul continued, knowing that was practically a certainty: Shizuru Fujino had yet to enter an election where her name did not come out at the top of the poll. "And probably in a far better climate, not to mention with a full year of office before you. As it is now, Fujino-san, the year has almost turned over to the second half without you seeing inauguration yet. Think on it, please! If you run again for praetor next year, you can occupy your seat for the proper length of time, without interruption to your duties. Half a year is not that long a wait for such a thing, I think."

Shizuru hummed quietly. Yukino persevered, hoping the other woman was at least thinking about it. Oh, why did she think this really was going to fail? And why did she feel as though those queer red eyes were laughing?

"You've also only turned twenty-five," the short-haired woman continued. "Which makes you far below the usual age for... everything you've achieved. You're far younger than most of us, Fujino-san, which means you can afford to wait. Neither the position of praetor nor any of the provinces currently being used as praetorian provinces, such as those in the North, say-" She cleared her throat here, telling Shizuru subtly that she had believed the talk about her intentions to annex the lands of the Mentulae. "-shall be going anywhere."

Shizuru hummed again and raised her goblet to drink.

"Fujino-san," Yukino prodded. "What do you say?"

The blonde stopped halfway through her sip.

"I say... no," Shizuru said gently.

"Why not?" Yukino asked, finding she was not too surprised by this. "What we offer is a fair trade, and perhaps more than fair, given how we are actually guaranteeing your election as a praetor again. If it's command of an army you want, it would be easier to achieve it once you took on the praetorian governorship of a province-perhaps even one of the Northern ones, if that is where your preferences lie! Merely a few months, Fujino-san. And far more legally."

"'Far more traditionally', you mean!" Shizuru exclaimed amiably, laughing but somehow managing to keep it from sounding like an insult. "After all, the legalism is not in question here. You know no law expressly forbids what I am asking, Kikukawa-han, whereas a law expressly permitting it can actually be created, which is what Urumi Himemiyaka-Kanzaki intends to do. Or so I hear."

Mouth going dry, Yukino reached for a sip of her own drink.

"It's unconstitutional," was the only thing she thing she could come up with just then.

"Is it?" Shizuru replied, having grown used to this old refrain.

"Perhaps and perhaps not. The interesting thing about having an unwritten constitution is that so many things can be tested as a point of law. For my part, of course, I shall argue that it is if any would be willing to indulge me in a little legal examination."

Yukino's lips parted from her cup. She regarded the other woman appraisingly, sparing a moment for a renewed consideration. Hard to believe she's so young! she thought, recalling exactly how many times she had already thought this, and feeling chagrined at the number. She, the elder of them, had reached the consulship earlier, as was right and proper. Yet, she also knew she had achieved little else that could compare to the younger woman's accomplishments: from the time she won the corona obsidionalis in her first battle, Shizuru had entered the realms of legend, and continued to win an ever ascending prominence in that realm with every military victory she generated. Shizuru was already assured of a lasting memory among their people no matter if she never ascended to the top of the political ladder, the sort of enduring repute not even a consul could immediately have. How could that not make one feel just a little bitter, wondered the junior consul of the year.

The worst of it perhaps was that she deserved her repute. Had it been otherwise, it would have been so much easier to ignore or topple her. But she was no easy foe, this one! She was too large, too dangerous, too threateningly great. That was why she should be knocked down, in Yukino's opinion: she was a titan, and this was no longer an age where titans walked the earth.

Little though Haruka-chan would like to hear me say that, she admitted, knowing her metaphor had just accorded a superior praise to their enemy. But she was not talking to Haruka now, and so she could say to herself what she truly felt. And she felt so much as though they were giants going up against something even larger. It could fall for all that height, Yukino was sure. But she could not imagine it falling easily. It was a titan sprung from Mars and Venus: an archaic divinity infused with the newer Olympic blood. Not a thing that could be forced into retreat or dropped into some deep pit, left to moulder slowly and die the death of the forgotten. This was a creature bent on fighting to the end, and that thought brought back to Yukino the sinking feeling she had experienced when deputed by her friends for this interview. Why did she really feel as though this mission was doomed to fail?

"You know neither Haruka nor I put up Katsu Hitagi to it," she said, suddenly veering into other territory.

The other woman looked faintly astonished by the confession.

"Of course I knew!" Shizuru said warmly. "I never even thought it. It hardly bespoke the Armitagian style-or the Kikukawan, for that matter."

Yukino smiled a little. "I'm glad of that, at least."

"So who was it really?"

"I don't know."

The crimson eyes gleamed. Both of them knew she was lying.

"A pity," Shizuru said. "But not for long."

Yukino very wisely chose not to comment.

"Returning to our discussion earlier," she said smoothly. "We're doing this because we want the unrest to stop, Fujino-san. The people are getting restive, as are the other senators. Some orders of business are being put on hold because of this issue-and that's a shame, I know you will agree. Why, even the civil courts are backed up with cases yet to be resolved, because there's still no urban praetor! We need to resolve this quickly, and we want to do it in peaceful way! So please do consider what we are offering. If you agree to it, we can all go on with our lives without the strife this matter has been causing in our sphere. Surely you want that as much as we do."

"Of course, but as I am not the one making so much of the issue, I am confused that it is to me this speech has been directed," Shizuru said, smiling.

Yukino persevered. "Because only you can cede in this matter, Fujino-san."

"Untrue. Those blocking the motion can cede just as well, perhaps even better. I fear I must refuse the offer, Kikukawa-han."

"Please think about it."

"If you wish, but never in consideration."

"Please, Fujino-san! It is no harm to your dignitas to cede this fight and take the right way!"

Shizuru put down her goblet on the table, exactly on a place where a beam of light from outside caught it. The sparkle of its crystalline facets was dazzling, and Yukino wondered idly from where the other woman had purchased so handsomely cut a piece.

"Do you remember what I said in my speech answering Hitagi?" Shizuru asked very softly. "What I said at the end of it?"

Yukino fought down a shiver: still light outside, yes, yet the room seemed to have grown so cool.

"Yes," she said. How could anyone forget?

The woman before her nodded.

"I meant every word, Kikukawa-han," she said, still very softly. "I believe that too is part of what makes up dignitas. The words we speak. We must carry out the promises we make, or else suffer the irreparable harm to dignitas if we fail."

"But not," interjected the woman who had once been called The Timid, "if the promise is wrong or immoral."

"Irrelevant, I fear," Shizuru answered. "The moral worth of the promise does not matter to our subject, Kikukawa-han. What matters to dignitas is the delivery of the promise, no matter how wrong or immoral the act promised would be. And, even if the morality did matter, who exactly would deserve to be an authority on it? No, the point is simply irrelevant. That just then sounded more like Haruka-han speaking."

The barb lodged. Yukino stiffened dangerously.

"She has sworn to oppose you if you press this," she warned. "As have the rest of us sworn. I ask you again to consider our offer, Fujino-san. You cannot win this."

Shizuru angled her head.

"I respect you, Kikukawa-han, so I shall recognise that challenge," she said. "And shall hold you to your word, then, as you should learn to hold me to mine: I shall expect all of the Traditionalists to do all within their honour to see that pledge come true. I do, however, have a light request to make."

"I can listen to it, but can't promise," the woman before her said, eyes narrowing.

Shizuru leaned forward slightly and smiled.

"Give me your best," she said. "Give me the best fight you can give, that I may say afterwards that the opposition I faced was truly worth facing. The harder you fight, the stronger I must be; the smarter your attempts, the smarter I must be at returning. Your opposition enhances me, Kikukawa-han. I am-I say this with no sarcasm-genuinely thankful for it."

Try as Yukino did, she could not dispel the chill from her body.

"You're assuming you'll win," she managed, getting up quickly to her feet; the jerky movements helped hide the shivers still passing through her. "It's dangerous to assume, Fujino-san."

"Especially if you assume against me," came the cheerful rejoinder. "Remember what I said to Katsu Hitagi and to the rest of the House, please. I meant it! And not you, nor Haruka-han, nor the rest of the Traditionalists together can stop me. If to win this means I must crush all of you together, crush you I shall."

Her hand came out with typical elegance, yet caused a flinch.

"My compliments to my adversaries," Shizuru said, urbane smile still in place as they shook hands and parted. "Please tell them I have heard the challenge and acknowledge it. As for the offer, I must very politely refuse. Although it does bring to mind Hector bargaining with Achilles over what to do with the loser's body."

A lift of the eyebrows from the far shorter woman, who had to step back to look at Shizuru properly.

She asked, "Are you saying you'd drag us through the sand by our heels if you win?"

"Oh, no! That is where Achilles fell afoul of the gods, after all, and I would not tempt Fortuna to turn from me with such disrespect to my worthy foes," was the answer. "No, merely his words to Hector's first offer. Perhaps you should bring that to the others as my answer."

So when Yukino returned to her comrades, she bore the answer direct from Homer: There are no binding oaths between men and lions; wolves and lambs can enjoy no meeting of the minds. An answer that chagrined them so much-Whom did Fujino think she was calling "lambs", exactly?-that they decided they were fools to think such a woman could be approached with the civility of an outstretched hand. They resolved to escalate their efforts in destroying her purpose. Which was exactly what Shizuru wanted, as a matter of fact, because the sooner the struggle reached the highest point, the sooner she believed she could break the enemy's hold... not knowing the enemy was dedicating itself to a battle of delay and indirect confrontation.

Thus the tug of war in Hime raged on, neither side willing now to give ground nor believing it could possibly lose. The standoff split Hime right down the middle, with most of the senators ranging on the Traditionalist side and the populace, plutocrats and progressives on Shizuru Fujino's. Work as either side would, nothing seemed capable of ending the deadlock. What the situation needed was a catalyst, a spark to send their impasse up in flames.

The spark would not come until August.

---

When Takeda Masashi received the invitation to hold diplomatic talks with the Mentulae at Argentum, he had the idea of taking with him one legate, and settled upon Suou Himemiya. Ironically, she had been the one most against the march; after he made clear that he would brook no argument, however, she suddenly changed her mind and insisted on accompanying him. Thinking her turnaround complete, he was thus quite glad to take her along, and so expected his trip to Argentum to be a pleasant one. Unfortunately, it turned out to be anything but... especially because of Suou Himemiya.

The differences between them showed from the start. Takeda had soldiered only under commanders who insisted on going by the book, which meant he insisted on a proper baggage train even if they were carrying only half a legion and seven hundred cavalry. Not Suou's style, for the only two commanders under whom she had soldiered before had both been obsessed with travelling light. The first was her elder sister, for whom she had been a contubernalis : Chikane Himemiya, although she had a baggage train, had always preferred a highly shortened one, so short most bandits blinked at seeing it and refrained from ambushing what looked so baggage-poor a cavalcade. Chikane also liked to use mules for her baggage, disliked the trouble of the standard and slower-if more powerful-oxen. Nor did she like encumbering her armies with its spoils when more battles would be necessary: she often sent all booty ahead to Hime under a separate but heavy guard, leaving her fighting legions free to manoeuvre as they wished.

The second commander of Suou's experience was even more unusual of tactic, having taken Chikane's example of mules-over-oxen and adding a stunning variation to it. Often eschewing the baggage train itself, Shizuru Fujino just strapped the gear on the legionaries themselves and marched them off willy-nilly. This style had actually contributed greatly to her legend, provoking many a joke amongst the men who had had to carry those extra thirty-pound packs for miles on end: not for anyone else, they swore, would they ever do it! They slogged through dust and drizzle, through snow and sleet-just about anywhere with the burden always on their shoulders, and always with the same dizzying speed. But never complained. Quite impossible to complain when their general took her share of weight and also went on foot, even going double the normal paces because she was always going up and down the ranks to chat with the legionaries and praise them as they walked. Making them merry enough to forget the packs and the fact that they were marching enough to cover at least thirty miles a day, on the slow days. You've not marched, went the joke among those who had served with her, until you've done a Fujino march.

Having in mind such commanders, Suou thus insisted that there should be either a very small baggage train or none at all for their march to Argentum. Takeda being of the opposite opinion, as well as cautious enough to want to buy more cheap grain than they would need-he intended to save money by not having to buy grain in Argentum, where the prices were higher-an argument ensued over the issue. Unfortunately for Suou's case, she was the subordinate, and thus the foregone loser. She ceded the argument and persuaded him to at least bring the artillery if they were to have a baggage train.

"Why?" he asked at the time, genuinely surprised by the request. "We're not going to lay siege to our own allies, you know! Sometimes, Suou-kun, you really are peculiar."

"Go ahead and call me peculiar," she told him with smooth laughter. "I'd just like to be good and whole when you do say it."

She insisted so strongly on the point that he gave in to the request as a concession, thinking her truly odd. Artillery without a possibility of impending siege? He had no idea she was thinking of her previous general's words on the subject.

Artillery should become a staple in the battlefield, I think, Shizuru had told her once, as they inspected the latest pieces developed by the engineers. I do not mean merely for siege. I want artillery to be used regularly, even in pure field encounters. What is the point of restricting ourselves in the use of technology, if the technology can be made to adapt to more than one purpose? Take these scorpions, for instance. Handy little things! Do you know how to use them, Suou-chan?

Shizuru had shown her, using one of the scorpion ballistae to plug several trees in the distance, each bolt going right through the middle of the trunk. Suou learned how to do it... and absorbed the rest of the lesson. Artillery in the midst of battle might not be too standard, but that would be the advantage-and when the possible enemy had such an overwhelming lead in numbers, all other advantages would be necessary.

So when the little army set out from the port city, it was baggage-heavy and bringing its own artillery. It also proceeded at a much slower velocity than Suou and the five cohorts of the Seventh would have liked, even if their current commander thought they would be grateful to him for the easy pace. Muddy ground is hard on the ankles, he said benevolently, seated high atop his general's horse.

What he said was true, as the earth was spongy, and not very good for walking. Even so, the men he had with him were too apprehensive to rest easy in his indulgence. They disliked the reason for their trip as much as Takeda's accompanying legate did. Said legate also bickered with the commander so regularly that he soon regretted his decision in having taken her along with him.

Six days away from their destination, she brought up her arguments again while the legionaries made camp.

"I don't like this," Suou told him. "I really don't like this."

"Oh, Suou-kun, stop being so negative, please!" Takeda cried, exasperated beyond belief. How many times had she already flogged this argument? Oh, when he set out so cheerfully from Argus with Argentum and a nice peace treaty waiting for him, he had not expected to be travelling with someone so contrary!

"Then perhaps you should stop being so romantic," she sighed, her drowsy eyes blinking slowly. "I hate to belabour the point, Takeda-kun, but you should know I'm not the sort of person to pester without reason for it. At least grant there is reason to be suspicious, considering the ones we go to meet are the very same ones I and the rest of this army were fighting only some time ago. Added to which is the fact that we have yet to hear from our scouts sent weeks into the past, and that no messages from Argentum seem to be forthcoming. Especially suspicious, when you consider that even Yamada-san's agents have been tardy in their cross-border business-or so he claimed last I spoke to him."

"That Greek trafficker!" he exclaimed, finding the name worthy of nothing but a scowl. He had not been impressed by the man when they met, deeming the man an un-Himean pretender seeking only money or elevation for his supposed information-an opinion that worsened even more after Takeda learned his predecessor had promised said un-Himean pretender the citizenship.

"Well," Suou sighed. "If you don't want to take him at his word, then think of our scouts, please."

He sucked on his teeth.

"There's that, true," he said patiently. "But there must be some reason for it. I imagine the paths are much more difficult up ahead, or something. The thaw must be worse near Argentum."

She shook her head. "They should still have returned by now, if that were the case."

"Banditry thrives in these parts," he proposed, gesturing to the forest thick about them. "It might be, you know, though it would be unfortunate if that's the case."

"All the more reason, at the very least, that we should be making a stronger camp than this."

"Oh, not again!"

"Yes, again. Just think of it as caution," she replied coolly, her extraordinary light eyes on the orderly activity of camp-making taking place. "You said it yourself. We're walking into highly-forested area, where an ambush grows more and more possible. Our scouts not only have yet to return, but the available number of men we can afford to send out is drastically dwindling. We have barely two alae of horse with us-and we can't afford to keep losing more of them to scouting since they're of the Lupine division! A good number of these are Otomeian nobles, mind, and the most elite of their soldiers besides. They're matchless auxiliary. Both horses and their riders are too precious, especially when you consider we have only five cohorts for infantry. Needs must conserve forces."

He shook his head at the criticism in the words, barely hanging on to his unravelling patience.

"Well, what do you want me to do, then?" he demanded, holding out both hands in supplication. "I'd like to point out that, for all your doomsaying, we've got this far without meeting a single bit of trouble! Except for the scouts, everything's gone pretty much as I expected... and can we really be blamed if a few foreign auxiliaries defect or take a side-trip somewhere because they're getting closer to their home territories?"

"Try saying that to Natsuki-san," she retorted, growing even more frigid; she was very like her older sister in displeasure, which always showed in them as a sudden frost. "Because she's been fidgeting all this time at the loss of some of her best scouts without their absence being taken as a warning."

He bit the inside of his cheek angrily.

"We should make the camp stronger," she repeated.

Takeda gave up. "If it will make you feel better, why not?"

"Good! I can handle it, then?"

He threw up his hands: "Do whatever you want!"

A quick nod to him, and she was already walking away.

"Takashi!" she yelled. "Kintarou!"

Meanwhile, Takeda ran a hand through his hair in the classic gesture of exasperation and shook his head ruefully at his legate. The two senior primipilii Suou had called were already approaching, and he decided to leave her to instruct them as to whatever it was she wanted. Perhaps, he hoped, if he let her have his way here then she would finally calm enough for them to make the few days' march left. They were so very close to the destination, barely a week's worth of travel remaining. Barely a week of easy walking, if Suou would only stop being so contrary.

He slipped away, his mind fixing suddenly on the prospect of a nice, un-contrary drink of wine. How he needed it!

"We want a stronger camp," his legate was telling the centurions when he left them. "Too perilous not to have a fall-back position in case something goes awry. I'm not saying something will go wrong, but we need to be on a higher alert than usual, especially given that our scouts haven't returned after all this time." She frowned shortly while glancing to the woods nearby. "And this is more forest than I would like."

The centurions nodded, eyeing the fair patrician with greater respect; they had been feeling prickly for a while, almost as though they could sense eyes in the trees about them.

"Double the towers for this camp and add four more metres to the walls," she ordered, brisk in her commands because she had devoted much thought to them the past few days, and had also seen a truly great general go through these motions already: her crimson-eyed friend had given her an object lesson before in how to set up a strong camp, and Suou still remembered what the woman had drilled into her head.

"We've got plenty of trees around," one of the centurions told Suou, indicating the woods. "They'll do fine for what we want."

"Shall have to," Suou answered, scuffing the toe of her boot on the muddy ground. She looked up and beckoned to one of the noncombatant servants attached to the troops before returning her attention to the centurions. "Yes, definitely more logs. Pare down that forest."

"I'll send them felling again. What we hauled in already is just enough for the usual."

"Get all the added lumber now. I want the breastworks raised by tonight-and make no mistake, Centurions, that when I say tonight, I mean tonight ! We'll all work until dark if necessary."

The men grinned and said they understood.

"And keep the branches for scorpion bolts when you get to lopping off from the logs. What a good thing I insisted on bringing artillery! I'd like several of the engineers assigned to that, although we can get to shaping and sharpening the bolts inside the camp when it's finished. Can we get rocks?"

"The stream."

"Get some men to it, and have the engineers work on diverting a good, usable channel of water, just in case." A wry smile appeared. "Perhaps it's as well our commander insisted on bringing far more food than necessary, after all, though I'd not like to say anything for certain."

The servant she had called was waiting.

"Find me the Otomeian princess," she said simply, knowing everyone knew by now who that was—even Takeda, for whom it was a recurrent private slap in the face. He had once presumed to try and purchase her from someone, after all, as though she were no more than a slave. It was so mortifying! Cast off their royalty Himeans might have, but many of them could still be impressed by existing, if foreign specimens of it. And the particular foreign specimen in question had to be one of the most impressive, if anything.

"What about the trenches?" Kintarou asked when the servant went away. "Can't dig any more, can't deepen what's already there." He pointed an eyebrow at the mud Suou had just dug up with her boot. "Ground's either mushy or still iced up."

Takashi finished the thought: "More stakes in them?"

Suou flashed her lazy smile at him.

"Enough to stick a legion's worth of pigs," she said. "I'm praying it shan't come to anything, boys, but if it does—I daresay we'll have ourselves a roast!"

The centurions ran off to execute the orders, happy that they were actually doing something about their unease. How nice to find that at least one of the people in the command tent understood it! For they were quite impressed by the young legate's grip of the situation, and the businesslike efficiency with which she rapped out the directives.

She had worked with Shizuru Fujino, after all: no matter what others might say, experience told there.

Natsuki arrived on the scene.

"Thank you for coming so quickly," Suou said in greeting, noting with a wince the blue-black shade extending from the bottom of the Otomeian's eyes: it could no longer be hidden by the thickened ring of black Natsuki was applying around her lashes these days. Suou allowed herself a moment to muse on this other one of her problems. Thank the gods for Shizuru's letter that arrived last month! It had seemed to cheer up the girl a little before they marched, and Suou knew for a fact that Natsuki reread it whenever they stopped for the night. The girl also seemed to be on slightly better terms with her food after it arrived, which told Suou one of the Otomeian's anxieties had truly been that Shizuru would not write. Foolish girl! Was she really so unaware of how soundly she had conquered Shizuru?

Even with the good effects of the letter, though, there were new chaperoning difficulties with which Suou had to contend these days. It was no longer possible to use the 'gifts from Shizuru' to help the Otomeian with depression, as they were on the march and not in a city. Nor was it easy to find milk for the girl's prescribed drink, for that matter. Oh, what legate ever had so many things go wrong in her first shift, and so quickly?

She covered the personal queries first.

"How are you feeling and when did you last eat? You did not get too much rest last night, I think."

That earned a long-suffering grimace. Well, what do you expect me to say when you look like that, thought the frustrated Himemiya, who set it aside for the moment; she would have all the time to earn all the grimaces she wanted later, once they were in a properly fortified camp.

"All right," was all Natsuki said, and with one of her weariest shrugs. "My men... not yet returned."

"I know. And yes, I am worried. I tried to talk to Masashi about it, but you know how he is."

"Thick," the girl rumbled mutinously. "Very."

Suou nodded in agreement.

"I called you over because we need help building, Natsuki," she said. "There aren't enough men, as you know, and I feel more anxious the closer we get to Argentum. I've managed to persuade our commander, at least, that we should build a really heavy camp, since we're so close already. I want a defensible fallback position in case something does go wrong. Can you see your way to sparing half of your men to help us set up the main camp? The other half can keep working on the cavalry's stables and section."

Some of the haggardness went out of Natsuki's face. So she had been feeling the unease too, thought the legate.

"Our servants and grooms, they can do most of the work," the girl said. "Not half. I can-I will -have all my men help you, but for some. I want to keep some. Not more than maybe one hundred?"

She turned her head to stare at the forest hedging them, and then turned to Suou again. "If your men have to go there again, some of us will keep watch. Or if they have to go farther than there."

Suou smiled, pleased by the Otomeian's quickness.

"Excellent," she said, and meant it.

They finished the fortified camp that day, and it was to all appearances a camp sturdy enough to withstand a siege, its construction having been carried out to Suou's exacting satisfaction. Surely it was worthy of satisfaction, thought the general of the mission, who believed his legate would no longer protest to his desires of marching on. Unfortunately, he found even two days after that she refused to march again, once more citing the scouts and messengers who had failed to return. And yet again, the general found himself in another debate with his legate, who was proving to be so opposing these days that he suspected it to be some manner of ailment.

"Either we stay put and send for reinforcements, or we march backwards and go to Sosia," she said.

"We've already passed Sosia!" he exclaimed, bewildered by so much stiff resistance from someone he had always known to be so laid-back. "We're so close to Argentum, Suou-kun! Five, six days at most! At the very least, we should march to know exactly why the scouts are not returning! The sooner we put into Argentum, the sooner we should be able to reorganise, not to mention have our men in a much safer place. You keep saying you're concerned. There is a legion of our soldiers sitting right in that city we're headed to, you know."

That earned him a level stare.

"I do know," she said flatly. "And yes, I believe we should eventually march to Argentum to find out why the scouts are not returning. But I do not believe we should march to it like this, so blindly. Do try to see it, Takeda-kun-you could be leading all of us into peril. I know you want to get a peace treaty very badly, but try to remember, please, what all the rest of us do: the people you want to meet are the same ones who killed some of our comrades in battle, very recently."

But that reminded him too much of the things said to him by the woman he had replaced, whose ghost he had been feeling more and more of late. This was perhaps where Suou made a mistake, for whatever part of him might have been willing to listen to her protests was stoppered up by all the feelings he had been trying to hide: all the resentment and uncertainty and hate. Was this really his army? Why was it that he felt dogged, every step he took, by whispers of comparison? His legate and old friend was becoming a curmudgeon who echoed of her, his legionaries restless and not as friendly as the ones he had known on his other campaigns. Even the girl he pined for refused to say more than one word to him when they spoke, and seemed to be wasting away-and, he very well knew, not for his sake. All because of the spectre of a woman that seemed bent on haunting him!

He glared at Suou, all patience exhausted.

"We march tomorrow," he told her curtly. "And that's it! No, I don't want to hear it-not another word, damn it! Tell the men to be ready to leave by dawn. That's the least you can do. You've been so bloody uncooperative!"

Her eyes flickered and communicated a faint contempt he could read.

"You're bent on being a fool, it seems," she said, ignoring the fresh rush of blood flooding into his face. "Remember that I warned you, if it ever comes to it! Though I'd rather be proven a liar, in this case: scant comfort I'd have in any of it ever becoming."

"Oh, go away!" he cried, tried beyond all endurance. "Let me have some peace, I beg of you!"

"If that's what you wanted, you should never have taken over this army," she retorted, after which Parthian shot she left him in his tent. But not to brood as he did: she went to inform the centurions and other officers of the march, and then went to sit at her desk and send for Natsuki. Who materialised with her usual superhuman alacrity.

"He insists we march tomorrow and nothing can persuade him otherwise," she told the Otomeian calmly; the two of them were alone. "I've done all I can here. I am sending letters to both Ushidasan in Argus and our old comrade who's still based in Sosia, Toshisan. I plan on informing them of the situation and all the markers supporting my suspicions. Both of them will know what needs to be done and will do it."

The large eyes stayed upon her.

"Secrecy?" the girl suddenly said, which brought a smile to Suou's face.

"Yes," the legate admitted. "He doesn't want to send to them and bring up reinforcements. Probably thinks it's too much trouble, you know. So he's not going to know I'm already doing it for him as a favour-or, say, an act of good will."

"The messenger will know?"

"Better they do, I think. One who knows, at least. Another can just act as safety, accompaniment."

"We must choose well."

"I have already chosen someone." Suou came out with it: "I want it to be you."

"No."

A pause followed the word. Suou blinked as if to reassure herself she was awake, then spoke again.

"That was an order," she said.

"No," Natsuki answered.

Pale blue clashed with green, and had anyone else been in the room, they might have frozen solid from the drop in ambient temperature. As it was, only the two women took the measure of each other, both creatures used to having their orders followed, and now radiating the awesome aura of their respective aristocracies.

"I'm your superior officer, Natsuki," the blonde woman said, her very pale brows rising. "If I say you should go, then you should."

The beautiful, prone-to-pout lips set and thinned.

"No," Natsuki repeated.

"What do you mean 'no'?"

"I refuse."

"You refuse?"

"I refuse."

The Himean leaned back in her seat, frowning direly at the girl standing before her.

"You do know to refuse this is technically insubordination?" she asked. A faint twinkle was in her eyes. "Punishable offence, for which no one would blame me no matter what I did. Although that could work out well for the purpose too, in a way: I could have excuse to send you packing home to Otomeia."

As the girl was no fool, she did not find the statement at all surprising: she had understood Suou's reason for wanting to send her from the beginning.

"Will not be well for your purpose," she said. "If I go, my men go with me."

"Are you threatening mass defection of the auxiliaries?"

"Not threaten," said the dark-haired troublemaker. "I tell."

"Worse than a threat then!" Suou said, finding it in herself to keep her face stern. But how difficult it was, when the girl on the other side of the desk was eyeing her with such haughty dignity, aloof-yet-sympathetic like a court advocate for the defence. What a perfect Himean she would have made, thought the actual Himean, wishing she were not so hugely amused by what was happening.

"That would be unpardonable, Natsuki, and a breach of the treaty between our countries," she told the mutineer dangerously. "You know Hime does not take abandonment or fickle actions by its allies so lightly."

"Neither do we," said the young woman, switching abruptly into her beautiful Greek; Suou quieted to listen, quite appreciating the sound of the Otomeian's mellifluous dark voice even as it argued against her will.

"I refuse your decision as it is made lightly," Natsuki reasoned, articulating her thoughts with the scholarly precision she had in that language. "I am part of this army and leader of the auxiliary you carry. If I leave now, I abandon them, and you, and my duty. Such an act is not the representation of what you mean by 'fickle'? Such is not abandonment, an act a true leader calls infra dignitatem ?"

"Shizuru-san was a true leader," Suou countered to this. "And yet she had to leave behind her army at the behest of her commanding officer-which, in her case, would be the Senate and People of Hime. Would you then consider what she did so worthy of scorn?"

"I find the analogy... inapt," the girl returned gravely. "Her recall required her specifically. No other could substitute, as no other was elected urban praetor. The task you want does not require me specifically. Another can substitute as messenger without harm to the task. The analogy collapses."

The Himean's lips were trembling.

"So it seems," she growled softly.

Natsuki plodded on, determined to push her argument further while she was still being allowed to speak; she had noticed the changes in the legate's demeanour and interpreted them as signs of rapidly mounting irritability with her defiance. Squaring her shoulders, she drew enough breath for a good final speech.

"Hypothetically," she pronounced, drawing a muffled sound from the now-shaking woman behind the desk. "Let us say that-that the analogy is apt, if you wish. But we still find a flaw in the reasoning. The analogy returns to the original problem: we find ourselves in this situation because of what happened tuh-tuh- to Shizuru ."

She slowed her pace after the stutter, but by dint of strict concentration managed to say the rest clearly.

"The true leader was removed for a reason counter to the interests of the many. No one could substitute for her, so we are led here... where one who pretends to substitute places us in danger. I am the true leader of the auxiliary. No one could substitute for me exactly. If you send me away for a task not requiring me and only me, you place my men and yours in more danger unnecessarily. So considered, your analogy destroys your reason."

She rasped a deep breath, relieved to be finished and thoroughly pink in the cheeks.

"I refuse you only because it is logical for me to refuse," she concluded. "As you see."

Bracing herself for the rejoinder that was undoubtedly coming, she set her jaw again and looked at the blonde with a combination of apprehension and obstinacy. To her surprise, she found herself on the receiving end of an odd look that had in it something so inapt she had difficulty identifying it.

Until the Himean helped her by bursting into hilarity.

" Ecastor !" the blonde cried in between whoops. " Ecastor !"

Natsuki gaped at the laughing woman, flabbergasted. Of all the possible retorts she had imagined, none had certainly contained laughter.

"Oh, all right already!" Suou said later to her, wiping away genuine tears. "By the gods, what a patrician you would have been! Go and find someone you can trust to do it, then come back here so I can hear you argue with me again in that lovely Greek. Jupiter, it truly is a pity!"

Shaking her head in bewilderment at the Himean she left still hooting, Natsuki went off to do as directed, wondering exactly what had just happened and unable to make either heads or tails of Suou's utterances. She was a practical girl, however, and had a great many things on her mind besides trying to understand some Himean's humours. She turned her thoughts to resolving the most immediate of her problems, for the time being.

She went to find her cousin.

"Nina," she called to the young woman, whom she found with two of her own subordinate officers: they all bowed respectfully to her. "Come with me."

The girl got up immediately and followed her until they were out of the others' range.

"An order," Natsuki said, proceeding to inform her of the command Suou had given. Once she had finished, it became clear that her cousin found the task as disagreeable an order as had she.

"But why not someone else?" demanded the younger Otomeian.
"Why me?"

"Why ask this?" Natsuki squinted, seemingly indifferent to her relative's distress. "You dither. Speed is important."

"But Natsuki, I don't-"

"Belong in my unit," the older Otomeian finished in her low voice.
"You came only to assist me. Assist me now."

"But I can also assist here!"

Natsuki disagreed: "Better you go. Once you go, I shall not think about you or the letters."

Hurt swam to Nina's eyes, was met only by an impregnable breadth of green.

"You want to send me away when we know there may be trouble," Nina said with bitterness, too tired and on edge from their situation to withhold it as she would normally. Her face crumpled, and she scowled fiercely at her gaunt but nonetheless intimidating cousin. "I can't keep up with you, so you have to think of me all the time as a burden? Leaving is the only way I can help?"

The slender black brows slanted, and Natsuki's sunken eyes narrowed within their orbits.

"You talk like a fool," she said severely, fuelling the resentment in Nina's heart before smothering it unexpectedly: "I chose you because I trust you for this."

Nina looked up at the statement, her eyes wide and heart racing.

"I need one fast on the saddle," the other continued with a frown.
"And able to stay on it for a day without stopping. I need one skilled at evasion too, if evasion is needed. There are worries enough here."

I want not to worry about the letters too when the one I send leaves. I want not to think about the one who goes because I trust them to finish the task completely. Nina . You understand me?"

The girl nodded eagerly, quite overwhelmed by this flattering expression of belief from her admired cousin. It took a while for her to realise Natsuki was waiting for her to speak.

"When do I go?" she breathed, attitude having completed a full turnabout. "Now? Immediately?"

The other woman looked away to tilt her head at another Otomeian passing.

"You will wait," she said simply. "The legate must finish writing. Today, soon."

The slender brows slanted again, although they relaxed quickly as she added: "You will reach Sosia in a week, then Argus a little over two weeks."

"I can make it in less."

Natsuki looked down at the younger woman without expression, then smiled rather suddenly to reveal that what had robbed her of flesh the past few months had not robbed her smile of its magic. Her smile was still the same one that had bowled over half of Shizuru's army without its owner even realising, although the deeply sunken cheeks and eyes did give it a new pathetic feel.

"Could be," she said, her tone making it clear she spoke a tribute. Between that and the smile, her cousin's cheeks flared. Natsuki looked away to save the girl from any possible embarrassment and folded her arms over her chest, using them to press the pearl that was under her uniform. Her eyes veiled instinctively at the familiar weight of it, but she fought the urge to close them.

"Argus..." she muttered as if without any thought to it, before her companion could move away. "There should be new mail in Argus now, I think."

"I'll be sure to get it," said the younger woman, obviously thinking they were talking about Natsuki's next letter from her Himean.

The look she received told her she had to reconsider that thought.

"Nina," said the elder girl evenly, as a further hint. "Also the regular mail."

And that word shed light upon the meaning. Nina knew that Shizuru Fujino's letters to her cousin were not carried by the normal couriers but by one of the Himean's own servants, loaded with money for the change of horses and papers of introduction should he encounter any difficulties. This man was tasked with riding at a furious gallop through the length of his journey: no stopovers save to sleep and change horses, no other purpose other than the delivery of the two letters in his pocket, one for Suou and the other for Natsuki. By the time he delivered them, he was usually so exhausted he either came down with a fever or slept away the entirety of the next day.

The rest of the mail was borne by the usual carriers, which meant it had more stopovers and less urgency. As was undoubtedly the case for any letters from the young woman who should have by now had time for writing, a young woman travelling with the legion that had been building a road while on the march. How hard Nina had been trying not to think about her! Apparently not hard enough, if Natsuki had still noticed.

"Ride fast, change horses often," Natsuki instructed. "Take caution."

Nina nodded meekly.

"I think you will be safe," Natsuki continued, her long neck craning as she tilted her head and sniffed at the air. Nina took a few discreet sniffs too and smelled nothing but the usual odours of camp, wondered for an instant if her cousin was actually scenting anything whenever she did this. Who knew when it came to one with such strange senses as Natsuki? Perhaps she smelled something no one else could? Like a coming enemy?

"Even if the missing scouts were sent in the other direction, to Argentum," the elder added, no longer sniffing but still looking up, towards the sky. "You will always take caution."

"I understand," Nina answered.

"You will take provisions and weapons. I will arrange with the legate the money and papers."

"I understand," Nina repeated.

"You will remember," Natsuki followed suddenly, her imperious syntax softened by the gentleness of her voice. "That you go is not running away. So you do not run away."

Poised to repeat the same words as before, Nina's lips fell apart soundlessly for an instant. Natsuki seemed to know she had taken the meaning immediately this time, because the older girl said no more and simply waited, furtively pressing the pearl under her shirt further into skin.

"I understand," Nina said quietly.

Natsuki nodded. She turned to go, even while leaving a parting directive.

"Prepare."

But Nina stopped her before she could leave. Acting purely by impulse, the younger Otomeian had reached out and gripped the older girl's arm. And almost wept when her fingers closed and overlapped markedly: how thin Natsuki had become!

The skeleton wrapped in her cousin's beautiful skin waited, seeming unfazed by the contact.

"I'll be quick, Natsuki," Nina blurted out, unable to remember what she had truly wanted to say. "I promise I'll be quick. And have your letter too, for you, when we next see each other."

The taller Otomeian said nothing, merely tipping her head. Nina struggled for a few seconds over what more to say, feeling awkward because she was still holding her cousin's arm, yet feeling somehow that she could not remedy the awkwardness by letting go of it. She rarely touched Natsuki, and although most of those times were kept cool by either the situation or Natsuki herself, there were also a few she remembered because of the clumsiness she was now feeling. It was always a struggle, and not because she did not like to touch Natsuki: it was because Natsuki hardly ever touched back.

"Take care," she eventually managed, choking.

The arm shrugged off her hand, and she relinquished her grip nervously. But then she felt her cousin's palm on the top of her head, giving it a brief pat.

"You will see Shizuki for me," the husky voice told her. "You will see she is fed properly?"

Nina nodded, scalp tingling from her cousin's touch. Natsuki smiled again, very briefly.

"Prepare now. Wait in your tent."

Again Nina stopped her from leaving. "Wait-Natsuki?"

"Mm?"

"If-I just thought-if you write a letter fast, I can carry it too," Nina suggested, visited by inspiration. "I can send it to Hime from Argus, if you want."

For a moment Nina tried to probe the cool eyes of her cousin. Whatever she imagined she saw there was lost quickly as Natsuki hummed again and left without a word.

Nina was able to leave shortly afterwards, still an hour or so before dark. She carried with her all the provisions and papers she would need to hasten her journey, along with several sealed letters-none of which was from Natsuki.

At the time Natsuki's cousin departed, the little army set about preparing their belongings for a march, then settled to turn in for an early night's sleep. They woke at dawn the following day, a mixture of apprehension and odd pricklings. Their commander, at least, did show them that he was not entirely casual once they marched out from camp. He sent all of the cavalry riding ahead at a distance that permitted them to act as the scouting advance, but still within sufficient reach of the Himean cohorts in case they did encounter opposition. For this his legate was both relieved and again exasperated: she admitted the wisdom of sending a strong reconnaissance force because of what had happened with their previous scouts, yet fidgeted over the thought that the girl she was chaperoning had to lead them.

As it turned out, the legate's fears proved justified: the second day into the march, the advance party came within sight of what seemed a huge army moving slowly their way. They ran nearly headlong into its scouts, but managed to wheel and retrace their tracks. Their captain did not bother seeking contact with them: that, to her, was an army ready for battle! A good thing she made that decision, it appeared. The horde-Mentulaean, judging from the armour-suddenly gave pursuit, sending an enormous detachment of their own horse to try and catch up with the fleeing Otomeians.

The chase was nerve-wracking to the Otomeians because of the suddenness. All those pricklings of the past few days had abruptly taken shape, and the shape was even larger than what they had feared. Even the horse unit sent after them seemed so big it could well swallow them up-and that was not even half of the army they had seen shuffling their way.

The chasers were Mentulaean cavalry, however, and that was a point for the Otomeians. Mentulaean horses were mere ponies next to the Lupine division's splendid chargers, so the pursuers were hard-put to catch up with the Otomeian troopers. Indeed, the Mentulae would have continued to merely trail on the Lupine horsemen's dust, had it not been for an additional consideration borne by the captain of the latter: the Himean cohorts, which she had warned by sending some of her fleetest ahead of the pack.

At first she toyed with the idea of leading the cavalry pursuing them straight to the Himean army; she estimated the pursuers to be six alae strong-what numbers these Mentulae had!-and though that was considerable, she knew that could be still be easily handled by her men with support from the Himean infantry. But then she heard an unmistakeable sound in the distance, mere minutes after the Mentulaean cavalry first began pursuit. Hooves, she thought, and something else. And then she realised that a second detachment of horse had been sent by the foe, most likely one made up of chariots.

The possibility of chariots changed the situation, especially as the ground in this area was still icy enough to support such units. Natsuki knew a standstill with the Himean infantry was no longer an option, because the second wave would undoubtedly catch up during the fight, and possibly extend it enough for the rest of that sluggish Mentulaean army to arrive. She did not know how large that army was, but from the glimpse they had seen, it was more than enough. It was necessary to retreat to the camp! But how to prevent the Himean infantry from being cut down as they retreated, how to protect them and Shizuru's precious artillery against those enemy horses coming closer...

As Natsuki pondered these matters, the Himeans had already begun their retreat, reversing the march with the speed only Himean infantry understood. Suou's cohort, which had been the rear guard, was suddenly the leading cohort as the order turned on its head. Takeda himself was to the middle, near the baggage train, when the sounds of the returning Otomeians first reached them and the warning signal was given. He thought of the same thing the Otomeian captain had: to stand ground. Before he could choose that option, however, he heard sounds louder than the distant marching beat of the infantry army heading towards them. Cavalry coming their way, and not just their own cavalry, from the sound of it! He gave the order to withdraw.

The retreat was executed at a frenzied pace by the energised Seventh, which understood very well from the sounds in the distance that at least one full army was coming. While most of them were actually spoiling for a fight, they were also veteran soldiers with enough experience to know it would be wiser to have that fight from a fortified position. The only worry was whether they would have time to make it before the enemy cavalry caught up. They gave no thought to infantry, since the Mentulaean infantry were shockingly slow, they all knew from experience. Horse, however, beat foot every time. How could they possibly make it in time? Several hours into that gruelling retreat, however, they suddenly heard another noise that hinted to them that they just might.

It was the sound of battle being joined.

The head of the Lupine division had decided to buy the Himeans the time they lacked by engaging the first wave of pursuers. Knowing she could not throw her cavalry into either a full charge or make it fight standstill because of the difference in numbers, she chose to do something that demonstrated again the immense tactical ability she had displayed at Argentum; it took advantage of both the foes' undisciplined-if-numerous ranks and her own troopers' versatility.

First, she ordered all of her men to switch to bows. Trusting that none of the first wave of Mentulae had bows or bowmen even remotely comparable to hers and also that their steeds were far inferior, she then had her men speed their mounts to what she remembered was a slightly inclined section of the road and ranged them on its crest. Once the enemy cavalry came within sight, she had her soldiers shower them with arrows from an impressive distance in a regular and precise hail. Her orders were specific to her troopers: do not bother with the riders, but shoot down all horses.

Her men followed her orders to the letter. As horse after horse fell from the Otomeian shafts, Natsuki's plan became clear: she had been counting on the fallen horses to pile up on each other, creating a ridge at the bottom of the incline that grew increasingly larger as more fell on it. Those following stumbled into the rising hurdle of fallen beasts and men, adding to its heft. By the time the Otomeian arrows ran out, two alae of Mentulaean horse had dropped this way and their huddle was sufficient to act as a wall into which the remaining four alae following crashed, momentum preventing these from turning to the uncluttered sides. Even as those at the very back of the Mentulaean charge began to slow enough to do that, however, the second part of Natsuki's plan was executed: the Lupine division charged down and came pouring through either side of the man-and-horse roadblock, waving their frightful weapons and screaming bloody murder.

The pursuers suddenly found their situation reversed-nay, worse than reversed. While the Otomeians had been able to flee earlier, the Mentulae were blocked by the Lupine warriors enveloping them in a noose, one part of it made up by the wall of Mentulaean dead. They fought back desperately, but the shock of the volte-face was too great. Their horses were also still winded, whereas the Otomeian ones were comparatively fresh given the pause they had moments earlier. All the Otomeians had to do was push them inwards while attacking and their mounts began to crash into each other, the pressure in the jumble escalating as more of the beasts panicked. Those Mentulae closest to the wall of fallen horse had the worst of it, for they were so tightly packed they could barely turn their mounts, nor even draw swords without cutting each other. A death trap closing in: what had started as a chase became a setting for massacre.

The Otomeians were quick to take the opportunity and were also very ably led. Urging on her men, their captain tightened the noose on the trapped foes until there came a point where a good part of the Mentulae dying were actually those being pushed deeper into the human-horse ridge made earlier, falling on those trying to clamber out of it and crushing them and each other. They did not even realise why the Otomeians did not seem to be stumbling on each new ring of Mentulaean dead their killing noose made. By rights this should have happened, since the number of falling Mentulae was sufficient to create fresh humps of dead that could slow the mounted attackers' progress. That it did not was because of the forethought of the Lupine division's captain.

Once the noose of cavalymen had been thrown around the Mentulaean troopers, Natsuki had ordered her men to do the inverse of what she had told them earlier-that is, that they now had to kill riders and preserve the horse. This way, each time an enemy trooper had his head lopped off by the daos or longsword, one of the free Otomeians would grab the reins of his horse and pull it outside the noose, dead rider still on. The Otomeian leader had given thought to it all, and thus reaped a remarkable upset that would have made her Himean lover unbearably proud.

This bloodbath would have ended with every single one of that first wave of Mentulaean pursuers dead had it not been for the second group, the chariots. Just as the Lupine division had whittled down their trapped enemy to less than a hundred, these finally caught up and began to shoot: not caring whether they hit what remained of their own comrades or the Otomeian troopers. Natsuki gave the signal to withdraw, and the Lupine division was pursued once more.

It was already dark then, and their flight went on into the deep hours when their foes would stop to sleep. It was not until the following day's dawn that they showed up at camp, every Himean soldier up on the ramparts and looking for them. Cheers rang out when the bedraggled Otomeians rode in the gates that had been kept open for their sake, and legionaries ran to their aid.

One of the first to come tearing down from the walls when they returned was Suou, who had been in a fit of anxiety over their situation. Ever since the last of the cohorts had reached camp safely, late in the night, she had been holding her cohort armed and ready to go out should the Otomeians arrive with pursuers still behind them. There had even been a point where she demanded that Takeda send out some of the army with her so she could fetch their missing auxiliary, but he very rightly refused, worried as he also was. If they were safe, they would turn up soon, he told her sensibly enough, and settled instead for posting an all-night watch. Suou chose to be one of those on the towers, and was thus one of the first to see the Lupine division appear with the first golden fingers of dawn.

"Natsuki!" she cried, helping down the young woman over whom she had been so agitated. The girl was filthy with gore, and there was an arrow sticking through one calf, its protruding tip even scratching her horse. The Otomeian stumbled upon dismount, then wobbled before settling all her weight on her unharmed leg and staying there with exquisite balance.

Suou yelled for a medic and led the girl limping to a stool. The other Otomeians were also dismounting, wincing as they were able to rest their feet on ground again. The Himeans rushing to help them, and Suou watched the weary troopers coming down raggedly from their horses. Not a one was without injury, although most seemed capable of standing, and even looked quite cheerful.

"How many?" she asked of their ill-looking captain.

Natsuki showed the faintest hint of a smile.

"Six alae," she said, voice rough with thirst.

" Six ?"

"Mmh."

Suou shook her head at the drained girl, her pale eyes shining with anger and emotion.

"They are matchless auxiliaries, damn him!" she growled fiercely, stopping the girl when she attempted to rise. Some of the Otomeian's officers were already headed their way, and the medic had arrived to elevate Natsuki's leg. "No, do not get up yet, please! I'll get some slaves to wash you after the doctor finishes, or all that blood on you shall get your wounds festering. You can get up later."

Natsuki's face moved, her eyes searching her warriors' ranks with patent concern. She was counting her men. Her hand came out to Suou's in mute supplication, and Suou saw that the bandages had been torn off the knuckles of that hand, along with the skin. She whipped to the physician, who was inspecting the arrow in Natsuki's calf.

"Well?" she snapped impatiently.

He continued what he was doing for a few seconds.

"Lucky," he grunted. "It doesn't look to have hit any arteries. Still, it's off to surgery for her."

Suou exhaled loudly with relief, applying pressure to Natsuki's shoulders again. The latter noted the touch was lighter this time.

"Your wounded will be tended to, Natsuki, never fear," Suou told the young woman, handing her a cup of water which a servant had brought. "See, our men already go amongst them! I'll be back to check on you once I've seen the status up there-but please stay here and let them see to your wounds first. Your officers are here to see you, so direct them if you need something to be done. Don't even think of getting up unless the doctor allows it. Gods know you and your men have done more than enough, compared to the rest of us! Oh, you're wonderful!"

After which heartfelt praise she ran off to clamber up a tower once more, calling out orders ceaselessly. She found the men on the ramparts still celebrating, the Seventh's morale having risen considerably after the auxiliary's victorious return. There was darkness tainting the jubilation, however: all of those on the walls could now see the glint of armour in the distance, and hear distinctly the tramp of the Mentulæan army coming ever closer to their little fort. By late afternoon, the elation over the auxiliary's triumph had all but fizzled out as hordes of Mentulæe began to line up before their eyes. Thousands of bladed chariots and horse were first, followed by even more foot warriors-and all of these spilled onto the space around the tiny camp like the forecasted spring floods. The grossly understrength legion and its allied cavalry were completely surrounded.

The siege of the Seventh began three days before the Calends of July.

Chapter 50

Vocabulaire:

1. Assembly - A meeting of the Roman people called specifically for the purpose of debating or dealing with governmental or legislative matters. The three Roman assemblies varied in composition: the Centuriate, which organised the people into their economic classes; the Popular, which organised the people into their tribes; and the Plebeian, which did not allow the participation of patricians.

2. Castor's - Actually the Temple of Castor (thus: Castor's Temple). State houses included temples, which meant many temples were used as government offices, and often had paper-filled nooks and basements.

3. Contio (s. L.), contiones (pl. L.) - Preparatory meetings convoked for assemblies (see note above) to discuss any one of various comitial matters, including elections and the promulgation of laws.

4. Imago (s. L.) - A likeness made of wax and crafted as a mask, generally used for ceremonial purposes, e.g. ancestral parades during rites like funerals, where actors were hired to play the roles of the family's ancestors. They were passed down generations, so a person with illustrious ancestors could have quite a collection. A good imago reproduced a person's features with great faithfulness, from their wrinkles down to the shade and quality of their hair: even imperfections or scars were included. Imagines (plural) were thus exquisitely lifelike... and expensive. They were hidden away from dust and corruption in a special cupboard, taken out only for special occasions.

5. "It is because the barbarians have no Greek." - To be understood, the remark takes both a bit of recollection regarding past notes in the story and some familiarity with Greek texts on warfare. A fair number of Greeks who wrote treatises on warfare discussed the use of fire (especially for projectiles), going so far as to prescribe different recipes for creating incendiary mixtures. Recall then that the Mentulae are not users of Greek, which is why they are unlikely to be familiar with such Hellenic tomes. Recall too that at some point in this story, the statement "he has not a measure / an ounce of Greek" was used as a Himean (Latin) put-down for someone considered uneducated. Good Greek was expected of Roman nobles or Latin intelligentsia, and so it is too for the nobles of Hime.

When Natsuki derides the Mentulae as uneducated or unlettered by her line, she also pokes fun at her Himean allies. This is found in her ironic treatment of what she is practically calling 'the Mentulaean lack of education'. After all, the 'unlettered' Mentulae are determined unlettered in her statement only because they do not know Greek, having in place of that 'language of the lettered' another. What is this other? Himean, the language of Natsuki's allies-who are also the originators of Natsuki's put-down.

There lies the question: if a Himean (Person A) considers barbaric a Mentulaean (Person B) who has no Greek but has Himean (Person A's own language) instead, then what exactly makes a barbarian by Person A's definition? If we recall, too, that the word "barbarian" developed from the onomatopoeia supposed to represent the sound the Hellenes heard when listening to a foreign language, Natsuki's insinuation becomes more apt. She is actually jesting about what various people-especially the Himeans-consider 'unlettered', 'uneducated', or 'barbarian'. A pun with a bite.

6. Mea vita (L.) - Extremely affectionate endearment: "my life".

7. Peregrinum est, non legitur. (L.) - "It is foreign to me: I cannot understand it." Suou is referring not to the specific words, but to Natsuki's syntax effect and skip-style communication. She might as well be saying, Otomeium est, non legitur. "It is Otomeian to me: I cannot understand it."

8. Pila (pl.), pilum (s. L.) - The standard-issue Roman military spear

9. Publicani (L.) - Individuals/organisations hired by the Roman State apparatus (specifically, the Treasury) to farm taxes on its behalf. Tax farming activities were more elaborately discussed in an earlier chapter of the story-the 13th, to be precise-and can be found in the third part of that particular chapter, "parts" being delineated by the long horizontal bars denoting page breaks on this website.

10. Rostra (L.) - The name given by the Romans to the speaker's platform on one side of the Well of the Comitia. This is the place where tribunes of the plebs hold their assemblies.

11. Wakizashi (L.) - Traditional Japanese blade about the length of a forearm. Thus shorter than the katana, it was primarily used for defence, and generally held to be one of the best weapons for this purpose.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

par ethnewinter

---

The Mentulae took a full day to array themselves before the Seventh's camp. About half of them had actually swept past the little fort upon arrival, which manoeuvre let the watching Himeans suppose their intent. The half that passed, actually a full army by itself, took with it nearly all the artillery the Mentulae were pulling, and was guessed to be destined for one of the two Himean city-provinces to the south. The Himeans did not know it at the time, but the army that went south was led by another prince of the Mentulaean empire, a half-brother of the captured Artaxi, whom Shizuru Fujino had defeated at Argentum.

The still-enormous force that remained to besiege the Seventh was in the care of a favoured baron of Obsidian's court. Baron Procaleps was actually meant to invest the city of Sosia, but the prince with whose army he had been marching had seen fit to give him other orders after running into this Himean outpost. The baron was told to destroy it first. A worthless deviation as far as the baron was concerned, since he would have preferred to ignore such a tiny force and simply drive for the original target. Nonetheless, trusting to the overwhelming number of his troops and the excellence of his own military mind, he settled down in front of the Himean camp and proceeded to siege it, expecting the matter to last for no more than a few days. One look at the odds would surely convince the defenders that the only thing to do was lie down and roll over.

The problem with this plan came when the doughty Himeans demonstrated they were not very good at lying down and rolling over. Part of the blame too fell on Mentulaean unfamiliarity with the Himean camp style, made clear with the first assault the invaders launched: having taken appropriate time to scratch their heads at the odd look of the enemy fort, the besiegers simply charged towards it and rolled up against its walls like waves on a rock-face. Many perished in the outlying ditches, but so numerous were the Mentulae that the waves kept on coming, a seething, screaming torrent of bodies trying to tear down or scramble up the walls. The effort was heroic; the gain, pitiful. None of the wall-climbers got very far.

The Himean camp was a good one and it bristled with fortifications. All legionaries were on the ramparts, shooting arrows and poking siege spears into enemy faces. The worst went to the Mentulae who actually got sufficient spears into the walls for their footholds, since these got close enough to the top to be subjected to the Otomeians' explosive daos. It was a terrible fight for both sides as one side refused to stop coming and the other refused to stop repelling. After only an hour of this engagement, the walls of the Himean camp were painted in red-and most of the paint was Mentulaean.

Even so, the Mentulae still had the better circumstances. They had the numbers to spend in extravagance while the Himeans were fewer and had to compensate by working double or even triple shifts. The Himeans were also cooped up in a fort, cut off from added resources until dark, when they might attempt to sneak out to forage or strip the field's dead of weapons and armour. An hour before noon during that furious first attack, the defenders began to run out of arrows and pila. By noon, their arms were seized by cramps. The defence on the walls looked as if it would flag.

And then one of the auxiliary heads, the Otomeian princess, started a trend: her servants suddenly produced sacks of manure they had collected from the stables and started pouring it onto the besiegers.

As the besiegers were looking up, mouths agape from panting and yelling in the fight, many of them took the rain of excrement in the face. So shocked were they at this foul repellence that that section of the wall was cleared abruptly of enemies, with the defenders in a mirthful uproar. More sections of the wall took up the example.

That happened around the time the sun shone hot. Because the day itself had also begun warm, the shit-stink rapidly heightened, sinking the Mentulae into a crashing pessimism for what suddenly seemed a futile attack. While it may not have proven futile had they kept on, any such victory would still have proven Pyrrhic. The ratio of Mentulaean dead to Himean ones in that primary, three-hour assault was shameful: hundreds were lost to them while the defenders lost none. Sobered and itching for a wash, the Mentulae retreated to their camp and their commanders into their tents for discussion.

The next day, a more standard sortie was fought. Along with the assaults upon the walls, the Mentulaean commander ordered the engineers to assemble the siege weapons left to his army. The only difficulty with this was the ground, since it had softened enough in this area for the heavy engines to sink and rut. This made it extremely easy for the Seventh-actually half of the Seventh-to harass them, since the machines could not be moved very quickly out of battle. The Himeans' Otomeian cavalry, of which the Mentulae still had a pronounced fear, proved highly opportunistic in this respect, and several engines were lost in the following engagements. Nor did the Himean infantry seem to weaken whenever the cavalry ventured out for this purpose. They had a superior-if-alien organisation and an absolutely pig-headed view of surrender that the Mentulae found both astounding and worthy of exasperation.

Had this small camp been the Baron Procaleps's only objective in the invasion, he would have won, for he would then have been willing to commit more of his forces to the battles that developed. But his true objective was Sosia, waiting some distance away, more heavily fortified and expected to have more troops as its garrison. He might be following orders from a prince, but his primary orders carried greater weight in his head, voiced as they had been by the King. So, commit more of his troops than necessary he would not, risk more of them he refused to do... which was why the Himeans found themselves winning skirmishes they had expected to be one-sided, by virtue of the enemy's chief virtue not being used: the numbers.

Nineteen days into this fruitless and half-hearted investment, the Baron Procaleps packed up. Uttering a mighty oath to the gods, heaping imprecations on Himeans in general and one Mentulaean prince in particular, he uprooted the main force of his army and marched them off to Sosia. He left five thousand foot and all of his chariots to finish the siege, however, for he was not the sort of man who could truly stomach leaving a job undone. The forces he split off were put in the care of his son, also named Procaleps.

"Finish it quickly, but don't skimp on the result," he told the young man. "Kill every last one and burn that thing to the ground. Then come join me at Sosia."

Procaleps the Younger took up the task with the fervour of a son out to impress his father. Meeting the same resolute defence his sire had, he did not lose heart. He was convinced, besides, that the enemy was by now beginning to weaken and even run out of food. And in that last respect, he was correct. It was during his time besieging the Seventh that the Himeans experienced the first grave stirrings of hunger, from the lowest rankers to highest officers.

"We're working on less than half-rations, General," said one of the military tribunes to the Himean commander during a meeting. "The grain's almost out, and it's impossible to forage. They're tight! We can't venture far enough to actually stand a chance of finding anything, and we can't even send out messengers at night, since they're keeping close watch. They jump if they see so much as a prick dangling out."

"Let's hope it's with intent to just kill and not something worse, if they jump out for that," a senior centurion grinned wolfishly.

"We'll have to make do," said the general, his brown skin paler than usual. "And we'll keep trying, damn them!"

"Worse comes to worst, we could ask the auxiliary to surrender their spare horses for ration," suggested another tribune. "Those are big animals. Plenty of meat on them."

But the commander rejected the idea.

"They're the only cavalry we have to cover us," he said. "Let's keep them cavalry fighters as long as possible. If one loses a horse in battle, he'll just turn into another foot soldier."

"If only we could send someone!" another centurion cried. "Just one. But the cunni keep watch on us like vultures waiting for the kill. If this goes on, we'll lose by plain starvation."

"At least we have water," someone answered.

"For all we know, that could dry up any day too! It's getting warmer and warmer."

Takeda looked tiredly at the man for a few minutes, too anxious to even contest this bleak outlook. And he thought of what his legate had confessed to him when he began to voice concern: that she had actually sent letters already to Sosia and Argus, the latter being one requesting reinforcements. How embarrassed he had felt at that moment-and how impossible it had been to berate her!

"Like I said, we'll have to make do," he repeated, trying to sound more positive than he felt. "Reinforcements will come. Even if the people back in Argus and Sosia don't know we're in this situation, they know enough to have noticed something's off by now... and they did get a warning from Himemiya-san. They'll come. In the meantime, we hold these cunni at bay."

So the siege went on. At one point, the Mentulae grew more innovative, loading flaming brush onto their two remaining catapults and lobbing them over the fortified walls of the Seventh's camp. The idea came too late, however, for the weather itself helped foil the plan: sporadic showers fell to douse the flames and combined with the overall muggy damp to protect the wood. The creative stroke even made things worse for the besiegers later, for the Himeans soon answered with their own artillery twist. By order of their legate-who was thoroughly fed up with putting out flaming meteors-the defenders loaded a mixture of fat, kindling, and pitch into their own catapultae and aimed at the enemy's siege engines.

As the Mentulae were actually loading more flaming brush into their machines at the time, all the Himean missiles had to do was land close enough for the incendiary mixtures to break and spatter on the enemy catapults, which swiftly took flame. The Himeans waved a hearty goodbye to the nuisances as they burned, glad it had not occurred to their foes to use such substances for their own projectiles. Which relief provoked a puzzling remark from their Otomeian princess that no one could understand-save, it seemed, for their legate, who also needed time to think it over before she suddenly began snorting uncontrollably to herself. The remark that put her in that state was: "It is because the barbarians have no Greek."

The bigger worry for the Himeans was the change in seasons. While the light showers had helped with the problem of fire, they also augmented an increasing humidity paired with warming weather. Of themselves the Seventh did their utmost to keep their camp clean and free of dirt and faeces, but their enemies and neighbours outside the walls did not. This meant that the area surrounding them was ripening each day with potential nastiness. The Himeans would welcome any diseases that could afflict the Mentulaean camp, but not if the same ailments invaded their walls. Compounding their difficulties was that both camps also had a good number of pack-animals and horse, whose manure added to the general stink.

This was on the Himean legate's mind as she surveyed the grounds from the fort's highest tower, her face arctic despite the heat-which was still not comparable to the heat of the summers back home, she and her companions noted.

"Heavens, but their battlefield manners are obnoxious," she said, her eyes on the enemy tents. "You would think they'd know enough to keep an area free of excrement if they intended to stay in it for this long, but no. See, the bodies we killed just yesterday in their little sortie are still there! Where are their firebrands when they actually need them?"

"I think we burned them all out with their catapults, Suou-san."

"True, we might have," she grinned. "Poor Prometheus-men fail to use properly your gift stolen from the gods. All those poor corpses. Don't they look pitiful down there? Mentulaeen those bodies might be, but I feel for them."

"Aren't a civilised lot, Legate," one of the centurions on the platform grunted. "They'll leave 'em there to melt, I think, and it will be us gets the worst of it. We've got to get out of here."

"So I think too," Suou agreed. "However, our commander is doubtful about forcing a full-on fight with them still-and I can't say I don't understand. Even I have to admit it will be a bit dodgy. Their infantry still looks to outnumber us two to one and, even more importantly, their horse three to one. Given that we'll be fighting on relatively flat ground, those are madmen's winning numbers at a wager, Takashi."

She paused to look into the horizon beyond the enemy's encampment, the dark parts of her eyes shrinking as she stared into the light sky. Her sharply contracted pupils gave her the look of someone blind.

"Part of me is screaming to take them on," she admitted. "But another part is asking if it's too great a risk. If only we'd whittled them down more, from the start! But whoever's leading them now is a little more cautious than the one before, so they're not losing as many as they were earlier. A better head for siegework, this one."

"We've good boys and girls, Suou-san," one of her companions ventured hopefully.

"Oh, the very best!" Suou exclaimed. "We wouldn't have held out so long here otherwise. But we have to remember that they're also tired boys and girls. About a quarter are afflicted with enteric fevers. Their bellies are half-empty and they've had to fend off the attacks of thousands of enemies harassing them through weeks now. Whereas the Mentulae out there are well-fed and well-rested. Added to which is that they have the capacity to cover their flanks in any deployment. They left all those damned chariots, after all."

"Damned now, yes."

She turned to the new voice and frowned.

"Oh no-you again, Natsuki?" she chided the Otomeian captain, who only gave a highly-injured sniff at the censure in her voice. Two of the girl's troopers followed her ascent onto the platform. Each one carried a stool, and they arranged their superior on them after mounting the tower, helping her sit on one and rest her bandaged leg on the other. They retired unobtrusively to a corner afterwards, and Suou eyed them with palpable disapproval.

"Natsuki, what are you doing here?" she demanded of the only dark-haired foreigner. "If I recall, you were told to stay in bed and let that heal. I'm now beginning to question whether I am correct in recalling that, because you seem not to share the memory-which discriminating case of amnesia has been going on for nearly three weeks now!"

The shell-pink lips plumped into a pout. Suou knew the girl hated this sort of lecture most, but went on anyhow.

"It's because you keep ignoring what we say that your leg refuses to heal properly," she said, crossing her arms loosely before her chest and arching a threatening brow. "Haven't you grown tired of having us douse it with alcohol, then, or are you developing some sort of deviant taste for that?"

Natsuki looked at her own leg.

"Better now," she volunteered.

"Not nearly!" Suou looked too at the limb, noting the yellowish stains that had seeped again through the linen. "Look at those. It's taking much longer than I'd like for it to dry up completely, and it's all because you keep breaking it open again yourself, what with all this walking about the camp. You're like a surveyor on a rabid hunt for a building infraction! What that thing needs is a good week of rest in bed and not out of it. You have to stay off your feet, the doctors said."

The girl arched a brow meaningfully, gesturing to the stool on which she sat.

"Very obedient of you now, yes," the Himean said with patent sarcasm. "You know what I mean, Natsuki. So please, for the final time-go back to your tent and stay there, for all our sakes!"

This time, the dark brow was arched at her.

"Not for all our sakes that I leave it?" she asked defiantly. "Not for all our sakes that I have left it, thus far?"

Suou took a deep breath, knowing the girl was referring to the times she had helped marshal the defenders whenever the Mentulae came close to scaling their walls. It was impossible to belittle her value at such times because she was instrumental to their ongoing successes. Natsuki's presence in battle always galvanised her men, and their energy often infected the Himeans. Many of the Himeans admired her as well, so the sight of the obviously ill, obviously injured girl ignoring her pains to fight with them roused them into ignoring their own weariness.

Suou knew too that even more important than Natsuki's effect on determination and morale was her leadership. Natsuki knew almost mystically where to send her men next, knew which spot would soon be in danger. It was the martial streak in the girl, of course: she had the natural ability to sense such perils before they materialised, and so had proven time and time again to be an invaluable asset to the defenders. Even so, it caused a great deal of worry for both her chaperone and physicians, who would cluck angrily after the engagements were over and lecture her all the way to bed until both her ears went scarlet.

"Granted," Suou replied heavily. "But it's high time you were permitted to be a little selfish, especially given everything you've done. This is for your sake now. Go on and rest."

Natsuki insisted: "Must talk to you now."

The Himean tilted her head. "If that was all, you could have just sent a messenger to get me instead, you know. All you would have had to do was wait."

"Too important," the other responded, before adding demurely: "I need to stay here a while, too."

"Why would you need to stay here?"

"Ah." An eager lift of the head. "We talk now?"

"My god, it's as though you haven't been listening at all," Suou said, opening her eyes wide. Her surprised irises looked like pieces of the sky, bright and feathered with little bits of white. "Just to teach you a lesson, then: No . I will not indulge you any longer, Natsuki-at least, not until you understand that my indulgence of you shall stop when it's your health involved. Get your men to take you back to your tent. That's all. Be off!"

She turned away and muttered the rest to the waiting centurions, who had been trying very hard not to laugh at the exchange.

"You'd think such a smart girl would understand how dangerous it is to risk a wound in this weather," she grumbled to them, aware Natsuki could still hear her. "That mess outside isn't conducive to good health either."

"I come about that," Natsuki's low voice suddenly spoke at her back. "I want to talk about that."

"I'm not going to turn around, so go away."

"Like this is fine too."

Suou's eyes met those of Takashi, who grinned his big yellow teeth her way.

"I think you better listen to her, Legate," he volunteered to the rueful-looking patrician.

"Yes, I think I better," she agreed, whirling to face the foreigner once more. The bony, severely beautiful face smiled in triumph at her surrender.

Now I understand what you meant, Shizuru-san, Suou thought to herself, now only a little surprised that even her estimation of the Otomeian's obduracy had been wrong. She remembered thinking once that anyone who was not Natsuki's lover could easily see that the princess would be stubborn, but she still turned out to be wrong in thinking they could guess the extent of that stubbornness. Heavens, but the girl could be like a brick wall! Suou had not expected her to be this wilful, and even now the concentrated exposure to her that their situation afforded was revealing further depths of wilfulness in the Otomeian, ones that exasperated Suou to no end.

At least half of the exasperation was for herself too. Irrked as she might be by Natsuki's obstinacy, Suou had to admit she was also amused by it: sometimes titillated, even. She did not know if it was simply because of the Otomeian's childlike manner, or delicate looks, or something else... but there was a quality to Natsuki's insubordination that had you tickled even when her teeth would surprise you with a nip, or smiling even as she broke leash and rammed you like an unruly kid goat. Suou found, to her chagrin, that she was not proof to the charm of unruly kid goats-even if she did want to lock this particular specimen in a pen on occasion. Oh, princesses! Bleating, butting bundles of stubborn!

"I'm still of half a mind to order the men to cart you back to your tent," Suou threatened, flicking a glance to the troopers in the corner and wondering if they would actually obey such an order. She had long-since learned that the regard Natsuki's men gave her was fanatical. In which respect she was very like her absent lover.

Suou leaned close to the girl.

"Were you by any chance half as disobedient when it was Shizuru with you?" she asked.

" Half," was the wicked reply.

Suou's lips twitched.

"Which was still worse than your average army mule, I'm sure," she quipped, throwing back her shoulders and stretching her aching back. "I have a proposition. If you really want me to listen, you have to listen to me first. Mutual exchange, you might say. Otherwise, it's off you go."

The Otomeian cocked her head to indicate her attention.

"Promise me you shall spend the rest of the week off your feet," Suou bargained, fully aware that this might be the most she could get out of the girl. "Absolutely no walking. Ask some of your men or servants to carry you-or ask mine, even. I'll have mine put together a litter. And you have to listen to the doctors from now on."

She paused and heaved a deep sigh at Natsuki's face.

"I'm not trying to be dictatorial, really," she told the young woman, bending closer and speaking very softly because this was for Natsuki's ears alone. "It's for your health, Natsuki, as well as my well-being. There's at least one person who would skin me alive if something bad happens to you again."

Natsuki seemed to sigh, though no breath actually escaped.

"Shizuru-san would be very displeased with me already with just the leg," Suou continued. "What more if she knew about all this?"

The pensive look vanished: Natsuki scoffed.

"Why be angry with you?" she rebutted. "Illogical. Shizuru is logical."

"Generally, yes. When it comes to you, no," Suou retorted. "She tends to become very illogical when it's you involved."

To her surprise, the girl's face fell-but not in annoyance.

"No, not like that," Suou whispered urgently, putting a hand on the Otomeian's shoulder. "Do not take it like that, Natsuki: I didn't mean that as an accusation or anything of the kind. I just wanted to point out that I take my promise to look over you as seriously as she took it from me, and both of us were deadly serious in that conversation. Apologies if it came out badly."

The Otomeian responded by shaking her head and assuming an aloof look, one that seemed calculated to cover up the fact that she had just now looked miserable.

"The promise," the girl said. "All right."

"You agree?"

"Yes." And then a hasty addendum: "Unless it is an emergency, yes?"

Suou nodded slowly. "Of course, but only a true emergency. Not merely something like a burning need to stretch your legs or anything of the kind."

Ever the stickler, the girl enquired what Suou's parameters for identifying 'true emergencies' were.

"Let's just say that if another arrow is about to stick you, you have every right to get to your feet," the Himean answered with narrowed eyes.

Natsuki said she would abide by the pledge.

"Good! Break that and I swear I shall lash you to your bed and sit on you afterwards," Suou said in good humour, putting both hands on her hips as she regarded the young woman. "Why are you here then? What is it you wanted?"

Quite unexpectedly, the other lifted one hand and pointed over the railing. She was pointing towards the Mentulaean camp, her finger aimed towards the cluster of chariots currently unmanned.

"I want them," she said.

"Them-er, the bladed chariots?"

"Mm. I want them."

Suou tried to work it out by herself first, then finally gave up and quizzed the girl.

"You want to force battle, I know," Natsuki explained. "If so, no more need to wait. Not anymore."

"Why not?" A thoughtful frown. "Were you waiting too?"

Natsuki nodded excitedly. "Now it ends. The terra is perfect. We can leave this camp as soon as they are caught. The chariots are no worry... just the infantry. Maybe those are no worry too."

"Go on and tell me why," Suou urged, still with a frown.

"Suou," the Otomeian very nearly whined, enthusiasm suddenly dissipating. "You said it before... when we made this camp. You really forget, maybe?"

Suou hung her head and smiled at the young woman.

"I think I do," she sighed. "Besides which, Natsuki, I fear you're not being terribly clear. Might I ask you to either switch languages, please, or simply tell me in more detail what makes you so excited to attack them now? As it is, I am left with sentences that I can tell are related, yet whose links I cannot seem to find. Peregrinum est, non legitur. "

Natsuki audibly sighed. It had a surprising depth of expression that said to Suou that she was being very slow and the only reason she was not being scolded for it was because the Otomeian was being very patient today. Which nice bit of irony made Suou's eyes dance wildly as she listened to the very patient girl.

"You see," Natsuki said in Greek, making another point of lenience by acquiescing to both of the legate's requests. "The chariots are the most important concern for you, no? Not actually the infantry."

"Yes, that is true," Suou said in the same language, playing along with a glint in her eye. "You understand me so well! I seem to be as a clearly written book to you, or a precisely articulated passage."

"It is so in this case," the girl nodded sagely, either ignoring or simply missing Suou's joke. "But you worry for nothing. The chariots are not a concern any longer. A new factor subtracts them from the equation."

"Oh god, you sound like an Attic version of my sister."

Natsuki's brow creased. "Hrr?"

"Go on, please, and do not mind me. Why are they out of the equation?"

"The Mentulaean chariots are large, heavy," Natsuki said, excited as she came to her point. "Good in their lands, maybe, but not here. Before, they could work, because there was no hindrance. But now a hindrance arrives. They have not used the chariots in the last two engagements, so they may not have noticed-as you have not noticed-but, this close to the river, the soil changes swiftly. The feel of it, or the... I cannot recall the word... the quality... I was waiting for it. You observe later," she said, suddenly releasing a very soft, very pleased giggle that only Suou heard. "The chariots' wheels will sink and get stuck. A fine trap, this soil."

Her auditor was frozen, stunned by the good sense of this advice. In her mind, Suou was actually jumping up and down. Of course! The chariots were indeed likely to get stuck in mud like this, which fetched spatters all over the legionaries whenever they walked. Why had she not thought of it? Oh, but she was a Himean through and through: unused to thinking of the mechanics of chariots, which she had only ever encountered in these lands, and as units of the enemy. She had only thought of them swirling around their camp those first days into the siege, had not thought of the steadily worsening impediment to the conveyances in the very ground they walked. Ah, but to think now of how to use that in a battle...

She stayed still and quiet for so long that Natsuki took it upon herself to speak again, keen to regain the Himean's attention.

"I think if they are pressed enough they will try to use them," she told the fair-haired woman, looking as though she would give her a tug if she failed to surface from her daze. "And when they fail... I think there will be panic enough for a rout. But they must be pressed enough, Suou. You understand?"

Suou snapped out of her stupor and gave the girl a smile.

"Don't worry, we can press them enough to bleed oil," she said, now sharing Natsuki's enthusiasm. "I know just how to do it! Now all I have to do is convince Takeda-kun that this is the perfect time."

She paused to look affectionately into green eyes, then bent again to speak in a whisper.

"You really are a pearl beyond price, Natsuki. I'd kiss you for this if I could, but..."

The younger woman smirked at her shrug.

"Shizuru would be angry?" Natsuki suggested.

"Ready to murder me," Suou enlarged. "And with good reason. Pearls beyond price should always be jealously guarded, especially when their worth proves to be beyond the ornamental-high as they already rank there."

The Otomeian blushed and ducked. As for Suou, she straightened and turned to the centurions, who had fallen into their own dialogue ever since the conversation had switched to Greek. Most Himeans had a basic working knowledge of the language of the Hellenes, yes, but very rarely understood the elite Attic argot, especially when it was rapped out at the pace at which Natsuki and Suou had been speaking.

"Kintarou, you were down last," she said to the men, who stopped their talk. "Where was the commander?"

"Checking the supply and rations, Suou-san."

"Let's go see him-you too, Takashi. I'd like both of you to hear it." She smiled and puffed at a stray lock of hair. "Besides, he's not been very comfortable with the two of us being alone ever since we got stuck here. Afraid I'll say 'I told you so'."

They laughed heartily with her, joking all the way down from the tower. They liked their legate very much, and so their interactions were warm. Throughout the march and the time penned up in this camp, Suou had been steadily working and fighting with them, always in good humour, always ready to give a kind word to anyone needing one. As she proved so very capable, and seemed always to understand their concerns so very well, the Seventh was very quickly charmed: nearly every member of that tiny army had grown to esteem their legate even more than their current commander.

Just as Suou had planned.

This was a contingency scheme she had formulated from the start, in case their general should suddenly decide on a tactical error without room for her to manoeuvre-something even worse than this ill-fated march to Argentum, for instance, or something that would without a doubt see all of them dead. If it came to that, Suou decided, she would have to instigate a mutiny and take over, and having the support of the rankers and officers would make such a coup so much easier.

The idea was a worst-case resort, though. Not even Suou, results-oriented woman that she was, truly liked the notion. Mutiny in the army was ever the Great Unpardonable, its authors easily condemned to death by convention and law. Her principle in this matter was to always exhaust the full vocabulary of persuasion first... and only after proving the man deaf and herself mute, only then would she even remember there was such a word as rebellion .

She did not need to remember the existence of the word on this occasion, as it turned out. Takeda heard her willingly this time, and quickly adopted her suggestions. Once everything had been agreed upon, the soldiers were duly informed of the plan and given the standard pep talk-in which respect Suou actually thought the commander acquitted himself well, based on the reaction of the soldiers. The Otomeian princess disagreed with this, however, and said that the legionaries' eager responses to Takeda's speech were due more to the general exasperation with their circumstances and a desire to have an end of the matter. Smiling at the fairly reasonable assessment, Suou whispered to the girl nonetheless to be kinder. Comparing all commanders to her charismatic lover, she told her, was just a little unfair.

They set the attack for twilight, just before dawn of the next day. The infantry massed in a line and simply marched up-although they took care to do it quietly-and fell on their surprised foes, who barely received warning from the guards before they were deprived of them by Himean swords. The Mentulaeen officers were quick, however, and they rallied their still-groggy men to defence. The first few lines put together fell quickly under the relentless Himean assault, but eventually torches were lit and spines were stiffened: some of the Mentulae finally began to wake and present to the attackers a decent fight.

The conflict seemed to hold for a time in the front lines, with neither army gaining ground nor moving backward. But then something seemed to break on the Mentulaean side, which was still half-gripped by panic and the rude remnants of sleep. The Himeans, on the other hand, were fully awake and fighting as though it would be their only chance to live-which it was. The attackers suddenly swelled, seemed to push even further. When his infantry threatened to cave in, Procaleps the Younger, commander of the Mentulaean force, did the most logical thing to save it.

His actions were exactly as the Himeans wanted them.

He gave the order for the charioteers to mobilise, sending his now-awake teams to the parked conveyances. Up the drivers and archers clambered onto the vehicles and on the vehicles rolled through the mud... before abruptly getting stuck in the sludge. Natsuki's prediction came true and her plan was carried to fruition: hundreds of her jubilant troopers rode their powerful horses through the thick slush and cut down the mired chariots, many of which were abandoned by panicking drivers. Nor were the Himeans left behind in their part of the battle: once the Mentulaean foot recovered its bearings and tried to go into the standard line, the Himeans went into their own formation and continued their press.

By this time, the first glow of light was beginning to spread on the sky. The timing could not have been better, for it was just about time for the other part of the Himean offensive to strike. Suou had hidden the artillery behind and beside the left of the infantry line, which was farthest from the cavalry charge. As soon as the Mentulae saw that weakness and tried to outflank the Himean foot on that side, the artillery shocked them with a rain of missiles. The result: the Mentulae on that side fled and piled up to the Himean right. Which left them pooling neatly between the Himean line and the Otomeians. These were still cutting down the remaining charioteers on the Himean right. As more of the Mentulae from these abandoned chariots ran to the safety of their infantry comrades, both Himean and Otomeian charges followed them inwards without breaking line. The Mentulae walked themselves straight into a pincer.

The battle was relatively short, lasting for perhaps little more than an hour. So vigorously had the Seventh fought against its besiegers that nary a Mentulaeen might have been left on the field had it not been for the general's orders to spare anyone from high command, in order to extract information. Save for that handful kept alive, every other Mentulaeen was put to the sword. The Seventh and its allies had been cooped up in that camp for over twenty days by then, living on scrap rations and bone-tired from the vigilance of the besieged. They were not in a merciful frame of mind.

Suou shook hands afterwards with her commander, who announced he would be awarding her decorations as soon as he was able. This triumphant reconciliation was interrupted when one of the tribunes ran to them, calling out that the Mentulaeen camp was stuffed with food and supplies. The Seventh could have a decent meal tonight!

"Isn't it wonderful, Suou-kun?" he gasped, having been worrying about feeding the men ever since the siege began; he had actually reduced his own rations to far less than half, trying to spare what he could for the men. "Oh, this is a good day! And I'm glad you were here with me, since I'd not have thought of using the artillery to cover the left flank. That was brilliant!"

She shook her head and answered, gently, "Thank you, but I'm afraid it wasn't my idea. I remembered reading it in Harada-san's accounts of her campaign before this one, where Shizuru-san did it first-although she hid her artillery under cover of a fog, not the darkness."

So lifted was his mood by the combined victory and relief that this did not have the power to depress him. He nodded thoughtfully.

"Still, it's a good idea," he confirmed.

It was on the tip of Suou's tongue to say it was because Shizuru was a good general, but she stopped herself in time.

"I'll handle the cleanup, Takeda-kun," she told him. "You go see to the food before the men run through it like goats let loose in a garden. I've one to look after already and it's more than enough!"

"What do you mean?" Takeda asked in confusion, removing his helmet to swipe his sweaty brow. "You have a goat?"

But she merely laughed and slapped him on the back of his cuirass, told him again to go on. A look at their camp stopped her laughter once he left, for she was just about able to make out a dark head of hair peeking down at her from one of the guard-towers, all its accompanying heads a uniform blonde. She shook her head.

"You were right, Shizuru-san: she really is a brat," she muttered under her breath. "I told her to stay off her feet, didn't I?"

---

As events developed in the North, so did they in Hime. At the same time the Seventh was besieged, Shizuru and her allies went into the next stage of their plan, which was to call successive contiones for the Plebeian Assembly. This was intended to keep the plebeian people adamantly on their side by keeping public interest stoked and furiously blazing for them. Very easily handled, because they had one of the greatest-and to the Traditionalists, worst -tribunes of the plebs in history on their side, in the person of Urumi Himemiya-Kanzaki.

She had by now become legendary in her doings on the rostra, which meant she drew crowds consistently whenever she began to declaim. Indeed, even some senators or knights known to have more conservative sympathies attended her contiones not for the sake of argument, but rather to watch her antics. Easy to hate the scoundrel, these almost-fence-sitters said, but hard not to love her rostra manner. And those who hated the scoundrel most would bite their teeth and gnash, not least because they understood exactly what the almost-fence-sitters meant: Himemiya-Kanzaki really did have the most watchable rostra manner of all those they had seen in their generation.

What they had yet to understand, though, was the purpose for which the woman employed her talents. It was actually part of Shizuru's plan to have Urumi draw all the attention with her contiones, because it meant that their foes would concentrate their ire upon the latter. In vain. While Urumi's role in the scheme was certainly important, the true attack was not to come from her venue but from another, which Shizuru and Chikane-working with typical subtlety and atypically severe stealth-were preparing at that very moment. So Urumi's splashing in the Comitia waters were actually performed only to throw diverting splatters in Traditionalist faces, conveniently permitting her allies to focus on other aspects.

For a while all seemed to go as they expected. A slight snag nearly happened midway through July when Chikane got wind of a suit being prepared against her best friend, courtesy of several publicani who had the contracts for collecting taxes in Sosia. As her informants put it, these tax farmers were fuming over Shizuru's reorganisation of taxes and loan collections when she had passed by that province and cowed the governor into taking orders from her. They had only now decided to sue her belatedly for arrogating herself such power over Sosia's fiscal matters.

Chikane agreed wholeheartedly with her friend's rearrangements-one look at the reports and exorbitant interest rates being enforced in Sosia had her scowling. Yet she had to admit nonetheless that the restive publicani would have the upper hand in court, because they had the contracts with the State and had no legal barriers to their usury. Worried, she went to see her friend straightaway.

Her friend received her with nary a twitch of concern, however, and answered that she already knew about the complaint. Furthermore, it turned out that Chikane was just a day late with the data: Shizuru had already dealt with the publicani .

"My informants must be tardy indeed," Hime's senior consul sighed then, lowering herself onto her friend's couch. "What did you tell them? This was yesterday, Shizuru?"

"Yes," Shizuru replied, while mixing some light wine and spring water for her visitor. "I invited them to a nice little dinner as soon as I caught the whispers, naturally."

A level glance from Chikane. "Naturally."

"It was then that I told them I would beat them to a lawsuit if they pursued the matter any further."

"How could they have succumbed to such an argument? They would have had the Treasury on their side, you know."

"Perhaps so, but the law actually is on mine... or, at least, it is if you go far back enough." Shizuru handed Chikane a drink, which the older woman took with a murmur of gratitude. "There is an ancient statute going back to the time of our last king that actually forbids extortionate rates of interest. You know our old laws hold, so long as they are not amended or repealed by the new ones-and no one truly wishes to repeal or amend ancient laws, given the attitude towards antiquity and tradition amongst our people. Oh, I almost wish they had not broken! Imagine the look on the Traditionalists' faces at court when they would realise they would have to support my side, much though they would love to see me prosecuted: it would have been impossible for them to go against a law actually belonging to tradition, after all."

"I do admire your capacity for levity even when discussing such a possibility."

A faint smirk. "What makes you think I am not serious?"

"Oh, Shizuru." Chikane sipped at her wine and looked thoughtful. "About that statute, however: where did you find it?"

"In Sagara-san's last book-was it last year or the year before that?-discussing her findings on ancient law drawn from that tattered old compendium she discovered in a dusty corner of Castor's. I shall lend you my copy later, if you wish it."

"Thank you. I wish I had known to buy one myself. I did not even know of it, that book of hers."

"You were occupied by other things then, I believe," Shizuru said. "And besides, most tomes discussing ancient law are not given much attention. There are few enthusiasts in that area, are there not? So it transpires that you may not have heard of the book coming out because few do talk about it."

She walked from her desk to sit on the couch next to Chikane.

"Returning to the publicani of Sosia, however, I confess I also threatened to attach to them the odium of Suda Yuuji-han."

"The disgraced Sosia governor, yes," the blue-eyed woman smiled. "Whose disgrace, incidentally, was partly of your orchestration."

"But entirely of his origination," Shizuru answered. "Well, he went into voluntary exile before the court could condemn him for his doings in Sosia. He managed to make off with a good part of his fortune. Still, his name stinks to the high heavens in Hime at the moment; it shall be a long time before he can even come near Fuuka again."

"Which is why the Sosia publicani quailed at your threat to connect them to him, I assume?"

Shizuru winked at her.

"Fear not, Chikane, for the problem no longer exists," the younger woman said. "They have decided to abandon all thoughts of serving me such a suit. Besides, they were also afraid of falling entirely out of the running for any concessions I might be in a position to grant in the future, should I actually go ahead with my rumoured annexation of the Mentulaean Empire. Bad business to antagonise a possible governor-conqueror, and all publicani are good businessmen at heart."

The other woman said nothing for a few seconds, content to nod and sip her wine. After a while, she turned to look at Shizuru.

"You always walk such a fine line," she sighed to the younger woman.

A particularly unrepentant smile came to Shizuru's lips.

"I am sorry for making you worry," she said without a hint of apology.

"Not at all," Chikane retorted. "It makes my life a little more interesting."

Shizuru chuckled. "As the audience feels about those performers who walk a thin beam over a bed of nails, no doubt, with a gasp for every wobble and wiggle."

Chikane smiled.

"Ah, my interest in you goes beyond such shallow suspense," she told the younger woman. "I do hope you are not about to belittle my emotional investment come your troubles: I invest a great deal of emotion in you, you know."

"To be sure," the other said, tongue-in-cheek. "Humour is still a form of investment."

After that problem was resolved, everything seemed to go well. Urumi continued to make trouble in the Forum as Chikane and Shizuru's manipulations below the surface progressed, and soon Chikane found herself considering a suggestion to Shizuru that their true attack should begin. For that purpose did she ready herself at home one day, with the intent of paying her friend a visit in the latter's villa just outside of Hime.

"Has someone gone to fetch the gig?" she asked her steward, while tucking her wakizashi into her belt. She was a cautious woman as well as a conscientious wife, and she knew that her spouse felt better knowing she always carried some article of weaponry. "I must leave presently."

"It is being readied now, Domina," the man answered. "I am sorry for the delay."

Chikane smiled her wonderful smile at him. "Not at all. It gives me time to see my wife first, at any rate, for she did say she wished to prepare something for me to bring."

"I believe the other domina is in the private kitchen," he advised. "I shall hold the gig here until you return, Domina. Would you also prefer to know when it arrives?"

"No, thank you. I shall merely return when I am ready."

"As you wish, Domina."

Off Chikane sauntered, passing through her enormous atrium and deeper into her mansion. She was searching for a specific room, the one her steward had mentioned, and her long-legged stride carried her swiftly to it. As her steward said, her wife was still there.

"Here you are," she said to announce herself, moved as always by the sight of her spouse actually using the private kitchen added to their manor. Looking far more like an unusual sitting room than a kitchen, this abnormal architectural addition was for Himeko's use alone. How her enemies had once tried to make capital out of it when they found out! Chikane Himemiya's wife made use of a kitchen, Chikane Himemiya's wife potted about pots and pans as any common slave! And so on, and so forth... until they found out that Chikane Himemiya also potted about in the same marble-countered, mosaic and gilt-decorated room-all added details that rather robbed the fact of any ignominy. It became just another of those ancient patrician quirks instead, even if everyone knew only Chikane should rightly be absolved of shame by that reasoning. Even so, the capital had already been stolen.

Chikane pulled out a seat at a table.

"That smells lovely," she commented, watching the other woman work. Himeko was transferring some steaming biscuits to a cloth-lined hamper. She would sprinkle some poppy-seeds atop a batch before depositing it in the basket, working swiftly but with enough care so as not to crush those biscuits at the bottom. Once they were all in, she took the tray and brushed off the poppy-seeds left there onto the topmost biscuits. Nothing unaccounted for, nothing wasted. Maximum economy in application.

Chikane marvelled again at how efficient a housewife was her spouse-though not in any acceptable mode of her class, of course. Himeko knew many things Chikane did not, such as how to bake bread and cook complicated stews out of meagre ingredients; how to tend to a plot of rich soil and sprout wonders that could be eaten or used to brighten up a room; how to banish all manner of pests from the dark, damp corners of a house. These were things that a poor daughter of a poor house had to learn, and they were not things supposed to fascinate Chikane in any way. Yet it fascinated Chikane how appealingly earthy she continued to find them.

Although one must admit that may also be because it is Himeko who does them, specifically, she conceded to herself, ever the woman conscious of qualifiers. And one must admit too that Himeko does not look actually look 'earthy', for all her knowledge suited to the role; for Chikane Himemiya's wife looked as impeccably patrician as her birth was unspeakable. As fair and purple-eyed as the products of the Armitage, she was even more nobly-cast of face-which meant Chikane could indulge in a private laugh whenever they ran into some poor-skinned, uninspiring-looking member of a Famous Family. Put one such noble next to Himeko and let a random bystander guess which one was the aristocrat. Oh, such fun!

"For Shizuru again?" she asked.

"Yes," her wife said. "I thought I'd make her some more. She likes these so much."

"Should I be envious?"

The other woman stopped what she was doing and looked at her with a laugh.

"I know the two of you eat them together, Chikane-chan," she teased.

It was Chikane's turn to laugh.

"I never deprive her of more than one, just so you know," she defended. "At any rate, this seems to be the fifth batch you've made her in just a little over two weeks. I am certain she is more than pleased to receive them, Love, but it appears to me as though you are a little more eager than usual to give her such tokens."

The other woman had gone to wash her hands in a bronze water-basin, and wiped them clean before returning. She had been married to Chikane for long enough to see the statement Chikane had just tendered not in a jealous light, but in the shade actually intended.

"I know, Chikane-chan," she said, coming over to the table as well. Her wife rose to fetch another chair and helped her into it first before sitting again. "I'm just worried, I guess."

Chikane tilted her dark head. "About Shizuru?"

"Yes."

"Understandable, these days. But may I hear from you why?"

A nervous shuffle of the feet first, before Himeko could reply.

"Well, she doesn't look herself. Or not so much, I think," the blonde said cautiously. "She's getting so thin too, and she looks so tired, and-I don't mean she looks bad, of course, only tired. She's still beautiful."

The raven-haired woman suppressed a laugh at the sudden disclaimer.

"Shizuru shall never be anything but beautiful," she agreed. "But I understand."

"Also, Chikane-chan, Shizuru doesn't usually seem so..."

She trailed off and would have left it there had Chikane not prodded.

"Seem so?"

"I don't know," Himeko admitted. "How to say it, I mean. I keep remembering things."

"Things."

"Ye-es. Like-oh, like the last time I went to visit her with Urumi! Did Urumi-chan tell you what we talked about?"

"Yes, although I daresay you shall have to tell me specifically what you mean, Dear."

The fair woman shifted uncomfortably, hunching to settle both elbows on the table and brace herself on them. Chikane smiled at the pose, finding it so devoid of affect. Her Himeko was so very natural.

"We were talking about what was happening," Himeko was telling her. "And how people kept opposing her and saying such things about her and then-and then she said it again." She paused, anxiety suddenly settling over her bright face like an ill-suited pall. "That she would, you know, 'destroy them if necessary'."

Chikane said nothing.

"She says it so often now, Chikane-chan," Himeko continued, finally giving vent to her concerns. "That she'll destroy them. Maybe I'm just being thin-skinned, and I hope maybe I am-but I don't know. Something... ohh."

She sighed out the breath, looking frustrated with herself for being unable to communicate the precise notion in her head. She sent a pleading look her wife's way, but continued right after it.

"It's just the way she says it," she said. "And the way she looks when she says it. Oh, she doesn't look angry, really, or even mad, but there's something about it that just worries me!"

A hum rose from Chikane's throat as she nodded slowly to soothe her restless wife.

"Can you not clarify further, Darling?" she asked the other woman. "I have heard her say that as well, and as you say, she does not really look as furious as many others would-at least, excepting that time she said it in Senate, in the meeting at the Ogasawara's basilica. There was something truly worth some worry."

She grinned then, displaying her lovely even teeth in a smile that was just as lovely and even; one of the more objective reasons her wife loved to use her so often as a model lay there, for Chikane's smiles were almost always perfectly symmetrical. There is a face, had said one of the most popular sculptors of the city, who was also giving private lessons to Himeko for the art: There is a face devoted entirely to the divine proportion!

"She gave me quite a start that day," said the lips devoted to the divine proportion.

"I didn't see it," Himeko reminded her, giggling. "I wish I had seen that, though."

"Put another of those busts of me in our bedroom and perhaps you shall," Chikane replied, knowing what her wife meant.

A playful look. "You said you thought I was getting better."

"Which is exactly why I was so surprised when I saw it."

"Not because it was in the bedroom?"

"That too is a consideration. How am I to make love to my wife without feeling mocked by a haughty effigy of me looking down its nose as though it beheld some gory spectator sport? It takes self-ridicule to a new extreme."

She stopped then, having remembered something she had wanted to ask upon seeing the first trial busts of herself.

"Incidentally, Darling, they all look like that. I had the same impression from the paintings, but it was faint there whereas here it stands out. To be sure, they are all very exquisite of execution. And yet, I do have a personal qualm. Why is it that I seem so haughty in all the likenesses?"

Her wife had been giggling all this time and finally gave up at the last remark, bursting into heartfelt laughter. She got up from her seat and gave Chikane a kiss on the mouth, the gesture brief because she was still laughing.

"Oh, Chikane-chan," she cried when able. "Only you could ask that!"

Chikane only touched her lips in confusion. Not being addicted to peering at her reflection in a mirror, she could not fully appreciate what her wife meant by that, especially since her true personality was so contrary to the coolness of her looks.

"I suppose that means I shall have to figure it out for myself," she murmured, making a note to peek in the cupboard containing her imago later. She looked again at her wife. "But we stray from the point, Dear. What was it about her speech on destruction that worried you so? Can you truly not explain further?"

The blonde in front of her sobered and thought for a while. Then, she finally produced what she thought was the best answer of which she could think.

"Her eyes," she said positively. "Her eyes don't look as calm as the rest of her face, Chikane-chan."

Chikane's own eyes regarded her wife with astonishment.

"It's when I see them that I think-well, I think she means all her threats. Or, no-it's when I see them that I start thinking her threats sound like promises."

The other woman tilted her head silently. How curious, she thought, that even her wife who knew hardly anything of politics should understand this foreboding: for Chikane understood very well what her wife was trying to say but could not articulate properly. So even Himeko had noticed! But perhaps that was not entirely unreasonable. Chikane's wife was an artist, after all, and had that intuitive and feeling perception most artists did, which sensed things without necessarily understanding the logic behind them. How swiftly they accepted these intuitions amazed Chikane, since she herself was a person who required reasoning behind everything she would deign to accept.

Her wife was smiling.

"And I'm not doing a very good job of explaining, am I?" she asked Chikane shyly. "I sound so silly. Eyes!"

Chikane returned the smile.

"No, I understand," she said. "Astonishing, however. I have known Shizuru nearly all our lives, which is why I am perhaps one of those few who may actually claim to understand her enough to see through the mask. Yet you, who have known her for only a fraction of that acquaintance, seem to perceive her quite clearly as well."

Himeko looked worried again. "Oh, Chikane-chan! Do you mean I'm right?"

Chikane crossed her legs under the table, but not before using one to nudge her wife's.

"'Yes' in part, and 'perhaps' to others," she sighed. "We shall see. You are good friends with her now, and I see your concern for her may well watch mine. It may be time I told you of something concerning Shizuru, Love, especially as I have longed to speak to someone of it of late. Who better than you? I have some time to spare before leaving, so I shall speak to you of it now. I never told you why she is the way she is, you see."

The other woman asked what she meant.

"Passionate without seeming it. I mean how she is actually a very passionate woman and yet manages to seem perfectly calm most of the time... or even unmoved by things that would move others to emotion. Apathetic would be another way to put it, but given her way with words and affability, it is hard to use that term. Let us say, rather, that she does not show so many emotions before others."

She added swiftly, however: "Most of the time, I stress. That incident at the Ogasawara basilica was a departure from usual-although perfectly justified."

Himeko voiced agreement softly.

"But you see what I mean."

"Oh yes, Chikane-chan. I used to think she was even more so... than you are, sometimes."

The blue-eyes twinkled. Before Chikane could say anything, however, a flash of something crossed her wife's visage. She taxed Himeko with it.

"What is it?" she asked. "You seemed troubled by some thought just now."

The other woman was reluctant.

"I was just thinking," she answered. "If Shizuru weren't so nice, she would be scary."

Chikane smiled grimly. "I think, in fact, that her being 'so nice' makes her scarier. In any case, I was going to tell you the reason-or rather, one of the reasons for her being like that."

Himeko told her to continue.

"It begins from the logical point," the patrician commenced. "You know who her parents were, by reputation?"

"Oh, yes."

"Although I would not think you had ever met them, of course."

Her wife giggled. "I should be so lucky, Chikane-chan."

"Indeed?" Chikane smiled. "I knew them. Our parents were good friends, particularly our mothers. So we knew each other almost from birth, you might say-or her birth, at any rate, since she is younger."

"That long?" A pause after she received affirmation. "So that's how you know Shi-chan?"

"Yes. From long past."

Having the artistic sensitivity, Himeko asked the correct question: "What were her parents like, Chikane-chan?"

The raven hair was pushed back as Chikane brushed away some of the locks over her brow.

"I think I need not tell you they were very impressive people, dear," she said. "Both epitomes of what true patricians should be. Everyone agreed on this, of course."

Her wife hummed.

"I liked them," said Chikane. "They were easy to like too, but then I suppose it came more easily to me as I neither felt threatened nor intimidated by who or what they were. A distinct advantage, I daresay, that many other people did not have when dealing with them-hence the wariness many others felt when they were present."

Something like what happens to Shizuru now-or me, too, I submit. A sort of insecurity before our presence that sets others on edge."

"I know how that is."

She reached to hold her wife's hand, smiling.

"I hope that does not apply to me in your case," she joked, stroking the thin, work-roughened fingers with her longer ones.

Himeko smiled. "Not now."

"I am glad. But to Shizuru?"

Her wife hesitated.

"Sometimes," the blonde eventually answered, cheeks going a healthy shade of pink. "She's just so... you know . Oh, I don't mean she puts me off, Chikane-chan!"

She waved her hands, growing more flustered by the second.

"I like her awfully," she declared. "And I love her too, because she's one of the first friends I ever had among the people you know. You know I don't dislike her at all."

Chikane encouraged her to go on.

"I don't know how to explain it," Himeko sighed in frustration. "Maybe it's just like you said. Shi-chan's nice but intimidating."

"Intimidating, and yet you call her chan ."

"Oh!" Himeko said, apprehensive. "Is that wrong?"

"No, she likes it," Chikane said, amused that her wife had reacted so earnestly to a joke. "She said so herself."

But the other woman was obviously bothered, and persisted on the thought: "Are you sure? I don't want to-"

"Himeko," said the patrician in the firmest voice she could summon in speaking to her wife. "Do not worry about it. Please do not stop addressing her that way, or you may even give her cause to be saddened. Trust me on this, and forgive me if that jest fell flat: it was merely a jest, with nothing more to it."

Her wife gave in, nodding with only the slightest hesitation.

"All right," she eventually said. "If you say so, Chikane-chan."

"I do say so, because she did say so, My Dear."

"Mm..." the sandy-haired woman nodded. "Oh. What do her parents have to do with why Shizuru-chan is the way she is?"

"Ah, that," said Chikane. "You see, they were very hard on her."

"How?"

"It is difficult to say. Let us simply say that they were very strict and expected nothing but the best from Shizuru," was the reply. "Not that she ever failed to deliver, of course, given who or what Shizuru is. But when I say they were hard, I mean they were constantly, perpetually so, for as long as I knew them. They were hard on Shizuru, you see, in the sense that she was never allowed to make, hmm, such tiny mistakes as other parents would allow of their children. I do not mean they restricted her freedoms. Rather, I mean that certain things, things most would permit a child to do, were not permitted in her case."

Chikane stopped, frowned thoughtfully.

"I think," she added. "I think I do not remember a time when they allowed her to-if I may revert to the vernacular-slack off."

The other woman looked sad.

"Poor Shizuru," she eventually whispered. "They were cruel people, then."

But Chikane differed: "No. No, they were not."

Himeko stared at her questioningly.

"They were actually very kind," Chikane explained. "I liked them very much, as I said, and in great part because of their kindness. Especially her mother."

A pause before going on.

"And she was the hardest when it came to Shizuru, I believe."

Her wife shook her head, completely perplexed now. "But why, Chikane-chan? I'm afraid I don't understand, I'm sorry-"

"No, it may be that this is my fault: I am the one who falls short in explaining now," Chikane sighed, interrupting the apology. "Permit me to attempt again. Try to understand first, however, that Shizuru is of a great patrician family. This must be appreciated fully for the explanation to proceed."

The other woman nodded attentively. "You mean a patrician like you."

"Yes, Dear." She raised one hand, unfurling it elegantly in the air as she continued to speak. "You understand some of this already, but I ask that you suffer me to say more on it for the purposes of this conversation. It is a complex matter, best expressed only after the best possible understanding of its origins has been achieved."

"Yes, I'll listen."

"Thank you. Then I begin with this, which you comprehend to some part already: we patricians bear a great burden. The greater the nobility or fame of one's family, the greater the burdens become. The case for patricians as opposed to our plebeian peers is worse, because we have the simultaneous disadvantage and advantage of having blue blood in our veins. There is expectation there, as well as wariness. To carry these twin loads without being crushed is difficult and requires a specific personality... or perhaps a specific person."

"Patrician blood is too old, Himeko," she sighed, reaching for her wife's fingertips. "It is too thin and grows thinner by the ages. Those families among us that still insist on breeding exclusively with other patricians-my family and Shizuru's class here, you note-find themselves producing fewer and fewer people with the characteristic strength distinguishing those clans that lorded over Hime for centuries. For every Shizuru Fujino thrown up by us, there are several hundred nonentities, with no credit to them save their aristocratic name."

"They threw up a Chikane Himemiya," her loyal wife added, provoking a grin.

"As it is, at least our blood is yet to be exhausted," Chikane replied. "But now you see the curse in the blessing, and the ceaseless struggle for patricians in a world where plebeians are growing more and more powerful. And why should they not? This is no longer a world of kings and queens, and not even we patricians want a world of kings and queens. Yet the fact remains that we are descended from those kings and queens, and all know it."

"All means both others and us. Understand, it is not enough that others know it, because the knowledge of others only grants the licence you see being given us each day, by people who brand us eccentric or weird or full of nonsensical vagary—all because they know we are patrician, and we are permitted to be full of nonsensical vagary. This is a shallow acknowledgment, especially if it is not paired with the true acknowledgment of the self, the patrician self in all its majesty. This shallow acknowledgment leads only to the formation of patricians you often see today, those of my peers who abuse the cachet granted them indiscriminately, and who thus fail to experience the true hardship required to forge themselves into any kind of steel. Overindulged, bored, and pampered specimens who can never be great because they have never experienced the resistance necessary for it."

She met her wife's eyes and saw the question swimming in the purple.

"The closest possible example with which you are familiar is Shizuma," she said.

Himeko looked uneasy. "But she's so..."

"Yes, I know, and when I said 'closest possible', I meant to hint I do not count her one anymore," Chikane confessed. "Still, there can be no question she has been pampered much of her life, not meeting the resistance of which I speak. But not any longer, Himeko... not after that. I am sorry for the pain she endures even now, but I pray it may serve only to her enhancement, for I have long lamented the waste of such a talent as is held by that friend of ours. If it turns out as I hope, then my point is justified: you cannot make a good sword without hammering it."

There was an interval of silence between them as Himeko thought about it, her wife's thumb chafing the knuckles of her right hand. The sound of some slaves laughing floated in from the window, and Chikane smiled. How good it is, she thought, to have a house where even the servants are happy.

"I think I understand what I mean by being pampered, Chikane-chan," she heard her wife say. "So Shizuru-chan's parents were thinking of that too, which is why they were hard on her?"

"Yes," Chikane replied. "The Fujino line is one of those that have very nearly gone extinct, Himeko. Shizuru is the only Fujino of her generation; her parents knew she might well be the last, especially as she made it clear early on that she was attracted only to women. She was made to know how special she was from the day she could talk. Shizuru has always been conscious that she is very nearly the endpoint of an august lineage."

She smiled and looked immensely proud, which she was.

"Patricians do not die out with a small gasp, and the Fujino are true patricians. Shizuru was-or rather, is-their final shout, to speak. It is probable, My Love, that we have been blessed enough and cursed enough to see the last true Fujino live. Is that not fascinating?"

Himeko pulled her arms closer to her body. Chikane did not take her to task for the shrinking reaction, having seen the tiny gold hairs rise on the fair woman's skin-as indeed the thought she had just expressed deserved. But suddenly, another thought rose to the fore: was not Shizuru's girl from the North also the last of an ancient dynasty?

Oh! she said to herself, stunned as she paused to consider it. Her next blink came a touch faster as she shook her head privately at an idea. Coincidence! It had to be mere coincidence. Even so, she had to allow such a coincidence was surely the height of chance. To think of those two young women, the last of two mythical dynasties, suddenly meeting and quite possibly coming together in the end... Why, she thought, it was almost a pity they could not actually make a child, between themselves. Or should it be a mercy, rather? Well, she had to meet Shizuru's girl first before she could tell.

"Shizuru had to become an Atlas," she told her wife, who was yet shivering; little did the woman know Chikane had come close to the same. "And when her parents died, more than an Atlas. Her parents were well-pleased with her, I should think, and yet saw something else too that begged pause from that appreciation."

Himeko leaned forward eagerly, still hugging herself.

"What do you mean?"

"This is the part that is complicated," Chikane began, only to be interrupted by her grinning wife.

"You mean that was the easy part?" Himeko asked, nose wrinkling.

They laughed.

"Unfortunately, yes," the raven-haired woman answered. "I shall attempt to explain very clearly; please tell me if there is aught that confuses. Returning to what I was saying, Shizuru was everything any patrician family could hope for in a scion and more, in the sense that she was born being better than nearly everyone else at nearly everything-or everything that matters, anyway. There are various kinds of genius, Himeko, but the truest is the versatile kind. And Shizuru has it."

"So do you."

This time, only Chikane laughed.

"Well, let us set me aside for now, though I thank you for that," she told her spouse. "In Shizuru's case, however, there is something else that even I find... hmm, remarkable. No doubt it is the reason her parents were so hard on her, because they were so afraid for her due to it. I do not think they could have done otherwise, mind you."

She squinted, then continued.

"Shizuru lacks something I have, Himeko. Or, conversely, she has something I do not, by virtue of lacking what I have."

"You know I'm not good at word riddles, Chikane," said her amused wife.

Chikane bowed her head slightly. "Forgive me, my dear. You know I am accustomed to speaking this way."

"I know. I don't really mind, so long as you explain them to me."

"Let us put it simply, then. Shizuru, from the day she was born, had no sense of the outrageous."

All that gained, as she had expected, was a befuddled expression. Chikane nodded in reassurance, then looked her wife in the eye.

"This is the confusing part, isn't it?" the blonde asked softly.

Chikane answered positively.

"Then I'll do my best to follow," Himeko sighed.

"And I shall do my best to lead," answered the patrician with a smile. "Permit me to begin with the query: you think Shizuru and I are somewhat similar, do you not?"

A nod.

"And yet you cannot refute that we are very much different from each other too, not only in appearance. This goes beyond personality, even. We are different on the most basic, most essential level of character found in an individual."

To her astonishment, that gained a positive nod.

"I always felt that," said her wife. "Although I can't really tell how, Chikane-chan."

"It is all right," Chikane answered. "I shall tell you. The essential difference is that, whereas we both function on an advanced level of ability compared to others, I have the ability to restrict mine if need be-"

She broke off, shook her head.

"No, that is not exactly right. Hmm, let me put it another way. As you see, even I find this a precarious thing to articulate. Let us say an indication would be our modes of thought. Both of us are very rational people, as I am sure you have noticed."

" Yes. "

Chikane stifled a grin at the feeling in the response and proceeded: "We are the same in that sense. We obey rules of reason, acknowledge the logical precepts. However, the difference exists even there, because Shizuru's reason has the potential to become almost irrational by its extremity."

Apparently, even Himeko was aware of the contradiction immediately: "Irrational... reason?"

"Yes," Chikane answered. "You see, reason is premised on several basic assumptions, Himeko. Such as, say, the idea that one added to one always makes up two. While both Shizuru and I recognize that fact, the difference is that I stop at recognizing it and proceed to reason or work out a mathematical formula from it. I accept the fact as a fact because it has always been recognized as true, and because I need an origin to continue reasoning, as Aristotle would put it. I can add one and one, get two as an answer, then move on to the next step. You follow, My Dear?"

Himeko nodded.

"Very well," Chikane said. "Shizuru, on the other hand, would go further than I in both directions of the equation. And perhaps that is where the difference truly lies. We return to the example of one being added to one. At first, Shizuru would proceed to reason from the assumption that one and one make two, as I had. Nonetheless, if she ever reached any point in her later reasoning-and you must remember that Shizuru has faultless reasoning-if ever she came to a point where she felt that some sum in the equation was unsatisfactory to her purposes, she would not accept it as a... say, inescapable figure of fate that the formula cannot help but produce. Shizuru would actually go back to the very beginning and question the categorical rule of the equation itself."

Her eyes narrowed faintly as she came to her conclusion.

"I cannot call it madness, nor stupidity," she told her wife. "Stupidity would be to disdain the categorical rule-the fact, I mean. Madness would be to warp it. Shizuru does neither. I feel, rather, that she questions factness, with the intent of remodelling or rewriting the fact to her purpose. And the frightening thing, Himeko, is that her rewrites work! They crumble existing structures, they destroy the way things have always been figured out-and yet they work, they are logical!"

Her black brows slanted, a disturbed look coming to her eyes.

"This is what concerned her parents so deeply, I believe, for her sake," she said. "As indeed it concerns me now, for the same reason. If we return to the example earlier, I am saying that Shizuru would dare to take apart the very premise that everyone would simply accept as true. She would ask whether one and one would really, truly, always be two."

Himeko regarded her wife with genuine unease, her mind still wrestling with the words and their complexity, yet her heart already understanding what was being said. She had understood it from the moment she saw that glimmer of fear in Chikane's blue gaze, a gaze that was only ever cool and composed, kind and fearless. Yet that had been fear, which Himeko knew when she saw it.

"I think... I see a little, Chikane-chan," she said truthfully. "A little, at least."

Chikane nodded, her immense calm settling over her once again. It was too much a part of herself to ever truly vanish, after all.

"You see what I mean by saying she has no sense of the outrageous," she said. "Or had none, as her parents worked hard to try and put some into her, particularly by being so hard, as we said."

"Was she different before?" Himeko asked. "Was there ever a time they didn't do that-or hadn't noticed, um, that she had no sense of the outrageous?"

Chikane's brows slanted again as she gave it some thought.

"Of that I cannot be certain," she eventually said. "I can say, however, that Shizuru was a little more free of expression with others than she is now, when she was much younger, although I do not deny she was still given to being generally in control of herself. I suspect it is as much a product of the breeding as it is her actual character." Her face loosened suddenly, and she surprised her wife by chuckling: "I remember one time she fell into the ditch being dug by some workers for the garden pool."

She winked at Himeko, who gave a little gasp.

"Our garden pool?" the woman asked. "In this house, Chikane-chan?"

"Yes. My father was the one who had it built."

"Oh! And poor Shi-chan fell into the pool? When?"

"She fell into the ditch," Chikane clarified mildly. "That would become the pool. It was during a rather late get-together for us youngsters, all the adults discussing politics in the grand study. I was one of the eldest, which meant I was occupied by several little monsters running around the atrium and into the rooms. None of us even noticed Shizuru slink away. She has an uncanny knack for slipping about unperceived she wishes, as you know."

Chikane twisted her lips ruefully and went on: "She apparently made her way to the garden and, there being no lights in that area just yet, walked a touch too close to the edge of the large ditch. Some ground collapsed and she fell." Her wife squeaked, and she knew

Himeko was imagining it happening. "Shizuru was about seven then and she was all elbows and legs, you might say, because she was always tall for her age. Thus the poor girl was bruised so badly it was a miracle no bones were broken. And she received quite a nasty gash on her head, too."

Her wife burst out: "Poor Shi-chan! What happened? How did you get her out?"

Chikane lifted an eyebrow.

"We did not," she said. "She got herself out. No one saw her fall, you see, and we did not even know she had wandered off to that area of the house. The situation in the atrium was rather too, ah, complicated to permit even that point any notice so quickly."

"She didn't call for help?"

This time, the question earned her an incredulous look.

"Shizuru, shriek for someone to pull her up from a ditch?" Chikane said. "Surely you know her better than that, Himeko! The rest of us were in the other atrium wondering where she had gone when, all of a sudden, someone did shriek and pointed to one of the archways."

"And?"

"And there she was, her clothing torn and really quite frightful, her face positively awash with blood. But, whereas everyone was rushing towards her in a panic, she simply busied herself with arranging her mussed clothes as well as she could. Oh, she was wincing, yes-but very faintly. So there we were, making an absolute fuss and screaming for the doctor. And do you know what she did?"

Himeko asked what it was.

"She just lifted her chin like so-you know the way she does it-and then made a wonderfully elegant bow, as if to apologize for causing so much commotion. And then she said: 'Your new pool shall be deep. What manner of leviathan do you intend to put in it, Chikane?'" Chikane sighed reminiscently. "She was wonderful."

Himeko laughed. "So that's why she always jokes about finding a sea-monster in our pool!"

"Mm." A sudden smile. "Which reminds me of some news that may come as an interesting aside, mea vita : Shizuma told me that Shizuru has been making arrangements for builders to enlarge and deepen her house's pool, as part of a remodelling of her courtyard garden. Mayhap she intends to tease me after all these years by actually getting a leviathan before I can? It would be so very like her."

Her wife giggled.

"But she's not going to be there to oversee it, is she?" she asked Chikane. "I mean-if you're talking about the garden pool in her manor inside the city. She can't cross the city boundary yet."

"She is apparently leaving most of the actual design to the architect," was the answer. "I doubt her faith shall prove misplaced, since I know the man and he happens to be a genius of good taste. I collect she shall merely specify what things she considers necessary, such as that whim to add apples," she said, with a faint smile for her friend's vagaries. "She is original, is she not? Ordinary apple trees in a garden already adorned with the rarest plants from other lands?"

"The apple trees look pretty when they blossom and the fruits come."

Chikane conceded that. "At any rate, we have spent quite enough time on this aside, have we not? I was telling you of Shizuru when she was young."

"And I was laughing at it," Himeko smiled. "Yes, Chikane-chan. So that was how Shi-chan was."

The other woman hummed, then went back to the first topic as though there had never been a divagation.

"That was how she was. All the same, she also turned into who she is due to her parents' handling. She was instructed to never show more than the very minimum of emotion necessitated by propriety, to be as reserved in her opinions as possible, and so on. They held her in an iron grip, so to speak, without crushing her. To that degree, we can say her parents did very well with their responsibilities."

"But an iron grip is still a cold one, Chikane-chan."

A chuckle, followed by a kiss.

"That was a very good play on words you just made, my dear," Chikane praised her spouse.

The other woman laughed. "Thank you."

"And, yes, an insightful one. It could be considered cold, considering how they began treating her that way almost as soon as she could speak. They were brilliant people too, after all, and they could sense it - I mean what their daughter was. I do not blame them, nor do I think they ever had anything but her interests at heart. They were frightened for her."

Her wife echoed the word.

"They had good reason to be frightened, I think," Chikane expounded. "Every now and then she shows what she is, Himeko, which is-for lack of a better term-a perfect radical. Not in the negative sense! I mean, rather, that she would take apart everything that seems to be... unsatisfactory to her reasoning. I know her well enough to know that she is only biding her time until she gets to the consulship before she really begins to draw blood from the conservatives' flesh. She would attempt to change Hime drastically, given a chance."

"You make it sound scary."

"It is, in a way. Although I am fairly certain that she would probably be right in the sense of bettering things, whatever she does, I cannot help but be a little worried about it, all the same."

Her wife enquired why.

"Ah, well," she sighed, with a tiny smile. "It is simply that I am still more a product of our class than she is, so I still have a modicum-small, but still there-of reluctance for destroying certain traditions. That is what it is, I suppose."

The other woman grinned impishly.

"I know someone who destroyed an important social tradition," she quipped.

Chikane burst into laughter.

"Oh, a touch!" she cried, holding a hand to her chest. "Very well. As it is, I am a radical too."

"Chikane-chan."

"It is true," Hime's senior consul allowed. "But with the caveat that I am little less radical than Shizuru is, or so I would maintain. I did manage to stay under the Traditionalists' radar for a good while, you know. Whereas they sniffed out Shizuru almost from the beginning. Such an exquisite sense of smell Armitage-san and the others have, when it comes to that! They marked her from the outset."

Himeko got to her feet and went to fetch a jug of water.

"So I was the stink that let them smell you?" she asked teasingly, handing her wife a cup.

"I would prefer to say you were the fragrance, my dear, that led them to me," Chikane answered. "Nothing so tickles their noses as a lovely perfume they would like to have themselves."

The other woman shook her golden head, blushing in spite of herself as she filled up Chikane's cup.

"Furthermore, you were an exception," the other continued, suddenly growing solemn. "Before I met you, I must confess that I never thought I would fall in love with someone beyond the upper stratum of Hime's social sphere. All the same, it matters nothing to me, since I had always thought of the social prescriptions for relationships as rather preposterous. I am speaking, rather, of other traditions."

Himeko poured some water for herself, then went to put away the jug.

"So while I still have that little adherence to some of the rules of our class, of our tradition, Shizuru does not. Never mind that she seems to, now. I have always felt that the relative forbearance she has shown thus far is merely an act, a sop to the factions she needs to pass through before she attains her ambitions. And she will attain them, make no mistake of that."

She met her wife's eyes as the other woman sat again.

"Sometimes," she said in a lower voice to answer the question in Himeko's countenance. "Sometimes I get the feeling that there is something lying dormant in that friend of mine-something almost terrible. What would be the fallout, I wonder, if that were ever unleashed?"

Himeko frowned in thought.

"You mean..." she started. "If the-the sense of the outrageous that her parents put in her just let go?"

Chikane responded to that with a strange smile, her head tilting to one side as she looked out of the window and to the sky.

"The truth of it is that I think that she still has no sense of the outrageous, Himeko," she admitted. "In fact, I do not know if she ever shall."

Chapter 51

Thank you to all, and yes, this is very late. Thus, fifty pages.

A special note of thanks to mountains from molehills for pointing out oversights in past chapters. It must be embarrassingly clear now that one (generally) neither edits chapters before posting them nor rereads most past chapters before writing succeeding ones. The latter is particularly because they were so long ago and one admits to finding it tedious to reread one's work each time: it has something of the masturbatory stripped of jouissance. My gratitude for taking time out of your undoubtedly busy day to point out errors, which I shall rectify if time permits. However, I advise that the conservatives' offer to Shizuru in Chapter 49 be reread through the conservative lens; at least one part of the offer was also implicit, not explicit, but certainly not buried severely enough to be six feet deep.

As for the remarks on Natsuki's incredibly glowing portrayal, my thanks for the note. The point notwithstanding, I would gently request both a little patience and a little faith, though the request may seem vain as we know not each other. Certainly there are many in the story who would (and, temporally and within the 'unmentioned' spaces of the extant text, already do) take issue with Natsuki for many things; still, I have not mentioned them in the text because I find it not yet necessary. The time shall come for that: it is inevitable given the circumstances.

A minute discontent here must be confessed, however, for the critique and suggestion were a touch pre-emptive of something I had intended for the future. Pray do not misunderstand. I flinch not at the critique, but rather at its inadvertent usurpation. It may be denounced by some, but I admit there is yet something of my pride that rebels now at the thought of writing something I had originally intended-something actually relative to your suggestion-given that it would no longer seem of my conception. I admit to my own vanity here, of course, so I apologise not for the conceit, especially when I am the one who suffers most for it.

---

Illustration:

(Remove spaces after full stops.)

ethnewinter. deviantart art/Riding-181380884

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Aedile (L.) - One of the magistracies of Rome not on the cursus honorum (the Way of Honour) but important nonetheless because aediles were responsible for Rome's general upkeep, the public grain supply, and the yearly games. As described in the text by Urumi, it is a very expensive office to have.

2. Augur (L.) - A Roman priest of divination, belonging to the College of Augurs that had about 12 members, half being patrician and the others plebeian. They took the auspices (i.e., checked the omens) before most public or formal occasions, interpreting favourability or its opposite according to very strict rules laid down in the augural texts; the Roman augur was not a person of supposedly mystic nature, as opposed to the Greek seers. In the present setting, members are co-opted by their fellows, not elected by popular vote. Note that part of the augural costume was the lituus (s.v.) and the toga trabea (described in the text). Pontifices (priests; members of the College of Pontifices) were also entitled to the toga trabea.

3. Pila (pl. L.), pilum (s. L.) - The Roman army's spear. It was modified at some point such that the head would break off from the shaft upon impact, preventing the enemy from picking one up and throwing it back at the legionaries. The modification is sometimes credited to Gaius Marius; in the story, it is credited to Shizuru.

4. Comitia centuriata - Also Centuriate Assembly ; one of the assemblies of the Roman people, it marshalled them in their classes and was convened for several purposes, including the drafting and approval of legislation as well as the elections for curule magistracies (s.v.). It held its meetings outside the pomerium, on the Campus Martius.

Voting in the Centuriate Assembly was slanted heavily in favour of the upper classes, especially the First. Citizens were organised into centuries (originally a group of a hundred men, but generally expanded later on to keep the number of centuries constant, even if the number of men in them were not). Each century can technically cast only one vote that counts in the assembly: that single vote is the majority result (or winning vote) of all its members' tabulated votes within the century.

5. Contio (s. L.) - A meeting of one of the assemblies of the Roman people.

6. Corona graminea - Also corona obsidionalis ; the highest and rarest military decoration of Rome.

7. Cunnus - Latin profanity referring to the female sex organs.

8. Curia - In full: Curia Hostilia ; the meeting-place of Senate.

9. Curule magistracy - A Roman government position vested with imperium (s.v.). Examples of curule magistracies include the praetorship and the consulship. Tribunes of the plebs were not curule magistrates.

10. Equestrians or Equites - Members of the Ordo Equester , called "the knights" as opposed to "the senators". Those of knight rank were usually as well-born as those of senatorial rank, but the difference was that they chose not a political career but a commercial one. Recall that there are restrictions on senatorial businesses, which is the reason the knights are generally the richer of the two ranks. One may consider them the equivalents of the modern "business sector" of the community, with the senators being the "government or political sector", for a simplified but convenient categorisation.

11. Ethnarch - The Greek term for a town leader/magistrate.

12. Fellatores - A Latin profanity referring to "those who suck a penis".

13. "Founding Fathers and Mothers" - Address for the members of Senate, modified from the original "Founding Fathers" because the story accepts female senators.

14. Forum - In full, Forum Romanum ; the area where most of the primary Roman state houses and government venues were located.

15. Imperium - The authority possessed by a Roman curule magistrate or promagistrate, specifying that said magistrate possessed the authority of his office and thus could not be gainsaid in that capacity. All commanders of Roman armies are also vested with imperium.

16. Lituus - The curved staff of an augur (s.v.).

17. Military tribune - Officers within a Roman army who often generalised cavalry; also known as prefects.

18. Nec nefas nec noxam optamus ergo negamus! (L.) - "We want neither sacrilege nor harm [done to us], so we decline!"

19. Publicani - Individuals/organisations hired by the Roman State apparatus (specifically, the Treasury) to farm taxes on its behalf. Tax farming activities were more elaborately discussed in an earlier chapter of the story-the 13th, to be precise-and can be found in the third part of that particular chapter, "parts" being delineated by the long horizontal bars denoting page breaks on this website. Publicani tend to be involved in other businesses like usury too.

20. Quiris, quirites - The proper terms for a Roman citizen or citizens.

21. Senatus consultum - A senatorial decree (a decision reached by the House in one of its sessions) that would then be sent to one of the assemblies to be voted into law. The Senate was not a lawmaking body and so needed the assemblies to endow its decisions with strict legal status, but most of its consulta [plural form] were often accepted immediately, even if not voted upon by an assembly.

22. Vestals - The Vestal Virgins, priestesses of Vesta who kept the fire burning on her sacred hearth. They constituted Rome's luck, and were also responsible for holding Roman wills. When a Roman made his will-and even the poorest Romans actually made them-he would go to the Vestals to lodge it for safekeeping.

23. Voting in the Centuriate Assembly - See Comitia centuriata.

24. Well of the Comitia - The traditional meeting-place of the Plebeian Assembly.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde Ira et Lacrimae

par ethnewinter

---

In the days of waiting to be returned to her Northern campaign, it was rare for Shizuru to indulge in sleep. Partly because she was so saddled with worries; partly because she was developing a newfound aversion to it. This latter was because of the dreams that plagued her nightly, and which she could not seem to shake. Aware nonetheless that she needed her rest, she would take to reading tome after tome in an effort to fill her mind with a different topic from the one she dreaded to dream. As her mind was both large enough to accommodate several topics comfortably as well as sharp enough to retain focus even when inundated with avowed miscellanies, these efforts proved vain.

She dreamt often, and usually about the same thing. Sometimes she had the good dreams where she could do the things she missed, like putting a cheek against raven hair and smelling-how was it she could smell that in dreams?-the unforgettable scent of the woman she loved. She dreaded these dreams too, but only afterwards, when the waking reminded her of the reality. But this was still better than the bad dreams, because those were dreadful even before the waking.

There were many beginnings to the bad dreams, but they all tended to end the same way, and it was this that made them bad. Sometimes they began as battles, sometimes they started merely with her walking in a crowd. Whatever it was, it involved a mass of faceless persons surrounding her, each of them bent on walking his own way. She would walk about aimlessly in their midst until it would occur to her that she had somewhere to be too, and that her purpose was actually waiting in the opposite direction from her walk. She would turn to head for it. The throng always moved against her at that point, and she would be stayed, crying out because she knew-although nothing and no one in the dream told her this, and she merely knew it-that someone else was heading for her purpose as well and was getting closer to it while she could not. "She is mine!" she would shout over the crowd, praying the warning would reach that unseen enemy heading for the unseen girl. "I am coming for her, so stand back!" But the crowd would hold her in its torpid mass, and all she could do was struggle.

It was during one of these dreams that her cousin came to see her in her study, and found her asleep in the comfy seat at her big desk. A rare sight, thought the visitor, who was tickled by the frown on the sleeper's brow. She could not say it sat ill on Shizuru- very few things could, the guest admitted dispassionately, on such a face -but she did take issue with the tiredness so very patent around Shizuru's eyes, the faint lines starting to carve themselves on either side of the younger woman's mouth. And when Shizuru stirred, when Shizuru's mouth deepened its frown, she decided it was time for the obviously unhappy dreamer to wake.

She came around the desk and touched a lean arm. The reaction was immediate.

As soon as the hand made contact, the sleeping woman jumped to her feet and placed her own hand on the one that had woken her. Shizuma suddenly found her wrist on the receiving end of a grip so strong it surprised her into fighting back, and it ended with the two cousins grappling.

It took two seconds for them to finally realise what they were doing and to whom.

"An unusual way of waking someone in their own house," Shizuru said with a frown, releasing the other woman as if she had been burned, and stepping away; her cousin followed suit.

"An unusual way of waking up, even in your own house!" Shizuma snapped testily. "Is that how you usually greet people who wake you?"

The younger woman blinked, shut her eyes for a moment, and then blinked again. Hazel eyes narrowed irritably at her.

"No," she eventually said. She lifted a hand and used her fingers to press on her eyelids. "No. I am sorry, Shizuma. You surprised me."

"I gathered that ."

After which they stood for an instant in silence, Shizuru looking away and Shizuma inspecting her sore forearm. She could still feel Shizuru's grip, and a faint silhouette was already emerging where it had landed. That would undoubtedly bruise because she was very fair, just like her cousin. Her cousin would not be likely to get similar bruises from her, however, because Shizuma had gripped by the tunic and not the skin. And that galled her more than a tiny bit.

"You're stronger than I remember," she said curtly.

Shizuru was running a hand through her mane.

"What you remember must be years ago," she replied, going to fix her upset chair. "And we have never wrestled. Always with swords."

"Well. But you've yet to beat me with a sword."

"I've yet to try."

Shizuma's frown deepened. She watched the younger woman going to sit again and noted the tremor in Shizuru's hands. It was also present in hers.

"Your servants let me in-I said I wanted no herald," she said, still wary.

A weak smile. "Did you bully them into it?"

"Perhaps. But what," Shizuma demanded, "were you dreaming to make you react like that ? Not even you are naturally that paranoid, for all that you've a share of caution."

Shizuru, who looked very tired for someone who had just been asleep, batted a hand.

"Nothing," she said after the gesture. "I was not dreaming."

An impressively loud snort. "Everyone dreams. Some merely forget."

"Then I merely forgot."

Shizuma let it go at that, not so much because of the words but rather because the look in Shizuru's eyes killed any further questions. So she made a remark instead about the papers littered on the desk.

"Ah, yes." Shizuru extended a hand and pointed to two book-buckets on the floor, both of them full. "I intended to send those to you today. I shall send a servant with them later, of course, that you may not be burdened by the load."

"What are they?"

"Copies of these."

Out came Shizuru's hand, lightly touching one of the many parchments and sheepskin charts on the table.

"These are maps and notes of the Northern territories and the adjacent terrain," she explained, keeping two fingers on a tiny drawing of what seemed to be a fortress. "The most up-to-date records we have. Not as detailed as I would prefer, to be honest, but not useless either. This one we have here, in particular, is merely what I call a basic map."

Shizuma repeated it as a question. "Basic?"

"A purely geographic visual, devoid of other references. Over here, however-" And she stood up to pull closer another map. Shizuma observed it to have the same geography as the one before, but with additional scribbles, symbols, and lines plotted on it. "This is an example of what I call a true cartographic document. This particular one is for last year's movements."

She put her hand on the new map, pointing out some of the symbols written on the landscape.

"You see that I have ordered the scribes to include here all relevant movements in the past year," she told her relative. "The legend is at the bottom right, and notes include intelligence about the Mentulaean movements relative to ours. Here we have the march from Otomeia to Argentum, for instance, along with the Mentulaean marches to that city as well-all dated and coded properly. The supply routes used last year have also been encoded in the document."

The silver-haired woman stared at the carefully-inked sheepskins, fascinated.

"Very detailed," she murmured.

"Other pertinent charts and notes having to do with the Mentulae and the North are included," Shizuru went on. "Please study them once you have the time, so that you may begin to familiarise yourself with the terrain in advance. And commit the information to memory. It would be too bothersome to have to keep referring to them all the time, after all, when there is so much data-which is changing all the time. Mental records are always superior to written ones, for the revision of the latter is so much more troublesome."

Shizuma said, voice hollow: "Yes, it would be troublesome."

"After that, please go over your copy of this." A sheet of paper was dug out from under several others, shown to her. "Tell me how you feel about them and if you would recommend anything or anyone."

"What is this?" Shizuma asked, taking the sheet.

"The list of military tribunes whose services I intend to request personally."

The other woman lowered the paper in her hand and fixed her with a look.

"It reminds me, Shizuru," she said, "to ask if your roster of legates has been filled. I have at least one suggestion, if you are willing to take it."

"Who?"

"Miyuki," said the silver-haired woman, naming one of her oldest friends.

Shizuru frowned, though not in displeasure. "As I recall, she is recently married. This is only the first year, is it not?"

"Her husband is unlikely to mind-he spends most of his time in Sicily due to his posting. She, on the other hand, is merely stuck here." A twist of the mouth. "And that's the true pity. I don't think her spouse understands exactly what sort of woman Miyuki is, for if he did he should have exerted his connections and found her a posting of some kind as well, or at least taken her with him to help in the job-she is the type who would moulder without work on her hands. A dependable woman, cousin; you would do well to help her in pursuing the career she deserves. I guarantee you she shall make it to consul come her time."

"True, she would go far," Shizuru replied, making her decision. "I would be delighted to ask her to be my legate. If you have any more recommendations you would like to see working with or for you, then please be so good as to tell me. For now, however, please do read that list."

"Hmm." Shizuma took up the list again and scowled. "Some of these names are from very conservative families."

"I know," was the response, an odd sound in the woman's voice. "What do you think?"

"I think I have no idea how you hope to get them for your campaign."

"Oh, I have my ways." The odd sound again, even more pronounced. "Displeased by them?"

"I'd rather not work with a rabid little Traditionalist-in-the-making, to be honest," Shizuma sighed, finally looking up from the parchment.

She caught sight of Shizuru's twinkling eyes. "What is it?"

"I picked at least one to please you," the younger woman said. Shizuma finally identified the odd sound in her cousin's voice: it was amusement. "Direct your attention to the bottom of the list, please."

Shizuma followed the direction and read the name. It was unfamiliar.

"Well?" she demanded impatiently. "Why is this to please me? I only recognise the family-staunchly arch-conservative, although not among those with the greatest clout."

"The Aoi," Shizuru informed her, "are related to the Noboru. Very closely, in fact, to the red-headed branch."

"Oh!" Shizuma read the name once more, a smile slowly dawning on her face as she thought of Noboru's insult all over again. Revenge, and finally! The prospect was enough to have her absurdly eager to go traipsing off on campaign. "I see... So you were listening when I was talking to Chikane."

Shizuru was still delivering information about the name on the parchment: "That one's mother is Noboru-han's sibling. And I hear she herself is his-and I quote-most beloved niece."

The white-blondé laughed. "And you propose to get her, even so?"

A nod.

"Excellent." Shizuma returned the sheet, then seemed to catch herself. "Ye gods, how is she? I have never seen her."

"I have." A lifted eyebrow. "You do not trust me?"

Again Shizuma laughed, tingling with excitement.

"I admire your taste in women, cousin, so I daresay I shall," she answered. "That is one piece of enemy territory I shall look forward to invading. Now if only I could be sure all parts of this future venture would be as enjoyable!"

"Why should they not be?" her cousin asked, all innocence.

For answer, Shizuma looked at the dauntingly full book-buckets intended for her and shut her eyes to them, as though attempting to vanquish them that way. Naturally, there was no such luck: when she opened her gaze again, they were still there.

"You are a demanding commander, aren't you?" she sighed. Not a question, but Shizuru answered as though it were.

"I have been told that before, yes."

"Irritating."

"Is it?"

"Very. I suppose it is too late for me to withdraw my pledge to come with you on this campaign?"

"You suppose correctly." A thought seemed to enter the tawny-haired woman's mind, and caused her lips to quirk. "If it helps, however, being senior legate has a great many perks. Not least being that you could have your pick of women from conquered cities, before they are sent to the slavers."

"What an enticing consolation," Shizuma said unenthusiastically, and collapsed into a seat.

The younger woman smiled, then went to the door and stepped out. A moment later, her head poked back through the doorway.

"You shall stay for dinner?" she asked.

"Shall you have anyone else?"

"No."

"Yes."

Shizuru vanished again, presumably to give instructions to her servants. Her cousin inspected the room meanwhile. It looked, she thought, like every other one of Shizuru's studies: scrolls to the rafters, a random sword hung somewhere with other legionary paraphernalia rested nearby, the latest odd contraptions her cousin found interesting dissected for autopsy on a table, all of it looking like the room was shared by different people of different professions and interests, like a soldier sharing space with a writer sharing space with an inventor... Yes, no doubt about it, the study absolutely reeked of Shizuru and her eclecticism. Thank the gods her furniture at least is consistent in taste, Shizuma thought, sinking deeper into her comfy seat.

An inhale deepened the smell already in her nostrils: the warmly voluptuous scent of leather from the many book buckets, the odour sharpened by the acrid notes of good paper. Not scents that Shizuma, also a reader, found alien. However, so many books were in Shizuru's study that she found the smell faintly cloying, too strong for personal comfort. She knew, of course, that Shizuru sent servants every week to the Argiletum, where the educated slaves scoured every bookshop on that street and bought nearly everything new in stock. Ponderous exercise bringing their hoards back! Yet even more ponderous, thought those in the know, was the notion of reading all those tomes the slaves bought. Which Shizuru did as soon as the slaves brought their cart home. All of that and she still found time to go over maps and work! If that nap earlier had not been an unplanned one caused by sheer tiredness, Shizuma would say she knew nothing of her cousin. Why was the fool killing herself by doing so many things anyway?

"You should be getting more rest," the elder woman said when Shizuru returned.

Shizuru walked over and said nothing, having been hearing that piece of advice so often that she preferred not even to acknowledge it. Reaching her desk, she began to set some of the sheets and maps upon each other in neat stacks. Shizuma watched her in silence.

And then, after the papers were in order: "But when I see you working this hard, Shizuru, it does give pause to those remarks that are always going on about your fortune."

At the younger woman's puzzled face, she explained.

"Your bizarre luck, I meant. How some try to explain how you get through things that seem unnatural-as pulling down how-many enemy fortresses in one forced march, or defeating an army thrice the size of yours, or single-handedly bringing up from the Underworld a vanquished Cerberus."

"I single-handedly what ?" Shizuru said, bursting into laughter.

"Thus runs the expanding litany of your valorous deeds," Shizuma returned, dry in her humour. "It ruins the image of the blessedly unruffled pet of the gods that people make you out to be, cousin, when you reveal that such effort actually goes into the production."

"Blessedly unruffled pet of the gods," Shizuru echoed softly.

She set her head at an angle while giving thought to it, and her cousin noted curiously that she looked neither pleased nor displeased.

Finally, she said: "Certainly I agree that that sort of bestowed luck is a wonderful thing to have, but one also makes one's luck, Shizuma. My armies do the 'unnatural' not because of some arcane appeal to divine forces-though I scorn it not, should the gods be good enough to grant it!-but because I train my army to be better than normal. My centurions know I expect them to work as much as the average ranker, and my men wear out the dust on a drill field until they pack it into rock."

She stopped to smile here, for she was proud of her legionaries and their efforts.

"To attribute our successes to purely esoteric reasons is something of an injustice, I think," she concluded. "Superior organisation and discipline, superior leadership and training. My luck lies in professionalism and hard work." A teasing glance at her cousin. "At least, I would expect people of our status and education to understand that."

Shizuma rolled her eyes. "Oh, of course! Although I doubt you make a point of subjecting your rankers to this explanation of your luck."

"The lowly are far more superstitious than even we are," the younger woman sighed with conscious drama. "No sense in attempting to disabuse them of their belief, as I assure you it would fall on deaf ears."

"And besides, why disabuse them of it when that belief operates on them profoundly enough to have them following you even to the gates of the Underworld, correct?"

A brilliant smile. "I wonder if people do think I could single-handedly vanquish Cerberus."

"And I wonder," Shizuma drawled. "Is it part of your 'professionalism and hard work' that you have the Fourteenth lending assistance to practically every state construction project outside of the pomerium?"

The fawn-haired woman tapped a finger on one cheek.

"They have been making themselves useful, have they not?" she said, walking around her desk and settling herself on the chair opposite her companion's. Her plain white tunic slid up one white and well-formed thigh as she crossed her legs. "It makes for a very nice public image."

"Not to at least one group." Shizuma hummed. "I ran into my predecessor yesterday."

Shizuru asked whom she meant.

"As your senior legate, I mean."

"Ah! Chie-han."

The older woman nodded.

"Did you know she was paying suit to the second daughter of the Senou?" she suddenly asked, sitting up straight and looking puzzled. "There is a politically-ironic match if ever there would be one! I like Harada well enough, but it boggles me that she should choose to go after one of the Senou, of all people. Ye gods, Shizuru, I know I might be one to speak-but snobs, the lot of them!"

"I have met Aoi-han already, actually, and she is not like her family," her cousin said. "Trust me, cousin. That one is not in the same mould."

Shizuma sniffed, looking doubtful. "I suppose... but the father represents the pattern faithfully. And at least the eldest daughter and son, whom I have met. Insufferable!"

"You have met the eldest daughter?"

"Oh, please," Shizuma said to that insinuation, amused. "I'd not give the woman the satisfaction."

"No doubt she would love a Hanazono coming after her," her cousin replied, smiling too.

"Thank you, I think she'd not scorn you either," Shizuma riposted. "You know, most of the brood does well enough when put with someone they consider of their level, but I find Hikaru Senou insufferable because he's one who would mark his level higher than anyone else's, given a chance at the chalk. The man is as puffed-up about his aristocracy as the most arrogant Fujino-Hanazono-and with less excuse."

Chuckling at the taunt to the extravagance of her own nobility, Shizuru answered equably enough: "Unfortunately so. However, Chie-han has hopes to win him over yet. I admit I have my own reservations, but would prefer to hope for the best."

"Oh, so do I... But she shall need a great deal more hope than either of us can provide, I would think."

"Indeed. You were telling me about running into her yesterday," Shizuru prompted gently.

"So I was," the white beauty owned. "Apologies for being diverted! I told her I was going to see you today, and she asked me to warn you that the Treasury is sounding some noise already about how much it currently spends for your soldiers, who should by now have been discharged. Soldiers kept on the state payroll, they say, and kept on to fight a nonexistent war. Talk is going around that your debt little trick with the Ninth and Eleventh-sending them out to handle a sudden security threat in Upper Fuuka, I mean-is just that. A trick."

"That much suspicion I expected," Shizuru said, tranquil. "Even so, I imagine none of them would be willing to have me pull back those legions from their post seriously, in the absence of more tangible evidence that the threat does not exist. That is an area known for suffering raids from the barbarian tribes nearby."

"True, they cannot be sure about that. So the more scathing critiques are actually for the legion you have here, where no security threat can be so easily alleged," Shizuma went on. "The Fourteenth has been bivouacked in the Campus Martius for three months now. The only apparent reason for not disbanding it is the postponement of your triumph, which makes its presence even easier to attack compared to that of the ones you sent out by-supposedly-Chikane's edict."

She folded her arms and finished: "I sounded out some other quarters, and they carry the same news. No amount of public works by your legionaries can stop the Treasury if it sets up a howl."

"Let it!" the younger woman said viciously. It was clear to Shizuma that her cousin had been expecting this, for the disdain in the younger patrician's face was a cold, unsurprised thing. "The Treasury carps about cost all the time-even though we all know that it is full of money!"

The other woman made a face. "It does whinge like a blubbing brat, I'll grant."

"Whinging is what it does best," Shizuru sneered, genuinely irritated with that state institution's predictability. "I tell you, Shizuma, that the Treasury and the people who run it make me despair sometimes of the quality of Himean business sense. For, as it is, the fools generally have none! If they ran up the numbers correct, they would have realised that the money they are paying to feed my soldiers is actually not an additional cost. Rather, it is back-pay they owe them from the added months of service in the North. Convenient of the Treasury officials to forget that it was their senatorial masters who decreed those added months for me and my army, hoping to hamper me by failing to send with the decree the added money required to fund it-which, of course, I had to cover during that time! Hence, what they are paying now is actually what they owe me for those costs"

She folded her arms and looked what she was: a very handsome woman with a very handsome indignation for shabby behaviour.

"How many times have I had to fund campaigns in the Treasury's stead, due to its admirable frugality when it comes to paying for soldiers?" she asked rhetorically. "As for the public works, the fact remains that my boys and girls have finished more construction projects in the past months than those overburdened and inadequate labourers to whom they give the contracts. Why do they not hire a decent number of workers for their projects, anyway? Parsimony without gain is simple folly."

Shizuma shrugged at this speech and did not pursue the issue any further, it not having escaped her that Shizuru was becoming quicker to annoy these days-if not to the red-hot boil she had displayed so famously in the Ogasawara villa, then at least to a skin-peeling simmer.

"And the work on those construction projects keeps your boys and girls from going soft?" she chose to say, knowing her young cousin very well and guessing this would be the best way to deflate said young cousin's ire.

It worked: the predatory gleam in Shizuru's eyes subsided.

"Pre-cisely," said the woman.

"A wonder your soldiers do not complain," Shizuma noted. "You do keep them on the hop!"

"Have people hopping enough and they shall be too busy to think about sitting down," was the answer. "Which is why so many others are capable of so much complaint, incidentally. All they do is sit."

The elder of the two slumped even deeper into the chair, as though seeking to add a comical note to Shizuru's criticism by portraying it.

"You mean the Senate," the frost-fair woman muttered. "Well, we both know they're the ones egging on the Treasury to complain, do we not? An attempt at reducing your bargaining position by forcing you to disband and part with your legions is perhaps only natural... if certainly a foregone failure. Do they really think you of all people would meekly consent to part with your legions at such a juncture, and with the knowledge that you head three of the only four legions currently in Fuuka? Either they do not credit you with the intellect they should or they are trying to live out some fantasy."

"As I said, they do let their imaginations run wild on their comfy couches," the other smirked.

"Quite so. Couch generals in general and of the general! Well..." She gave Shizuru one of her wickedest, most infectious smiles. "At least I shan't be classified in that category any longer, once you have your way."

Shizuru's eyes danced.

"Why, cousin," was her reply, positively dripping humour. "You almost sound excited to campaign with me."

It gained an airy lift of the silver brows.

"Perhaps I am," Shizuma admitted coolly enough. "Before you say it's all due to that niece of Noboru's, you may think again. I'm not yet such a beast that it's only my fleshly-or malicious, I shall admit it-desires that rule me." A haughty sniff. "You know I've yet to serve as a legate with anyone before, though what terms I have served I did not find myself disliking. Perhaps army life is just what I need to distract me these days."

Shizuru regarded her favourite relative.

"I have always known," she said. "That you have the stuff of a good general, cousin."

"Thank you," Shizuma said with simple grace. "I know you mean that, else-family or not-you would never have asked me to be senior legate. Still, that means I must prove myself in the position before taking on actual generalship, naturally." A shrug, eminently casual. "I know what people shall say when you announce my appointment, of course, and I know it shall not be entirely baseless, Shizuru. My name is not known to be linked to anything military, and my last campaign was ages past. Not that it matters to me. At least this campaign of yours shall be a major graduation in my record and experience."

"Come now, you speak as though your time as a military tribune had been without distinction."

"Wasn't it? I didn't get a corona graminea, did I?"

"What an injustice!"

They traded grins.

"I shall have you on the hop too-don't think I shall not," the younger warned, eliciting an abrupt grimace.

"I can see it already with this pile you want me to study, so consider me warned," Shizuma said, drawling again. "But I meant to ask earlier: what is this? I expected you to be entertaining guests tonight."

"Because of the upcoming contio, you mean?"

She was speaking of the contio that would draw a close to the seventeen-day waiting period required by law to elapse before a bill proposed to an Assembly could be voted upon: specifically, the bill recently proposed by Himemiya-Kanzaki to finally decide Shizuru Fujino's matter. As Urumi had managed to put the bill to the Centuriate Assembly, the decision would come down to the votes of the First-and possibly, though not very probably, the Second-Class. It was an extreme rarity for the Third or Fourth Classes to be called to vote at all, so lobbying for motions put to the comitia centuriata generally focused on the higher strata of society. Which meant a different kind of lobbying from usual: invocations of blood or political-alliance instead of spectacles and inducements for the People, persuasion-laced dinners rather than distributions of bribes.

"Relaxed you are," Shizuma said. "Only three days left before the vote and here we have you, blasé as ever. I truly thought you would be spending these days charming some undecided knight or senator out of his boots, which is why I did not expect to find you napping when I passed by. Not worried at all, are we?"

Shizuru shrugged her shoulders very slightly.

"Of course I am. But a few dinner parties at the last minute shall not do much for that," she admitted. "And I have actually done all the lobbying I feel possible. Admittedly, some of it was held over dinners, so you were not far off the mark just now."

"I heard... you had Kanade and her posse over last night, right?"

"My, but women do keep you informed of who goes where!"

Shizuma ignored the tease. "Are they sympathetic?"

"Kanade-han seemed to be. But then, we may yet be uncertain." Shizuru frowned gently, folding her long, white fingers atop her thighs. "You know it is very difficult to elicit anything that may be construed as a commitment from her."

Shizuma looked critical. "The Jinguuji are always very careful about not overtly taking sides."

"Well, the clan is split in half: although the more powerful members are on the conservative side, save Kanade-han herself. A disadvantage to us. At the very least, she is not nearly as hidebound as some of her relatives."

"But bound anyway to her clan," Shizuma countered. "Who else? The Ootori?" she asked, naming another of Hime's powerful equestrian families.

But the younger woman shook her head. "Futile trying to treat with them. Have you ever met an Ootori whose promise could be trusted as oath?"

Shizuma smiled.

"I know what you mean. That family's absolutely no sense of political honour: funding the conservatives when requested to help bring down radicals like you; founding at the same time a new manufactory that produces pila according to your radical new design. Animals!" Shizuma exclaimed, laughing along with her host. "They don't begin to dabble in politics unless you give them a commercial reason for it. Knights first and senators later. The economics of our world rule them."

"And vice versa."

"Mm-hm. But I think their attitude makes them more likely to vote your way, you know. All those business prospects in the North. The more voracious equites are already lusting after the idea, and the Ootori are voracious about their businesses, if they would be anything at all." She drew a breath quietly. "The knights, in the main. It shall be the knights who tip the balance your way."

"So I believe. Whereas it shall be the senatorial families who shall tip it back," Shizuru admitted. "I have been keeping abreast of events in Hime from here, and I do know what is going on, not least the lobbying being made by the conservatives against my cause. Very busy bees, our conservative friends."

A pause; her lips thinned.

"Especially Yuzuru Nakao-han, I hear."

Shizuma looked at her cousin, remembering how angry she had been when Nakao's man, Hitagi, had tried to denounce her in that fateful House meeting. How surprised everyone-herself included-had been!

"He's an unthinking fool without any class feeling," she spat, referring to the patrician Nakao.

"He would undoubtedly say the same of me," replied her cousin grimly, before suddenly gripping both arms of her chair and pushing herself forward. "Oh, no matter, Shizuma! I shall deal with him another day. For now, Nakao shall keep. The more important issue at hand is how the centuries shall vote in three days' time." She rested an elbow on the table to her right and leaned slightly towards it, propping up her chin with one hand: "Sosius-han came to see me the day before last."

"Your chubby little banker? To, what, inform you that you're still rich?"

Her cousin was chuckling. "No-although I am still that, fortunately! No, his visit actually had to do with two things: first, to inform me of what is happening among the Eighteen; second, to finish the purchase of this house and several others on my behalf."

Shizuma was puzzled. "You've been buying real estate? Why?"

"It is a good investment, as I see it," Shizuru answered. "I never realised until now-staying in this villa and hiring it for so long-what a good market there is for properties like this. There are countless others staying in hired villas near mine this very moment, many of them ambassadors from other nations. Some others are overseas governors returned to Fuuka for some reason, yet required to go back to their provinces afterwards and thus prevented from crossing the pomerium into the city. And, of course, there are the generals awaiting triumphs or ovations to be granted: although I am currently the only example of this type, this has been an unusually quiet year. And I predict that my choice to rent this villa instead of putting up in a tent with the soldiers shall start a trend from now on-you know our peers!"

"Yes, that's so."

"Thus I thought about it. If I buy the properties from the original land-owners, all those rents go to me directly and I also have an investment in prime real-estate I can sell off in the future, should I ever need to. As it is now, I shall no longer have to hire this villa. It already belongs to me."

The hazel eyes regarded her with a fair dose of befuddlement and Shizuru lifted an eyebrow curiously. Not that the other woman intended to give her an explanation: Shizuma was actually trying to understand this creature she called her cousin, who was already a brilliant politician and general, yet was also turning out to have a great deal of plutocrat as well. To have one of the aforementioned qualities was noteworthy, and to have two of them excellent... but all three ? No wonder her cousin sometimes sounded insane! To be so superlatively gifted in so many fields, Shizuma decided, could not be mentally healthy. Maybe that was why her temper was turning out to be so destructive?

"What did your Sosius say about the Eighteen, though?" she said, changing the topic.

"That the conservatives are bringing every ounce of influence they have to bear on the First Class," Shizuru revealed. "Naturally. As things stand, the vote is just as likely to go my way as it is theirs, although I still believe I have a slight edge."

"I wonder you can still be so calm with only a slight edge."

The younger woman's expression turned feline.

"Because I have faith yet in Hime's First Class," she purred. "I am quite willing to gamble that, after they hear what we have to say during the contio, they shall show themselves just as self-preserving as mortals of whatever rank or stature."

"Oh, I see. You've something boiling in the pot."

"Urumi-han does."

"A queer fish, that one."

Shizuma adopted a pensive expression, her mind occupied with the image of the queer fish's decidedly queer stare. A few more seconds of this had her looking grim. Shizuma had all the Himean distrust of overly intelligent young women-a distrust she often-but-not-always spared her cousin.

"A very smart queer fish," she concluded. "She's dangerous, Shizuru."

"Yes, without question."

A level glance. "But you are still unworried about using her, eh?"

Truly relaxed ."

Shizuru threw back her head and laughed, producing an image very few of her peers knew and loved because very few of her peers could see it without feeling envious: either of her youth, or of her beauty. But this cousin sitting with her at the moment felt no negative emotion at the sight, and could look on in nothing but comfortable and affectionate appreciation.

"Please never forget, cousin," the woman reminded Shizuma with a winning smile. "Never forget: I am a very smart, very queer fish as well."

Shizuma smirked at her relative, who was also her friend.

"Which is why the conservatives refuse to swallow you, Shizuru," she said. "Queer fish make for spiny morsels."

By the time the contio arrived, however, the spiny morsel looked as mild and unassumingly dignified as any upstanding member of the patriciate could hope to be. She could attend the meeting since gatherings of the Centuriate Assembly were held outside the pomerium, the invisible barrier of the city she could not cross . Thus she was able to make an appearance for this meeting in full augural dress, from purple-and-red toga trabea to curlicued lituus . As with most fair men and women, Shizuru showed best against a backdrop of dark, rich shades as could be found on the toga trabea . Which was exactly why she had worn it. Besides, it reminded everyone that she was an augur, which was a further distinction. Her cousin made much of her conceits as they bantered with each other before the meeting-a familial display very much appreciated by many in the crowd, ravished by the cousins' appearances.

The presiding magistrate was the senior consul, who soon called down silence. The auspices were taken by Shizuru herself, after which the senior consul did not dally long and reminded the gathered citizens only that the bill upon which they were voting was not being put forward by her, but rather by her cousin. Before any voting would take place, however, she announced that said cousin would be allowed to have her say and refresh everyone's memories as to the content of the law for which she sought passage.

Urumi Himemiya-Kanzaki's appearance on the podium was not hailed with the usual raucous support it usually met. That regular adulation was given her in her fief, the venue of the Assembly of the Plebs, specifically the Well of the Comitia. The Centuriate Assembly was not made up of such elements as might frequently be found in its plebeian counterpart, where majority attendance was actually constituted by the plebeian lower and middle classes. To be sure, many of these were present that day as well, and still shouted their support of her from the sidelines. But they were on the sides and could not actually set the tone of the meeting. They were not the power in the Centuriate Assembly, where the only votes that mattered belonged to their superiors, not prone to being half as vocal. Most of the crowd clustered nearest to the podium were such subdued specimens, senatores and equites mixed together.

While a good number of the faces nearest Urumi were open enough to indicate willingness to listen, there were also some very dark ones. The darkest belonged to a cluster of senators to her right, many of whom were the leading members of the Traditionalists. These had good reason to glower at the speaker: the days leading to this contio had shown them the full extent of Urumi's menace.

The very first contio convoked for discussion of this bill had not actually been held in this Assembly, but rather in the Assembly of the Plebs, and several weeks ago. On that day, as soon as word spread that the President of the Plebeian College had called a meeting about Shizuru Fujino, every last archconservative had come running to the lower Forum, their tribunes of the plebs in the lead. The response they had in mind had been simple: the conservative tribunes would veto the proceedings before they went any further, the Fabian strategy adopted by the Traditionalists would continue, and any bill proposing resolution to the Fujino issue would never see the light of day-or so went the idea.

There had already been a good thousand in the Well of the Comitia by the time the conservatives arrived, which meant that their tribunes of the plebs had had to squeeze through a crush to get to the rostra that day. They had pushed and edged through the crowd, screaming vetoes as they went. Not that they had needed to scream to be heard: the convoker of the meeting had gone silent at their arrival. Strange, the panting conservatives had thought, but also understandable, given how she had just been muzzled. Far stranger was that many of the gathered plebs had also been silent, faces ugly.

Just as the conservative tribunes had finally reached their destination and the Traditionalists had started to pat themselves on the back for yet another successful delay, the strangest and most terrible thing of all happened. At the time, no one had noticed that it happened only after Urumi Himemiya-Kanzaki put a hand to her fair hair and began to scratch as one would when put-out. A natural enough gesture, but not one normal to Urumi Himemiya-Kanzaki's nature.

A convulsion had followed Urumi's scratch. Suddenly feet had jumped, hands had hauled one of the conservative tribunes from the rostra and into the mass-where she had then vanished amidst a swarm of people shouting, pinching, slapping. Of actual punches or kicks none had been dealt: merely pinches or open-handed blows were meted out to the hapless tribune, whose face had soon swelled into unfamiliarity from the slaps of what seemed hundreds of hands.

Many of the senators and some of the uninvolved plebs had fled. Many others had stayed and watched, rooted to their places in horror, and unable to do anything against the sheer power of the mob and its violence. Violence against the sacred person of a tribune of the plebs? Violence against one of the officials every other official dared not touch, so protected were they? Unthinkable! Yet there it was, right before them!

The two remaining conservative tribunes had been sensible enough, at least, to back away from the platform's edge. It was at that point that the president of their college had sidled up to them:

" That is the real plebeian veto. Isn't it a sight? I suppose this means we shall have to discount your friend's veto today, since the Plebs themselves have spoken disapproval through their actions. They've gone rabid! I can't blame them, though... What's government coming to when tribunes of the plebs use their vetoes to block a motion that would see an end to a problem crying out for solution?"

And, stepping bravely to the fore of the podium, she had lifted arms and voice.

"Cease, Plebs!" she had cried, tone indicating she had no fear of being ignored. "I implore you to cease! We understand your wishes- her veto is null and void! Leave her be, for I believe we all understand this!"

She had turned to the remaining conservative tribunes behind her.

"You two over there, speak! Tell them you understand this and withdraw your vetoes!"

What else could the conservative tribunes have done, save to say yes? After this the crowd had immediately ceased and, letting drop the bruised and split-lipped tribune to the ground, dispersed at the behest of the President of the Plebeian College. Every senator still present had rushed to the aid of the unconscious woman, too horrified yet to realise how coolly the Plebeian College's President had acted, and how swiftly the abusive elements of the crowd had obeyed her wishes. It was much later in the evening that many of them had remembered the premeditated look of the event, and understood fearfully which senatorial wolf had just shed its skin to reveal an even more beastly aspect. How they had cringed! What was happening to the Republic when a single tribune of the plebs could muzzle the rest by threat of mob violence? For Urumi Himemiya-Kanzaki had shaken her head at the end of that horrid spectacle and, taking the arms of both her conservative colleagues, had said,

"What a good thing you two were standing far back from the edge! They might have grabbed you too. In any case, look on her well." She had pointed where someone was lifting their insentient friend. "It serves an object lesson, doesn't it? I really, really hope that does not need to happen ever again."

So when word came out soon after that another meeting was being convoked to discuss the Fujino issue-albeit in the Centuriate Assembly and by the senior consul this time-the conservatives had come running once more... but could not persuade a single one of their tribunes to veto the new contio. They coaxed, cajoled, tried to convince their tribunes with promises and money. All to no avail, as the grey-faced tribunes took one look at the podium, shook their heads and fled from the scene in a tearing hurry. Veto, they said to their leaders, with that monster of a woman grinning at them from there? Veto, with all the raffish elements lurking on the fringes? Veto, and have the sacred body of a tribune of the plebs violated again? No, no, no, no! Nec nefas nec noxam optamus ergo negamus!

Haruka Armitage was so incensed she had one of her fits right there on the Campus Martius, tearing out hair and rending toga in front of a fascinated public. But that was because the trait Haruka Armitage possessed to a fault was courage of the most bull-headed kind. She alone could say that she would have lodged a veto regardless of the peril, and be believed in that statement. As for the others, they knew that they could not completely fault their tribunes of the plebs for knuckling under. All very well for Armitage to rave about principle and lily livers! Any kind of liver was fine so long as you lived to use it, and majority liked to live better than they liked principles.

Hence this day, and the days that had led up to it. There was much resentment simmering in the crowd Urumi faced. But it bothered her not a whit. It was not in her nature to be troubled by bad opinions of her, especially when those harbouring said bad opinions happened to be people she had by the balls. She also knew that, outside the Senate, more were eager to see a resolution to the issue that had been on the public table for the better part of the year, if only because the public was starting to tire of chewing on it.

"Greetings, quirites, " she began, pitching her voice high and clear. "I thank the senior consul for affording me this venue to discuss the bill I drafted with her assistance. For clarity, the bill to be voted upon today states that Shizuru Fujino shall be invested with her proper praetorian office, but be denied the traditional honour given to those praetorian candidates who come in first at the poll, which is the urban praetorship. This owing to the plot executed by Tomoe Marguerite, who is not now in this city and is reported to have fled prospective charges by boarding ship to Greece. Said plot, we note, does not involve Shizuru Fujino as an accomplice, and indeed shows her to be a victim. I pray this much is already clear. If so, may we proceed?"

She made a show of waiting for any protests to be registered, although not expecting any.

"Then let me address first a remark I've heard over and over lately," she said. "There's been much talk of this setting a precedent. Very well, I say. Why do I say very well? Because it should ! It should set a precedent, quirites . After all, the very problem it aims to remedy is one that does set a precedent! A very dangerous one, whose growth we must nip in the bud this second."

"I've spoken of this precedent before, the first time actually being to my fellow senators. However, I fear I wasn't very well received. But it was not merely my audience to blame for that. It's possible that I phrased what I said too circuitously, still a touch too delicately for most. It's possible that, when I talked about this pernicious little seed thrown into the soil of our beloved Republic, I made a mistake by not putting my warnings direct! For I chose instead to hint at it by reminding the Founding Fathers and Mothers of our responsibilities to the creation and consolidation of law, regardless of the fact that the Senate does not-strictly and as a body-directly pass the laws of Hime."

She held out a hand and shook her head.

"I thought the hint would be taken then, but I miscalculated," she said gravely. "That miscalculation is an error that should fall on me. Feelings ran high due to events at the time, and so it was only natural that many would have the veil over their eyes, even if said eyes are normally far-seeing and clear. Even my eyes were partly veiled, in the sense that I failed to consider this veil over my audience's eyes when I gave my first warning. Now I see what I should have said and done. I should have given my warning in frank and plain speech! Thus shall I give it today, in hopes that you as well as my honoured colleagues see the justice of my statements and my proposition."

She paused to bow humbly to her cousin and those allies standing nearby. The same bow was given to the huddle of Traditionalists, regardless of their glowering faces.

"First, let me say I am a tribune of the plebs," she stated. "I became a tribune of the plebs in the last elections and, upon becoming a tribune of the plebs, I also became a senator. It is my duty to speak out if something endangers the interests of these two bodies, whether it be the Plebs concerned, or the Senate. What I have to say today concerns all these, in fact, and a greater body that has my full allegiance: the body made up of Hime and all Himeans themselves. What I have to say concerns none other than the Republic. This is why I implore you to listen, for this issue touches on and endangers every one of us."

" Cunnus!" spat Haruka Armitage. "She's the one who endangers the Republic! How dare she?"

Her friend the junior consul held her by one arm and whispered her into subsiding. They needed to hear what this maverick was going to say.

"Let us review what I have said in the past on the subject. In the past, I spoke of this as an illegality of dangerous consequences. To be sure, each time I was speaking of the illegality in this electoral travesty, I was indeed speaking of Shizuru Fujino's unusual case as perpetrated by the deceitful Tomoe Marguerite. However, I was not drawing the line at Shizuru Fujino's case alone! There is a far bleaker, darker future to which this case leads, and it is that which concerns us."

"When Shizuru Fujino's name was put up in the list of candidates for the praetorian elections, it was without her knowledge and consent. It was something that took her by surprise, for it had not been her intention to run for praetor yet. Yet there it was-her name put up, the votes for her counted, the victory complete! It was a grave wrong to Shizuru Fujino, yes, in the sense that it violated her right to decide for herself which office to seek and when to seek it. But it is an even graver wrong to the Republic as a whole, for the implications it carries."

She turned suddenly to the direction of the huddled conservatives, peering into their faces with her mismatched eyes.

"Let us take an example to illustrate these implications, quirites," she announced. "Let us pretend that, say, a certain senator or knight or citizen found the same thing happening to him as it happened to Shizuru Fujino. Granted, a good number of my senatorial colleagues might not think it such a bad thing: it is said there is honour in simply being permitted to serve Hime, in any capacity. Yet would the same be thought by our good knights, who serve Hime in their own way-no less than the senators!-yet not in any elected position and of their own choice? Would the same be thought by any odd citizen amongst us, who surely serves the Republic in his or her own way as well? We choose our niches, quirites, because we know best where we can serve and serve well. Should another be arbitrarily given this right to choose the way we take?"

Her shoulders squared; a frown came to her face.

"Something must be mentioned here, of course, as an exception," she told them. "There have been rare cases where circumstances of the greatest urgency made it necessary to elect leaders without their prior knowledge or consent-as with the case of several consuls and war leaders elected during pressing times, chosen by the People to take command of the army when the Republic was imperilled. But that was in a specific context, quirites, which we do not currently have and did not have during the last elections. In times of peace, the respect for the rights of citizens cannot be abridged; in times of peace, there is insufficient reason to do so. The Republic is not threatened, which means that the only viable justification for such an exception to be made-the safeguarding of the Republic as a whole, I mean-is inapplicable. Furthermore, those rare cases I just mentioned had been determined in the nature of mandates from the People, who ratified them with the assistance of the Senate and obtained the subsequent permission of the concerned persons afterwards. So much can we say about a legal history of the issue."

She nodded solemnly to her audience, which had gone completely quiet. Even the conservatives listened with furrowed brows, their faces indicating they were actually giving thought to what she was saying-little though they liked the one saying it. They were by no means all stupid: the sharper advocates and experts of law were beginning to realise what she was getting at, and realised too that they were in agreement. Oh, but why had she not spoken of it this frankly before now? And, even more galling to think about, why had none of them seen as far as she had?

"Returning to the issue itself, when I talked about the illegality being committed, I was not restricting its violations to the sanctity of our elections alone," Urumi said, her eerie eyes flashing. "The even greater violation was actually to something all of us must cherish-to every citizen's representative integrity! If we put it in blunt speech, quirites, what happened to Shizuru Fujino was no more and no less than a frame-up. It was an entrapment that can never be permitted to happen again else it lead to worse liberties taken by others who would use our names for purposes other than our own!"

"Let us keep going along the logical path of the example I gave a moment ago. Let us say you were nominated and elected an aedile ahead of the time you had wished to seek the office, with your finances in bad shape and your affairs not ready for the aedilician drain on your purse. You did not know of the nomination, yet suddenly found yourself obliged to ascend an office you had not yet intended to ascend. Jinx to your plans, and perhaps even your career! The aedileship, we all know, is an office that can prove ruinous-and has in fact ruined several of our worthy fellows, who found themselves experiencing in the office what every aedile throughout history has had to suffer: the disastrous drain of money for the sake of the games, which the aediles are expected to put on each year with only a bit of help from the Treasury. How many have we seen riddled with debt after their aedileships, never again to rise to the level of financial security? How many careers have we seen destroyed by only a year in this office? Would you be compelled to undergo the same even if you were not prepared financially, mentally, politically for it? Would you permit yourself to be compelled simply because some liberty-taking criminal arrogated himself the right to put up your name in deceit?"

A brief pause, a turn, another slant of the brows.

"That is only the beginning," she said threateningly. "For see! What if-just what if-we indeed allowed this sort of liberty to others? What if we permitted this illegal use of our names by others? I ask you to think on it, quirites, and imagine if you will the many situations such permission could breed. If we permit Shizuru Fujino's case to go uncontested, what shall happen? If we allow someone to put up another's name so cavalierly without the other's consent, then where does this permission stop? Where else are we allowing this someone to put up the other person's name? Whose names are we allowing to be put up so insidiously? And what does it look like if we allow all this?" she asked, looking fierce.

She took a deep breath.

"I shall tell you!" she thundered, hands held out as though to embrace the gathering, or perhaps to take it by the arms and shake it into seeing what it needed to see. "It looks like we are saying that it is now legally permissible to employ the name of another for a purpose unknown to the true bearer of the name! It looks like we are legitimising frauds and forgeries ever after! It looks like we are removing not just Shizuru Fujino's but every - single - citizen's inalienable ownership of their legal personhood, destroying the concept of proper self-representation to the public and the state!"

"Can you not see then where this leads?" she roared, managing to make it sound both worried and angry. "Can you not imagine any of your enemies-for we all have enemies!-taking advantage of this? Were a person elected to a position without his consent to candidature, would we then oblige him to take it, even in an absence of the most urgent circumstances compelling his acquiescence? Were some treacherous family member to submit a new will to the Vestals boasting his name on it, would we then be obliged to honour that will without proper verification of his consent? Were his name posted on the doors of the Curia in a pronouncement declaring revolution against the Republic, would he then be damned as a traitor of the state immediately, without any investigation made to confirm his complicity? Are we to do all of this? Are we stupid savages and base barbarians, that we should fail to investigate allegations made in a person's name? For, I warn you, this is where sanctioning the illegality in Shizuru Fujino's case will lead! It leads to forgery of the most horrid possibilities, of entrapment and liberties taken against the individual personhood of every lawful citizen of our great Republic!"

She paused after the last word, letting it echo portentously over the gathering. Oh, the silence! Urumi used her pause to listen to it reverently; she knew she had all of them hanging on her speech. Now all that was left was to let them down, soft as dandelions dropped by the wind.

"That is the precedent I warned of earlier, my beloved quirites," she said, lowering her voice and adopting a painfully concerned look on her face; most of those present had an even worse variant of the same look, for that which Urumi was warning of had such immense gravity.

"That is the precedent. It is but a short step from this sort of disregard for personal determination to the disregard for the person itself. If we allow people to use our names without our consent, we are giving up our ability to speak and decide for ourselves. We become no better than slaves whose masters decide everything for them. And we cannot allow ourselves to be slaves. So we acknowledge the crime in this issue and prevent it from establishing a case for future criminals to get away scot-free. Hence this bill."

She paused to swallow gently, throat dry from the summer heat. How nice it would be to get a glass of cool spring water! She could not stop yet, however, nor even pause to ask for a drink: it would be a weakness, and she could not afford it.

A little more, she urged herself, hiding discomfort behind a bitter smile. Just a little more!

"Now, I can hear some people asking about the provisions of the bill. Why must we give Shizuru Fujino any acknowledgment as an elected official at all, if we cannot deem her candidature as legal? Because, fellow citizens, despite the illegitimate nature of her candidature... her election itself was legitimate. The forms were observed. You and none other than you elected her in a lawful assembly. If I may remind everyone of the legal processes of our Republic, that which has been decreed and approved by we Himeans in our valid assemblies-whether those of the Plebs, the People, or the Centuries-is Lawalready. Thus, barring the contentious nature of the nomination, the election itself of Shizuru Fujino was lawful. The gods signalled acceptance of it when the auspices were taken on the election day and showed to be perfect. You yourselves ratified it the moment the votes were counted and she was declared first on the elected praetors' list. Her election became legal the moment the members of the Centuriate Assembly voted her in and had those votes counted, expressing through the polls an electoral mandate which is equivalent to a bill. "

She shrugged exaggeratedly-to ensure the gesture would be seen even by those far away-and assumed a helpless grin.

"So much do we know: we cannot gainsay the outcome of the elections on that point," she said then. "The only way to do so would be to allege that the praetorian elections themselves had been dirty or to accuse the elected official of bribery. But have we heard a single murmur of any such thing? Any allegations against Shizuru Fujino on that count?"

Here the junior consul had to be glad that she was standing right next to her dearest friend, because it permitted her to yank the woman's arm with unexpected strength when she saw the latter's mouth twitch.

" Don't, Haruka-chan!" she whispered furiously, unaware of Sergay Wang issuing the same prohibition to some other hothead in their midst. "It won't do to raise accusations of Fujino-san having bribed-unless you have something right now to prove it! And you know there's nothing to prove she did!"

Haruka stared, quite taken aback. A good thing she found Yukino's actions so stunning, for nothing else could have cooled her head sufficiently to prevent her bellowing out an accusation that very moment.

"But they'll beat us!" she protested, in a voice she had not even known herself to possess: quietly plaintive, not boisterous and brassy.

"Yes, but they'll beat us more extravagantly if you do what you're thinking," the other hissed, too afraid for Haruka to even contemplate how unlike herself she was acting. "Please, Haruka-chan! We'll think of another way after this, but for now just let it be."

Urumi on the podium was still asking questions in provocation, actually wishing Haruka Armitage-whom she had seen on the verge of an outburst-would get up and scream bribery.

"Even one whisper of bribery?" she asked, looking terribly expectant as she peered into the crowd. "No? Nothing? Never? That's quite rare, isn't it? I wonder why that is!"

A call from someone in the crowd made her cup her ears to his direction, and she asked him to repeat his words. He did so quite cheerfully.

"Oh, yes!" Urumi clapped her hands together after the second call and pretended to bow in courtesy. "Quite so, quiris, thank you for reminding all of us here! Shizuru Fujino was not even in Hime at the time of her election and could not have done any bribing, considering that she was unaware of what was happening! Not that bribery could be expected from her, mind you, had she known about it: I would like all to note that this selfsame Shizuru Fujino, in every election she has ever contested in the past, has always and ever placed at the top of the list, absent a single allegation of bribery! Every-single-election, quirites ! Statistically-speaking, the outcome of her candidacy had to have been no surprise, even if her candidacy was."

Another shrug, as eloquent and beautifully executed as all her other gestures-for Urumi's mastery of rhetoric extended to the rhetoric of the body, and each turn of her head, each extension of her hand, was done in superb accord with the effect her words were making.

"Now, a praetorship is a curule magistracy, vested with imperium . It cannot be stripped so easily from one who has been elected into it. If anyone at all can do so, needs must be those who elected the magistrate. As it was with Katsu Hitagi, former tribune of the plebs, whose case did not even involve the matter of imperium, and is thus less weighty . Hitagi's downfall began in the Senate, but it concluded in the Plebeian Assembly. As it should have, for it was there that the Plebs voted him into office, and it was also there that they voted him out of that office by ratifying the Senate's decisive recommendation, strictly a senatus consultum . You remember this, my fellow Plebs who are here! As I remember it, having been there when you voted to support the Senate's recommendation! As illustrated by that instance and legal tradition, an elected official can only be stripped of elected status by the redress of law-when under charges of bribery or treason-or by the legal mandate of the proper Assemblies."

"So Shizuru Fujino cannot be stripped of her status as an elected official. She is not under accusations of bribery or treason. She has not requested this Assembly to pass a law undoing their votes of her, specifically. Or would she? I have been talking so far about the right of every citizen here to represent himself lawfully. Far be it from me to turn hypocrite! Let's ask the woman here, now, what she says of this. Shizuru Fujino, please step forward!"

The woman in question detached herself from the side of her cousin and their allies, the people around them clearing a path for her to walk up the podium. The crowd sighed its appreciation, finding the summoned woman a treat: decked out in the augural robes, her head of gorgeously thick, loosely curling hair finally bare (she had had to cover it with a fold of her toga for taking the auspices), Shizuru looked sumptuous. Upon ascent, she faced Urumi.

"Were you aware of your candidature in the last praetorian elections and was it with your consent?"

"I was not aware and it was not with my consent," Shizuru declared, her voice carrying clearly.

"Do you nonetheless consent now to occupy the position of praetor, into which you were voted by the members of this Assembly?"

Again from Shizuru: "I accept it, as it is the people's wish."

"Shall you not request that they undo their election by creating a law waiving their votes in your case?"

"I shall not, for my only desire is to serve the people of Hime," the woman answered modestly. The summer light pouring over them showed her to full advantage, and she looked haloed with honour, incorruptible. "But if there is any part of my election or candidature that shall not serve Hime, I myself urge it to be redressed. I would not own an honour procured at the price of Hime's interests."

"Oh, well played, Fujino!" hissed Sergay Wang to those in the audience who could hear him.

"I thank you for your honesty," Urumi answered loudly, as Shizuru again stepped away. The tribune turned to her audience once more.

" Quirites, we are answered. She has agreed to accept the mandate of your votes. We are then justified in considering her an elected official, despite the doubts within her candidature. But! But we cannot be justified in giving her the full traditional benefit of the elections. As I said earlier, we must rectify the illegality buried in her candidature, and do so in such a way that makes clear our disapproval of the deceit involved in it. Yet we cannot tamper with that which has been established lawful already, which is her conclusive electoral victory."

Her eyes gleamed, and she flicked her gaze very swiftly at the Traditionalists.

"I talked earlier about people misunderstanding my first speeches about this issue," she said. "And now I come to yet another of those misunderstandings. When I asked the Senate for a senatus consultum removing her from the topmost praetorian seat, I was misunderstood again, I fear. They thought I was asking for a special privilege for Shizuru Fujino. Let me clear up the misunderstanding today!"

Her voice boomed again.

"I was not demanding special privileges for a senator whose misfortune it has been to be caught in between two cliffs without even intending it. I was and am not giving Shizuru Fujino anything she does not deserve or have already! In fact, I was and am denying her the only thing I can deny her -it not being provided by hard, written law but by more flexible, unwritten custom. I am denying her an honour that I firmly argue she would have achieved legitimately, if only her name had not been unknowing party to deceit. I am denying her the highest signal honour of the praetorship, the choice position of being the urban praetor. It grieves me to have to do this to one actually innocent of the crime we have been discussing, but I have been left only two paths due to this situation! Think on them, fellow citizens, and see which one I had to take and why I took it."

She turned carefully this way and that, making sure to pretend to be peering in supplication to every side of the crowd she faced. She had every appearance of a woman troubled, pained by the hard road she was forced to take for justice.

"Witness the questions I had to ask from the beginning," she said to them. "Was I to allow an ulcer to take root and fester within our beloved Republic, one that could harm every person here in the future if let be? Was I to keep silent and permit a well-deserved honour to a woman who would doubtless have gained it even without the pre-emption of an outside deceit? Or was I to cut out that ulcer instead to preserve the rights of every man and woman in our Republic, and in doing so deny a signal honour to a woman who-even given the situation-of herself deserves it?"

A despairing shake of the head.

"Oh, yes, quirites ! The choice was clear, much though it pained me. I had to speak and deny that innocent woman an honour that unsolicited others had contrived for her to gain dangerously: I had to cut out that ulcer planted on that one innocent woman because I could not permit worse danger to cut the innocent many ."

She stopped here, her face covered with lofty sadness, and shook her head again.

"It cannot be helped, but this is the only way. At least, our learned senior consul has informed me she shall propose legislation soon that imposes more stringent requirements on the declaration of candidature for our electoral process, that this may not happen again," she disclosed, drawing some to him strongly in approbation. "I am in agreement that it is high time someone formulated better, stricter laws for this, given that we have experienced such a travesty recently. For now, however, I am asking you to pass a more immediate prevention to similar travesties, also a resolution in its own way. I ask you to pass the legislation we have tabled today, which shall make an example of this case as an instructive lesson to all would-be forgers and falsifiers in the future."

"Let Shizuru Fujino-lawful praetor-elect-be marked," she said, her chin held high and her stature seeming almost to increase. "Let her be singled out as the only praetorian candidate ever elected first in the poll not given the distinction of being named the urban praetor. Let this much be withheld from her, much though it should grieve all of us to single out for such a denial she who is actually a victim. Let this much happen, our grief notwithstanding, because we have no other choice but to deny her this to signal our disapproval of the illegal element in her candidacy. If we do not make an example of her case by this denial, we shall imperil every citizen of our Republic by implicitly condoning the misdeed through which Shizuru Fujino was manoeuvred into gaining that which we deny her now. And that imperilment to all of us, to the whole of the Republic, we cannot condone. Nor indeed, as Shizuru Fujino said earlier, can she."

After which words the senior consul permitted no others to speak and simply commenced the voting. She wanted Urumi's words to be the last ringing in the audience's ears, had they truly listened and understood. And, as it turned out, the Centuries had listened and understood. The bill divorcing Shizuru from her praetor urbanus position was passed by century after century called to vote-including those centuries, in fact, with the strongest ties to the conservatives. Shizuru and Urumi's gambit had paid off. The First Class voted unanimously for their proposal because it was shown that to do so was not really about supporting Shizuru Fujino: it was about preserving its own skin.

---

Takeda Masashi's senior legate, Seigo Ushida, received the letter carried by Nina nearly a fortnight after the young woman left Takeda and Suou's Seventh. If the bedraggled Otomeian who handed Ushida the letter failed to impress him, the letter's seal did. An eagle with wings curved out, bordered by thorns and bearing the striking contraction HIME between the open talons-no mistaking those letters! Only one family in the Republic could have so impressive an ellipsis for their name. Ushida was sensitive enough to sit up when a letter came from the sister of the current senior consul, even if he did wonder why the packet had not also carried a letter from their common general, who was his friend. A question that grew stronger once he perused the letter's contents: it should actually be Takeda writing to him demanding that he bring up the rest of the cohorts, not a woman whose military rank was below his, and who was not even a senator yet, into the bargain.

Oh well, he shrugged, quickly weighing the matter. Chain of command in an army was one thing and tended to be temporary, whereas the social chain was another... and was more or less permanent. He was acutely aware of the duties of the upper classes to each other, and aware too of which families had the claim to the uppermost stratum. Here Suou's name stood her in good stead, since the very well-born and patrician Ushida might have ignored her had she not been a member of her clan. As it was, he had to admit her clan made even his look just slightly above pedestrian. Besides, to give his fellow patrician her due, he also noted that Himemiya Minor had written a letter full of good, sound military sense. If there was anything Ushida understood aside from Himean social ranks, it was good, sound military sense. If scouts had disappeared and someone as obviously capable as a Himemiya scented something foul underfoot, it was obviously time to get on for a sweep!

In truth, he was also relieved. This letter had come at the perfect time, giving him just the opportunity he needed to uproot from his post. Ushida was a man of action and had been hankering so long for something better than staying in Argus and cooling his heels, his fantasies full of leading the legions to some outlying foreign territory and snatching up the fabulous treasures sure to be discovered therein.

Seigo Ushida had taken this mission in hopes of finding wealth in the rich North: his family's fortunes had gone bad, and there was enough of the brood to make funding their political careers terrifically costly. Seigo was the eldest and had to be the one to find the money. Just his luck he happened to have the talents that would help him find his fortunes in the military. Ah, for a nice foreign war against a wealthy foe! He thought, when Takeda offered this post to him, that he had found it. But his old friend had proven an unexpected hurdle, had turned out to genuinely mean what he said about working towards a peaceful concession with the barbarian

Mentulae.

Nothing daunted, Ushida had then proposed to plunder the vaults of a different nation, said to be just as rich, if not richer: Otomeia. But Takeda had shrieked like a plucked fowl, told him to stop jumping to ideas of war, and to look over the Argus garrison quietly. Subsiding, Ushida had then tried to content himself with the tiny gifts he managed to solicit from the local upper crust, with his dickerings with the publicani, whose collection of overdue taxes he aided by having the soldiers do the confiscations, taking a work of art or something of value for his cut here and there... and conscious all the while that his purse was only growing plumper by inches, while he himself was growing bored by miles. It was not even so much about the sluggishness of the financial trickle-simply that he needed action! He was a military man, in command of an army, yet was being left to waste away!

So after Suou's letter, Ushida wasted neither words nor time. After composing a brief reply, he told his officers to mobilise the army straightaway. What he would have liked to do was take the legion garrisoning Argus with him, but he had sufficient sense to know he would not be likely to obtain it. Argus held the main Himean ports in the North, and was too strategically important. As the legion garrisoning it also happened to be understrength, the governor naturally regretted to say she could not peel off any cohorts to lend him. She did, however, offer to send messengers for him to Otomeia demanding the recall of the auxiliaries that had been sent back there recently.

The Argus governor was actually another recipient of Suou's mail. Aside from Ushida, Nina had been carrying letters for two others in Argus: one being Midori Sugiura and the other-though Nina made sure to let no one know about this-being that enterprising Greek that Takeda disliked so sorely. These two were also informed of Suou's inklings of Mentulaean foul play, but asked to take different courses of action from Takeda's senior legate.

The Argus governor was adjured to prepare for any outbreak of conflict by training militia and shoring up defences in the province, as well as barring all Mentulae in her territory from leaving. Not that this meant she would be putting all descendants of Mentulae or Mentulaean nationals under house arrest: rather, one could call it provincial arrest. They would not be allowed to exit or enter the Argus boundaries from that moment, to help reduce the possibilities of treachery. All ships passing by or docking at the ports and found to be carrying material bound for the Mentulaean territories were to be detained indefinitely, their cargo to be seized in the event of outbreak. And, finally, the governor was to be ready to send an official letter to Hime in such an event, to help light a fire under all those sluggish and sceptical senatorial arses.

The other recipient of Suou's communication, Yamada, found himself reading a missive that did not so much suggest as it directed. He was ordered to cull whatever information he already had, get more immediately, and write to Hime to inform Shizuru Fujino of all that had already taken place. He was also commanded to request orders for himself from Shizuru Fujino: so that he could, she said, prove himself "not entirely superfluous".

A powerful man in these lands and a veteran in his field of expertise, Yamada could have chuckled at this young aristocrat's acidity and her smugness in ordering him. That no laughs escaped him was for two reasons: first, quite naturally, was her ominously powerful name; second, not as naturally, were the equally ominous and powerful paragraphs she had tacked onto the end of her letter.

Now, Yamada-san, I've been telling you to do this and that thus far, but I think it's time I told you why exactly I can tell you to do this and that. Being that you are a man who makes a living on intelligences and traded knowledge, let me put it to you in terms of my knowledge so that you may better appreciate it.

I know Fujino-san came to an agreement with you about your services. I also know the terms of your service to her were not as fully outlined as they would normally be, had she only had the time to finish all matters with you. Circumstances being what they were during her departure, this has not been the case. So I think it's possible this lack of clarity is to blame for your subpar showing of information so far, and the indistinct nature of what little you have provided: most of the information you've given me has been about a lack of communication from some of your travelling agents instead of actual communication from ones still heard-from and possible to send out for the purpose.

Now, do not worry. I'll not think this evidence of sluggishness to invest more of your resources to Fujino-san's cause, of course. And I definitely will not think it evidence of you doubting Fujino-san's ability to get you the citizenship you wanted, or her word that she will. After all, I'm sure you are taking the initiative required of you and sending out more of your best people this very moment, are you not? Of course you are! I never doubted you for a second, you know.

At least, when I see Fujino-san again, I can tell her you have every indication of having held to whatever minimum of loyalties your standing agreement demands. That's good: it might make her a little less dangerous when she questions why you've taken so long to be more proactive about taking the risk of sending out more of your agents. I'm not sure it would really make her less dangerous, you understand, although I am sure that Fujino-san considers loyalties to be important things. As do I.

But times like these are not very healthy for loyalties, are they? Such periods of uncertainty lead many to question loyalties, especially fresh ones, when the scales of power seem to hint that they might tilt. I personally feel a word of caution is always better during such times, so I shall help by tendering you a few to use for points of certainty, us being allies and obliged to help each other.

For the first point of certainty: do not imagine the scales shall ever tip against Hime. No foreign nation has ever triumphed against it, no foreign nation ever shall. Do you remember that silly country that tried anyway? It was a long time ago. That nation was actually quite large, I believe, and led by far better generals than that King of Kings the Mentulae have. But what was that long-ago nation's name again? Oh dear, I seem to be forgetting! Let me see... Oh, yes, now I remember: Carthage. It's so easy to forget them when they are written so conclusively out of existence.

Second point of certainty: do not make the mistake of thinking that you are the only head of clandestine operations in the area or that your network is insulated and-should you get into hot water, say, with a disgruntled client-that your network can insulate you perfectly.

I have noticed that separate and sometimes conflicting intelligence groups actually tend to work with and around each other, even if they have (whether technically or according to appearances) only one master. For instance, even if Fujino-san often employs local intelligencers for her campaigns, she also happens to be very fond of grabbing officers and rankers raised in the Sulpician territories for her legions... which you should note because she's the type to actually use tools she gets. Very good at checks and balances, Fujino-san is.

Finally, to add just one more point of certainty to the list: do not imagine that anyone who makes an enemy of Hime can ever escape. We have very long arms, we Himeans, and Fujino-san herself is-as I said earlier-very fond of grabbing.

That having been said, I do have a great deal of certainty that you are currently doing as Fujino-san would expect: jumping all over to find the information you should be providing us. At least, this is what I'm certain you are doing if you still want the citizenship. It's good practice for being a true Himean too, in that you'll not count the costs to your business in this matter, and count yourself glad instead to be of service to Hime. And-just like a true Himean!-you'll not even think of switching loyalties to some ambitious thug just because he calls himself King of Kings and he and his soldiers happen to seem nearer to you at the moment. What is such temporary proximity compared to a more enduring and significant one, after all? Remember our long arms, and Hime's inability to be beat. Remember too that this King of Kings is the same creature Fujino-san sent home with a mere word-whipping. Not a very attractive alternative to Hime, is he? Ah, but nothing is.

But what am I doing? Apologies: my quill ran too long and superfluously. After all, you already know many of these things! I know you know them, just as I know you're a paragon of loyalty to us, and to the woman whom you asked to become your patron upon enfranchisement and to practically function as your patron while you prove the worth of your enfranchisement. I know you're so dedicated to this woman's cause that you're simply killing yourself finding a way to get information that can help her, even without me coming to administer a neat kick to your bottom to help get you moving. I know this, just as I know you appreciate me sharing all this knowledge with you. Fear not about the trade: I share all this information completely free of cost. As your ally in the enterprise, it is the least I can do.

I will repeat your orders: infiltrate the Mentulæan Empire and command, by any means necessary. Get all your agents, including those on other missions, and rededicate them to getting information that can help us here. And report everything-your recent actions and inactions included-to Fujino-san.

Yamada took the hint. His efforts, he admitted, had been flagging recently: a spate of doubts had coincided due to the absence of Shizuru Fujino and the increasingly precarious local situation. Suou Himemiya's letter had dried up the spate, and Yamada gave his intelligence network the neat kick to its bottom the letter had threatened to give him. While he bore no grudges against the writer of that menacing epistle, he was honestly taken unawares. The claws that had written it! He remembered the author from prior encounters only as a very attractive and affable woman, rather sociable but not flamboyantly so. Not unintelligent, but with an inclination to be easy-going. Uncomplicated.

It seemed he had to revise this impression quickly. For some reason, Suou Himemiya had managed to keep from him the more acute traits in her, now manifest. Clearly one more patrician who bore watching: another very young aristocrat with very sharp teeth!

Yamada deemed it high time he impressed both his sharp-toothed patron and her sharp-toothed friend. The packet he sent to Hime was thus a very fat bundle, full of culled reports and letters besides his. His ownmissive imparted both information and inferential advice, aside from apologies for his sloth in reporting. Best to assume, he wrote anyway to his patron, that the Mentulæe are planning on attacking. Aside from the odd lapse of communiqués from his agents, he cited too one of the last pieces of information his agents had been able to intercept and report: one of the royal princes, Calchis, had been summoned from his station and instructed to bring his army with him to the capital. Significant, especially considering that the army that prince carried was the largest force belonging to the Mentulæan King.

Another piece of information he shared and cited as support for his assumptions was the fact that some of his agents had recently tracked large shipments of charcoal to the Mentulaean towns of Arvern and Comus. These were the Mentulaean towns with the highest number of steel foundries, he explained.

While I don't intend to be arrogant, I'm still obliged to explain everything for clarity and to ensure your satisfaction in my work, Fujino-san . So please forgive me if I seem to be making an assumption you don't know the things I have to say next, because that's not what I intend. In reality, I'm only going to say them because I'd rather you know that I know them. I'm aware I have to prove my worth to you, so I'm making sure to prove it wherever I can from now on.

Everyone in the steel and metalwork business knows that it's not the amount of iron available that actually determines the productivity of a foundry. It's charcoal, of course, since the amount of charcoal needed to make steel is considerable. So I think it's fair to say that the spike in Arvern and Comus's charcoal imports is indication there's a sudden spate of production going on there. Arvern and Comus generally produce ploughs and ladles and pots, but why not swords and mail-shirts? I'd guess that's what's happening over there right now in all those manufactories.

If this guess is right, this tells us that the Mentulae have plans for a massive and extended military investment. Their current armies are already equipped, so this indicates that they intend to raise more armies in the future. And wherever they intend to send out armies is likely to be within the area adjacent to their borders, given the tactical recall of Prince Calchis to the capital. Obviously, the Himean territories are included in the potential area of deployment-as are, a little further along, the Otomeian ones. The Mentulae are likely thinking of going to war with us, and very seriously.

Thus Yamada's letter to Shizuru. About the same time his packet was halfway through its journey to Hime, Takeda Masashi's senior legate was discovering further complications that would compel a far more urgent letter to be sent presently. Twelve days into Ushida's march to honour Suou's request for reinforcements, the messengers he had sent ahead returned, racing back down the path they had just travelled. Their reason: a Mentulaean army sighted marching on the road to Sosia, its ranks looking ready for a siege.

The news threw Ushida into a fury of reorganisation, as it gave him to understand he would now have to proceed in a state of high alert instead of relative security. Not, of course, that he had thus far conducted himself like someone just on a nice little stroll. A good man with an army, he had been sure to observe the requisite amount of suspicion a march in foreign lands necessitated. If it was the foreign part that raised the bar for "the requisite amount of suspicion", his officers said to each other, what did that matter when it actually improved the commander's vigilance? The trick was to try and keep his suspicion of the foreign from getting to the archers travelling with them: little regard though Ushida had for auxiliaries, he had still brought up the remaining Otomeian cavalry archers in Argus with him. For which instance of military caution overriding prejudice his officers were grateful indeed.

So Ushida carried with him one squadron of horse archers and the last five cohorts of the Seventh-the last in terms of number and standard position, since the Seventh's leading cohort down to its fifth one were the ones with Suou and Takeda. Desperate numbers, Ushida knew. But Ushida's case had a lucky advantage over Suou and Takeda's: to all appearances, the Mentulae had not yet detected him, whereas his messengers had already detected them. There were thus no enemy troops fielded to impede him on his march. He could follow them to Sosia unhindered, making smokeless camps the whole way. That he headed to Sosia instead of trying to find Takeda and Suou was because he knew they would likely be headed there too, gods having been willing to preserve them wherever they were!

More of his messengers went out, some sent to make contact with the general's group. More were deputed to reach Argus, informing the governor and advising her to "buckle down", because Suou's premonitions had become more or less a reality. Similar messages were sent to nearby towns too: the small, Himean-allied communities near the main fortress cities of the Sosia and Argus provinces. Whenever he encountered any of these small settlements on the march, Ushida spoke with the local authorities or town leaders-people usually of Himean descent-in order to warn them of what might be on the way.

"Raise your militia," he told these. "Send them to Argus to get equipped or send to Argus for equipment if you feel you want to make a stand here, though I'd not advise it. If you don't fancy being run down by the Mentulae, though, clear out quick! Help will come eventually, but it won't be quick enough to help you if the Mentulae decide to pass through here."

"We will go to Argus," replied one such ethnarch to him. "But what of the harvest? We are only halfway through gathering it."

"Then get all hands on it, man!" Ushida exclaimed. "And bring all of it to Argus. It will come in handy with all the extra mouths going there to feed."

"We will send word to the neighbouring towns as well," the man suggested deferentially.

"Good. Tell them not to fanny about, or they'll be lost before they know it! The Mentulae are coming and there're enough of them to swarm the place."

And in afterthought, he added, "Take with you the treasures of your community, naturally. You can billet them with my people: I have very roomy quarters in Argus, and they'd make a safe storehouse for your things."

He doubled the number of his scouts. It was only here that Suou might have disagreed with his military actions, for the scouts he chose were purely Himean and Argus locals, not a single one of the Otomeian stock Suou had grown to prefer. To be sure, Suou did not actually mind using Himean and Argus locals as well, especially those who had years of experience. But she had come to prefer the Otomeian scouts for their skill and military sense.

The Otomeians were a people so used to the area as well as to the military that they all knew what things to note ahead of time for army purposes. They knew what things to preserve without being told, and also what things to kill. They also had a near-fanatical notion of honour and duty that more or less ensured they would prefer to die rather than turn traitor or divulge information. Their belief in the hereafter apparently demanded that they die honourably to enjoy a good afterlife, and this made them very difficult to break (it was dishonourable for a warrior to break) in torture.

Whatever the case for his scouts' nationalities, Takeda's senior legate nonetheless managed to follow the Mentulae quietly. The complement to his half of the Seventh, meanwhile, was creeping about not too far away, having abandoned their old camp and moving to a new and cleaner location. They had sent reconnaissance teams out to better inform them of the situation, since Takeda was wary of running into the enemy again. While waiting for the teams to return, his group kept a vigilant perimeter check to avoid detection, and worked on recuperating those who were wounded.

The scouts they sent this time operated under extreme stealth, and were the very best the Otomeians could field. One group, the one sent to Argentum to find out what had become of that city and the legion in it, was led by one of the sub-commanders of the Lupine division; another group, the one scouting the camp perimeter and nearby paths for enemy threats, was led by the division's commander herself. It was for the first group that everyone in the command tent waited, for it would decide if they would proceed to Argentum or head to another destination. Everyone was too restless to wait patiently, however, so the Mentulaean officers taken captive after the Siege of the Seventh were routinely subjected to questioning. Unfortunately, to little effect.

"One's brains are gone from being coshed too hard on the head and the other one's acting a fucking warrior-prince-just the sort of cunnus too proud of himself to break," the officer in charge of the two captives growled to Suou when she checked. "I've had the men beat him up good enough to crush a nose but he's not saying anything yet about Argentum. All he does is smirk-and that's enough to get the men asking if they can beat him up again."

"You broke his nose?"

"Yes."

"I see," Suou said with a faint look of derision. "If our dear-what's his name again?"

"Carus." A grunt. "Says he's some noble or something. Hah!"

"He might be. Anyway, if our dear Carus is smirking about Argentum, broken nose and all, that means we can't expect anything good from the scouts when they come back."

"At least he admitted they're hoping to surprise Sosia and Argus."

"At least," Suou said dryly, thinking that admission little better than useless. She wished again that she had Nao here; Nao would know what to do to get a man talking. "Well, I don't know about Sosia and Argus, but they caught us by surprise, all right! I myself knew they were about to start something funny, but I thought they would do it in late summer."

"It's these bloody odd seasons," the officer answered. "Spring was slow, and that kept the rivers fordable between them and us for too long. The Otomeians say the thaw usually arrives later here than it does back in Fuuka."

"I wish we had known that before," Suou sighed. "If the thaw had only happened earlier, I doubt they would have crossed so easily and without detection."

"Would've liked them all to try even then, just so they could've drowned."

"Quite. Get more out of him if you can, would you?" she said. "Something a little more concrete... like how many troops are being sent out, what other movements they plan."

She started to turn, but not before sending a glare over her shoulder.

"And leave their faces alone, " she added frigidly. "It's an idiot who smashes in the parts most important for getting answers to questions. Have a little finesse about it. If I come here next time and find one of them killed from the torture, I shall flog to ribbons the man responsible-right before sending him off to execution."

Three days before the Calends of August, the scouts who had gone to Argentum finally reported. The Mentulaean curtain had come up, it seemed: the enemy's scouts had grown complacent as soon as the Mentulae penetrated deeper into Himean territories, deeming their work half-finished. Most had gone home, and those who did stay operated so slackly that the sneaking Otomeians not only managed to evade enemy patrols all the way, they also captured one Mentulaean scout while returning. Thus did the Otomeian troopers get to fill out the story whose bare bones they discovered in Argentum... which they had found in ruins, a city devoid of life. From the captured scout came the story Carus had refused to tell: the Mentulae had taken Argentum from inside even as Takeda had marched for his peace treaty. Argentum and its people were no more, including the legion that had been garrisoned in it-Shizuru Fujino's Eighth.

The news fell like a thunderclap. The Himeans were deafeningly silent as the Otomeians passed word, and a heavy pall descended upon the camp. The Eighth! A legion whose standards groaned when carried, so heavy were the decorations upon it; a legion that had once trampled down three fortresses in one legendary march in another country; the very legion with which the Seventh had fought at Argentum to make military history. That had been a year ago. To think that only a year had passed and already there was no longer an Eighth in the legions of Hime! A new one would have to be raised to take its place. But that new Eighth would not be Shizuru Fujino's, would not be the legion that had come to achieve the status of legend.

The Eighth can't be dead, the aghast soldiers muttered to each other, saying it over and over as though it could disprove the reality. It was just so hard to believe! What all could believe, at least, was that the Eighth had stayed true to its repute: the scouts said the area around the legionaries had been littered with even more Mentulaean than Himean dead, each member of the Eighth seeming to have determined that the price of his life would not come cheap. But oh... the pain of imagining the Eighth's bodies strewn around the place where they had triumphed, the very field where they had sent thousands of Mentulaean dogs running! How the General-not this general, but their general-would weep!

Shizuru's former legate did weep, but in a strangely composed way, without a sob or a choke to her. And in her eyes was the hardening frost of anger already, promising retaliation for the deed.

"Really some shades of Homer at work here," she remarked dispassionately, voice smooth though the tears still ran down her cheeks. "Of the legate Aidou-san there was no sign, so we must presume him either dead or captured. Either way, this is a travesty."

Takeda, too shocked to even grieve, agreed. They were in a meeting with the rest of command, trying to decide what their next course of action should be. Morale was low even among the faces in the tent, for the fate of Argentum and the Eighth rammed home the point that this small force of theirs, combined with the small forces garrisoned in the Sosia and Argus provinces, would be the only Himean armies present to contend with the enemy. The outlook was too bleak to even contemplate winning. The question most of them were asking was actually How can we possibly survive this?

"What do you intend now?" Suou asked the commander, dabbing at her eyes with a cloth.

For some reason he could not entirely plumb, something in the reasonable query felt threatening. He looked into her eyes-trickling water, yet never thawing-and saw suddenly that if he something wrong, this coolly grieving patrician would not hesitate to strip him of position and primacy.

A shudder at the idea, a blink. What was he thinking? This was Suou, cool and steady Suou who could not be capable of mutiny! But to look in her eyes was enough to have him doubting, and he wondered again if he was right in his fears. Or was it merely that his nerves had been stretched so thin lately?

"We march for the nearest relief we can have," he said, aware that his shaky voice made it sound less of a command and more a proposition. "Sosia. I'd like nothing better than to go and get the Eighth properly burned with ceremony, but we can't risk exposing ourselves on a flat plain like Argentum, especially if the Mentulae are passing through it. So it's Sosia."

He cleared his throat and explained: "It's close, and even if we know the Mentulae are besieging it, at least we'll be assured there's a garrison there to support us, and maybe food to spare for us too. Though we'll also have to forage as we go, naturally, to be safe. At least we still have the food we pillaged from the Mentulaean camp after we broke up their siege! If we go now, we can help relieve the siege the cunni have at Sosia by falling upon their rear. It's not too long since they went, and I'm sure they can't take Sosia so easily. Shigeru Oni's the commander of the guard there-a good man. He's one can hold them until we get there to help."

Suou nodded approvingly. Relief coursed through him, and as though by contagion the faces in the tent suddenly looked a little less despondent.

"We've got to send for reinforcements," said one of the centurions, seizing eagerly on practicalities: the grief over the Eighth would not be forgotten, of course, but could be indulged in later. At the moment, it was just necessary to live long enough in order to make the Mentulae pay for their treachery.

"It'll do until we get more Himean legions here," the same man went on. "They should've got word of it by now-no doubt Argus is sending to Hime already! But right now we need auxiliaries to fill up the gap. Cavalry, archers, infantry. Anything they can give. We'll take 'em because we need 'em."

Takeda pinked uncomfortably, as he had been the one to send home most of the auxiliaries his predecessor had garrisoned in various cities. To his relief, no one saw fit to remind anyone of it, although he did spy a wicked gleam of the eyes from his Suou the Ever-Steady.

"Better do it now. We're not that far from Stych Gorge," said a tribune, naming the nearest route to the Otomeians' mountain citadel and general territories. "Whom should we send?"

"It makes sense that it would have to be the Otomeians themselves, probably with some tribunes," the commander replied. "Yes, some of the horse troopers. They'd know how to get around fast and without getting caught in a trap. If they could get through to Argentum and back, they could get through anything."

Suou's cut in.

"Stych Gorge was swarming with Mentulae the last time Obsidian tried to invade," she reminded the group. "And I hardly think the Mentulae will desist from doing the same thing this time, no matter the failure of the previous attempt to hold the gorge. Their interests in this region are contested by only two forces: Hime and Otomeia. That pass is probably invested again."

"So what should we do? Surely we can send some through it... you know, just sneak through if they can."

Suou got to her feet. "Let me get Natsuki-san. She's the highest-ranked Otomeian we have, and head of the division we're carrying. She should be here."

After a quick summons from the outside of the tent, the Otomeian in question limped through the entrance. Suou motioned to one of the non-combatant servants, who brought up a stool for the head of their auxiliary.

"We're sending for troops from Otomeia," Suou informed her. "We need it to plump out our troops since we're heading for Sosia."

Takeda suddenly received a quick, very meaningful flicker from the cut-emerald eyes, and reddened again from mortification. No doubt she remembered whose decisions had necessitated this second summons of auxiliary!

"I think Stych Gorge is going to be invested again, which means I'm against sending the couriers that way. What do you think?" Suou was asking.

"Likely," the girl answered, before offering the alternative: "Another route exists."

"Yes, I recall hearing about it before, and it was actually there that I was inclining. Tell us about it."

"It is longer," Natsuki said. "Curves around the high parts of the range."

"I expected it to be longer. It's far to the north, right?"

A map was produced and the girl traced the route with her finger. All heads huddled around the table to look.

"Would you say it's safer?" Suou demanded.

A frown was directed to the floor, followed by a furious chew on the lip.

"Is it less likely to be invested? Yes, because it is hard to invest," Natsuki answered slowly, clearly focusing on her words to ensure there would be no misunderstanding. "Too long, too open, too far from these lands to concern the Mentulae. Not an easy investment or one to see many returns..." A thinking pause, the beautiful eyes narrowing. "And also far from their area of - ah - speculation."

Eyebrows shot up automatically. Rhetorical metaphors from their Sphinx? What a day this was turning out to be!

"But is it safe?" the appropriately enigmatic creature before them finished. "That, I cannot say."

"Fair enough," Suou replied, tears completely dried. "Any ideas, however?"

A sharp nod, darkly glossy hair rippling. "I would suggest some things."

"What are they?" Takeda blurted out.

"Send through both routes," Natsuki answered. "Men in disguise, small groups, to be fast and less likely to be noticed. My best men, I will choose them. They will be slower than normal, even if they go fast, because it is so that... it may be necessary for them to hide, most of the way."

"What's the point of having them in disguise, then?" someone asked, drawing a roll of the eyes from several people.

Natsuki still humoured the query.

"Better to avoid discovery if possible," she said to him. And then, with a faint downturn of the mouth: "Also, Otomeians are - are recognisable . Very tall, unlike the other local peoples... and also very fair of hair."

No one bothered to note that she herself did not display the latter attribute.

"So they must hide often and will be slow," she said again. "But it is better to be slow than to never arrive."

"Or, as we Himeans say," Suou smiled, " better late than never. Yes, the main idea is to get word to Otomeia, anyway. The troop deployment itself can make up for any lost time, once the call for reinforcements is conveyed. I like it. What do you think?"

She addressed the question to the gathering, which nodded and voiced agreement.

"But," spoke one of the other officers, "this means we'll be some tribunes less, since we're sending out two separate groups of couriers with the same request. Whom should we send?"

This remark provoked the Otomeian into tugging at Suou's arm, bringing the patrician's attention to her effectively. She asked a question in Greek, voice so low it was hardly a voice, and Suou murmured an answer. Something seemed to displease Natsuki about the reply, however, for she shook her head vigorously and started muttering. The conversation in the tent proceeded for some moments without them.

"Oh, I see," Suou suddenly said loudly. She straightened and faced the company, which had turned its attention to her again. "She is asking me to tell you that she feels it would be wiser if you did not send any tribunes at all."

That provoked eyebrows to go climbing up foreheads again.

"Why not?" Takeda enquired with relative mildness: it was technically Natsuki he was quizzing, after all, even if he addressed the query to Suou. "It's normal policy to send at least one Himean of suitable rank for such purposes."

Natsuki's brow creased, although she said nothing.

"She has a point, you know, which is the necessity of speeding up where we can," Suou said in her place. "She already said the messengers would be slower than usual because of the circumstances. Why hamper them further by tacking on tribunes to their care?"

"That presumes the tribunes are incompetent," one of the tribunes, Kaori, retorted. "In which case we shouldn't be sending them at all! The commander's right in that it's a formal delegation to an allied nation, therefore it should carry at least one Himean of appropriate position in it. This is for certainty as much as formality, too. How do we know the urgency of the request will be heard properly unless a Himean member of command is there to say it?"

Natsuki unexpectedly replied to this.

"You do not trust us?"

That drew the speaker's eyes to hers in a flash, and the Himean's mouth clicked shut at the glitter in the green. Everyone stared at Natsuki.

"That's not what I said," Kaori replied, feeling at a disadvantage. The foreigner rarely spoke, so to have to be the one drawing out her voice and in such a confrontational manner was awkward.

"It's partly a matter of form," she explained to the young lady, whose face was dangerously impassive. "And also insurance. They can help organise any reinforcement troops sent out from Otomeia, as well as lead them to us."

"But we have leaders too, capable of that much," Natsuki protested, colour rising on her cheeks. "Or you would not have me here, no? My men will be slowed if you make a tribune go with them."

"You said earlier that they'd be slow already. The tribunes should be able to keep up, especially if several of your men are there to help them."

"Are they trained in such things?" Natsuki demanded. "Can they ride as we do? Can they climb trees so fast? Creep up a rock face?"

"No!" Kaori snapped, goaded. "But they can learn as they go."

"Learning, it takes time," was the obstinate murmur. "There is not much time."

"That's exactly why we need to send the tribunes, Natsuki-san," another officer tried, seeing that both women looked to have tender tempers-and after the news of the Eighth, who could blame them?

"To make sure the deployment of reinforcements from the capital is as speedy as required and to ensure it all the way by commanding them on the march to the place where they are needed."

"That, it ignores my point."

The Otomeian was agitated.

"You ask my men to take one more consideration when there are already so many," she said in her husky voice, looking both exasperated and angry. "And it is not a consideration that is required. Why is this? You risk so much for so little? You do not trust us even now?"

The occupants of the room gazed at her stare, finding the green of it incredible-almost as much as the fact of her speaking straight to them, in fact.

"If you will take my suggestions, you have no choice but to trust," the Otomeian was saying in her slow but deliberately-pronounced fashion. "You may trust us and let only my men go to Otomeia. Or you may say you do not trust us... send tribunes with my men to Otomeia... but then still have to trust us after, because my men will have care of your tribunes with them anyway."

She swept them with a darkling look.

"If it is about the one to command the reinforcements," she continued, "it is strange . Strange because you did not do this on the march before... when first you came to our citadel... but want to start now." Her chest heaved. "So in times of great - of great - great urgency, we are not to be trusted to command ourselves on our own lands? We are so incompetent? Our leaders are so untrustworthy?"

A silence followed this impassioned speech until one of the primipilii broke it.

"Pardon general, but I've got to agree with the lady," he said to Takeda, swinging about to turn his stubbly face to the general. "I think they'll be fine getting to us. The real problem is us getting to 'em."

"But... it's irregular," someone from the back countered weakly. "A Himean should command the reinforcements."

"Even for just the march?" Suou demanded, deeming it high time she returned to the conversation. She had actually gone quiet out of fascination, for this minor argument had finally shown her something Shizuru and her sister had warned her about before: that Himeans tended not to get anything done sometimes because they brought bureaucracy even to military tents! How many other natural military men had she heard complain about it, without understanding in full because she had yet to experience such a thing? And here she was finally seeing what they meant for herself, but only after her third spell in the legions.

Suou Himemiya, she told herself, you have been atrociously spoiled.

"To insist that only we can command them is nonsense!" she said. "It's not unheard of for allies to have their own commands, especially when marching instead of engaging. It's normal, in fact. We've been fighting with the Otomeians for months now-almost a year for those of us who've been here since Argentum-and if there is anything we have seen from them, it would be that they are good allies and their leaders are dependable."

A tip of her head to Natsuki, to remind Takeda's staff of what the girl had done for them during the flight to their old fortified camp, before the Siege of the Seventh.

"See, I think we shall be needing all our officers here, given the sorry state of our forces. Our men need their leaders more than ever, so why peel away more just to send for auxiliary? I don't think the Otomeians have ever failed to honour any requests we've made to them on that account, have they? You were King Kruger's attendant, besides being a relation of his, Natsuki-san. What do you think? Would he have any reason to hesitate in sending more auxiliaries this time?"

Natsuki shook her head vigorously.

"There you are, then."

She looked at Takeda, who had pulled in both lips and looked to be thinking.

"We need a decision now," she pressed him. "We're wasting even more time."

Takeda frowned, then sucked on his teeth in that irritating way Natsuki had noticed he did when trying to make up his mind about something. Takeda understood what those who wanted to send tribunes were saying but also agreed with Suou in that it was just as normal to allow auxiliaries to command themselves for a march as it was to send them an actual commander. So he weighed instead what Natsuki- beautiful, sensible girl -was trying to express. Should he send tribunes along with whatever troopers she sent, the whole delegation would not only be slowed but also endangered. Which meant the possible loss of not only the delegation's purpose but also of some tribunes who would be of noble birth, valuable members of the next generation of Himean senators. Yes, quite easy to see which way was best. It just happened to be a bonus that it would also have a certain princess thinking better of him.

"We'll keep the tribunes with us: I'll need all the officers with me," he finally decided. "Send messengers to Otomeia now. Suou, can you organise it this moment with Natsuki-san? As you said earlier, the sooner they're off, the better. The rest will get the men ready for march."

A nod of the head, and the two women-one limping on her walking stick-were out of the tent.

Takeda turned to the rest, his tones hard to show them he would brook no more extended debates.

"We move out tomorrow, at dawn," he directed. "And stiffen them up, would you! I don't want to bring a group of broken-hearted legionaries to Sosia. Remind them of who they are and how they've survived thousands of these Mentulae not a week ago. Tell them they'll survive the fellatores again and put paid to the bastards."

So the rest of the officers spent as much of the day reassuring the men as getting them ready, while Suou and Natsuki worked on the deputations to be sent to the Otomeian king. Suou composed the missives herself and spoke with the barons the girl chose for the purpose, making a point of explaining the situation in detail. It was dark by the time the delegations left, and both women retired to their tent: they were sharing one these days, for the sake of practicality.

"Well, that's that!" the Himean said, massaging her nose's bridge. "I only hope your troopers can make it and make it quickly, Natsuki."

The Otomeian hobbled over to her cot before answering. Not for the first time, Suou was struck by how wrong it felt to see the girl hobbling. There was something inside her that insisted against the idea of Shizuru's girl limping, found it almost profane to either atmosphere or aesthetics. For a second she was tempted to help the young woman instead of suffering the display any longer, but she resisted the urge: the last time she had tried to do it, the Otomeian had been so incensed Suou counted herself fortunate an ear had not been bitten off. The princess had a royal temper, apparently!

"I hope too," Natsuki said, finally depositing herself on the cot. She looked tired, Suou thought.

The Himean took a chair. "What, not going to assure me at all?"

"My men are skilled."

Suou was wry. "Your idea of assurance is still too practical, but thank you anyway."

" We will make it, you think?"

Suou looked at her with cold assessment, noting that the girl would only ask such questions now, when they were alone. Good girl, really . After all, having the legionaries overhear their superiors discussing the possibility of defeat was not exactly confidence-building.

"I wish I could say yes for certain, but I can't," she answered candidly. "Yet it's far from impossible to get to Sosia without conflict. If we speak in terms of probability, we're in fairly good shape." A slow, charming smile. "Especially because of your people's work. Keep it up, and we shall all reach Sosia safely."

"And when we reach Sosia?"

Suou laughed without amusement. "Well, Natsuki, that's quite another bridge to cross, isn't it?"

"Uh... mm."

They were quiet for a moment, Suou in rest and Natsuki in thought. Suddenly, an expression of excitement dawned on the latter's face, lighting up her remarkable eyes from within.

"I have an idea," she announced, practically shivering with enthusiasm. "Suou. I have an idea ."

"Then say it," Suou grinned.

"Why not go to Otomeia?" the young woman suggested eagerly. "Pick up the reinforcements and supplies there, directly, yes?"

But the face Suou turned to her was apologetic. "If I thought we could last long enough, Natsuki, I would be all for it. But, as you said to us earlier, the safer path is longer... and we're watching rations as it is. The Seventh's also too low at this point: I would like it to regain its spine again, and I believe the best way to do to that at present is to have it in sight of allies. The knowledge that the Eighth is no longer here as a back-up force is working on them, so they need to be reminded that the numbers aren't all on the Mentulaean side. Thus Sosia, with its garrison."

"But if the goal shall be reinforcements, Otomeia too has them," the girl countered. "For provision, there are a few posts if we detour a little along the way. Also, I thought we could curve."

"Curve how?"

Natsuki nodded eagerly. "To cross the upper boundaries of the Mentulae. It is not very fortified, the area near their upper boundaries. They have no great cities there. But they have many small towns, also farmlands on the outskirts. Why not hit them and seize food and stores, then run?"

"You sound like a bandit."

"We destroy the towns is what I would like," the Otomeian replied haughtily. "If it is to be a bandit, why not? The Mentulae work so. It is good for your men too... since they feel much sadness now, but the feeling can be turned to - to ultio."

Suou was smiling broadly by this time. "Vengeance?"

"Yes, vengeance. We give them that through burning some of the Mentulaean towns. Such vengeance will make your men confident. We can also forage on the way. Too, it is a good thing for the war if we strike now. Maybe the Mentulae will be shocked - will be a little distracted, no?"

"True. It's unlikely they would even think of having any of their towns suddenly come under fire while they're so vigorously on offensive. Not at this point, at any rate." Another smile, even as Suou shook her head. "Even so, I stand by the decision to head for Sosia. It's still the best and safest option."

Natsuki made a sound in her throat, looking thwarted but not overly surprised at this outcome. Studying her surreptitiously, the Himean guessed why.

"You're thinking Shizuru-san would have done it."

Natsuki was stunned.

"So I think too," the blonde admitted readily, before the younger woman could deny it. "And, doubtless, she would have done it successfully. Perhaps even our ill-fated march to Argentum would have gone well if it had been Shizuru-san heading it. But I'm not Shizuru-san, and neither is Takeda."

The pale brow furrowed.

"Never mind him," Natsuki dismissed. "But you are good too at war. You can do it, I think."

"Thank you for that. Although, if I may say it myself without sounding an arrogant prat, I also believe this past year has shown me that I am not a complete disaster indeed," Suou said, managing to say it without sounding like she was bragging. "At warmaking, I mean. I confess I'm pleased-or should it be relieved?-to be able to live up to expectations there."

Natsuki's ears perked at this. "Expectations?"

"Since I would hate to disappoint either Shizuru-san or my sister in this posting." A pretend-shudder, theatrical and reminiscent of Shizuru to Natsuki. "And with the two of them so very good at it! War and tactics come to both of them without effort, you know. They happen to be naturals, so they tend to be hard on those who are not. They also expect people around them to be naturals too, is the problem."

She looked at the Otomeian, ruefulness and amusement vying for supremacy on her beautiful face.

"Can you imagine," she said, "what it's like to have two elder sisters, especially sisters of their ilk?"

Natsuki actually grinned.

"I was the only child of my parents," she disclosed.

"Consider yourself lucky."

Natsuki chuckled, causing the Himean to do the same. It was a moment that Takeda would have given a fortune to have, for the atmosphere between the two women had by now become very comfortable. To many who noticed it-Takeda included-it tempted comparison to the one shared by the Otomeian princess and Shizuru Fujino, which meant there were a few already eyeing this new pair with suspicion. However, most still refused to countenance the idea of anything romantic between the Otomeian and her new charge. And with good reason: the atmosphere between Natsuki and Suou was different from the one shared by Natsuki and Shizuru, as anyone with experience could attest. As opposed to the latter, the former held no crackle, none of that odd and subtle aggression that came only with sexual liking.

Natsuki herself understood this, which made her discovery of Suou all the more important. The Himemiya actually reminded the girl of her lover in many ways but without the unbalancing romantic element that had always come with Shizuru's presence. To be with Suou was easy in a way it would never be easy with the other Himean, she apprehended, and that made Suou attractive company on her own merit. Natsuki yielded with what she thought surprising ease to that attraction-but then again, the circumstances may well have made the surrender unsurprising.

Suou was only the second Himean with whom Natsuki had ever been able to converse freely. She was also the only Himean Natsuki had seen able to converse freely with her awesome lover. The Himemiya had known Shizuru since childhood, and was not averse to dropping shreds of information or anecdotes about a person Natsuki wished she had had the opportunity to meet: a Shizuru adolescent, with a faint tendency to impudence, prone to getting scolded by her parents, a touch reckless because her bravery lived with an unregulated curiosity... and yet, with all that, still made of the same stuff as the final, polished product that had walked all over Natsuki's life last year and conquered it: that powerful woman who had ruled Natsuki with the gentlest word, or the slightest twitch of her lips. Shizuru, Shizuru, cried the amazed Natsuki, listening to Suou's tales: She was also once such a filly? She could not imagine it-had only ever wondered, never wandered in her mind about it. But how much she had wondered, and how often! So when Suou arrived on the scene, armed with the information she craved, how could she possibly repel the opportunity?

That was how Natsuki had found herself talking to Suou regularly. And, through those talks, had found her like for Suou growing. Natsuki had always found the woman interesting, in fact. The first reason was physical: dazzled by Shizuru as she had been in those early days, Natsuki also had to confess that her first sight of Suou Himemiya had left her blinking. One of the most good-looking women she had ever seen, she thought, and actually very close to the Otomeian ideal due to the colouring. Even standing next to Shizuru, the woman held her own. And anything that could stand next to Shizuru and not be cast into the shade, the girl decided firmly, was worthy of notice.

That having been said, Natsuki was still not the kind of person whose interest could be held long by physique-with the exception of a certain pair of red eyes, naturally, because those were just so strange you had to marvel at them every time. When it came to Suou, however, what Natsuki had found so enduringly interesting was actually the character.

She had watched her from first acquaintance, unerring nose picking out a whiff of something original under the classical facade. And was not disappointed. Suou turned out to have an oddly coldblooded and sensible style that was all her own, often hidden under an easy-going cover. Natsuki thought it helped this concealment that the woman did not have Shizuru's intensity. As appealing and urbane as her lover, Suou was yet hardly as overpowering or dominant. Nor, Natsuki assessed, was Suou half as passionate.

Even if the woman lacked Shizuru's fire, however, she did seem to have the same makeup of metal. And she was so very level-headed! Natsuki did not know precisely what made Suou's level-headedness worthy of distinct comment, but sometimes... sometimes she had the feeling that the woman might trump even Shizuru on certain occasions when it came to the trait. And anything that could trump Shizuru in any way, the girl decided again, was worthy of distinct comment. Thus the criteria for anything Natsuki deemed worthy! Had Suou known of this, she would have split her sides laughing: few knew better than she that to use someone like Shizuru as the baseline for evaluating personal merit would disqualify all but one from a hundred. And that was if the hundred you got was already top-quality.

At any rate, Suou passed Natsuki's scrutiny. And as it turned out, it was actually Natsuki who had more reason to be glad for that. The blonde and blue-eyed woman was the only Himean approved by Shizuru to be Natsuki's company, as well as due to said blonde and blue-eyed woman's collusion with Shizuru's verdict-practically the girl's only company. Suou seemed to have adopted some of Shizuru's jealousies recently, because this second of Natsuki's charges did her best to separate the princess from all other Himean officers, watching over Natsuki like a hawk in place of Shizuru's hydra. When Natsuki first noticed it, she had paused to appreciate the irony: odd to think she was now being chaperoned, when it had originally been she supposed to do the chaperoning! But even odder for her was that she did not genuinely mind it. Not as much as she would have expected to mind, anyway. Why was that?

Because she was a creature who truly did try to keep her own level-headedness, she eventually settled upon a self-confession to answer this: because she had desired it . It was possible, she admitted painfully, that she had not yet taught herself to stop going after such things . Gods knew she had tried! But hope was a difficult thing to extinguish: give it a tiny spark, and up it flared. Thus it came hard not to welcome the hope Suou was offering, which was that Shizuru had not yet finished with her and would return, that Shizuru would end the agony.

The loss of Shizuru had gone hard for Natsuki. She herself was aware that it showed, even if she tried not to show it. The trouble was that most of her attempts had to be focused on her already-heavy mind, and that left her little strength to deal with her mutinous body. Her body seemed to know and insist, on some wordlessly primitive level, that it was missing something. Even as she struggled to keep her thoughts from dwelling on memories, her body persisted in recalling the same things: a non-intellectual, not even purely sexual recall that hollowed out what was under her skin and made leaden weights of her feet. It was animal and undefeatable and sometimes it made her gasp, Why can I not control me?

So it was her body that betrayed to the outside world her pain-or part of it, at least. People kept noting that she had lost so much weight ever since the Himeans sailed off, but they did not know, did not understand. The Himean who sailed away had taken along such a part of her that she actually had reason to be relieved that the Her left behind had only lost weight. For what Shizuru had spirited on her ship was something so very important to the girl's being: the Natsuki she had helped to discover, the one who was not completely fettered by that ancient guilt and not resigned to the dungeon built by it.

It was this Natsuki that went with Shizuru because it was the Natsuki on which Shizuru had focused, the one that fit in best with what she wanted: something she could liberate with a view to catching it, something to draw out from a hole only to tempt into her toils. To be fair to the woman, she had meant to ensure its liberty to its benefit. Shizuru had known that all liberties came with a chain and that she was best equipped to provide the gentlest chain for this creature. Thus had she concentrated her efforts on it, staking her claim while lighting its progress through the labyrinth... then tying it forever to her by being the one to push it up and into flying, the one to help it sing by giving it the music. She got her wish: it was welded to her permanently because it defined its freedom inseparable from her aid.

But Shizuru missed something. When she had pushed up that Natsuki, the winged bit, she missed that she pushed it separate from the rest, leaving another bit stuck in mud and mired to the heels. This land-locked Natsuki had tried to follow after the winged bit, and even had a moment where it seemed that it might catch up, where the distance might be diminishing... but then Shizuru had sailed away and off to her native land. Not knowing that she had left something behind, stripped of the only thing that had been keeping it from sinking.

Natsuki understood this to some extent, but did not blame Shizuru. Dignity and reason went against it. How could she blame Shizuru when she knew she had been the one to surrender whatever Shizuru had taken unknowingly? In any case, she had surrendered willingly, she admitted, and had even done so to indulge herself. So why blame anyone else for it? Could she even blame that part of her that had gone away, when she could understand so well why it had followed the woman on that ship? So someone had come along and found a part of her that could take to the air and sing; so someone had gone and that part had gone away with them. Nothing left to do but to accept the facts... unless she herself boarded a ship and went after that singing, soaring bit. But that she would not do, because it would mean going after Shizuru's soaring bit and pulling it down with her weight-and that was so selfish it was actually pitiful.

And Natsuki absolutely refused to be pitiful, whatever else she could be.

So she would not do that, nor would she blame Shizuru for what she now suffered. Just as she would not call out Shizuru's name aloud whenever the pain erupted inside, because to call it aloud would mean subjecting it to other ears that would not understand its significance. Call that name outside, before the people who did not know what Shizuru had meant and had been? Call that name before these Himeans, some of whom looked at her with that strange and impersonal curiosity? Call that name before her own people, many of whom thought she had taken up with the Himean only to secure the King's interests with the foreign army? How could she call that many-laden name before them, who heard so much but understood so little?

No, Natsuki decided. She would not permit anyone to diminish either her or her lover by misunderstanding what the call would mean, or reducing it to far less than all the significations it carried. She would die first before such a thing! But a voice in her head would laugh, counter that she had died already, so what was the difficulty? The death returning: in her mind, with ships going out at her back-in a big room, a request killing her each time she spoke to refuse it-in the brush, with her feet chilled with snow as she listened to two voices-in the stuffy darkness, once for each body falling- Shizuru, help me, I am confused by this- and all the recollections would shift as something in her died all over again, her body a worn-out weary thing and her heart in a powerful throb saying only one word, which was a name.

Thus had been the situation. Reeling from the age-old disease, feeling like a stopped-up fumarole stuck between finally spewing or caving in, Natsuki had grasped at the relief Suou was offering. All of Suou's attentions had a message, and it was this: You are not yet excised, so do not fear. This was a lifeline and not something Natsuki could so quickly dismiss, for it was reeled out by the only person the girl had ever seen to speak to Shizuru with no misgivings, a person Shizuru had even trusted enough to leave as an agent-emissary. Suou's opinion mattered -and Suou's opinion was that Shizuru would undoubtedly come back. And with her, perhaps, the winged part Natsuki knew she was missing. It was a thin thread, practically a straw, but a straw nonetheless in a landless sea. Weak as she felt for grasping at the straw, Natsuki found to her shame that she could not yet hold back from it.

"If you agree you have the skill for war, why not go?" she asked now of the woman saving her from drowning. "You fear that - um - that the skill is below the necessary?"

Suou shook her fair head, setting the longish fringe over her brow waving.

"Such fear? No, never that. I'm not known for that sort of self-doubt, after all," she said to Natsuki. "And it's not because I'm afraid I lack experience, or not chiefly because of it. Lateral experience is best accrued in ventures of that kind, anyway. The actual reason why I turned down the idea is because there is a shortcoming not in my skill but instead in my aura."

Natsuki's brows went up. But before she could ask anything, a voice announced that her servants were waiting outside the tent, and she had to bid them enter. They were bearing buckets of water and an old tub that they set down behind a shade: it was meant to shelter her from view when she bathed. Suou did not find the shade necessary, but she supposed she had to allow for the girl's great modesty.

Once everything had been prepared, all but one of the intruders left. This was the servant who always helped Natsuki bathe when she needed to be assisted, who dressed Natsuki's wounds when Natsuki needed it. Natsuki trusted her deeply, and the woman honoured that trust by never saying anything about whatever she saw when she stripped Natsuki's clothes and bared her body.

Natsuki resumed her dialogue with the Himean on the other side of the screen.

"Aura?" she said aloud, seating herself on the low stool provided by her helper. "You say it is a shortcoming in your aura? What is it you mean?"

Suou tried to recall what she had said earlier.

"My reputation or hold over the men, perhaps?" she eventually supplied. "I know no better word for it. The confidence they have in me, is what I meant."

"What? Buh-but you have it." And with obvious scorn: "More than that man."

"Takeda. Maybe, but I find that little achievement, to be frank," Suou drawled, inwardly laughing. "But the point is that their belief is not... worshipful enough, I suppose. That, combined with my lack of experience in proving my skill, is what advises me not to entertain the idea."

Natsuki's brow furrowed again. When enough time had passed without her offering a reply, the other woman realised she was waiting for an explanation.

"Consider how they believe in Shizuru-san, for example," Suou said, listening to the sound of water from behind the partition. "Shizuru-san is a walking superstition to them. Better to say, rather: a walking idol. She's a good luck talisman to the men, who have an assumption that she shall always win, no matter the circumstances or obstacles stating otherwise... which means they have unassailable confidence under her aegis to do whatever absurd thing she asks. Who cares about absurdity, after all, when one is certain of backing the winner?"

She paused suddenly and frowned, finding something to pick on in her own explanation.

"Or perhaps that's oversimplifying it," she admitted. "I'd not like to belittle the love they have for her as a mere matter of practical certainty founded on a mythic premise. It's a love that would see through a lot of impractical risks if you said they would be for her sake. Every one of Shizuru-san's soldiers would let her tramp about the filthiest, most excrement-filled soil in Fuuka and then let her wipe her feet on them after that. Ye gods, they might even welcome being her doormat! It's not that they're backing her simply because she's a winner. There's a great deal of the unexplainable involved, and that's what I mean when I talk about their belief in her being worshipful... She has their confidence as well as their love."

The black hair was flicked over a naked shoulder; Natsuki's servant worked on her chest.

"And you?" Natsuki said, shivering a little from the cooling water on her skin. "You do not?"

"The soldiers love me now, yes," Suou answered equably. "Perhaps they even love me now nearly as much as they love Shizuru-san. But only after the Siege of the Seventh. And only after so much conscious effort on my part to foster that love. I had to work for that, whereas Shizuru-san did not. The soldiers love her in a way they have never loved me... or any other commander, I suspect. I don't doubt that the Seventh would fight for me now with every ounce of their being if I so asked-and that is not something Takeda can say at this point. However, I also don't doubt that the Seventh would fight for Shizuru with every ounce of their being if she were the one to ask, and do it with something even more than every ounce of their being. I'm not sure what that something more is, but I know that it exists. I have seen it before, in Argentum. You were not in the city with us before that battle, Natsuki, but you should have seen it: she actually made a point of reminding the rankers about how outnumbered they were, but without even beginning to destroy their confidence. There's the irony. They would die for her, even while believing that being under her command means that they don't actually need to die."

Natsuki nodded sagaciously.

"Shizuru," the raven-haired girl said in Greek, "is ever of the paradox."

Both her Otomeian servant and the Himean had to smile at this, although the former hid it by ducking and starting on Natsuki's limbs.

"I would agree with that," came Suou's voice.

"Then... you would never attempt such a manoeuvre as I suggested? Even in the future, after more experience?"

"Perhaps things shall change in the future, and then I might," Suou replied. "And perhaps things shall change in the future such that experience shows me I truly don't have what it takes for what you proposed and with only such resources as are available now. Either way, we can't be certain."

She said this with perfect equanimity, as though she did not wish for a specific choice among the two she had described, but did not scorn a specific choice among them either. Natsuki's eyes narrowed, for she knew which possibility she herself would prefer.

"What is it?" Suou asked, for again a while passed without the girl offering a reply.

A splash. "The second possibility... It does not trouble?"

"Well, not really, though it goes without saying that I would prefer the first," the Himean laughed. "Still, it does not bother me unduly to entertain the idea, if that is what you mean. Why would it?"

"In the same situation..." There was hesitation here: "Shizuru would be troubled."

"Or, more precisely, she would hate it and herself," Suou replied shrewdly. "But Shizuru-san's aspirations are bound to her own unassailable excellence in the fields prized most by our kind-or perhaps by the world in general. Whereas I don't require myself to be unassailable, just excellent. Perhaps even our notions of excellence differ, which is just as well because what suits her-or my dear sister, for that matter-would not necessarily suit me. For example, I'm not in the Senate yet, even if I am currently a legate, whereas Shizuru-san actually set the record for the youngest person to ever enter."

"Nineteen," Natsuki said without hesitation.

"Correct," Suou said, swallowing the laughter: Natsuki still blushed behind the screen. "That's at least one thing that suits her but not me, because it's not in my nature to seek distinctions the way she does, so flamboyantly. It's not in me either to go running off to what seems to be the worst part of a battle my first time in one, and then come out with the highest accolade for it! I don't think I'm a coward, but I'm certainly not as big a risk-taker as Shizuru-san when it comes to my own skin. I may be a good fighter, but there are many who would still be better."

She leaned her back against the hard, thick edge of the table.

"There are other examples. Like engaging the rankers in chats so personal she addresses each one by name. It doesn't really suit me to have to remember each soldier's name, to be honest, although I don't mind a friendly chat with them when offered the opportunity. It would not suit me to show my rage the way she does when she's driven to the limit: I'm not naturally passionate and I don't have the corporeal faculties to replicate her delivery," she quipped, knowing Natsuki would realise she was referring to her extremely chilly eyes, the antitheses to Shizuru's blazing ones. "Fire, you see, does not become my style."

A laugh out of the Otomeian.

"As for the touch she has with soldiers," she said. "That is something no one has ever been able to explain and no one shall ever be able to explain fully. Which does not take away its potency. It is not something I have... or, rather, even if I do end up ever having it, I still know it shall never be anywhere near as much as hers. And truth be told, it suits me just fine. Shizuru-san paves her way as her nature and tools dictate; I do the same with mine."

A muffled sound from behind the screen. Suou waited for the girl to explain it.

"Your self-knowledge," Natsuki finally whispered in Greek, sounding awed. "It is merciless."

That brought out Suou's widest smile.

"Why thank you," she chuckled. "For that is the greatest compliment anyone ever gave me!"

"Also... you know her well."

"As I said, she is my other sister," Suou replied. "However, Natsuki, I just now remembered something. Since we are talking of knowing the self as well as others, I believe you know your king well. So I shall ask a question that I beg you not to misinterpret as lack of faith, given that I asked it of you for argumentative effect earlier."

Natsuki hummed, which she took as permission to continue.

"Would your king really be so quick to send us auxiliaries again, and of a number sufficient to stay the Mentulaean advance? When I say quick, I mean it: I doubt not that he'd send them, but ask rather if he would send them in all urgency. Your people's complaints about the switch in Himean commanders have already reached him by now. Might this not affect his eagerness adversely?"

Natsuki was wincing, for the other Otomeian had started to work on her leg. She waited for the wince to pass, because she did not wish it to affect her tones when she answered Suou's query.

"He will send them quickly," she eventually spoke. "Have no fear."

She paused to let a second sting finish.

"How can he wait?" she continued. "Otomeia has also interests in this part of the world. It is in its interest to - to have your people keep your provinces. The Mentulaean king, he is ambitious. Your provinces stand between us and his ambitions. The stronger is your hold here, the safer our own. We aid you as much to honour our alliance as to aid ourselves. So, when His Majesty responds, he will respond with - with as much haste as he would for a threat to us. Because he knows that if Obsidian is not stopped, the Mentulae will come next to our lands. So if you ask if he will send in all urgency, the answer is that he must, because the urgency is also his."

All of which was said many wincing and cringes that Suou could not see from behind the screen.

"Oh, you've a head for politics!" Suou applauded after Natsuki had finished. "Did it not go against Shizuru-san's desires, I would hope you to be in the running to become your people's next regent, Natsuki; sensible rulers tend to be in short supply when it comes to our allied nations, and a sensible ruler you would definitely make."

"He is sensible." Another wince, her breath catching even as she strove to sound natural. "Our - our king."

Finally Suou noticed.

"Is she working on your leg, Natsuki?" she asked abruptly. She heard Natsuki's soft inhale and the way it caught at the end. Was it fear, she wondered. Worry?

From Natsuki came a mumble: "Uhhm."

Suou frowned, growing more suspicious. "Then wrap yourself up with something. If she has finished bathing you, cover yourself, please. I want to check your wound. It's been a while since last I looked at it."

The worst cringe from Natsuki yet.

"Why?" she asked, unease obvious. "It is... healing."

"Good news to me and all the more reason to see." The sound of her rising from her seat. "Cover yourself now, please. I am coming over."

"No-"

No sooner had she thrown around herself the cloak given by her servant than Suou walked around the screen.

"Excuse me," said the Himean, crouching beside the seated Natsuki and moving the other Otomeian aside. Her eyes fell on that which she had insisted upon seeing and she bit the inside of her cheek.

It's not gotten better at all since last I saw it . She eyed it with worry.

The flesh around the ragged stitching was inflamed, pink at the edges and shading darkly reddish. Damn it all, the skin is livid-are the stitches holding? Careful perusal assured her that the surgeons had indeed done a good job, and that the flesh, even though it was swelling badly, was not becoming necrotic. She wondered how the inside was for a second. The arrow responsible for this might have missed the major veins and arteries but it had not spared the muscle.

She looked at the apprehensive and fidgeting Natsuki.

"When did you last get the army physicians to look at it?"

Natsuki looked guilty. "Juh-just earlier."

"When?" A pause as she thought of it. "While I was writing the letters?"

"Mm."

Suou blew through her nose.

"If it was swelling like this, you need not have come with me after that," she said ruefully. "I would have been fine doing the rest of the errands on my own." She flicked a glance at the other Otomeian, the one kneeling to her left. "Has she finished cleaning it?"

A twitchy nod from Natsuki.

"Does it still hurt?"

A twitch of head again: this time, unreadable and vague.

Suou's pale brows slanted, a frown building. Of course it hurts, she thought angrily, directing her displeasure towards both their commander and herself. But Takeda was expected to be thoughtless: he had been the one to get them in this situation in the first place, the commander and culpable. She herself was the greater disappointment. She should have known better! Letting Natsuki lead so many reconnaissance and scouting trips herself, not taking as seriously the duty to keep the girl off her feet... And why? All because she knew Natsuki's skill contributed so much to the preservation of their little army, because Natsuki was truly the best when it came to the tasks she had been doing. But because of that, could one say she had a choice in it?

No, not really, she said to herself grimly, feeling no relief at all in having been absolved by the circumstances. I cannot repine if I acted as my lights saw fit. It was not just the tasks she was doing but also the move from camp to camp that has worsened this... and for that I cannot be blamed, as that much was both unavoidable and necessary. But would it really have been so bad to ask that she make another of her sub-commanders take over more of her duties temporarily? Am I sure I have not erred there?

Well, either way, there was no use repining. All she could do was handle what she had before her at present. So she turned the full force of her apologies in the smile she gave to Natsuki.

"All this moving around hasn't helped you in the least, has it?" she said.

Natsuki returned her smile, shy and uncertain. And still, for some reason Suou could not fully see, terribly apprehensive.

"No... It's all right," she offered.

"It shouldn't be," Suou answered, smile fading. "Ye gods, we shouldn't have asked this of you too! Once all of this is finished, I shall do everything I can to make it up to you. So do I promise."

She put a hand on the Otomeian's shoulder and squeezed it. As she had picked that spot to squeeze because she knew it had no injuries, it surprised her when the action brought a flinch, Natsuki's eyes squinting briefly.

Suou lifted her hand, mind racing even as Natsuki twitched.

Pain?

"What is it?" she asked, bringing down her hand again to slide off the cloak covering Natsuki's shoulder. The Otomeian reacted swiftly, but still fell late. Suou had already pulled away the wrap by the time she tried to tighten her hold on it, so all she could do was freeze as the Himean's unwelcome scrutiny fell on her body. And when the stunned Himean gently took away the rest of the wrap, knuckles white against the fabric, she remained still. No use now in struggling: her current state told her she would not win and Suou's face told her that what she had been hiding had already been seen. So she would brazen this out, since to do any other thing would diminish her dignity.

As for Suou, she was still staring. Staring at the body her friend had loved so tenderly, the pale whiteness of it marred by scores of foreign marks. Dozens upon dozens of crescent shapes, stark and reddish, some haloed by a sulphuric yellow glow. Ghosts of heavy fingers-some marks actually leading to trails that had broken the skin-racing down an arm or around a side-the streaking welts of abuse painful on the still pitifully thin girl. And Suou's mind too, streaking: throwing up the countless possibilities that might have led to this image disgusting every part of her genuinely civilised being.

For the briefest instant, the ever-composed Suou looked as if she would vomit.

That instant did not last. An extraordinary change came over her that amazed even Natsuki.

Suou spoke to the other Otomeian present, not moving her eyes from where they stared at Natsuki with that new and glacial intensity.

"You are dismissed," she said, practically droning. "Leave."

Such was the expression on her face that the woman got up and left immediately, saying nothing.

"Natsuki."

How dead was that voice!

"Who did this?" she asked, cold hands lifting the wrap she was still holding and replacing it gently around Natsuki's frame. "Who is responsible, Natsuki?"

Natsuki shivered, but said nothing.

"Who did this?" Suou repeated, still staring at Natsuki in that dead but unwavering way. "I need to know. Tell me."

But again there was no reaction to this, save the girl's head turning away. So Suou did something she would never have done under other circumstances and touched the young woman in a manner she knew would have had Shizuru growling.

"I asked you a question," she whispered, keeping Natsuki facing her by holding the Otomeian's chin. She could feel Natsuki's head fighting her grip, but she tightened her fingers and held on with rude insistence. "It's bad-mannered to ignore a person asking you something, you should know. You might dislike this manner of interrogation, but I daresay dislike should not make you forget your breeding."

The feral green eyes narrowed, became less apprehensive, more angry. Good! thought the actually-furious Himean, who had been provoking her on purpose. There would be something intrinsically wrong with her if she is not angry!

"Who did this?" she demanded again, wondering who would have the temerity-and brutishness-to have done it. Who could had been animalenough to dare? Dead and all though her anger might appear, it was genuine and it was deep . How could it not be? Whoever had done this to her charge had not just made a fool of her by doing it: he had also committed one of the most despicable acts in a Himean noble's eyes. There was no greater scorn amongst Suou's kind than for those who attempted to impose themselves on women by abuse, and Suou was a true example of her kind. So from the moment she had imagined the implications of those marks on Natsuki, her gorge had risen in time with her rage. It was murder roiling in her head as she stared at Natsuki, murder tightening her uneasy jaw and moving a muscle on the lower part of one cheek.

I am not a hot woman, she thought while closing her eyes, teeth so tight together her gums ached. But whoever did this shall find I can be. A repugnant act, one of an impotent coward! It has shamed me and the promise I made. Who could have done this-and to Natsuki, of all people? Even were she not important to me and to my friend-even were she not important to this army-she would remain a princess, and to have laid hands on her would still be the height of political inanity. Yet Natsuki is important in all these ways. So what class of imbecile would have had the impudence to lay hands on her anyway?

She opened both eyes and mouth, the latter baring for an unintended moment her clenched teeth.

I shall kill whoever did this. And I shall do it very slowly.

"Don't be afraid to tell me," she said to the still-silent Natsuki. "I shall let nobody touch you again. I swear it. So please tell me who did this."

Natsuki looked again as though she would say nothing. Just when Suou thought she would have to shake it out of the young woman, a reply finally came.

"No one," Natsuki's husky voice said, tense and wary. "Tuh-touched me."

Suou scowled, let the Otomeian remove her hand from where it had been holding the chin. She repeated the question quietly, not moving her eyes from the other's face: "Who did this?"

Natsuki repeated her words too, eyes just as deadly: "No one."

" Who did this? "

"I said no one !"

"Oh, well, then I must be imagining these, really!" Suou snapped back stiffly, still rigidly controlled even though she was very close to giving the girl a good slapping. She set her teeth and grinned humourlessly for an instant.

"I don't want to be angry with you, Natsuki, especially as you are the victim," she said. "But I can be angry with you if you start treating me as though I'm stupid! I might have slipped in my duties to you, judging from this, but it shall not happen again. You tell me now who did this! If you are afraid of the consequences, I told you already not to be. I swore that I shall handle everything, and I meant it. I cannot let this pass, and you know why."

Still only the glaring defiance, the incomprehensible resistance to her justice. Suou was flabbergasted by it, and this helped the Otomeian because it was the only thing keeping the blonde's rage from breaking. But what in the world was the matter with Natsuki?

"Tell me already, or I swear I shall find out for myself," she growled with impatience, voice soft because she was grinding her teeth again. "I'm capable of doing my own inquiries-and I've no problem with breaking several legs while at it! I tell you now and plainly that I'd go through the entire army. Would you like to have that on your head?"

Natsuki flinched as though she had been slapped. But then she seemed to redouble in rebelliousness and apprehension in the same breath, face turning a hostile shade of red. Her lips pulled back from her teeth as a cornered animal's, and she tried to push Suou backwards feebly.

"Not your concern who did this!" she said, a bitten-back scream.

"Not my concern?" Suou reared in chill incredulity, finding this one of the hardest things she had ever had to do-and finding the hardness of it as unbelievable as it was irrational. " Not my concern? Now, of all times, you have taken to speaking plain idiocy! You seem to have forgotten that you're one of the reasons I'm still here! If you have, then recall it! Recall that my friend made me promise to look after you-which means my honour is now compromised, from the looks of this! Oh, do imagine how pleased Shizuru would be! What do you think she'd say if she found out I'd let someone lay hands on her girl?"

" That is not all I am !"

Suou fell back a little, surprised.

"That is not-" Natsuki choked, trembling in some great emotion before trailing off and shaking her head in wild jerks. Whatever emotion seemed to have birthed her explosion, Suou could at least see that there was more of it still swelling under the Otomeian's skin:

so she held off any reply out of an inexplicable intuition that whatever Natsuki was trying to get out needed to be said and that she herself needed to hear it.

She stared at the Otomeian for a moment, fury sinking slightly because of a growing confusion. As for Natsuki, she only continued to shake her head and wrestle with her tongue.

"Nuh-nuh-not all I am!" the young woman managed to get out, her stutter so violent Suou thought it a wonder she got out anything.

And then she astounded Suou further by dropping the cloak wrapped about her, letting it fall around her hips and lap as a last nod to modesty. Her hand went up: she threw it around her other arm as though hugging herself tightly.

Her fingers went to one set of marks on the skin.

All of Suou's dread imaginings, all of her disgust and rage suddenly vanished. She watched in mingled horror and fascination, lips parting slackly, as the carmine and crescent welts corresponded to the tips of Natsuki's digits in a perfect meeting. When the display was over and Natsuki's arm fell again, Suou hissed a breath of comprehension.

A horrid instant of silence; Natsuki's lips so tight they were trembling; Suou shutting her eyes just as tightly.

"No," she groaned, opening them again. "Oh, stupid !"

She reached to the Otomeian on an impulse born of mingled remorse and sympathy. No time did it spare for her to think on whether Natsuki would welcome the act or not-if Natsuki would try to avoid it-if Shizuru would have called her out for hugging the near-naked form of the woman she claimed so jealously. Suou did not think about the action because she did it innocent of any malice and guilty only of the rashness of her compassion. So the gesture when achieved had no awkwardness on her part, and the sincerity of it did much to allay the instinctive stiffening of the other woman.

"I've been so stupid, so very stupid-prize fool," she rambled, for she was overwhelmed. "I've been such an idiot! Please forgive me, Natsuki. I'm afraid I didn't think of that, and I'm sorry. I was just so worried, see, and if someone had done that to you I would have been angry. I was worried."

Natsuki said nothing. Her face next to Suou's ear was very hot, almost distracting.

"I'm really so sorry," Suou repeated, wishing she could take back what she had said and done earlier. If only she could hit herself! But that would be both an addition to her follies as well as a useless thing, so she settled for guessing instead: "Was it in the nights?"

It took a while, but she eventually received a nod, rough and ashamed.

"I see," she whispered, voice as gentle as she could make it. "I see. I failed to notice even that, and I should have."

She put a hand on the hot scalp, hoping that Natsuki had not been clutching at that as well and wounding it. Who could have known Natsuki had been feeling it like this? Or perhaps she should have guessed it from the self-starvation? Of course she should have guessed it from there! If eating itself was an ordeal, then of course the nights must be terrifying. Surely a more perceptive person would have thought of it. Yet Natsuki had been so quiet every evening, betraying her torment by neither shuffle nor groan. Or had she done that to herself in an effort not to shuffle or groan? Ye gods, thought Suou, how lonely it must have been for her to feel like she had to claw herself that way just to keep quiet! And how painful, how very painful.

I said to write yourself into her, she thought, talking now to the Shizuru in her head. Well, you've done it. This proves, more than ever, that you've certainly done it. But how would you feel if you knew this would be the fallout? Would you still have done it? I would still have told you to do it, and I believe you would still have done the same. I believe this firmly...

So why then could she not help but feel as though she and Shizuru were guilty here?

"You have to stop that," she murmured, her normally clear voice showing suddenly that it could be throaty. "I understand why, Natsuki... but please don't do that. Not anymore, all right?"

The warm body against her suddenly stiffened again, went through a brief shudder.

"See, if it becomes painful, it's better to talk about it," she continued, wondering what she could possibly offer and worried by the feeling of inadequacy. "I think it's better. You should not have to... to do that. Please just talk to me if you feel so and I promise I shall try to help you stand it until it passes. We don't even need to talk about it. We can talk about anything you wish."

The corners of her lips turned downwards as she considered saying she would not mind holding her like this either if Natsuki needed the warmth, but then thought better of it. That was not something to be said because it was not something the princess would ever ask for.

"I know I'm not Shizuru-san, but I do know she would not like to know or see you doing this," she murmured. "Still, when I ask you not to do it anymore, it's not actually because she would not like it."

She drew a sluggish and heavy breath first before concluding.

"It's that you don't deserve it."

She felt Natsuki shudder again, stronger than before.

"Please promise me that first," she requested, ignoring the sharp and shallow breaths by her ear. "Do not do it any longer. And I promise I shall do all I can to see you through without you having to do such a thing. I ask you this because it pains me too. I don't ask you simply because Shizuru asked me to look after you in her absence. Indeed, I would never have agreed to her request had I not liked you from the beginning-and now I like you even without your relation to my friend as a referent, because I have come to see you as a friend too. But that's vain of me... I should ask first. So I am offering you my friendship now, Natsuki, though I have been offering it all this time, really: only I shall say it aloud now. Would you think of me as a friend? Would that please you, even if only a little?"

Natsuki's head moved, nodded jerkily on her shoulder. Suou smiled and smoothed her palm on the dark hair.

"Thank you," she whispered. "So I return to my other request: would you please agree not to do this anymore, Natsuki? What hurts my friends hurts me. I do not like seeing you hurt. So would you please spare yourself and me, as a friend?"

Another jerky nod. The neck pressed against her shoulder moving convulsively, gulping angrily the way people gulped when they were trying very hard to keep from sobbing. Suou held the young woman a little tighter then, vexed with herself and with everything that was happening around them, and vexed too by the knowledge that this sole comfort she could offer was also making it harder for Natsuki to hold on to her pride. But it was such a mistaken pride! Natsuki should understand that there was no shame in it, that it would not kill her to rely on someone else for such things-because, really, everyone had to at some point, did they not?

"I'm sorry about earlier," she said again, suddenly reminded of her sister by the dark hair brushing her cheek, the soft strands tickling her nose when she leaned in. Chikane! she thought. Chikane's face flashed before her eyes, and she felt for an instant a tickle of the same awful longing Natsuki was experiencing as she thought of her dear sibling. She had not spoken about Chikane earlier to Natsuki in their conversation, during the time she was expressing her self-knowledge: she had chosen to use Shizuru for her comparisons instead, because Shizuru was the one Natsuki knew so intimately. But now she found herself wishing this girl could also know Chikane. For with the longing for her sister came what she believed to be an enhanced vision or insight into the foreigner she was holding, a sudden articulation of why she had always liked this girl so instinctively.

They are like, she reflected in amazement, softening further with each comparison of the Otomeian to her beloved sibling. How could she not have seen it before? One only had to look past the shallow differences, the tiny variations made by each woman's life. And would see all that stubborn devotion, the lonely majesty, that mad and beautiful martyrdom... Oh, they were so very like, really.

A sad smile as she had a thought: That only makes it worse, doesn't it?

She inhaled deeply at the idea, was surprised and then astonished by the smell she caught from Natsuki. Was that pine and snow she smelled in her hair?

Chikane, another voice in her head edged in, smells of roses.

"One day you shall meet my sister, whom Shizuru-san calls her best friend," she said suddenly, still trying to soothe the shaking girl. "And she will love you, Natsuki."

Natsuki's throat kept swallowing.

"You would love her too, I know it," Suou went on, pretending she did not notice. "I hope the two of you can soon meet. You would be amazed by Chikane, I think, as she would be amazed by you: the two of you have the same unusual colouring, although my sister's physique is closer to Shizuru-san than yours. She is a very beautiful woman, you know, or perhaps Shizuru-san has told you."

She went on in that warm and friendly way.

"Shizuru-san would be there during that meeting, of course. Proud as a peacock, the peacock I've heard you tease her. Chikane would tease her about that: I know my sister well enough to know it would be irresistible. Would that not be wonderful, to see our forever-teasing Shizuru-san get teased unmercifully? I daresay you might get in on it too. It would be such fun-do you see?"

She did not know if the tiny movement Natsuki's head made was a nod, but she treated it as one.

"What fun it would really be," she said. "I will make sure you get to that day, Natsuki. So trust in me, please, and talk to me if you ever need to talk about something. You are my friend, which means I love you and you are entitled it. It's good to expect much from yourself-you do, I have noticed-but you should know that you should feel justified in expecting much for yourself too, in return. This cannot be called selfishness, Natsuki. How can it, when the relation merits such an exchange? So I don't mind at all if you talk to me. And you need never worry about me misconstruing any of your speech, because I would never be so foolish as to think anything from you evidence of anything unsavoury or weak, I understand the difficulties of thinking in one language and having to translate as you talk..."

Suou rattled on, talking away and into the night, never once by word or deed acknowledging that Natsuki was crying on her shoulder. But when Natsuki finally went limp and quiet, going to sleep out of sheer exhaustion, she lifted the girl tenderly to the bed and kindly wiped the tear-streaked face clean. And after she had ensured that the prone body was sufficiently covered by the sheet, she went to get some ink and parchment, then sat at the table and began writing.

Chapter 52

My gratitude to the readers and reviewers, as well as apologies to those who sent me messages enquiring about the deleted stories. My silence on that subject was since I had yet to decide, and I would politely ask to be allowed that silence for a while.

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Dictator - An office rarely granted and granted a senator only on special occasions, when Rome was considered to be in such grave danger or facing such peril that such a political animal was deemed necessary. The Dictator was appointed by the senate and had a fixed/limited term; he could not be prosecuted for any actions afterwards, because the dictatorship's special nature was not simply in the vesting of chief authority in the man chosen to have it: it lay in his indemnification for all actions taken during the tenure of the office. Not even consuls were so indemnified after their terms.

2. Fasces - Bunches of birch rods tied together by red leather straps and borne by the lictors (a type of public servant I have chosen to eschew almost entirely for this story), the fasces signified imperium. In the case of the consuls, whichever consul was officiating over senate meetings for the month (they alternated in this duty by month) held the fasces through his lictors.

3. Pedarius - A backbencher senator, one of those who sat in the House but was not permitted to speak.

4. Heres superstes - Latin for "surviving heiress".

5. Ides - The third of the three fixed points of a Roman (Himean) month. The days of the month were not named or given numbers, save for these three points. The day of the Ides varies by month. It is the 15th day of all "long months" (the months reaching 31 days in total) and the 13th of the others. For example, the Ides of February would be February 13, since February is not a "long month"...

whereas the Ides of March is March 15, as March is a "long month." Note that this story's universe uses the modern-day names and lengths of the months, thus establishing months like August as long months.

6. Imperium - The authority of a curule magistrate's office, indicating he could not be gainsaid within the bounds of his authority; also the authority given to Roman generals or leaders of armies.

7. Ineptes (L.) - Fools or incompetents.

8. Nones - The second of the three fixed points of a Roman (Himean) month. Its placement varied, like the Ides. For July it is on the 7th. For more on this story's calendar, see the note for the Ides.

9. Socii - The Latin term for a llies or comrades.

10. "Tace!" (L.) - "Shut up!"

11. Temple of Bellona - The temple where the Senate met to discuss foreign wars. It lay outside the pomerium or sacred boundary of the city.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

par ethnewinter

---

The same day that Takeda uprooted his army and marched them towards Sosia, his senior legate reached that city and dug himself into a near hill so fast that the Mentulae had scarcely noticed him than he was finished. The enemy was also with another engagement with the city's defenders at the time, and so were unable to harry Ushida properly. Had the second group of Mentulae-the Baron Procaleps's, coming from the Siege of the Seventh-only arrived earlier, they might have kept the hill from him. But the Baron arrived two days later, by which time Ushida had entrenched his army behind fortifications on his advantageous location.

Ushida's army was actually slightly larger than it had been when he set out from Argus. Whenever he had passed towns on the march, he had not scorned to take all men and women with military experience and training. Admittedly there were not very many, but this only meant it was easier to equip those he took with him. These he slipped into his five cohorts, plumping them out as much as possible.

His progress to Sosia had been marked by unease at the advance of the Mentulae before him. Typical of barbarian peoples who relied on numbers, they seemed to have rolled on carelessly, killing and burning instead of capturing, trampling unthinkingly over town and country. Oh, certainly they seized what wealth they could find, and what wheat-but did not think to preserve what was still sprouting in gardens or fields. Such a waste! Ushida made sure to pick up all provisions he could scrounge up before getting to his destination, of course, in case the Mentulae made it hard to forage. He knew Sosia had food-it was originally built as a fortress town, and was always kept stocked-but he also knew he was unlikely to get at that food, for the besiegers would be standing between him and the city. Thus the heft of the baggage train he put in his camp, filled by his scramble to forage while marching.

Before, during, and after the entire business of camp-making upon getting to Sosia, he had observed the siege. Many were the curses he and his officers spat on the Mentulae, and many the praises for the Sosia garrison-which was holding out extremely well, all considered. That famous military man who was the garrison's commander, Shigeru Oni, was evidently proving his worth. Mind, he had strong reason to prove it, said Ushida's officers. Head of the Sosia garrison for seven years, Shigeru Oni had grown so used to life in the North that he had moved his household there permanently: both his husband and adopted child were in the city he was so stoutly defending.

As Ushida himself was not without military skill, he and the Sosia commander were able to join their efforts against the besiegers to good effect. Assiduous in their skirmishing, the two of them prevented the Mentulae from ever making real headway into the city's investment. They could not entirely repulse the invaders, however, for they were still awesomely outnumbered. They would have to hold and wait for reinforcements from Argus-or from Otomeia-or even from Takeda's still-missing half of the army. Or from anywhere! For stocked-up food would run out eventually and the Mentulae were looking to be obstinate.

Ushida actually set up camp before Sosia's city only a day after his first message warned Argus of his Mentulaean sighting. As the Argus governor had been prepared for it by Suou Himemiya's warnings, she had her province buckling down without delay, and also sent off the message Suou had adjured her to send to Hime. It was just a preliminary notice to the Senate, of course, since Ushida's message had not yet confirmed any hostilities from the Mentulaean side.

The message with that confirmation would be sent twelve days later.

The Argus governor thus sent two messages, twelve days apart, to Hime. As Midori Sugiura used only the swiftest riders to carry her dispatches, they spent a mere twenty days on the new via Fujino before reaching their purpose. However, this still left a dozen days between the two missives-one warning of possible conflict, the other confirming it had happened. So when the earlier missive arrived, the Senate deliberated over a possible resumption of hostilities with the Mentulae instead of an actuality.

Both the consuls received Midori's message, for the Argus governor had sent dispatches to a good number of senators in order to-as she put it-"spread the sparks". Even some conservatives, those who could claim friendliness with her, received similar dispatches. In the end, it was the senior consul who got in first of all and called a meeting, even if the month was August and it was the junior consul holding the fascēs .

"The report holds no verification of conflict yet," said Chikane to the House. "Yet I have called for the meeting to take place here, in the Temple of Bellona, for I believe Midori Sugiura-san's report prefigures a strong probability of conflict soon breaking, if it has not broken already. Those of us who have not received letters from Sugiura-san have been informed today of what her reports contained, and should consider the rest of this meeting in light of that and all other information we have on the Mentulaean Empire thus far-which we have just reviewed."

"Yes, yes, it was all very edifying," drawled Hikaru Senou, one hand flapping lazily. "It's considerate of you to share Sugiura's reports with us, Himemiya-san, but I fail to see why a senate meeting had to be called just to discuss them! Even now, I do not understand what you are even suggesting we do about this 'strong probability of conflict'."

"Oh, learn to read between the lines, do!" came from the woman in the middle of the tribunician bench, with an upswing of her queer eyes. "Though I understand it's hard to get the subtleties when your own nose is that far up your rear, isn't it? The senior consul is obviously suggesting we consider preparations for war abroad."

"I thank you for the clarification, but ask you to keep order," the senior consul said to her cousin. "As the President of the Plebeian Tribune has just expressed, we must make plans for such a possibility. A march by the Mentulae that deep into our territories cannot be taken lightly."

Several people attempted to address her at once, and she called for order.

"Princeps Senatus, you wished to speak," she prompted, settling her eyes on a man sitting in the first row.

Reito Kanzaki rose from his seat.

"I was thinking that-for all that I agree this is worrying news-we do not have any more than a sighting, Himemiya-san," said the Princeps Senatus, his handsome face in a frown. "They might be marching through our lands as much as marching on them, and at this point, we don't know which it is. Surely it would be just as great a mistake as unpreparedness to prepare for something for which we have no confirmation? I agree the reports from Sugiura-san lean more towards the probability of some bad business, but it's ultimately inconclusive. Is there no more evidence?"

"As regards that, Kanzaki-san, we have yet another reason for meeting outside the pomerium," Chikane responded, stifling the urge to shake her head at him. "For the person holding the additional evidence cannot yet cross our city's boundary. She shall deliver the evidence requested and give us her expert opinion. I am calling Shizuru Fujino, praetor-elect, to take the floor."

Whereupon a groan arose and the senators threw up their hands.

"Of course!" Haruka Armitage roared. "Of course it's Shizuru Fujino!"

"Of course!" the senior consul said to the interruption, lifting her brows with a grin. "After all, she was our chosen commander for the deputation in that area last year, the one most knowledgeable about those lands and the Mentulaeans she battled. I am pleased you agree with me on that score: of course it must be she."

Before the woman could spit out anything more to this, Chikane urged Shizuru to rise.

"Thank you, senior consul," said the young woman, who chose to stay by her seat instead of walking the floor. "Before I begin, I must say I am honoured to be able to assist the House today in this matter... though I cannot say I am pleased to do it. For, fellow senators, what I have to say is not cheering. Yet it needs to be heard, so I ask that you bear with me."

She drew herself up to full height, back straight as spear, left arm crooked slightly so her hand could cuddle the folds of her blindingly white toga.

"A year and some months ago, this House sent me on a mission to defend the North and our allies against the depredations of the Mentulaean king, Obsidian born Artai," she intoned smoothly. "Almost exactly a year ago, I defeated his son the Prince Artaxi at the Battle of Argentum, after the prince sought to take that allied territory by main force. A little under a year ago, I intercepted the King himself on his way deeper into our territories, and commanded him to return to his capital under threat of reprisal from Hime."

"Ten months ago, I received a letter from this House thanking me for having prevented war-which wording I would like now to correct, it being quite obvious that I did not so much prevent a war but end one, against over fourteen Mentulaean legions that breached our territories and entered hostilities with us. Ten months ago, this House charged me with a second mission to add to my first: fortifying the northern territories against any other possible incursions from the Mentulae. Thus, ten months ago, this House admitted the possibility and probability of further attacks coming from the Mentulaean king. There is no other way to interpret the second charge that was given me, and I caution the House that to challenge it now would be tantamount to this House retracting its official words on the subject."

A challenging look blazed at the archconservatives, whose faces darkened at the pre-emption. You could not have actually thought I would fail to use that, Shizuru smirked to herself.

"These things happened last year, and they are common knowledge," she said, her gaze searing into their heads. "Yet there are other knowledges that are not so common. That I am privileged to have access to them myself has to do with some presentiments I recently had. When I was summoned by this House after election to the praetorship, I was not yet completely at ease with the defence of the Northern territories. That is, I was not yet satisfied we had seen the last of the Mentulae. Considering the matter, I thought it my duty to leave behind what might be called a rudimentary intelligence network in the north... made up of people who would keep me informed if anything untoward happened, so that I could communicate it to this gathering. Most of our contacts in the north are friends, fellow senators, Himeans and people allied to Hime. Some are even members of this august body."

"About six months ago, I left the docks of Argus. A month after that, I received the first communiqué from my contacts. They related some questionable dispositions by my successor, Takeda Masashi, including his dismissal of the auxiliary legions I left garrisoned in the allied city of Argentum. The dismissal of those auxiliaries thus weakened that allied city's guard. The allied city that happens to be closest to the Mentulaean borderline and thus logically the first point of any hypothetical Mentulaean attack."

She heaved a long-suffering, weary breath.

"Now I cannot speak for the man," she said dryly. "I neither know him well nor have known him long. So I know not why Takeda Masashi saw fit to send those auxiliary legions home. Perhaps he thought they were no longer needed, there being no conflict at the moment- even though they were there in case they would become needed, in case conflict should suddenly come. Perhaps he thought it would be more practical or parsimonious to pack them off- even though they were costing us nothing, given that our Otomeian allies were paying for their own keep."

She shrugged with supreme hauteur, the gesture telling them without words exactly what she thought of her replacement.

"It might be any of these things; it might be none of them. I know not what Takeda Masashi thought, although I do know that I disagree with what he did. As I disagree with his further weakening of the Argentum garrison by paring away five cohorts from the Himean legions there, bringing that city's guard to a mere legion. For those who have forgotten their military terminology, that would be ten cohorts, or roughly five thousand men. At the risk of sounding repetitive, I shall restate that the last time Argentum was besieged, it was besieged by no less than fourteen legions. That would be a hundred and forty cohorts, or roughly seventy thousand men. I hope it is clear why I disagreed with Takeda Masashi's dispositions. Most of my contacts from the North felt the same way, but I shall not expand on that, as I believe others here have been receiving mail to the same effect."

A wave of sound from the ranks, which knew she was referring to the letters that had been pouring in from the North the past few months. At least they now had another explanation for the prevailing disapproval for Fujino's replacement!

"So Takeda Masashi's decisions rendered me uneasy, fellow senators," she said, passing a sigh. "But what could I do? I was no longer head of the defence mission in the North: that command had passed to him. So all I could do was sit here and deal with matters in Hime, even if I remained uneasy. And for a while, there seemed to be a reprieve. No further complications seemed to appear, no hiccups in the communiqués sent to me."

She cleared her throat delicately: "That is, until two months ago."

The House tensed, shifted in its seats.

"Two months ago, I received another communiqué," Shizuru narrated. "And it returned my unease in full force. For it said that Takeda Masashi had received a message from Mentulaeen ambassadors requesting him to meet them in Argentum. To what end? Apparently, to obtain a treaty of peace. The Mentulaeen ambassadors claimed to already be in Argentum when they sent their invitation to Takeda Masashi. And according to my contact, Takeda Masashi accepted the invitation to participate in such treating."

Amazed murmurs among them. She nodded with understanding.

"Not long after I received this communiqué, I received another," she said conversationally. "Informing of several very odd things my source had noted on the march towards Argentum-for my source went with Takeda Masashi on his journey. Apparently, from the moment they sent a message to Argentum that they were on their way, Takeda Masashi's people were no longer able to get in touch with anyone from that city, be he Mentulaeen or Himean or one of the socii. Furthermore, all scouts and couriers sent from the beginning of their march to the date my contact wrote the message failed to return. Takeda Masashi was carrying five cohorts of veteran legionaries with him, which means his couriers would have been military, the very best and most reliable in Hime. Yet none of them returned, including the auxiliary scouts sent ahead of the column. And that, fellow senators, is not normal."

She paused to look from left to right of the rows and was satisfied: all of them were listening closely.

"In brief then, this is what we know," she concluded. "Past four months ago, Takeda Masashi made depositions whittling down the Argentum garrison to one legion only. About three months ago, Takeda Masashi set out from Argus to meet the Mentulaeans at Argentum for supposed treating. And yesterday, two days before the Ides of August, we received letters from Midori Sugiura stating that Seigo Ushida-Takeda Masashi's senior legate, posted in Argus-detected a Mentulaean army bearing siege engines and headed towards Sosia. These events must be considered together. And there lies between the last two a disquieting discrepancy. You see, if Takeda Masashi did march troops towards Argentum, he would have needed to pass the route to Sosia. If so, he should have run into the Mentulaean army taking the same route. It would have been an unexpected encounter, for my source wrote nothing in all her missives about a Mentulaean army known to be coming."

She scowled, looking puzzled even though she was actually feeling grim: to have to outline such possibilities, especially when she knew they touched on the woman she loved, was enough to sour her mouth while talking.

"Again I must say I know not well my successor in the Northern command," she said. "I know not the precise calibre of the man, so I know not what he must have done upon meeting that Mentulaean army. I know not if he did what I-or any of us worthy senators here, I think!-would have, which would have been to see the commander of that Mentulaean army and tell him to turn around and bolt for home. It is not our policy to permit foreign armies to go traipsing about our lands, even if they are only 'passing through'. Caution has always been the Himean watchword with such matters, and it is only one of the many reasons Hime's and Himeans' holds have so long been secure."

"But then again, this particular Himean was going to meet the Mentulae to make a treaty," she said with a withering grin, which developed into a smirk. "A treaty I would not have sought, seeing as the Mentulae have had so many other treaties with us in the past, each one shortly disposed of after creation. Repetitive demonstrations of bad faith from one party, fellow senators, do not make for wise treaty-making! Indeed, this House demonstrated famous good sense when it refused to grant a certain Mentulaean prince another such 'disposable' treaty when he came last year. But Takeda Masashi was not here when the House was demonstrating its good sense that way, was he?"

She smiled, lifted her shoulders in the tiniest shrug possible, and looked supremely ironic.

"Well, I know not the man, so I know not what he would have done had he been here then," she said. "However, in an unexpected encounter with a foreign army within our territories, I do know that there are two things a Himean senator can be safely expected to do, even for a Takeda Masashi. The first of these things I have already mentioned. The second thing-not an alternative to the first, but an even more natural reaction-would be to send a dispatch informing the nearest Himean governors and other Himean notables nearby that a Mentulaeen army was or is on the march in Himean lands. Yet neither Seigo Ushida nor Midori Sugiura received any such dispatch, although an estimate of the travel times averaged against distances shows that they should have, had Takeda Masashi sent out such a message. For those who do not believe me, I am willing to provide verified maps and calculations proving this assertion."

"No need-we all know you're so wonderfully good with numbers," Jin Akagi said waspishly.

"Why thank you, Akagi-han, and I echo the praise," Shizuru answered without blinking. "We all still remember your stellar performance as a quaestor of the Treasury, naturally."

As all did indeed remember what a shambles he had made of the Treasury's account-books at that time, giggles resounded through the tiers and Akagi subsided in embarrassed fury.

"As I was saying, evidence leads us to conclude that there was no warning from Takeda Masashi about the Mentulaeen army heading to Sosia," Shizuru said coolly, as though no interruption had taken place. "Which means that we may safely assume that something happened to prevent Takeda Masashi and all his officers from sending out such warnings. What exactly that something is, fellow senators, I cannot say for certain."

She drew a deep breath, not liking what she was about to say next.

"However, we have information before us that makes it possible to conjecture just shy of perfect certainty," she told them. "It would not be unreasonable of us to assume for now that Takeda Masashi and his five cohorts have been caught in an ambush or trapped. No nation, Members of this House, sends an invitation for peacemaking and then sends an army right after it! At least, no nation does so if it truly wants peacemaking, and I personally doubt the Mentulaeans want it. In light of this, it would not be unreasonable for us either to imagine that Argentum has again been imperilled by some foul dealing. And within Argentum, the Eighth legion along with the consular Aidou Yuuji. You are right in what you said earlier, Princeps Senatus, when you say there is no confirmation yet. But I repeat that we have all the evidence we need to make a conclusion, only short of actually confirming it! And the logical conclusion is that we shall be-if we are not already, in fact- at war with the Mentulae ."

Ending with this frank pronouncement, Shizuru resumed her seat amidst murmurs of discord and disbelief, too conscious of her heartbeat to hear the murmurs. She had given the House much to think about and could only hope now that the House was truly thinking about it. Oh, was it truly too much to hope that? Pray that today, of all days, it had actually listened! Pray that it understood what she was saying and felt at least a tingle of that immense fear that had been living in her bones ever since these last Northern missives: the fear that something had happened to the legions she left in the North, to the excellent people she had left there. That something had happened to her friend, Suou. And, worst thought of all, that something had happened to a certain young woman for whom she would have sold over half her peers in this sacred and governing body.

She flexed her hands and held them on her lap with the palms down. She hoped her tunic would sop away the sweat on her fingers.

A voice suddenly rose above the mutters.

"This is a dangerous set of assumptions, Fujino-san, but it's all predicated upon information you claim to have about Masashi-san's experiences in the North-information the rest of us, for some reason, do not have! We would all feel more confident in this news if we knew who your contact is," said Sergay Wang with some difficulty: he was one of those who had supported Takeda Masashi's bid for the Northern command, and was conscious of that ally's swift drop in popularity among the senators after Shizuru's dry speech about him.

"Who is this source and why does he know all of this? None of us have received word from Masashi-san about such a treaty."

It was the senior consul who answered.

" She is one of Takeda Masashi's own legates, Wang-san," said that formidable woman. "She possesses the senatorial census and is slated to be formally accepted by the censors into this body upon her return to Hime. My sister, Suou Himemiya."

This provoked no replies, but much humming.

"As to Masashi-san's silence thus far about such a treaty, I believe that very easily explained," the senior consul continued. "He might have desired to obtain the treaty and present it as a surprise at the end of his commission. A coup of sorts, if you will. I would also remind everyone that, ever since his assumption of Shizuru Fujino's former command, Masashi-san has not exactly been flushing us with correspondence. As opposed to my sister, who has been sending letters steadily to Hime-as several others aside from me may attest."

The House saw the truth of these statements and hummed again, but more quietly.

"Then, if I'm to understand you and Fujino-san correctly, Himemiya-san," Sergay answered. "And I'm actually reading between the lines here, take note! You're suggesting that we send more legions back to the Northern territories under pretext of guarding against what you think a possible war with the Mentulaeans, and you're suggesting we send these legions under another commander besides Masashi-san?"

"As the evidence indicates that Masashi-san may be lost to us, that would be wise," replied the senior consul. "I am yet hoping very strongly that he and his officers may be recovered. Even so, I believe we must replace him anyway given the questionable nature of his recent decisions."

"Oho! And we all know whose name you want to replace his with!" Haruka Armitage boomed from where she had been sitting on her fists, her redoubtable jaw thrust forward. "None of us are going to be surprised when you say your recommendation, though she might have the ball to look surprised for effect!"

Shizuma Hanazono turned to her neighbouring pedarius and whispered, "Gall?"

"Most likely," the other whispered back, giggling.

"Could be 'balls'," another neighbour suggested. "Though I'm inclined to think your cousin doesn't have them."

"Not physically, anyway."

Blissfully ignorant of this joking talk from the back rows, Haruka continued in a fever of indignation.

"Why is it," she roared, "that everything we discuss these days goes back to Shizuru Fujino? Shizuru Fujino this, Shizuru Fujino that! Why, I can't even go out of my house now without hearing her name being said by some backstreet hawker! The next thing I know, I'll be hearing it on the way to the latrine!"

"Oh, go to it, Armitage-san!" Urumi Himemiya-Kanzaki yelled merrily. "That's drumming them on the dirty!"

Haruka's glare should have crushed the laughing tribune, but did not.

"Now we hear about something happening in the North," Haruka went on, shaking a fist in the air in thwarted anger. "Which could be just because of miscommunication as about what Fujino's alleging! Well, I don't know about the rest of you, but I'm not ready to believe it yet! Clear we're at war with the Mentulae, eh? I don't think it's as clear as all that! What's clear to me's that, ever since Fujino returned to this House, we've had nothing but headaches from her and her allies manipulating us into one thing after another thing! She gets elected in absentia and suddenly wants to give up the urban praetorship but keep the praetorship itself-and she gets it! Off she goes to the northlands and back-and off she wants to go again!"

"Wake up and see what she's doing!" she roared, a rain of spittle prompting the woman sitting in front of her to hide ostentatiously under a fold of toga. "Wake up to what's going on! Are you about to let her get this too, after you knuckled under to the last demand she made? Do we exist only for Shizuru Fujino's sake? For one ambitious patrician's whims?"

She was glaring at her foe now, who smiled bitterly in quiet anger. The House was watching, utterly transfixed: so much time had passed since these two had knocked heads in front of them that they could only sit and listen, privy again to one of the most famous dislikes ever seen by Hime's senate—a dislike so strong, some of them knew, that it had begun at first sight.

"I was wondering when Fujino would get around this," one party to that dislike seethed, throwing up a hand and slicing it in Shizuru's direction as though doing so would cut the other woman. "Why else would she fight to keep a praetorship she says she didn't want, if not to get another jab at commanding? And now that she's got that praetorship, why else would she keep her allies working to postpone her triumph, unless to keep her imperium? Now we get this - this - this insane case she's making just so she can get at it! Well, I'm unconvinced! I am unconvinced!" she howled, drawing out the word into a doleful echo.

An accusing finger jabbed at Shizuru, who sighed loudly.

"Why should we believe this, eh? For all we know, Sugiura might've made up what's in those letters so that Fujino could make her case! Everyone's aware that Shizuru Fujino is fairly thick with Midori Sugiura. The same with Suou Himemiya!"

"And what has that to do with the information itself?" Shizuru finally replied, eyeing the purple-eyed woman with the ominous calm for which she was famed. "Given how tiny our world is, about a quarter of us are always fairly thick with another quarter. You yourself might be considered fairly thick with Sugiura-han, depending on the conditions for what is 'fairly thick'. If we dismissed everything reported to us on such a pretext, we would end dismissing everything."

"Not a bad idea to me," said one of the famous idlers of the House, earning dirty looks from all sides.

"Some relationships are more suspect than others!" Haruka screeched. "Remember that Shizuru Fujino's mission in the North was supposed to be fortifying it against foreign raids-so it ought to be laid at Fujino's feet if even she finds it likely that the Mentulae are up to something. We'd not even be talking about this if Fujino had done her job properly!"

"As I said earlier- Armitage! -some very nasty people angled me out of that post before I could finish," Shizuru retorted with utmost sweetness on her face. "Which reminds me that there was a certain Mentulaean prince getting very cosy with several persons here, around the same time. Is it merely coincidence that he left soon after that scheme to get me elected urban praetor, which was the scheme responsible for my work in the North getting cut short? I do wonder. Or should I say, rather, that ' I am unconvinced '?"

Silence fell after the insinuation; even the blustering Haruka was quieted. Everyone caught Shizuru's meaning, and those who had fraternised most with the Mentulaean prince looked embarrassed and indignant by turns. It was such an amazing suggestion!

And yet, could it be so, some wondered. Could that smooth and smarmy prince have been behind Tomoe Marguerite's work, angling Shizuru Fujino-as she put it-out of her command in the North so as to be able to march and wreak havoc were they would? But no - impossible - it was too daring and diabolical a scheme! How could the Mentulaean prince have predicted who would replace Shizuru Fujino, after all? Unless, of course, he had helped arrange that too.

But that was taking the conspiracy too far for their credulity. No Northern savage could have thought of it, was what the senators told themselves, no matter how smooth and smarmy said Northern savage could be .

"That accusation is unfounded," Hikaru Senou said between a mewl and a whine, suddenly losing his drawl. As well he might, thought some amused senators, for they remembered he had been among those playing host to the Mentulaean prince at the time.

"I accused no one of anything," said Shizuru, opening her eyes widely. "I was merely pointing out the exquisite timing, the puzzle-piece order of all these events. At any rate, I would like to point out too that Armitage-han's speech bore little material of consequence to this discussion."

A twinkling look for Haruka, who looked on the verge of another explosion at the remark.

"Certainly it had a great deal to say about me, but very little about the topic. So I reiterate my opinion about the subject: we should prepare for war with the Mentulae."

"Actually, I think what Armitage-san was trying to say, Fujino-san," said the junior consul suddenly, "is that we can't help but think of the rumours going around that you would like to annex the Mentulaean Empire yourself. Which, I agree, can't easily be separated from this discussion. But that aside, it's also that it seems an overreaction to jump into war preparations for evidence this scanty."

"Scanty!" a fresh voice exploded. It was Mai Tokiha, shaking her bright head of hair.

"For shame, Kikukawa-san!" she said, face torn between exasperation and despair. "How can you call it scanty after everything Fujino-san just said? And the last time we had such 'scanty' evidence, Members of the House, you said much the same things. Then-after prolonged dickering-you finally sent off Shizuru Fujino on a nearly suicidal deputation to investigate and repel all prospective invasions from the Mentulae. Well, you sent her off wisely enough. But not rightly enough, given how many Mentulaean soldiers she found there. Fourteen legions! My god, and to think some of you would have sent her off with nary a legion at all, given that what we had then was mere scanty evidence!"

"I note the 'you', Tokiha-san," said the junior consul, whose cheeks had flushed at the red-headed senator's reproach. "You seem to be separating yourself from those decisions, which were collective decisions of this body."

"There's no need to remind me, Kikukawa-san," the other retorted without rancour, but still with a great deal of exasperation. "I spoke that way because I wanted to remind you and everybody here that I wasn't among those who endorsed those foolhardy decisions then. I strongly recommended a decent force-more legions than we actually sent, that is-to be sent with our emissary. Well, we came through that all right, and that we did come out at all is due entirely to Shizuru Fujino's genius. If you need to be reminded of that too, then please take a look at that tiny circlet of grass on her blonde head!"

She was sitting up in her seat now and frowned at the body, so agitated that one of her feet tapped the floor in a staccato.

"What we have here is likely to turn out a repeat," she said. "With the exception that instead of a meagre five legions-which was pitted against fourteen then!-we now have a meagre two, led by a minor senator with a far less impressive record than Fujino-san's. A fine thing to forget how that scanty evidence turned out last time! Do you mean to say we should wait and see how many Mentulae show up to besiege our lands first, before we start calling up whatever legions are available? To test that point might be inviting a massacre! Think for a moment, my fellow senators, and remember what happened last time. Remember what happened before, when we found out how many Shizuru Fujino had to face at Argentum."

There was quiet after she had finished speaking, and the listening Shizuru began to hope that they would be swayed, would actually see the reason in Mai's speech. But when too much time went on without anyone seconding, she realised the truth: the senators were waiting. Waiting for someone else to speak and tell them one good reason to fight against the good sense of what she and Mai had said. Her fists clenched on her toga as she bit back the anger. Oh, the idiots! Cooped-up hens waiting for a rooster to lead!

The first rooster to start crowing was Sergay, again.

"We do not forget the things Tokiha-san has pointed out," he declared. "However, we do not forget either that, as Armitage-san said and the junior consul pointed out, Shizuru Fujino has been giving out lately that she has every desire of bringing the Mentulaean Empire to war, such that she could then annex their territories. Barring the possibility of such a venture coming to defeat-which is still a possibility, mind you, given how large the Mentulaean Empire is!-there is still the matter of what Shizuru Fujino would possibly want with those territories. Well, I think we all know the answer to that, don't we?"

He got to his feet and drew a deep breath, boomed in his largest voice:

"I stand with Armitage-san when she says she is unconvinced! Hime doesn't go to war with foreign nations just on the whims of a single senator who would use such a war to obtain the support of the knightly community by promising concessions she has no business promising! Hime doesn't get ready to go to war just because of that single senator's say-so, with the connivance of her allies and friends! Hime doesn't send out legions, react unnecessarily, or replace one of its generals just because we think there could be a potential war on our hands, but not an actual one!"

He squared his stance and faced the curule dais, glaring at Shizuru's eyes for a moment.

"I believe the army in the North is ably led," he stated firmly. "Takeda Masashi might indeed have a less impressive record than Shizuru Fujino, but only by a margin! He has won his own awards, he has his own crowns from the military. Do not forget that when we chose him, fellow senators, we did it because he had sufficient experience to be the successor to the Northern deputation! We put our trust in him because we reviewed his experience and found him deserving. Thus we should give him-and the time of year and communication delays-sufficient latitude, sufficient trust to wait for an actual confirmation before jumping straight into replacement and recruiting!"

His feet pushed apart as he took a fighting stance, not knowing he did it because of the look in Shizuru's eyes: that look that left the rest of her face expressionless and concentrated in the eyes every possible malice.

"The army in the North too," he continued, no less firmly than before, "is sufficient. It is not merely two legions strong-which actually makes a full army, Fujino-san, as you know since you obviously remember your military terminology. It's more than two legions strong because it has at least two more Himean legions acting in support, both garrisoned in the sturdy citadels of our provinces. And they are within reasonable distance of the allied nation of Otomeia, from where they could easily fetch more auxiliaries if they should be needed! So how can we possibly send more legions to the North again without a confirmation, knowing that the North is actually well-defended, by an army within reach of auxiliary and generated by someone whom we put in command because we trusted him as we trusted his predecessor before him?"

He looked from left to right sternly while concluding.

"We take note of the evidence and opinion presented by Fujino-san today," he told them. "But more than that we shouldn't do! It's excessive to act as recommended by the senior consul and Shizuru Fujino by preparing for a war and replacing someone in a command tent just because of some suspicions. If a confirmation of war comes, Members of this House, I swear to you I shall be among the first to say we should send more legions to wipe out the Mentulaeans and their king. But before that I can't condone sending anyone or anything! Except for a letter to Masashi-san, putting forth all questions this House should be addressing to him. And another letter directing Masashi-san and his officers, Seigo Ushida included, to tell that sighted Mentulaeen army to return to their side of the borders. That is the only prudent decision here. That is the moderate and correct decision."

The senior consul listened to this from the curule dais, her inscrutable eyes turned to the distance, her dismay closed to all but herself. She was actually unhappy at having to call this meeting, because this was the time of year where Himeans were most preoccupied with internal affairs, from the imminent elections to the spurt of lawmaking those entailed. The senators had difficulty thinking of anything like foreign wars at the moment, and had all the conservative disbelief of foreigners being daring enough to start such a war with Hime besides. No matter that such things actually happened and had happened in the past! Himeans were not prone to caring overmuch about lands too far from Fuuka-or Hime itself, for that matter. Especially when the summer heat weighed down their heads with plans of taking off to the seaside, or to their country villas. Many who had come to the day's meeting had come only to have some excuse to leave the city, currently suffocated by the summer fug. A fug that remained in their heads, unfortunately, making them even more negative than they usually were.

All of which meant that Sergay's speech turned the tide against Shizuru easily, and Chikane knew it.

As does Shizuru, she thought with worry, noting the thinning line of her friend's normally-sensuous lips. Well, that settled that: she could not allow her overanxious young friend to go off and give the House another rage-inspired speech pregnant with threats. It would not be the wise thing to do today, especially when she had a feeling the senators might be persuaded to their side with a little more diplomatic lobbying, a little more out-of-session work.

She rose, giving the assembled House one of her frigid stares.

"I do not think this House has been given enough time to consider the ramifications," she announced. "Some of the objections I have heard thus far have been shallow, by and large. You have been given evidence that strongly suggests our people are beleaguered in the North, yet the remarks passed have been so literary that I must wonder if the very likely reality has even been considered. Moderation is wise, I agree, but moderation of the sort some speakers today have advocated is ill-named."

"My only sister is affected by this, so I myself pray to the gods that my fears are for naught. But I do not persuade myself that mere hopes and prayers would make it so. Nor do I persuade myself that a denarius's worth of senate dispatches will suffice in place of an army. Not to consider the possibility is not moderation: it is wishful thinking. Not to plan for the worst simply out of an unnecessary financial stringency is not moderation: it is self-defeating tight-fistedness. And to repeat almost exactly the same line for a situation in which you were once proven mistaken, Sergay Wang, is not good rhetoric."

This rebuke for Sergay was followed by a hard look at the Princeps, whose eyes widened in surprise. Chikane ignored the expression, for she was still irked by his words earlier in the meeting.

"As for preparation being premature," she said. "I must confess that such must be among the worst pieces of logic that I have yet to hear. You suggested earlier, Princeps Senatus, that unpreparedness is an equivalent error to preparedness without a confirmation of its necessity. I beg to disagree. Who can deny that action admitting a possibility is always wiser than inaction denying it? Is it not always wiser to err on the side of safety than its opposite? Do we not place measures to secure our homes even though we have no confirmation we shall be burgled? Or are your own measures for your house so lax that you permit all and sundry to enter?"

The Princeps blushed, but set his jaw and would not look away.

"We shall convene again in three days, after the Ides," she told them. "This body is not made up of unthinking people, and a moment's reflection on the things said today should serve to separate the sensible from the nonsensical. Think on what you have heard, if you please. And think well. I am not the only one here who has family in those areas that are very likely beleaguered. Let us consider too that some of our friends and families may even now be in danger. I ask that you think well about that probability at home, for I am closing this meeting. Go home and think on it, as I will." A wicked gleam of her eyes, which swept the gamut of them dismissively. "If I must listen to Wang-san repeat his talk of 'potential, not actual wars' again, I believe I shall be sick."

Shizuru was among those to exit the temple quickest once the senior consul closed the session, and she exited in such a haze of anger she even failed to appreciate her best friend's digs at their opponents. Chikane was right in thinking the younger woman had been close to an outburst: ever since receiving the latest Northern dispatches, Shizuru had been wound up to the highest pitch of anxiety possible, her own understanding telling her that, while the House blathered on in these interminable sessions, their people in the North were already at war. And all she or any of the senators could do was talk! Talk, talk, talk, she drummed in her mind, the natural autocrat in her wishing she could just nail their mouths shut and make all the decrees herself. Wishing she could have a power that was given only to kings. Or to the Dictator of Hime.

That office that had never tempted her tempted now, all of a sudden.

She was standing outside the temple, near the doors but off the path, for she had paused to wait for Chikane. Though her face was calm, such was the atmosphere around her that none of those exiting the temple dared to strike up a conversation and all found valid reasons for rushing past her with only fleeting nods and greetings. The first one to actually approach her was not among the first to leave, and was actually a surprise for her to see.

"Shizuru," said the senator, in a voice so beautiful it was generally acknowledged unique.

She held out her hand, and Shizuru took it instantly.

"Sachiko," Shizuru said, kissing the ebony-haired woman-whose lips, she noted in the returning kiss, were tight with displeasure. It did not seem to be due to Shizuru, for which the fair-haired patrician was glad: she was genuinely pleased to meet Sachiko after a House session, because the other senator was one of those friends she had known since childhood. They had fallen out of touch with each other during the past years but Shizuru still harboured fondness for her old friend.

"I had not even noticed you were here," she said, squeezing the other woman's hand. "This is a pleasure."

The woman's strikingly attractive face-as beautiful as her voice, it was also generally acknowledged-flushed as she drew Shizuru away from the crowd. Sachiko Ogasawara was one of those people who, in any gathering, did their best to keep well away from the thick of the action: only one of the reasons she and the flamboyant Shizuru might have grown apart as they came into their political birthrights. Famously reclusive and socially reluctant, Sachiko was regarded as one of the greater eccentrics in the pool of senators who would eventually form the next generation of Senate fixtures.

"I slipped through as the rest of them were filing in," Sachiko admitted with a cool glance at their peers crowding nearby. Oh that dark arrogance! thought a longing Shizuru, diverted from her anger by the echo of Natsuki there-and the echo of Chikane too, come to think of it. What was it about these women that they could look like that so effortlessly, she wondered. Was it that natural tendency to reclusiveness that did it? Was it something as simple as lovely eyes and an ebony-framed face?

"I know I do not often attend," Sachiko said, as though apologising. "But I am running for the aedileship next year. I must show more often."

"True. As I said before, I shall support your candidature," Shizuru said with warmth.

"Dare I hope you support me in what was discussed by the House earlier?" she followed with her most tender voice, knowing this woman was sensitive and responded best to tender treatment.

The sensitive woman's eyebrows drew close and produced an expression none too tender.

"Inepes!" Sachiko sneered. "Of course it is war in the North."

Shizuru was a little astonished. She had not even thought Sachiko to be very interested in the Northern question, for all that it had been her family that had been lending its basilica thus far for most of Chikane's out-of-citysessions. Why, for most of those sessions, Sachiko had been absent anyway!

"Do you mean you believe me?" she asked in wonder.

"Yes! Yes, I do," the other said with slight impatience. "I am not an idiot, as opposed to those dense characters in our senate who would prefer to see our provinces made charnel houses before they listened. I was tempted to speak out earlier and would have, had it not been for Senator Tokiha and Chikane-san doing so. They spoke my thoughts well, as did you."

Her eyes were dark now: the same deep shade as Chikane's blue, thought Shizuru, but infinitely stormier, more prone to flashes of internal thunder and lightning. Another part of the bundle of contradictions making up this woman's supposed eccentricity. Sensitive as she was, well-mannered though she could be, Sachiko Ogasawara had a surprisingly rude temper. It snapped easily and snapped with a crack.

"It is not merely that I would place my faith in your opinions, you understand," the woman told Shizuru hastily. "Although it does strengthen my conviction here that you believe the same thing I do. That aside, it appears natural to me that matters should come to war given everything that has happened. Furthermore, I think the very author of the report prompting this meeting should be setting off warning alarms!"

Shizuru tilted her head at the hiss. "Midori Sugiura?"

"In her six years of governing Argus, Sugiura-san has never once been the kind to send out messages for every little problem that comes up under her watch, as any of them would remember if they had half the memory they were supposed to have been born with," Sachiko huffed, showing that she actually paid more attention to political matters than would be believed by her peers.

"Unfortunately, our fellows have longer arrears records than they do memories," Shizuru sighed. "Is that why you looked irate just now?"

The other woman was startled.

"I suppose so," she confessed, finally bending her reserve enough to smile. "I looked irate?"

A returning smile. "You rather did."

"Please pardon me. I might have seemed rude in my approach, if so."

"Not at all. I myself was angered by the density earlier."

"Chikane-san was too, it seems." A low, attractive chuckle escaped Sachiko's lips, her eyes turning humorous at the memory. "One has to admire the way she expresses herself. Kanzaki-san was taken off-guard when she set on him, but I think Haruka-san was even more surprised that Chikane did not set on her. She never has, I think."

Shizuru explained, "Because Chikane feels Haruka-han needs no one to set on her, it being that the woman destroys her own points without needing anyone's help. The only reason I even bother answering when she gets up to speak is that most of what she says is often about and addressed to me. A courtesy, you might say."

Out of the corner of her eye, she saw a silver-gilt flash. She glanced and saw a typically bored-looking Shizuma surrounded by a group of far younger senators-about Shizuru's own age and most of them backbenchers-and several, Shizuru noted, were actually sons or daughters from conservative families. Not typical! Shizuma seemed to be holding court among them, she noted. What new mischief was her cousin doing?

Deciding she would find out eventually, she turned to her companion.

"Oh, it is good to have sensible friends in the midst of this coop of hens!" she laughed lightly. "Do you know I was beginning to worry no one would believe me? You know how the Senate can be when it comes to talking about 'distant' foreign wars."

"They forget our world grows smaller-'distant' has become a useless adjective," Sachiko said, unknowingly echoing some of Shizuru's opinions. "Would I add so much to your confidence rating, however? We might be considered thick with each other too, Shizuru."

Shizuru returned the smirk. "Indeed."

Suddenly the other senator stiffened again, seemed to regain her earlier wariness.

"I did not have a chance to sit and talk with you very long, before," she said quietly and with apology. "It was remiss of me... especially as we are old friends."

Shizuru's interest was piqued, and she leaned down to better hear: not by much, because Sachiko was also tall.

"It is a pity we have both been so busy, although understandable, especially in your case," the woman continued softly, her voice wonderful in Shizuru's ears. "I would invite you to dinner if you could come into the city."

"As I cannot, I am pleased to be the one extending the invitation," Shizuru said without hesitation. "You are right, Sachiko-it has been too long since last we truly had the opportunity to speak with each other. It seems to me that all our recent encounters have been pure business-the last certainly was that!-and the business has been mostly mine, too. I have been very selfish."

Sachiko shook her head, and the fringe above her eyes waved before sloping again to one side.

"No," she said. "As I said, it was understandable. Please do not be concerned on my account. If I was able to help you with your business recently, I required nothing in return for it, and did not grudge the doing."

"And I thank you for that all the more," Shizuru said. "Would you happen to be free this evening?"

"Yes."

"Then it would give me great pleasure to have you over for dinner." And on inspiration, recalling some of the rumours, added: "And anyone else you might wish to bring, of course. My evening would be merrier with more company."

That anxious, secretive face lightened suddenly. "Thank you. I may take you up on that offer to bring a companion."

After that, Sachiko took her leave. Shizuru stayed to exchange words with a few more senators before leaving too, and heading for her temporary home.

It was her steward who met her at her villa, and she ceded her toga to him with a quick shrug. He took it and rolled up the cloth in one hand.

"Hermias," his mistress said, still walking. "Would you fetch my riding tunic?"

"At once, domina," he said, snapping his fingers at one of the waiting slaves to do it. "Shall you be going somewhere?"

"Only for a short ride," she told him. "Have Albinus saddled and waiting outside as soon as I am ready."

Another snap of the fingers to another waiting slave.

"The white stallion-the largest," he told her.

"The one that looks like it eats people," Shizuru said teasingly, given a shy smile in reply.

Said Hermias, "Would it please you to take anything else with you, perhaps? Refreshment?"

"Merely some water."

She stopped in her trek to the bedroom, to his relief: his mistress sometimes forgot that she was taller, which meant that he had to take longer steps to keep up. And something must have happened to displease her in the House, he guessed, because her steps were always faster when she was displeased.

"I shall have Sachiko Ogasawara over for dinner later," she was saying, staring for some reason at a mosaic wall depicting the argument of Achilles and Agamemnon, a wailing Briseis being torn from the former by the latter. "She may bring a guest, so please inform the kitchen staff. I shall require a hot bath as well once I return, along with my clothes ready. Be aware I shall not be long: an hour, perhaps, and no more."

"Shall you wear a dress or tunic?"

"A dress-you may choose which one, Hermias."

"As you wish, domina ."

"And Hermias?"

"Yes?"

"Have someone over tomorrow to take that out," she said, pointing to the mosaic at which she had been staring. "I never noticed it before, but now that I have, I do not particularly care to look at it. It looks coarse to me. Have them replace it with something else. Something lighter."

And though Hermias was shrewd enough an observer to note that the mosaic was excellent, a work of art as finished as the top-of-the-line mosaics done in Sicilia, he nodded.

"I will have someone take care of it, domina," he said.

Later, astride Albinus and tearing through the countryside, Shizuru let her fretful mind ease to revel in the wind, in the sun soaking her with heat. And in the animal between her legs, whose powerful and shifting muscles had also shifted once under another woman. A great horse, that other woman had called him, and she had been right. Shizuru knew the trailing stares given by the people she passed were not merely for her alone, but also for her showy blue-white mount. I ride on a bolt of ice, she thought to herself, and was amused by the fancy.

Himeans were not a horse-people by nature-which was why they sought cavalry from allied nations-but Shizuru was a natural rider. She liked horses and had demonstrated the liking reciprocated the first time she got on one such beast. It had pleased her then to find it so, as it had her parents. All for the same reason.

"It's difficult to be a good general or officer if you find riding difficult," her father had remarked those many years ago, looking up at her from where she sat on her first steed. "The rankers never get the opportunity to appreciate it. But all officers have to work from atop their horses in the army."

Although I do break that rule very often, she admitted, smiling. Nevertheless, it was never out of dislike for the riding: she loved being on a horse in full gallop, finding a perfection in it similar to the perfection of having a weapon in one hand and a vanquished foe on its end. It was the unity of purpose, tool, and achievement that gave things like this their flawlessness.

My girl always understood that well.

She sighed deeply, involuntarily, and it sobbed against the wind. Everything came back to that these days, she thought. Her dearest Natsuki. How was she? Was she well? Was she safe? Shizuru knew her girl had gone on the march to Argentum but refused to think that anything might have happened to her, for all that she had tried to impress the probability upon her peers earlier. In Shizuru's mind, Natsuki was alive and Natsuki was safe. She could not permit herself to think otherwise because such permission would prove apocalyptic to her own thinking. The only thing to do, she decided, was to trust to her fortune. She had always been beloved of Fortuna and knew it: surely there could not be a world where the goddess would not also extend that love to Natsuki?

Thus in Shizuru's mind, Natsuki had to be safe. So Natsuki was safe. However, Natsuki would be much safer once she herself returned to the north and ensured the girl's security, which was why it was killing her not to be able to go sailing to the north immediately. Oh the lethargy, the bucolic imbecility of the senate! Why was it that they could not see what she herself saw so clearly? What gave them that foolish confidence that Hime's name alone could roll up a foreign army every time? The name was not always enough-the night was all too often required as well.

Wait just a little more for me, little one, she thought, hoping the thought would somehow take wing to that beloved pair of ears. She hoped very much that Natsuki could wait a little more. Ye gods, and tomorrow was the girl's birthday too! If only she were here with me, Shizuru wished all over again, I would give her such pleasure, such things. She knew she would even try to give the world did the girl ask for it. But then, Natsuki never did ask for too much from her, did she?

An unselfish girl . Sometimes Shizuru had wished the girl had been more selfish. For her lack of selfishness had made Shizuru feel sometimes inadequate, a scratchy feeling of being unable to give back something to equal what she took. Indeed, this separation had shown Shizuru just how much she had been taking from the younger woman, for she was not blind to the changes her friends had been noting in herself: the growing lack of temperance and rising impatience. Things that had threatened again only earlier, when her imagination had run riot during Sergay Wang's speech and the House's turning away from her. She had imagined murder in her frustration, imagined getting her hands on Sergay Wang's accursedly moderate throat and tightening slowly until she heard the satisfaction of windpipe and gorge crunching under her thumb.

Yes, she needed her girl. It was not that she was weaker without Natsuki; rather, it was that she was less controlled in her strength, intemperate. It never occurred to her that she might not have become so intemperate had she never met the Otomeian. Before Natsuki, after all, she had never wanted anything so forbidden or difficult, and even her only other want-to become the First Citizen, the most powerful and influential woman in her world-had seemed easier. Her mother, who had known her best of all people, would have said that even the path to that latter desire might have eventually shown up Shizuru's intemperance anyway: Shizuru shed restraints according to whatever obstacles came against her goals, and her mother had always said that a creature of Shizuru's ilk would always have more obstacles than normal.

Shizuru knew that she needed Natsuki not merely for her sake but for the sake of all those around her.

What binds me to her is inside even my mirror of self, she mulled. I need her in my reflection, a safeguard for myself. I too can be pushed too far, and I accept now that I shall always be pushed too far. I can do little else but become as the situation demands it. But it becomes dangerous when the situation demands too much. I need her now: I need Natsuki. Who was my girl, just as I was ever her woman. I need her here if I am to avoid becoming her monster.

---

The Ninth and Eleventh legions, sent back out from the Campus Martius four days before the Nones of July, had an easy time of their march back up the road they had built, because they had built it well. The new via Fujino was firm, its polished and packed-down surface smooth as polished wood, travel on its length easy as a walk up Fuuka's best-kept roads. When they had received the order to move out again, the troops had miraculously refrained from complaining.

They're well-disciplined troops, thought some of their newer officers. Whereas the older ones thought: they're smart troops, more like, and they know their general. For the two legions were Shizuru Fujino's soldiers at heart and sensed-on their vague, uneducated terms-what it was that Shizuru Fujino wanted. To beat the bloody Mentulaeans out of the North, to reclaim for themselves all the glory of that foreign war they should have been given. Had the general not said words to that effect, that last time she addressed them? It would have been the perfect war: rich and red and right. And if the general had thought, while giving her boys and girls that stirring final address, that all wars were always seen as rich and red and right, the general had naturally made no mention of it.

So the troops that travelled up the Fujino road were Fujino troops commanded by Fujino leaders, the head of whom was the legate Shohei Nagayama. And if there was a Fujino man to the core, it was he. A member of the plebeian Nagayama, a decently old Himean family if another of those impoverished, he had begun his political career in the plebeian tribunate. And had found himself wondering what the next step up the ladder should be, since he was not a stunning-enough politician to make the splash needed. Then Shizuru Fujino had come along, remembered him from his stint in the army-for he had also been in the first army in which she had served-and correctly identified where Shohei's real talents were: in the military, not the Forum. She offered him a position in her army and he took her as his patron.

He had served with her in a campaign before and had never given cause to disappoint, which was why she had chosen him specifically to lead the Ninth and Eleventh-with her most senior primipilus to assist-back in the direction of the northern territories. Trusting that these two favoured subalterns would be capable of divining for themselves what action to take if action became necessary. Which trust was tested on that day, the day before the Ides of August, while the senate itself was busy testing Shizuru's patience.

Midori Sugiura's couriers from Argus had to travel the road that the Ninth and Eleventh were taking, moving south while the two legions moved north. It was thus inevitable that the couriers would run into or pass by the legions. That the first courier-the one bearing the news that prompted Chikane Himemiya into calling the first Temple of Bellona meeting-had not stopped to share his news with them was simply because he had not the brains to see that he should have. He had been, besides, very eager to finish the wretched journey on time because the governor had promised a flogging if he did not cover the distance within the stipulated days: and he had suffered an accident along the way that had lamed one horse and forced him to lose a day while seeking out the nearest farm-stable.

The second courier, however, had both better luck and a better mind. He also needed a new horse, for he had been burning out each one at an accelerated rate, being aware that the news he carried was news that needed to get to Hime as fast as news could get. Nothing more sensible than to stop at the proper little marching camp he encountered, and demand to see whoever commanded the place.

He rode into the camp while the first primipilus was by her tent, holding forth with her latest human property and protégé. The former whore from Argus, named Pollonia.

"Not," Nao was telling her. "That you'll stop using your body yet, Poll. It's still a tool of the trade you'll be going into now, you know, along with everything else you have."

"You've not seen me stop using it yet, have you?" said her cheeky acolyte, who slept with her on a regular basis. "So what's it today, Nao? More sword-stuff?"

She was referring to the lessons the primipilus gave her each day.

"No, that'll do later. For now, just a little review," was the answer. Nao eyed the other woman with approbation. "You take good to the work, Poll, and I'd bet my arse you'd do it well enough in the actual lurch."

She brought down one hand to her seat and chipped off some wood with a nail idly.

"Though you can't be sure of that until you try it, really," she continued. "Especially killing a person. At least I'd not expect you to have to do any of that-or much, anyway, if you do the rest well."

Noting that the other looked faintly pleased, she added: "What, got a problem with killing after all?"

"Only if it's meant for me."

"Smart mouth! But that's right enough," Nao laughed. Suddenly, she sobered and looking sharp.

"Quick," she rapped out. "Pretend I'm someone you need to kill."

Pollonia got up and approached her. " Need because I should only kill if I need to."

"Good." That fiery head of hair bobbed up and down, the freshly-cut tips spiking. "I'm sitting on a bench. You're behind me. You've got to kill me right now."

Poll went to the prescribed position; Nao yawned.

"What have I got to hand?" the dark-skinned, auburn-haired woman asked the fair-skinned, red-haired one.

"Nothing."

"Step... and twist of the neck like this." One hand held palm-flat on the collar, the other on the neck just below the base of the hair. "Though it's better with a weapon, always. Especially if you were much bigger than I am."

"What weapon?" her Himean mistress demanded.

"A knife. Sharp and thin point, about four inches of blade." Pollonia was warming up now, and went through the motions without further prompting. "Quick step and cover the mouth." She held her palm against Nao's mouth and quickly turned the other woman's face sideways, the motion so smooth there was no jar to it. "Thrust knife and walk away."

She felt something wet draw against her palm and released, giggling.

"Where?" the centurion demanded, not looking around.

Pollonia reached over with one olive arm and touched the other woman on the space where the collarbones met, the tiny hollow. The movement was superbly fast-Nao was pleased by that-although the woman lingered in place after it.

A chin rested on Nao's shoulder.

"This notch above the bones of the breast," Pollonia said. "If I'm coming from behind, because it's easy to stick a knife in and downwards." She made a controlled side-to-side motion with the fisted hand holding the imaginary weapon. "The knife ought to be wiggled, because I'm supposed to make sure I tear whatever I can inside before I walk away, making it harder to fix."

"Good, though if you get the heart it's already a done thing-that's hardest to fix. That's just for safety, the tearing, in case of a fluke. Where else?"

The fingers drifted up, played with Nao's neck. "Here, to slit the throat. Best when no one else is near, because it's messy, so always a second option."

"That it is." She let Poll nuzzle for a moment with that beak of a nose, then pushed her away. "What if you're coming from the front, just to be fair?"

The other woman had walked around to look her in the face. "Juno take fair! I'd go to the back."

They grinned.

"Good," Nao praised. She told Pollonia to take a seat. "Though it's a truth, you know, that if you do end up having to kill you'll have as much chance of being forced to go from the front as you will from the back. Not like you can pick and choose everything, though you can set it up a bit."

Her lime-green eyes wiggled, set the question wordlessly.

"Then I aim for the place just below the bones of the breast,"

Pollonia recited, leaning forward to touch the spot on the centurion's torso. The flesh rose and fell slightly, in time to Nao's steady breathing. "There and smoothly up, in a swing. It's the best because the knife goes up the heart without having to go through bone and because-for some reason-a man usually can't scream when it goes through there."

"Good. How strong is the stroke?"

"Light. Don't need to force it and forcing it sometimes gets a scream too."

"Again 'for some reason'," Nao ended, purring like a pleased schoolmaster. "We don't know what's in there that sings a tune when it's struck too hard, but that's for them surgeon types to know. The point for us is just to know how to keep it from singing."

"Do you think it's a lung?" Pollonia asked.

"No, the lungs go to the sides of the heart. Like I said, no use worrying our heads off about it, Greek-like. We're not Greek."

"It's funny," said her half-Mentulaean, half-Jew companion, "that your people don't like the Greeks too much. But you've taken a lot of things from them."

"Tace !" Nao growled, irritated by the slide towards philosophising-or whatever one could call it. "What we did take we made better. Them spittle-arsed bum-fuckers aren't practical, and we are. Back to what I said before! Remember all of this, but remember not to kill if possible, you hear me? I'm not teaching you to be a straight-out murderer."

"But an intelligencer," Pollonia answered, good student that she was. "I know."

"You'd better."

Rapid footsteps alerted them to someone coming. Both looked up to see Nao's body-servant round their tent's corner, her oft-cheery face earnest.

"Nao-senpai," she gasped, putting her hands on her bent knees and supporting herself that way. "Shohei-san said... to get you. Another courier just got in-passing by-he said to meet in the commander's tent." Another gasp. "They're both there."

Nao got to her feet; as did Pollonia, coming to throw an arm around the newcomer's shoulders and lead her to a seat.

"You get your breath back, Ers-why you're running like that when I'm this close to the commander's tent, I'd like to know," said the primipilus, letting Pollonia cluck over the youngest member of what she jokingly called their family. She nodded to them, her little household, so loyal and so friendly with each other.

"Give her water, Poll," she said. "I'll go see what the legate wants."

She found the legate with a sweat-soaked courier who told them his tale so succinctly that not two sentences had passed before Nao and Shohei looked grim.

"Why didn't the first courier stop to tell us?" was Nao's first query once the man had been taken away to get a fresh horse and she and the legate were alone.

"Might've taken a little detour or passed us out of haste-could be anything," the legate answered. "But I'm damned glad this courier stopped here!"

"Damned fool the one who didn't."

"I agree."

"That wanker of a replacement's at fault."

"You'll not get an argument from me. How in all the hells did a Mentulaeen army get far enough to siege Sosia?"

Nao snarled. "The Eighth's in Argentum."

"Let's hope it's still there," Shohei said, speaking in a deep rumble. "As for the Seventh..."

They sat for a moment in silence, comrades of old acquaintance and old battles, and weighed the problem that had just arisen.

"This is a fine pickle," Shohei said.

"Bugged is what it is," Nao said.

"We'll have to send a message to Hime requesting instructions, of course."

"Of course." The primipilus scowled. "That's not all we'll have to do, is it?"

"Oh, this is me you're talking to, Yuuki-san!"

Shohei folded both brawny arms across his chest and pulled in his chin to his neck, like a bull girding itself for a charge.

"I know our general as well you do, and I know why she sent us on this walk back up the road we just built," he said solemnly. "We'll send a message requesting instructions. But we'll send another message to our general telling her we've gone and marched on to Argus, bearing for Sosia. Fujino-san wouldn't thank me if I didn't do a thing to relieve the siege... yet she'd commend me if I requested the order first from her and Hime to relieve it. She's our general, so she's the one who has to deal with the rest of those cantankerous cunni in the senate. Which means that we carry out her orders-anticipated or otherwise-but we always have to make it look to the rest of them that we asked first before moving."

He got up from his chair and barked an order to the soldier outside to get the officers ready.

"To Argus, then Sosia at first light," he told the primipilus. "And it'll be a forced march the whole way. I don't care if we scorch the fucking road we built with our feet."

Nao left the tent satisfied and went to hers. She sought out Pollonia.

"Get up, Poll!" she said to the woman, baring her teeth in a thing that could not be called a smile. "You ready to earn your keep?"

---

This, Suou told herself, is going to take some doing.

She was standing with some other officers in a clump of forest poised on a rise of land near Sosia's citadel, surveying the plain infested with Mentulae at arms. Thousands and thousands of them, littered in front of the bulk of Sosia's city, massing to a clumped camp that was actually made up of two camps, two armies right next to each other. And not too far from that, another, far smaller camp standing atop a small hill, on the far side of the plain. Seigo Ushida's camp. Which Suou and Takeda would have to find a way to join, somehow bypassing the Mentulaeans standing right in between.

"We'll have to skirt the long way around and offer to the gods that they don't have any secondary units hiding behind," the commander said, chewing furiously on a piece of twine.

She grunted an agreement. "That's what scouts are for."

Takeda nodded.

"But Jupiter," he whispered. "Look at them! I can't believe they brought so many."

Suou's smile crusted on her face. It irked her when he expressed any wondering disbelief about their enemy, particularly when it was his disbelief that had put them in this situation in the first place.

"Indeed," she said dryly. "We'll hear from our scouts in the morning, let's hope. For now, we can't do anything else."

He agreed, then saw her turn around and saunter off. "Off to bed already?"

"I have to talk to Natsuki," she said, with intentional cruelty.

He bumbled something indiscernible and Suou escaped.

Later, reaching the tent she shared with her Otomeian companion, she went in to find the girl sitting on a bed. Both legs were extended and the injured one was elevated by a pillow, as per the surgeons' orders. There was a lamp next to her: Natsuki was reading.

"I was just taking a look at the enemy," Suou said in greeting. "A veritable horde. We shall probably be able to move tomorrow."

She held up something red and glossy. It was an apple.

"It's a touch bruised, I'm afraid." She handed the fruit to Natsuki. "But this is the best one. I remembered that you like these."

The Otomeian took the fruit with the red-cheeked gratitude she always did upon receiving a gift, and bowed her chin in thanks. However, she then did no more than stare at the round red object she was holding.

Suou angled her head curiously.

"Would you like me to cut it up and peel it?" she offered.

"Nn-no," the girl replied, flustered. She regarded Suou with some embarrassment and said: "But... I thought we should cut it? So you can eat too?"

"Oh no, I don't care for apples myself," Suou lied cheerfully. "Go on and eat it all. It's clean, don't worry." She looked wistful. "Now if it had been grapes-!"

Natsuki grinned.

"Shizuru," she explained to the bemused Himean, "said once that she liked grapes."

"It would be natural. Himeans tend to think of them first when it comes to fruit." Suou shrugged, sitting on the bed as well after requesting and obtaining permission. "Grapes... It's all about the wine, really."

The other woman nodded and admired the apple again.

"I know," Suou said very casually. "It's your birthday."

Natsuki looked up.

"I was wondering if you would tell me," the Himean continued. "But either you're as silent on that score as you are on everything or you forgot owing to everything else going on. But either way, I'm still a little surprised you said nothing about it."

Natsuki made no reply to that, and looked very guilty. Suou smiled.

"I wish it could be better," she said. "And I'm afraid it's not easy to obtain something worthy of being a present in our circumstances. Still, I hope this makes up for it. Here you are."

She handed over the other thing she had been carrying: a long object wrapped in cloth, obviously a sword. Natsuki took it silently and, to the Himean's amusement, did no more again than stare at the thing in her hands.

"Unwrap it," Suou told her. "Or is this the one you would like to cut up and peel?"

The girl frowned.

"How?" she retorted stiffly. "I do - do not know if it is such as you can cut and peel."

"Which is why you should unwrap it to find out," Suou pointed out gently. "Go on, please. I doubt it can be cut and peeled, though it should be capable of doing the same things itself."

The Otomeian undid the cord tying the bundle, her thin fingers trembling.

"Aah," she breathed.

She had unwrapped it. In that bolt of cloth had been a sword, as she expected, but not a sword of a type she had ever owned. It was a sheathed Himean katana, its handle bound in indigo, its scabbard of finest wood inlaid with silver detail. She made as if to touch it where it lay on her lap, but held back at the last moment.

Suou understood.

"Please inspect it as you like," she said.

Holding her breath, Natsuki ran the pads of her fingers first over the sheath. Then she slipped both hands under it and lifted.

"It..." she said, marvelling. "Heavier. Than I thought."

"Oh, yes," Suou told her. "They are heavier than they look. And it's not merely due to the scabbard either. Go on and unsheathe it."

Natsuki did just that. And gasped at the sight of fine blue steel, its diamond edge winking at her. Suou cautioned her that it was sharp and she nodded absentmindedly, hardly able to take her eyes away from that winking blade.

She returned it to its sheath with quiet reverence.

"Suou," she whispered, obviously falling headlong in love with the gift. "It's beautiful."

Suou smiled. "I'm glad you like it."

"Yes." She bowed as well as she could from her position and could not hide her flush, which stained even her ears. "Thank you. I like it. Ve-very much."

"You're welcome. If you try it and find you like its use as well, I would be honoured if you carried it with you at all times, as your sword."

The Otomeian nodded bashfully and returned to her inspection of the sword, looking wordlessly overwhelmed. Suddenly she froze. Suou tried to see what had startled her and saw that the girl's eyes were on the engraving on one side of the sheath, the side that had been facing downwards earlier.

"Hime," Natsuki read.

"Actually, Himemiya," Suou told her. "That is how my family contracts our name for our seal, remember?" And she proceeded to point out the tiny detail of thorns engraved around the letters. "This is actually a modified version of our seal, see? The wings have been amended to frame the edges instead of being bounded by the thorns."

But Natsuki twisted at this information.

"The-then," she stammered. "I should not-"

"You would break my heart if you said you could not accept it," Suou said, cutting her off and thus sparing her from that painful sacrifice: it was clear Natsuki wanted to keep the sword badly, even if the girl would not lower her pride to do it without protest. "Please do take it. I am giving it to you in all sincerity, after all, and would feel deeply rejected if you declined. It is as much a gift for your birthday as it is a gift made of our friendship, you know. That is why I said I would be honoured if you carried it with you at all times."

What she did not mention was the other, even more important reason for giving her the sword. Ever since the scare two weeks past-a scare that had proven false, admittedly-she had been thinking of something to prevent anything of the kind that she had mistakenly imagined. After all, if she could still worry about something like that, she decided she needed to institute more safeguards and prohibitions shielding her charge as well as her own peace of mind. The trick was in not showing her charge these added safeguards. She needed something subtle, soft as fur. It needed to be so sleek a prohibition that it would slip in without friction and spare Natsuki the chafing.

The sword was her elegant solution.

Like most of the other august patrician clans, Suou's family held several heirlooms that were actually items commissioned by some ancestor and passed down along the line. The most famous was perhaps the huge bow of the Himemiya, which went naturally to her sister, the current head of the family. There were others, and-as is the way of things in the world-some of these others were already falling into disrepair, succumbing to the inevitable devaluation imposed by time and the elements. In place of these decaying objects, however, were always new ones: items commissioned by later generations and passed down to even later generations again, imbued with the magical and sentimental value of time and some long-ago kin with some sort of achievement, some measure of fame.

The sword she gave to Natsuki was one such, a sword that had been commissioned especially for her and should have been passed down the Himemiya line instead, at some point in time. That Suou did not even hesitate to give up such an artefact to the Otomeian-not even her Otomeian!-was indication of how much and how little she had in common with Natsuki's lover: the lack of insularity, they shared; the lack of sentimentality, they did not.

In giving the sword to Natsuki, she had actually given the girl a shield. She had been thinking for some time now that there might be a possibility-very faint, but still a possibility-that some might be tempted to interpret Shizuru's abandonment of her as a permanent disposal. And that, combined with Natsuki's currently weakened state, made her feel anxious about such a temptation. If, however, the girl carried with her a more physical marker, a tangible and immediate brand to ward off all comers, Suou knew she would rest easier. Hence her sword, which could actually be passed on only to members of the family. Natsuki did not realise it, but what Suou had given her was one of the greatest gifts a Himean could give: Suou was proclaiming, to all seeing the letters on that sheath, that Natsuki was henceforth under her family's wing. And whoever could be ignorant enough to disregard that the girl was Shizuru Fujino's could not be ignorant enough too to disregard the name on that sword.

"If so," Natsuki said, finally yielding. "If so... then... then I will give you something too!"

Suou's eyes went wide. "Why, no, you're not obliged to do that. I did not give it expecting anything in return."

"You said to me before," the girl replied slyly. "It is just to expect for oneself too when one gives much, as a return. You will not say now that you are not giving much, yes? Because that would - would contradict what you said about the value of it."

The Himean laughed.

"You have the most irritating habit of throwing people's words back in their faces," she noted, having experienced this with her several times before.

"You say it is also a gift of our - um - our friendship," the dark-haired one said. "So, I give you one too, for that."

Suou thought it over for a second and succumbed.

"Well," she said. "If you feel you must, it would be churlish of me to refuse, I suppose."

A fierce nod from the Otomeian.

"I see. Then I shall look forward to that gift." She gave her a smile; something else caught her eye when she looked away. "Oh, they brought it while I was out! Good, good."

She got up from the bed, followed by Natsuki's gaze.

"Armour from the Mentulae," the girl identified.

"Yes, one of those we stripped from the battlefield last time." Suou lifted the torso-piece, more a set of broad plates than the moulded cuirasses Himeans wore, and examined it to find the latches. "I gather this is the one most used, so I asked for one to be delivered here."

"Why?"

"For a little experimentation." She looked over the rest of the gear. "I thought it might give us some fresh perspectives. Where the weak areas are, what the disadvantages and advantages would be for someone wearing this... and using their weapons, of course. I have already handled a falx, so I daresay imagination can suffice for that point."

She shot a glance at Natsuki.

"Would you help me with that? I shall put it on first," she said.

Natsuki agreed, and resumed her reading while she waited. When Suou had finished, she called the Otomeian's attention.

"Well?" she said, holding out her hands. "What do you think?"

But all that earned for her was an amazed look, followed by hilarity.

"You barbarian," Natsuki said laughingly, once she recovered enough to get out some words. "Oh, you savage."

The other woman grinned-but rolled her eyes upwards too.

"Don't you start." Suou clunked over to a stool, finding the exercise as slow as it was ungainly. "Though I'll warrant it must look odd on me. Or is it that it looks odd on anybody?"

Natsuki finally swallowed the tag-ends of her mirth and smiled. She had laughed not just at the thought of a Himean of Himeans like Suou donning a Mentulaean outfit: that amusement had come later, while she was already laughing. It was actually the image of someone so Otomeian-looking in a Mentulaean outfit that had sent her into merriment

She looked Suou over one more time.

"I thought before," she said reflectively. "And now, too. It looks... cumbersome. That is the right word, cumbersome?"

"I should say so!" Suou exclaimed. "If you mean that it seems awkward or unwieldy, that would be it-and yes, that means I find it awkward and unwieldy. Of course it is my first time to wear it, so that must be accounted for. That aside, however, this still suffers compared to the Himean uniform-or yours, for that matter. To think this is what their main infantry troops wear... I suppose this is just another reason they are such turtles on field and road." She patted the broad plate covering her chest. "Not that they would be of sufficient sophistication to find any advantage in that. They would not know their Aesop."

Natsuki sniggered in appreciation, although she did point out jokingly that it should be a tortoise, not a turtle.

"The pieces here and here are awkwardly placed," Suou said afterwards, making her notes aloud. She pointed out specific areas to Natsuki. "They chafe, you see? It restricts pivot movement, and this is probably another reason it takes so long for them to recover when their slice misses."

She turned her head experimentally and tried to nod.

"The helmet has a slightly smaller range of vision than ours," she went on. "This could be turned into an advantage."

The Otomeian listened to her observations, humming and adding her own remarks every now and then. When they had finished their note-taking, Suou divested herself of the armour and changed into a fresh tunic, wiping herself with a cloth and some water from a basin. Natsuki kept her eyes firmly on her reading the entire time, a little rebel colour brushing over the slopes of her cheeks.

"I'll have the centurions spread the word tomorrow," Suou said, once done with her ablutions. She dried her face with another cloth. "Every little bit helps. Better for the men to know exactly what they will be facing."

The look in Natsuki's eyes told her the girl approved mightily.

"Now," she sighed. "If only we could be sure we'd get to Ushida-san's camp without a cry being raised by some especially sly scout hidden in the trees."

The younger woman put down the scroll she had been reading.

"About this, I have an idea," she announced. "You will listen?"

"Always." Suou had come by now to respect Natsuki's opinions greatly. "What is it?"

As was her wont, the girl established first the premise and the problem: "You are concerned some of them will notice. When we try to slip through the woods and go the long way."

"Yes."

"It is so that we shall try to go in the dark, yes?"

"Yes."

"Then we light the way we do not take," Natsuki said with her beautiful simplicity. "Start a fire in the woods, on the side opposite."

They will stare at it and go blind. And also forget to look the other way."

Suou gasped, suddenly stripped of her breath.

"Ye gods," she whispered later, drawing a raspy lungful of air. She looked as though she would get up from her seat, but was too winded to do it.

"Ye gods, Natsuki, you're amazing," she said finally, still speaking in an awed whisper. "So simple! Yet I doubt it would have ever come to me. It's absolutely brilliant, all the more as it might drive the Mentulae to distraction for the other reason that they worship the trees or something of the sort. And all that racket will drown out other sounds, say that of us skirting round-or even being discovered by a scout. Wonderful! Still..."

"Still?"

"Shizuru-san said something to me before," the Himean said, looking at the younger woman closely. "Your original people, the Ortygians, were worshippers too of the forest, much like the Mentulae we fight."

She did not have to go on. Natsuki understood her.

"I do not think the gods would side with the Mentulae," the girl said. "I think... more now, after all we have - we have - um - endured... that they side with us. So they will understand. If we make offering and prayer in exchange, the forest gods will understand. The gods are not unreasonable."

"Oh, well said!" cried the Himean, who understood the idea of making contracts with the gods; but to think this foreigner would understand it too! She gave the young woman another of those penetrating glances, the ones that said she was trying to figure out something about Natsuki that she found puzzling. No stranger to such regard, Natsuki contented herself with frowning a little and just waited.

"Have you ever generated?" Suou asked. "A full army, I mean."

The girl shook her head.

"Only my division," was her answer.

"You should be a general." Suou shook her head to dispel a shiver and clawed the skirt of her tunic. "Oh, I hate this! You really would have been such a Himean!"

The younger woman was astonished by the statement.

"Excuse me for that," Suou said, though she still looked regretful about the tricks of Fate. "At any rate, I shall put it to our commander later-he's on the Watch right now, so he'll not be going to bed early. By tomorrow, the scouts should have come back. And then we can work out how to do this."

She smiled one of her slow smiles, which Natsuki rather liked. "I hope Ushida-san and whoever's generaling in Sosia-Oni-san, I should say, though Toshi-san's there too-will have enough gumption to attack when we do that little diversion."

Natsuki agreed with her.

"And no matter how many times I have said it, let me say it again: I am profoundly glad you are on our side, Natsuki. If nothing else indicates the gods are on our side, your presence at least proves it."

The Otomeian predictably coloured, and looked away.

"I... am glad too," Natsuki admitted suddenly.

"For what?" Suou asked, correctly guessing the girl had moved on to a different thing.

"That the Mentulae are still stupid."

A startled chuckle. "What?"

"With such machines... with such an army," Natsuki said, flicking her eyes away and back. "Shizuru would take Sosia in a day."

Suou puffed through her nose.

"I believe you're right," she conceded immediately. "Which is why we should also be glad they do not have a Shizuru of the Fujino among them. Or a Natsuki Heres Superstes of Ortygia."

"Or a Suou of the Himemiya?" the girl said provocatively, amused by the title given her-especially since Suou had unwittingly hit a mark that the Otomeians purposefully kept quiet: Natsuki truly was, in a way the foreigners did not know and Shizuru had guessed at but did not understand fully, the solesurviving heiress of Ortygia.

"Perhaps so, Natsuki."

But Natsuki's face changed all of a sudden, one of those swift clouds of mood shading it over.

"Only..." she murmured. "Only, Suou, I am worried still."

"Of what?"

The Otomeian shifted restively.

"You agree the Mentulae out there are stupid?" she said, bringing another smile to Suou's face.

"Yes, I rather do."

"Argentum was not stupid."

That snuffed the amusement out of her companion. For Natsuki was right. The presumable infiltration of Argentum, the invitation to draw out the commander from Argus, the complete extermination of every soul in Argentum when it was taken, to prevent any tattlers from spreading the word... it had been base, certainly, even if only the baiting of the commander was confirmed, but it was also an inspired strike in its own way. Whoever had come up with the grand scheme for that blow had been intelligent-and malignantly so, if the perfidies of that scheme were considered.

"No," Suou agreed sombrely. "It was not stupid."

The Otomeian chewed on her bottom lip, her face still dark with that gloomy shade.

"Not stupid," she said, and asked the question Suou was also asking. "So who thought of it?"

Chapter 53

Thank you again to the readers and reviewers. Perhaps some of the longer-standing ones shall recall that this time of the year is worst for me; I would apologise in advance, as I cannot answer most reviews at the moment. Therefore, I wish all of you well this season now.

Oh, and to explain to certain persons why I chose "Mentula" as the name for the enemy when I first wrote the story-with no gravity for myself and my work at the time, else I would certainly have chosen a more respectable name-it is because "Mentula" was arguably the most commonly used Latin profanity at the time during which this story was set, and far eclipsed the saltier "Cunnus" in terms of usage. As the Conscript Fathers-a nice point, by the way: Conscript Fathers -were not averse to referring to Rome's enemies (or theirs) with a casual "mentula/mentulae" even in session, one shrugged one's shoulders and used the term they used so often.

---

Vocabulaire:

1. Consultum, consulta - A recommendation, specifically a senatorial one in the context below. Decisions of the senators reached in House sessions were strictly senatorial recommendations or consulta because the Senate did not have legislative power: it needed one of the various assemblies to ratify its consulta for them to carry actual legal weight. Many consulta were not ratified, however, because they were immediately carried out under the assumption that the ratification was implicitly given by the assemblies ( the comitia ).
2. Fasces - The bundles of birch rods considered symbols of imperium and passed from one consul to the other in an alternating sequence each month.
3. Gladius - the short sword of the Romans, standard military issue for a legionary.

4. Hortator - Officer aboard a galley (ship) responsible for coordinating the rowing, usually by producing a beat.

5. Imperium - The degree of authority vested in a curule magistrate (e.g. praetors and consuls) or promagistrate (e.g. propraetors, proconsuls, generals in command of an army). It must be noted that the story has altered some parts of the complicated construct through which the Ancient Romans granted or conferred specific kinds of imperium upon their magistrates or commanders.

6. Pedarius - A member of the Senate who had not yet occupied sufficiently high office to be granted the privilege of speaking in a House session. In Parliamentary terms, a backbencher.

7. Praetor peregrinus - The foreign praetor, the second-highest seat among the praetors; he dealt with matters involving foreign nationals (which would include Fuukans in this story because Fuukans are not technically Himean).

8. Praetor Urbanus - The urban praetor; given traditionally to the praetor-elect with the highest number of votes.

9. Provinces (praetorian and consular) - Roman magistrates of the offices praetor and consul often took provinces to govern after their term in office, although it was also considered fairly normal to assume that governorship even before the term (or political year) had finished.

---

Inter Nos II: Inde ira et lacrimae

par ethnewinter

---

The confirmation of the Mentulaeen siege of Sosia knelled the end of the senatorial scepticism. Barely eleven days after the first meeting in the Temple of Bellona, the senators were returned to it, this time to discuss the war that had been thrust upon them all of a sudden.

"Although to call it sudden is folly," muttered Shizuru to her old senior legate. "Only that they have their eyes screwed so shut that everything comes as though it did not creep slowly up the horizon."

Chie smiled sourly. "The rising of the sun must be a regular surprise."

They were seated next to each other and listening to their friend, the senior consul. She had again been the one to call the meeting, even though the month had not turned over and the fascies had yet to pass from her junior colleague. Though the latter's conservative allies might have raised a ruckus at this usurpation any other time, they were currently too chastised to protest. Furthermore, in the words of the Princeps, who still remembered Chikane's public rebuke to him in the previous meeting,

"It is apt that the senior consul was the one to call the session. I mean no offence to her most honoured colleague, but tradition has it that the one to direct meetings of the senate during wartimes is rightly the senior consul, supported by his or her junior colleague. Also, and again without offence to the excellent junior consul, it is our current senior consul who has the edge in terms of war experience. Although I shall not move that the fascies be taken off Kikukawa-san and given to Himemiya-san in this instance, please take notice that I, the Leader of the House, ask for the senior consul's guidance in this meeting and request her to exercise it fully. She called our attention to it last time and we failed to take heed. As one of those who so failed, I profess my utmost support for her today, as well as whatever preparations she might recommend."

Which had Chikane Himemiya's eyes full of suffocated mirth-as well as Princeps Senatus Kanzaki's.

Chikane opened the session with a straightforward speech and dealt with questions in her usual capable way. Again Midori Sugiura had sent multiple missives, so most people were actually fairly informed already; that Chikane even bothered to speak of details by now well-known was simply so that there could be no confusion later and for the senatorial scribes' transcripts. When she had finished with the overview, Sergay Wang asked to speak.

"I thank the senior consul first of all," he told his assembled colleagues. He was as embarrassed as the rest of the archconservatives, but was not without his share of courage: he swallowed the chagrin manfully and stood tall. "For both her promptness in calling this meeting and the good sense with which she has handled the situation. The Princeps spoke of our failure to take heed of her earlier warnings, and I admit I was among those who did not listen. In fact, I spoke against her case and questioned her evidence! Now it looks like I was wrong, fellow senators, and I'll be the first to admit it myself, since I remember it keenly now."

He lifted his chin and stared straight ahead, a handsome man of wonderfully patrician bearing.

"I also said, last time, that I would do another thing first of anyone else here," he said in his clear-carrying tenor. "I claimed I would be the first to move we should destroy the Mentulae if the warnings proved real. Well, I remember that too, fellow senators! The warnings have been confirmed. We know the danger is real. What path we must take is obvious. I shall speak it now and thus make good on my earlier promise."

There was some stirring. Everyone knew, more or less, what to expect.

"I move," he said, "that an army be raised to war with the Mentulae and eject them from our territories. And, taking into account the notes of our senior consul and other learned senators who have spoken on the subject, I move that this army be set at a minimum of ten legions."

There was a ripple of murmurs.

"Excluding foreign auxiliaries," he clarified. "That is the minimum number of Himean or Fuukan legions for this campaign I am proposing. Going from what we know of these Mentulae's numbers, ten shall be just about enough! Which is why I propose it to be the minimum. I add that the ten legions are to be recruited as well as funded immediately, the Treasury paying out the full sum of the cost of ten legions for ten months at the beginning of the campaign. This is to avoid the commander being hampered by financial issues, as so many of our recent overseas commanders have been. Well, not in this case. When our own territories are threatened, we can't let ourselves sink into the mire of bureaucracy even before we get to the battlefield! Never let it be said that we do not learn from our mistakes! Let us show these Mentulaeans what Himeans can do when pushed to do it!"

Applause and cheers broke from the tiers. He waited reverently for it to die down before continuing with his speech.

"Furthermore," he boomed, "I move that the senior consul be given the command. The junior consul shall remain in the city to deal with matters political and administrative, as well as with the recruitment of more legions if necessary. The supreme commander on the field shall be the senior consul, however, as is right and proper."

He cleared his throat and inclined his head to Chikane.

"Just as the Leader of our House remarked earlier," he said, "it's only appropriate that Chikane Himemiya should be the one to lead today's meeting. The senior consul of Hime is the one on whom Hime relies when she is most threatened, when incursions are made against her territories. In which case, it's only appropriate too that the senior consul should also be the one to defend Hime on the field, to head Hime's brave soldiers against her craven foes. Let Chikane Himemiya, senior consul, lead the army going to the North, where she shall repulse Obsidian and all his arrogant cronies. Let her be given a mandate to wage war with these foreign savages, so that they can learn the might of Hime at the point of a Himean gladius !"

Again the House broke into cheers.

"Order!" Chikane suddenly called, rising swiftly from her seat. "I shall speak!"

They quieted obediently at their senior consul's command, faces still flushed from excitement. All heads craned towards the curule dais, a very few turning towards another place where another woman was seated. What did she think of this, those few staring at that other woman wondered gleefully. What would those red eyes say when they looked up from where they were trained about the floor, to regard the ironic twist of this second northbound campaign? For all knew she wanted to be returned to her command in the North, and had been using the promise of such a return to woo many of the knightly communities to her side recently. To lose that promise would open her to all sorts of assault. Even should she accompany her friend the senior consul-who could not possibly refuse the commission-as a legate, that lowered position would not suffice for the promises she had been making. Her only chance would then be for the senate to choose her as the successor to that command should the senior consul exit it without finishing, but that was very unlikely indeed: Chikane Himemiya was known to be a brilliant general herself, and would handle the job so well that her command would be prorogued. Oh, raise your head, Shizuru Fujino! The prospect of seeing that too-perfect face lose its too-perfect confidence would be all too perfect, really!

"Wang-san's proposal is admirable," the senior consul was saying. "I could hardly do better myself. The advancement of funds covering ten months, in particular, is wise. The Treasury's reserves can certainly extend that far at the moment-please note that the officials of the Treasury are nodding-so I would support that condition."

She stopped and suddenly looked apologetic.

"The other conditions can be debated shortly," she said. "I fear, however, that there is something that must be mentioned this very instant."

There was a slight pause before she said it.

"There was something in Wang-san's proposal just now to which I object strongly."

Sergay shot up from his stool, hands shaking so hard his immediate neighbours stared up at him.

"You object, Himemiya-san?" he demanded, eyes wide and unblinking. Ye gods, he thought, would she actually do it? The woman would have to be mad if she did! No one turned down a commission of the sort he had proposed, particularly when it had been phrased the way he had phrased it: as a duty of the senior consul of Hime, and done in exchange for the lasting fame the task would give along with an assurance of extended authority without having to seek further office immediately after the year. Oh yes, she would have to be insane indeed to pass this up. And no matter how eccentric he agreed her to be, he had never been among those to think her actually insane.

His eyes wavered, itched to snap to the place where Shizuru Fujino was sitting. No mistake in his mind who was the beneficiary in this seeming insanity!

"To what do you object?" he asked Chikane. "To which of my propositions, senior consul?"

"Only to the last," she told him.

He frowned. He could hear Haruka Armitage wheezing next to him, and vaguely wondered why he was not doing the same.

"The one that moves that you be given this new northern command?" he said, calmly enough.

"Quite so, that proposition."

Confused looks appeared on some faces now. Sergay held his breath.

"You mean to say," he ground out, heart pounding, "that you decline?"

Chikane seemed almost puzzled. "Yes."

Among the tiers, a pair of red eyes finally looked up.

"I am honoured to have been suggested for the position," Chikane told the House, which was beginning to growl, the sound rising from a hundred displeased throats. "Yet I am also honour-bound to decline it. All circumstances considered, I confess that I do not feel myself to be the best person for that post."

I don't believe it, thought Sergay, so astonished he was unable to check his jaw as it dropped. Himemiya had actually done it! He had foreseen what she was now doing, yet had not seriously expected her to do it. In a world where even the best of friends were rivals and peers strove to rise faster than their peers, what Chikane Himemiya had just done defied every path of logic. Who in their right political mind would refuse command over such a venture and such an army? Who would pass up such a chance for glory? Especially when the person refusing had every legal entitlement to it?

I still don't think you're insane, Himemiya... but what are you then? Sergay asked the woman on the dais silently, every blonde hair on his body stiff and shrilling alarm. What in the world are you? No fool and no slacker, yet what you've done can only be credited to either type. What would lead a woman like you to surrender such an opportunity in favour of a friend? I can't credit you've no ambition-otherwise you'd never have made it to the consulship-but what is the extent of your ambition? Or of your friend's, who was willing to surrender even her own triumph-the height of ambition for any true senator, the event of pure adoration most of us want so much? She surrendered it because she was chasing after another command, the one you're about to try and give to her, but at least there's a possibility of another triumph in her path. At least if Fujino wins this gamble, her chances can still get what she just cast off. But what can you get if you cast this off? The gratitude of your friend? The chance to stay in Hime with your still-new wife? The passage of those several new laws you've been pushing? And what are those compared to the possible rewards of that campaign I've just proposed, a campaign so big it would undoubtedly go into the history books? Compared to that, what are those things you'd be gaining? Worthless, pure nothings. Yet they're the only things you'd get.

His upper lip curled with distaste, for the only reasons he could imagine her having were so ludicrous: yet it remained they were the only reasons to be seen.

They call Fujino mad all the time, he thought, furious at the conundrum he could not solve. And Fujino is mad, barking mad. But it's Himemiya who bears watching. It's Himemiya that's the real abnormality.

"You can't object," he protested. "The senior consul must lead the army at times like this. The Princeps said as much earlier, I believe."

Chikane actually looked at him sourly, having seen something of the intense aversion for her that had just filled him.

"I can object and I did," she answered with immense hauteur. "Do you now presume to tell me, the senior consul, the bounds of my activity? As for the Princeps, he was speaking about my leading this meeting, which is quite another thing from my leading the mission. I actually have reasons for declining, which the House would find most sensible."

"Then by all means," he said dryly, sweeping one arm in a lavish gesture. "Let us hear it."

Chikane's cousin cleared her throat showily from her bench.

"I believe she used the plural," she said. "So it should be 'let us hear them'."

"Tace !" shrieked Haruka Armitage; she had had enough of Urumi's malicious penchant for correcting the grammar of the senators-especially since she was the most common target of said penchant. "Rein in your cousin, Himemiya, or I'll wring her neck from here!"

Urumi stared at the woman, who was about nine metres away.

"How do you propose to do that from there?" she said with false incredulity.

Haruka prepared to unleash her most blistering invectives.

"Order," sighed the senior consul.

Urumi straightened her posture, folded both hands atop demurely closed knees, and shut her mouth with a smile of beatific superiority.

Haruka subsided, as stunned by the senatorial chameleon as she was appalled by it.

"For Juno's sake," chuckled Chie beside Shizuru, muffling the sound with her hand. "Doesn't she realise by now that Himemiya's cousin does it only to get a rise out of her? I saw it after only one meeting!"

"Did I not say it earlier, Chie-han?" Shizuru whispered back. "Their eyes are too tightly shut to see anything."

Meanwhile, Chikane had begun her explanation for refusing to lead the army.

"I would remind you it is already halfway into August," she told the assembled senators. "Only four months are left of my consulship, out of which two shall be spent in preparation and conduct of the elections. You would recall I swore to refine our electoral processes and legislation during my time in office. If I am out of the city, the compound of laws I have already drafted-which I was scheduled to present in the next session, as you recall-would most likely be set aside and might moulder away. And when would I get another opportunity such as this to ensure their passage, fellow senators? Ten years from now? Five? Even only one year away would be far too long! Too many elections have been delayed and questioned in the past years for comfort. Whether it is on allegations of bribery or some other foul play, these issues stain the very machinery of the state. I shall have no more of these electoral travesties, dearest colleagues, especially when the last one threatened to collapse the very foundations of the Republic! I shall have an end to such problems, so I swear again!"

The look on her face told them that she was determined to make good on her words.

"The upcoming curule elections are also best overseen by the consuls," she said. " Not by other magistrates, as I was forced to do last year when both consuls were absent and I was the urban praetor. The untimely death of the junior consul and the senior consul's inability to return to Hime quickly created a situation where I-and several other officials-had to take over the tasks that the consuls should have overseen, thus adding to our duties and creating a backlog in many offices. The absence of both consuls also delayed last year's elections so badly that the final election day actually coincided with the first day of this year. Far too late for comfort. And all because of overly relaxed laws on electoral policy and a series of unfortunate circumstances."

"It is obviously bad for the consuls to be out of Hime," she told them, while ignoring Haruka Armitage's glare: obviously that worthy had taken the insinuation that last year's electoral travesties had been her fault, owing to her failure to return on time from her African campaign.

"The consuls," she said, "are the highest of our magistracies, which is why their names are put up forever on the consular fasti after their term of office, there to be remembered forever. And they deserve to be remembered forever. To be a consul is not merely to be responsible for Hime the city: it is also to be responsible for Hime and all Himean provinces and peoples everywhere. The consuls are chief over all the spinners forever crafting and recrafting the growing web of Hime's influence. It stands to reason that, as chief overseers, they should remain as much as possible at the heart of the web."

"Now, if a threat arises close enough to the heart to facilitate swift congress between the threat's location and the centre, I would say it makes sense for consuls to be sent on the field," she continued with a conciliatory tone. "But the Northern Provinces are not so very close; the Mentulaean Empire is even farther away. This is further complicated by the fact that the consular and praetorian provinces have already been decided and all of them are located in contrary directions, bearing south to the east and to the west. Whomever we send north must be someone who can leave now and shall not evacuate the northern area suddenly out of a commitment to another province or office after his or her term."

She was coming to it; everyone listening tensed.

"Thus whomever we send to fight the Mentulae requires several things," she concluded. "First and naturally, experience in that area's terrain and skill on the field. Second, immediate availability and sufficient authority to act on behalf of Hime and her consuls, whom he or she would be technically freeing up to execute their proper tasks in office. Third and most importantly, a guarantee of command for at least five years, subject to extension should it prove insufficient to finish the task in such time. The task is not simply to drive the Mentulae out of our northern lands. It is also to subdue them and ensure the future peace of that area in perpetuity."

"Senior consul," wheezed Jin Akagi, gasping from the speed of Chikane's speech. "You are talking about invasion and annexation."

"Yes, I am talking about those. Surely no one expected we would do otherwise with the Mentulae, especially after the news that brought us to this meeting here?" Chikane's lips turned up faintly at the corners. "As is clear from this, the person we send must have occupied an office no lower than praetor at least once in his or her life-current occupants of such offices are to be preferred, naturally, save for the present consuls, for reasons I have already given. The person we depute cannot undertake a task as large as annexing a new territory otherwise, for it would require, at the very least, a grant of advanced gubernatorial imperium extending for five years and extendable thereafter if needed. In other words, whomever we choose shall have to function as both general of an army and military governor of what shall become Hime's newest territories."

"I see what you mean, though I don't think you're going far enough, senior consul," someone cut in.

A quick search told Chikane the one who had spoken was the current praetor urbanus, who had been recently moved up into that position from praetor peregrinus after the resolution permitting Shizuru to escape the top praetorian seat.

"I agree," the urban praetor continued, "that whomever we send has to have an advance grant of gubernatorial imperium to function as annexing governor in the lands currently part of the Mentulaean Empire. But the mission would also involve going through the provinces Sosia and Argus. They already have governors, and there could be a question of whose imperium outranks whose. As to why that question would arise..."

A rude snort from among the ranks.

"Don't think you need to explain why, Ginga-san," said the man who had snorted. "I think even we have to admit that our generals and governors often butt heads over who's got more authority in one place or another. Even when there are more important things to be done than play ' My stick is bigger than yours '."

"Quite so, Hajime-san," Chikane said to the sarcastic remark. "And thank you for pointing out that difficulty, Ginga-san. I was coming to it, in fact. Given the breadth and demands of the campaign, the mandate for the future Mentulaeen Province shall carry with it a proconsular imperium, comparable to that given for the governors of the Spanish Provinces. That would make it a higher imperium than the proprætorian ones granted to the governors of the Sosia and Argus Provinces. This is sensible and satisfactory, I hope?"

The praetor urbanus nodded thoughtfully.

"These provisions should be added, I think, to Wang-san's earlier proposal," Chikane went on. "And the part about me being the commander of the deputation should be excised, of course. There are others better suited to that role, truly."

"Say her name," said Sergay, shaking in fury. "Say her name already, senior consul!"

Chikane turned to him again.

"Whose name, Wang-san?" she asked mildly. "You seem to have a distinct idea of whose name I shall suggest, or so I would think."

Everyone shot bolt upright. Sergay's teeth were grinding close to powder inside his mouth.

" Shizuru Fujino," he muttered.

The wave crested over the senior consul's head. The senior consul smiled at it.

"Shizuru Fujino," she said.

The wave broke. Suddenly chairs were scraping, and every archconservative or Fujino enemy found his voice and feet with a vengeance.

"Again the senior consul panders to her friend!" shrieked someone the listening Shizuru later identified as her old foe, Nakao. "What a day for Hime! Overrun by barbarians in the north and conscienceless plotters at home!"

"I won't allow it!" chorused Akagi, hands on his toga as though he would rip it. "Shizuru Fujino won't get that command, she'll never get it-unless she gets it over my dead body !"

"And mine!"

Sergay alone was silent among those in protest, though he remained standing to indicate his solidarity with the dissenters. He also continued to stare at the person dominating the curule dais: his gaze resentful and wondering.

"Please, fellow senators!" the Princeps was shouting. He too was up from his chair. "Order, I say! Speak one at a time!"

But the furore continued unabated. The other senators were struck dumb by the torrent of resentment the senior consul had unleashed and could only look about themselves wildly, lost eyes seeking a quiet corner where the arrows would not hit. How the Traditionalist missiles were flying today! And only Shizuru Fujino, thought some with wry amusement, could sit there so calmly as though all the bows were not aiming for her ears.

Amidst the gabble, one voice dominated.

"Now we get to what you really want, don't we?" Haruka screeched towards the curule dais; she kicked away her chair and it toppled to the centre of the floor in a clatter. "You're mad if you think I'll let you gift-wrap a present for your boon companion while we're dealing with a serious issue here! You should be ashamed of yourself, Himemiya! Ashamed !"

"It's you who should be ashamed, Armitage!" hollered Chie, who had had enough by this time. She jumped up from beside Shizuru, who continued to look unconcerned.

"Block it from the only person here who'd stand the best chance against the Mentulae?" Chie yelled, showing she could produce a voice to equal Haruka's when needed. "And for what? For whom, even? The senior consul's at least put up a recommendation with her objection, but you haven't even put a name to yours, have you?"

"I shouldn't need to!" Haruka roared in response. "It's obviously the junior consul who must go! The junior consul takes precedence over a mere praetor who'd only use that command to enrich herself! If the senior consul won't do it, then the junior consul can!"

"That's so!" agreed Sergay shakily, finally coming out of his silence. "Himemiya's already denied the job, so it should be offered first to her colleague, Yukino Kikukawa."

"Ye gods, Kikukawa couldn't general herself out of a barroom brawl!" someone groaned.

" Tace, cunnus! "

"He has a point, Armitage," Chie yelled again. "Our junior consul's no mean politician, but not even you can imagine she's the equal of Shizuru Fujino as a commander. What makes you think she can lead an army against a horde of savages? She hasn't even been leading this senate hearing!"

"All because of you and your cronies, Harada!" Haruka yelled back. "If not for you and the rest of the Fujino pawns, it'd be obvious that Yukino Kikukawa deserves that position first of all! It should be the junior consul, fellow senators! If Shizuru Fujino really wants to wage war in the north, let her offer her services to the woman who deserves the generaling position! Let her apply as a legate to Yukino Kikukawa!"

Which actually had Shizuru coming out of her abstraction enough to glare at Haruka, and the usually laid-back Shizuma on her feet, silver hair a halo about her head.

"Are you daft, Armitage?" she shouted to Haruka, ignoring the fact that she had no right to speak, being a backbencher. "My cousin, a subordinate? And to that?"

The junior consul's face contorted. It was Haruka who replied: "You shut your mouth, you pedarius, you philandering whore!"

"And you shut yours, you suppurating sack of cant!"

"It stands to reason," Urumi announced, when a pause during which all participants finally ran out of breath. "The only praetor with an undecided province as of yet is Shizuru Fujino! She's also the only one here of sufficient experience to lead the army against the Mentulae and in those territories. The legions stationed there and near the area are already and still her veterans, soldiers who have worked with her successfully. Who then has a better claim to that command?"

But Haruka had found her second wind and was again screaming.

"Those soldiers are only still hers because she still won't give up her imperium, a year after the whole business! This is blackmail, fellow senators! Don't give that command to the blackmailer! Don't give in to her! Give it to Yukino Kikukawa, senators, not to a woman who only wants to do it so she can use it for her own motives!"

"Oh, Armitage-san," said a disgusted Chikane from the dais, voice actually rising too. "You harp so much on why she would do it, when the why does not matter here! Why she would do it is not germane to the present conversation. Any one of us would have a good reason to take the command! Be it the prospect of earning a triumph, or some other military coup for the undertaking, or the simple monetary reward of booty, every one of us would have a Why To Do It! What separates Shizuru Fujino from the rest is that she also has a How To Do It! You talk so much of the motive that you forget no one is untouched by them, which means that we should cull our commander not by virtue of his or her aims, but rather by virtue of his or her talents and experience. And in the total compound of those terms, Shizuru Fujino outstrips everyone!"

But the Traditionalists had started to pound their feet on the floor and howl, led by a Haruka who kept the beat up like a hortator going wild on the drum. Echoing an unyielding "No, no, no!" The sound shook Bellona and the people outside it gathered, wishing the lictors would open the portals already and let them have a peek. Wishing the senators would give them a treat and come out of those great doors swinging fists at each other.

Had the session gone on any longer, the last wish might have been fulfilled, so hot was the mood of the House. But when both consuls and the Princeps realised that no amount of shrilling for order would make the cries cease, and when some of the hotheads of either faction began to get up and push their way towards their opponents in search of more physical expression, Chikane swept from the curule dais and cried that the meeting was ended and that she was ordering-not asking, but ordering-everyone to leave. With the aid of the lictors and some of the calmer senators, the command was finally enforced.

"By rights you should have stopped some of the hysteria with the lictors, Kikukawa-san," she told her miserable-looking junior colleague afterwards; they were watching the stream of toga-clad bodies dwindle through the doors. "You are, after all, the consul bearing the fasces for the month, which means you had more leeway to use the lictors than I did, in the absence of an extreme situation. Of course I understand that it would have been difficult for someone in your position to do as I wish you had. And for that, I am sorry."

She left her colleague more miserable than ever.

"A pox on Himemiya! How did we ever elect such a senior consul?" demanded Akagi of Yukino later, when the Temple of Bellona had cleared of all but the heads of the archconservative faction. He could not know he was fanning the flames of unrest gnawing in Yukino's mind, so he continued to address his diatribe to her.

"Can you believe she was to give it to Fujino instead?" he ranted. "I would have said she was in the pay of the woman had she been of a different family! Jupiter, she shames her name!"

"The woman's not right," Sergay said. Yukino thought he sounded puzzled for some reason. "Really, not perfectly right in the head. Not perfectly wrong either, though, I think."

"Curse them!"

It was Haruka, who came up at a rush and was still puffing with anger.

"Did you hear Fujino's cousin?" she demanded of the rest, who had indeed heard. "How dare she say that!"

Yukino flinched as her best friend snatched her arm with painful strength. Why was it Haruka always forgot she was flimsier, more brittle?

"Ginga spoke earlier," Sergay brought up, recalling the urban praetor's words. He ran a hand through his hair, tousling the carefully barbered strands. "From the way she talked, I'd say the Jinguuji faction is in support of Fujino and Himemiya's scheme now."

His friends stared at him, aghast.

"But the Jinguuji are conservative!" Hikaru Senou cried.

"Essentially, but not so conservative they would miss an opportunity to expand their interests if offered it. We have to assume they got such an offer, since Ginga is known to be their latest paid pawn."

Yukino had a qualm.

"I wouldn't call her a mere pawn," she qualified, looking very thoughtful and sombre.

"Never mind what we'd call her!" Haruka finally let go of the scrawny arm in her hand. "What does it matter?"

I think it matters, Yukino answered in her mind. Haruka went off again on another rant and the discussion proceeded for a while that way, with all of them venting their spleen on their foes. All of a sudden, Yukino said something that silenced their talk.

"Would it be so bad if she got that command?"

Her companions all gaped at her, shocked.

"I was thinking," she said hastily, "that Fujino-san's dangerous already when she's far away. But she's ten times more dangerous when she's here in Fuuka, because she can actually respond immediately to our actions. So would it be so bad if she got sent away due to an overseas command?"

"Giving her that command," said an outraged Akagi, "would be giving in to the woman. How can you even think of it, Yukino-san? Can't you see what a-a- a danger Fujino is? The woman would keep pushing for more if we gave her anything now! She represents every danger that exists to the Hime, every radical element we've sworn to guard against. We have to stop her soon or else she'll bring the whole Republic crashing about our ears!"

"But it would be harder for her to do that if she weren't here," Yukino persevered. "She was easier to deal with, you remember, when she wasn't here. So I can't help but think it would be wiser for us to let her have her way and go back to the North. Then we can manoeuvre more comfortably. At the moment, I don't really think we're doing much aside from keeping the thorn close to our side."

"Better in our side than in the heart of the Republic!" Haruka trumpeted, wondering what was the matter with her best friend.

"According to Himemiya-san earlier, this is the heart of the Republic," the junior consul responded with spontaneous dryness, catching herself at the sight of Haruka's face. So much concern! And so much fear, so much real terror at the idea that her faithful Yukino might be losing nerve. Ah, poor Haruka! Yukino knew she could not do this to the woman at the moment, not in front of their other friends.

"But maybe you're right," she said quietly, calming some of the terror in the purple eyes. "It was just an idea."

"Not a very good one," Hikaru muttered.

Yukino gave him a sickly smile in response. The discussion proceeded again without her participation save as an auditor, and after only a few moments she heard the sharp crack of realisation break upon her.

Oh! she thought, still listening to them. I see why we never get anywhere! They're so adamant about standing ground. Even when I explain that giving ground in some ways can become an advantage, they refuse to do it. Everything has to be done by force and advance. No concessions to the enemy at all costs, which tells me they're not really fighting the enemy to win-they do it just to harass. Haruka-chan herself is the best example for that. She would never give Fujino-san an inch, even if giving that inch meant a later gain of a mile. And if I can't change Haruka-chan's mind, how can I hope to change the others'? They don't know how to bend, and I can't bend them by my will alone. No one could.

But then she remembered their foes and the awesome will some of them seemed to radiate by nature.

Is it just that I don't have enough will for it, then? How much will does it take and why do I not have enough? Can it be gained? Can it be found by some method or procedure? Or is it just another of those things on the lap of Fate, which throws beauty to some and brains to others, then proceeds to dower the rest with mediocrity or downright ugliness? Is the will another of those things you have in abundance by simple luck of the draw?

If that was so, why was it that some people seemed to have such luck that they drew all the good when they were born? And why was it that there were others who seemed to have come to the draw late, like her?

"Our problem is that we're not just coming up against one political mastermind," she said aloud, to reinsert herself into the conversation and take herself away from her thoughts. "It's two of them, working together. Or perhaps I'd better say three, considering the President of the Tribunes of the Plebs."

"Don't tell me you're still considering giving in!" Haruka's scowled in exasperation.

"If you all are against it, I know I can't do much about that," Yukino smiled in exasperation. "Only..."

"Only?"

She took a deep breath and came out with it: "Only, I wish that you hadn't mentioned Fujino-san applying to me as a legate earlier."

Haruka was stunned.

"That would be the proper thing for her!" she squawked. " You're the junior consul."

"I know that, Haruka-chan," Yukino soothed. "I just don't think it was a - a very good idea to throw something like that in her face."

" Don't you want to bring her down? "

"I do want that. I do, yes." The junior consul pressed wearily on the lids of her aching eyes, suddenly looking far older than her years.

"It's not that I'm losing my resolve, Haruka-chan, I promise. I'm not giving up. It's just that I don't think it's wise to taunt a giant before its face hits the ground."

---

The giant of Yukino's remark stalked home in high dudgeon, every footfall a tremor upon the earth.

How dare she! she raved while on the way to her villa. How dare Haruka Armitage? How could she have spoken such a ludicrous thought in the session earlier? Did she-do any of them, even-think Shizuru would take an offer that condescending? A suggestion that laughable?

The junior consul was correct in thinking her taunted by Haruka's remark about volunteering her subordinate services to Yukino Kikukawa as a superior. Not even for Chikane would Shizuru lower herself to the position of legate, after all. Why, her dignitas would be devastated beyond repair! She, possessor of several military awards including the corona obsidionalis, a yet undefeated commander, to take a legatal position subordinate to an untried general? The fools would put a donkey's harness on a war charger! Damn them for thinking she would deign to play the ass!

How my girl would laugh, she muttered. And how she would weep did I ever agree to such a proposition.

A vicious shiver went up her spine.

Very well then, she decided. It was time to teach the archconservatives a lesson. Time to take the question of command to the Centuriate Assembly and teach the Senate something it had forgotten: that although it decided on matters military, it was not actually the final word on them. Prior to this she had harboured some hesitations over going so far so quickly, not least because she was the sort of woman who genuinely refrained from crossing lines until circumstances forced her to cross them. Part of the hesitation too had been her own inability to believe that the archconservatives would deny her even now. She had credited them with sufficient sense at least to yield after Chikane presented all the reasons to their very faces. It was so unreasonable to resist the reasons! Yet their hate of her apparently outweighed all good sense in such matters... and did she do nothing, Hime would be the one to suffer.

"I did not think they would actually push me so far," she admitted to the friends she had invited over: a circle made up of those she trusted and needed most for what was to come. "I planned for it too, of course, which you know. But I did not want it as the first measure, merely as a reinforcement of the senatorial decree granting me the mission. I did not genuinely believe I would have to do it the other way around. If only because for them to make circumstances thus would have been, I thought, the height of folly."

A pair of tempestuous eyes flashed across the table.

"Well, you would be generous, cousin," sneered Shizuma, chin on her hand. "You credit the bastards with more intellect than I ever did."

Shizuru's face softened as she eyed her cousin, thinking of how the older woman had stood up for her earlier. And been called a whore by Armitage for her pains-oh, how that made the blood curdle!

"That aside," Shizuma went on. "Your plans look rather troubled."

It was another voice that responded.

"That is an unexpectedly mild way of putting it."

Shizuma turned to the lounging senior consul.

"Not in character, was it, Chikane?" she smirked. "I suppose I should cease the poetry then, and go on to the prose."

She faced her cousin again.

"Shizuru, your chances at that command suddenly appear bleak. I expected difficulty, yes, but not opposition that obdurate!" She pulled a face. "What I saw today was the archconservative mob up in full force, and marshalling even more support than usual, in fact. I predict the number of people on their side should have doubled by the next meeting, as we can expect them to be trolling all avenues of blood and ties tonight, down to the last dead-end alley!"

There was a chuckle from the fourth member of their meeting.

"Oh, wonderfully enough," she said to their enquiring gazes, "that was more poetic than before."

"My cousin has a naturally wonderful turn of phrase, Urumi-chan," Shizuru answered.

Shizuma spared a dry glance for both commentators-who, she thought, would wittify and waft rhetoric even to their deathbeds. These intellectuals !

"You'll pardon me for being blunt," she muttered. "What I was trying to say is that we all know from the exhibition today that you stand little-to-no chance of being given that command by the House, I believe. I must confess that the last scheme you pulled-the bill settling the issue of your praetorship, that is-has not endeared you very much to the other senators. They are currently predisposed to siding against you and thus with the conservatives because a lot of them still feel, even though that bill was passed in assembly, that what you did was highly unconstitutional. The only reason that bill passed was because your popularity among the knights is elevated, whereas your popularity with the senators drops further and further."

"In this situation, however, it's the latter popularity you need," she continued. "And since it's unfortunately the one that is uncomfortable, I fail to see how all your support among the knights can help you. No doubt it's why the Traditionalists felt justified in throwing that sort of display earlier. They shall pull at every string they have to swing the senators against you, cousin... and sheep, even given an idiot of a shepherd, swing easily enough. Especially when you have that much weight concentrated on one end of the motion."

Her cousin sighed once she had finished.

"Summed up admirably," Shizuru said through the sigh.

"And irritatingly, I'm sure," was Shizuma's retort. "So what do you intend to do now?"

"Still to get the command, of course."

Shizuru set down her goblet on the console table and let her gaze touch the other three faces in the room one by one.

"Shizuma, only you have never heard me discuss this option among the people here," she started. "Chikane and Urumi-chan have already heard it, for the reason that I knew they would prove necessary were this plan ever to be implemented the way it must be now."

Shizuma was curious, but also wise enough not to feel left-out.

"What is it?" she asked.

"I plan to gain the command not by decree of the senate, but rather by decree of the comitia ."

Shizuma's eyes went wide. The other two visitors, knowing it already, said and did naught.

"I shall have to bring the issue up in the Centuriate Assembly now," Shizuru explained. "Because the Popular Assembly would, I estimate, take more time-and I have not time to spare any longer, you understand. Furthermore, a decree from the Centuriate Assembly would come from the people considered Hime's best, the upper classes, which at least allows for some satisfaction of exclusivity and privilege. The intent is to have the Centuries decree me the commander of the Northern Campaign. My command shall then be passed into law, a safer thing by far than a decree of the House that can be taken away at the senators' whims."

"It's a very neat concept," Urumi complimented, smiling with sheer intellectual pleasure. Shizuru nodded, genuinely gratified by her fellow prodigy's approval.

"Hold. Hold, the both of you." Shizuma was still reeling from the novelty of the idea; she flapped a hand in distraction. "What do you mean? How can that even be possible, Shizuru? The Centuries have never dealt with issues of command or campaigns."

"Yes, but they've always had the legal right to do so," Urumi answered before Shizuru could. "The only reason the Senate has handled those issues for so long has been an implicit assumption that its decisions on such matters are automatically ratified and thus don't even need to be sent to the assemblies. But all the House's decisions, from a legal standpoint, are strictly mere consulta or senatorial recommendations. Not laws, which is why many consulta on other subjects are still sent to the assemblies to be ratified by the People."

She wriggled with enjoyment of the subject she was explaining.

